Still, it isn't certain PSA will make a bid for P&O, one of Britain's oldest companies, founded in 1840. Singapore port operator PSA, which has been granted access to the same nonpublic financial information that was given to Dubai Ports, has a little more than two weeks to review the data and decide. Dubai Ports, meanwhile, has said it is reviewing the situation carefully.

Expansion Dreams

Like Dubai Ports, PSA -- the world's second-biggest operator by number of containers handled, according to the London maritime advisory service Drewry Shipping Consultants Ltd. -- is eager to expand beyond its small home base and grab a share of bigger cargo markets in Asia, Europe and North America. The container-ports industry has received a jolt of energy during recent years, thanks to a surge in manufactured exports from China and other Asian nations.

Analysts see any showdown for P&O as a further sign that container-port companies are starting to gobble each other up just as some of their shipping-line customers have done. "If you want to make it into the super-big league, then this is the last opportunity to get in," says an investment-bank analyst whose bank is advising one of P&O's potential buyers.

By containers handled, P&O is the world's fourth-biggest operator, behind No. 3 APM Terminals, the port-operating arm of A.P. Moeller-Maersk of Denmark; No. 2 PSA; and No. 1 Hutchison Port Holdings, part of the Hong Kong-listed conglomerate Hutchison Whampoa Ltd. Dubai Ports ranks seventh world-wide.

P&O operates at 29 ports around the world, including Baltimore, Miami, New Orleans and Newark, N.J., where it has a 50% stake in the Port Newark Container Terminal. Neither PSA nor Dubai Ports has a presence in the U.S.

People close to the matter expect Dubai Ports to try to stop PSA should it make a formal bid. If it does bid, PSA has said, it would match the terms of Dubai Ports' offer. That would include pumping money into the London company's pension plan, a move that would require approval from the pension trustees, which Dubai Ports has received.

Prize Catch

Since both PSA and Dubai Ports are already among the world's top port operators, P&O's board would likely accept the higher bid.

With container operations world-wide, P&O would be a rare prize for either buyer, in an industry with few remaining opportunities for substantial growth through a single acquisition. The pair have tangled once already, in 2004, when Dubai Ports outbid PSA for the global port assets of CSX Corp., of Jacksonville, Fla. "The U.S. assets under P&O are a great attraction to any potential bidders, given the difficulties to get into this market," says Cusson Leung of Merrill Lynch in Hong Kong.

If PSA bids for and acquires P&O, it would overtake industry leader Hutchison. If Dubai Ports prevails, it would rise to No. 2, ahead of PSA by container count, according to 2004 figures compiled by Drewry. Dubai Ports, based in the United Arab Emirates' sheikhdom of Dubai, is the overseas arm of the state-run ports operator.

A Hutchison spokesman declined to comment on Hutchison's likely response to any battle.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

U.S. Officials Confirm Miners Tried To Escape After Blast (NYT)

By Felicity Barringer

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 11 - As questions persisted about violations of safety requirements at the Sago Mine in West Virginia, federal regulators on Wednesday confirmed reports that the 12 miners trapped after the Jan. 2 explosion started to walk toward the exit, only to turn back and take shelter in the farthest recesses of the mine.

DOJ_NMG_0009259

But the regulators said they had heard nothing to confirm an account by relatives of the only survivor that the men had tried to force their way out in a rail car but that their escape route had been blocked by debris. Rescuers found no such blockage, the regulators said.

All but one of those 12 trapped miners died of carbon monoxide poisoning, as did one other who was close to the blast site. Only Randal McCloy Jr., 27, was found alive. He remains in a coma, in critical but stable condition at the West Virginia University Hospitals, the medical center said.

Asked why the miners changed course, Robert Friend, the acting deputy assistant secretary at the federal Mine Safety and Health Administration, said, "We're waiting for Mr. McCloy to tell us."

On Wednesday, hospital spokesmen and the F.B.I. also warned that an Internet-based campaign soliciting money on Mr. McCloy's behalf was a hoax.

Mr. Friend and Ray McKinney, administrator for coal mine safety and health, told reporters on Capitol Hill on Wednesday that two mine rescue teams arrived at the mine five and a half hours after the 6:30 a.m. explosion on Jan. 2, but that it was not until 4 p.m. that carbon monoxide levels began to drop enough that the safety team managers felt rescuers could enter the mine.

Mr. McKinney said the first rescue team entered the mine at 5:25 p.m., and slowly made its way down the main tunnel. With three teams working in shifts, they found the miners' tracks at 8 p.m. on Jan. 3.

Three hours later, they found Mr. McCloy, unconscious and groaning, and the 12 other miners dead. A PowerPoint version of the timeline that Mr. McKinney gave reporters is uat the Web site for the agency, www.msha.gov.

Mr. McKinney's account did not resolve some disputes.

For one point, the mining company has always maintained, and Mr. McKinney repeated, that a second crew in the mine that day, which emerged safely, had six men. But four miners in that group say it numbered 13, and one miner provided the names and job titles for all 13.

For another point, 12 significant violations of fire-safety regulations that federal officials listed on Tuesday did not, Mr. McKinney said, constitute a pattern of misconduct that would have warranted closing the mine. Industry critics say the violations gave the agency ample cause to close the mine until new practices were instituted.

In a news conference on Wednesday, Ben Hatfield, the chief executive of the International Coal Group, which owns the mine, defended its safety efforts, according to The Associated Press. Mr. Hatfield said the company had reconstructed two miles of the primary escape path, upgraded the mine rail system and instituted employee safety training that exceeded legal requirements.

"In my opinion," he said, "the Sago Mine was a safe operation."

Interior Department To Open Alaskan Land To Oil Drilling (WP)

By Justin Blum

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

The Interior Department yesterday agreed to open about 400,000 acres on Alaska's North Slope for exploratory oil drilling, an area that previously had been off limits because of concerns about the impact on wildlife.

Officials said they would lease acreage in the northeastern corner of the National Petroleum Reserve-Alaska to oil companies to provide access to domestic oil supplies.

"We recognize . . . the energy needs of this nation," said Susan Childs, an official with the Bureau of Land Management. "So, hopefully, this will alleviate some of the pressure."

Government officials said that the area of the preserve opened yesterday has significant potential for oil development. They estimate it contains about 2 billion barrels of oil that is economically recoverable, along with 3.5 trillion cubic feet of natural gas. The United States consumes more than 20 million barrels of oil per day.

Much of the 23.5 million-acre petroleum reserve already is open to oil development. The reserve, created in 1923, is located west of the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge, long a flashpoint in the debate over allowing oil drilling versus protecting the environment.

DOJ_NMG_0009260

Childs said the land opened yesterday could be drilled with "minimal" impact on wildlife, a conclusion that environmentalists dispute.

The area -- particularly near Teshekpuk Lake -- has been a focal point of concern among environmentalists. They say oil operations would disrupt an area where thousands of brant geese and white-fronted geese molt. They also predicted harm to caribou and tundra swans.

"This is the single most important goose molting area in the arctic," said Stanley Senner, executive director of Audubon Alaska. "It will mean fewer birds."

The Bureau of Land Management proposed opening the area a year ago. But it was not until yesterday that an Interior Department official, Deputy Assistant Secretary Chad Calvert, approved a modified version of that plan.

The area near Teshekpuk Lake was put off limits to drilling during the Reagan administration. The Clinton administration expanded the restricted area.

But the Bureau of Land Management says technological advances in oil drilling allow drilling to occur without the impact previously feared. Drilling will be allowed about a quarter-mile from the lake.

Bureau officials said they would conduct further study on the impact to molting geese before allowing permanent drilling.

U.S. Lifts Longtime Drilling Ban On Alaskan Wildlife Habitat (LAT)

By Janet Wilson

The Los Angeles Times, January 12, 2006

The Department of Interior on Wednesday approved oil and gas drilling on Alaska land considered such sensitive wildlife habitat that it was first protected by former Interior Secretary James G. Watt under President Reagan, and by four Interior secretaries since.

The decision — decried by Native American, hunting and environmental groups — comes just weeks after the U.S. Senate rejected drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge, about 200 miles to the east.

Bureau of Land Management staff said the decision was made after three years of study and in response to requests by Vice President Dick Cheney's energy task force.

The plan, signed by Deputy Assistant Interior Secretary Chad Calvert, will open up more than 500,000 acres in and around Teshekpuk Lake on Alaska's oil-rich North Slope. BLM officials estimate the northeast National Petroleum Reserve, including the lake area, may contain as much as 2 billion barrels of "economically recoverable" oil.

The area is a critical stop for molting geese on the Pacific flyway, with as many as 90,000 birds resting in flat wetlands in the summer. Up to 46,000 caribou also use areas near the lake for calving and migration paths.

Although many Alaskans welcome drilling as an economic boon, some native leaders in the state blasted the decision.

"There are a lot of frustrated people in our community right now," said Dora Nukapigak, who lives in the small Inupiat Eskimo village of Nuiqsut, at the eastern edge of the reserve, where many people depend on caribou as a food source. "It's a very sensitive area. It seems like regardless of what we say or do with BLM, they'll do what they're going to do anyways, and that's drill."

Former Interior Secretary Watt, often derided by environmentalists for other actions, protected more than 200,000 acres of the goose-molting area north of the lake from oil and gas drilling in the early 1980s. His successors under Reagan and President George H.W. Bush maintained those protections. Under President Clinton, Bruce Babbitt expanded bans against drilling around and on the lake to more than half a million acres.

BLM officials acknowledged that the area is important for wildlife and subsistence hunting, and said their plan was "very, very rigorous" in requiring environmental protection and mitigation.

No surface drilling will be allowed on 242,000 acres considered vital for molting geese, or on another 244,000 acres used by caribou. Slant drilling will be allowed under those surfaces from adjoining land. Pipelines must be seven feet high, at least initially, to allow caribou and hunters to pass beneath.

A maximum of 2,100 acres total in seven different zones can be permanently disturbed on the surface, and a three-year study will be conducted of molting geese, BLM staff said.

DOJ_NMG_0009261

Leasing of the lands could begin by September, after reviews by a state coastal agency and a regional planning agency, although drilling on the lake will be deferred for 10 years.

"We have done a very good job balancing the subsistence resources while allowing some areas to be opened to oil and gas drilling," said Susan Childs, energy and mineral planning coordinator for BLM's Alaska office, which oversees the plan.

"Our mission is to provide for multiple uses. A part of our mission is to protect wildlife, but also part of our mission is to allow for the development of resources. Our job is to find that balance in oil and gas mining," said BLM Alaska spokeswoman Jody Weil.

But conservation groups blasted the plan and said there were no guarantees the restrictions would remain in place.

"They're notorious for granting waivers to their own rules," said Stanley E. Senner, a biologist who is executive director of Audubon Alaska.

"This plan is utterly unbalanced. Even the Reagan administration protected the waterfowl habitat around Teshekpuk Lake because of its world-class ecological and cultural value," Senner said. "No one should be fooled by the window dressing … this plan makes every last acre available for oil development."

Chuck Clusen, director of the Natural Resource Defense Council's Alaska Project, said the BLM "is supposed to balance all values of our public lands. Giving 100% to the oil industry is not what anyone would call balanced."

Times Staff Writer Sam Howe Verhovek in Seattle contributed to this report.

Warming Tied To Extinction Of Frog Species (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

Rising temperatures are responsible for pushing dozens of frog species over the brink of extinction in the past three decades, according to findings being reported today by a team of Latin American and U.S. scientists.

The study, published in the journal Nature, provides compelling evidence that climate change has already helped wipe out a slew of species and could spur more extinctions and the spread of diseases worldwide. It also helps solve the international mystery of why amphibians around the globe have been vanishing from their usual habitats over the past quarter-century -- as many as 112 species have disappeared since 1980.

Scientists have speculated that rising temperatures and changing weather patterns could endanger the survival of many species, but the new study documents for the first time a direct correlation between global warming and the disappearance of around 65 amphibian species in Central and South America.

The fate of amphibians -- whose permeable skin makes them sensitive to environmental changes -- is seen by scientists as a possible harbinger of global warming's effects. Rising temperatures are threatening the survival of flora and fauna worldwide, including coral reefs in the Caribbean, which serve as critical fish nurseries, and South African rhododendrons, which cannot move to a cooler climate.

J. Alan Pounds -- the resident scientist at the Tropical Science Center's Monteverde Cloud Forest Preserve in Costa Rica and the study's lead author -- worked with 13 other researchers to pin down the link between rising tropical temperatures and the spread of the deadly chytrid fungus that has wiped out dozens of species of harlequin frogs in recent years.

"Disease is the bullet killing frogs, but climate change is pulling the trigger," Pounds said. "Global warming is wreaking havoc on amphibians and will cause staggering losses of biodiversity if we don't do something first."

The paper helps explain how global warming has allowed the chytrid fungus -- which kills frogs by growing on their skin and attacking their epidermis and teeth, as well as by releasing a toxin -- to thrive in Costa Rica and neighboring countries. The higher temperatures result in more water vapor in the air, which in turn forms a cloud cover that leads to cooler days and warmer nights. These conditions favor the fungus, which grows and reproduces best at temperatures between 63 and 77 degrees Fahrenheit.

At least 110 species of the vibrantly colored amphibians once lived near streams in the Central and South American tropics, but about two-thirds disappeared in the 1980s and 1990s, including the golden toad. While researchers had previously identified the fungus as a major reason for the frogs' demise, they have been trying determine why the disease has taken such a major toll in recent years.

DOJ_NMG_0009262

Looking at more than 65 harlequin frog species that had vanished, researchers found that 80 percent of the time there was a correlation between higher temperatures and the species' disappearance. After a warm peak in 1987, for example, five species died off.

"There's a coherent pattern of disappearances, all the way from Costa Rica to Peru," Pounds said in an interview. "Here's a case where we can show that global warming is affecting outbreaks of this disease."

Amphibians are experiencing a precipitous decline in Africa, Asia and North America, according to a comprehensive 2004 survey, which cited climate change as well as deforestation, pollution and habitat loss as key factors.

"We have a biodiversity crisis," said Andrew Blaustein, director of Oregon State University's graduate programs in environmental science. "Amphibians seem to be harder hit than other groups."

Michael Totten, senior director for climate and water initiatives at the environmental group Conservation International, said humans have made it more difficult for animal and plant species to adapt to the shifting climate by fragmenting natural habitat. "Traditionally species have been resilient and capable of going through dramatic climate change, but with humans changing the face of the landscape, we've created lots of prisons for species, and that's the major problem they face," he said.

Stanford University climatologist Stephen Schneider said the new research represents "a creative step in the right direction, but it's still early in the game to sound the 'solved' bell." He added that the study is "just further evidence" that global warming is linked to accelerating extinctions worldwide.

While Pounds and his colleagues are still researching the harlequin frogs' disappearance, their findings are prompting even some scientists who had been skeptical about climate change's impact on amphibians to reassess their position.

James Collins, who studies harlequin frogs at Arizona State University, called the paper "an intriguing contribution" to understanding what is happening to amphibians worldwide. He said the study shows that when it comes to climate change, "these forces don't all move in one direction," since some habitats are becoming drier while others are becoming wetter.

Collins and a team of researchers are trying to determine if the chytrid fungus is surfacing in areas where it had never thrived before.

Study Finds Global Warming Is Killing Frogs (WSJ)

By Gautam Naik

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2006

Conservationists have been puzzled for more than a decade by the mysterious disappearance of harlequin frogs from the pristine, high-altitude tropical forests of Costa Rica. Now a group of scientists believe they have pinpointed the likely cause: global warming that promotes a fungus that is fatal to the frogs.

The finding, published today in the journal Nature1, is likely to stoke the debate about whether climate change is affecting the dynamics of disease, and why amphibians are dying out in such massive numbers world-wide. Recent data indicates that, since 1980, as many as 122 amphibian species are likely to have become extinct and one-third of known amphibian species are threatened.

In Costa Rica, researchers found that the region's brightly-colored harlequin frogs were succumbing to a disease caused by the chytrid (KIT-rid) fungus, which also has been implicated in a wave of amphibian deaths elsewhere in the world. Using records of sea and air temperatures, the scientists discovered that the frogs were disappearing at a rate in near-lockstep with the changing climate.

"About 80% of the disappearances of frogs correspond to unusually warm years" when the fungus thrives, said J. Alan Pounds, the study's lead author and resident scientist at the Monteverde Cloud Forest Preserve in Costa Rica. The fungus grows on amphibians' skin, creating a dermatological condition for the creatures that is often fatal. About two-thirds of the harlequin species, which once thrived in the tropics of Central and South America, vanished in the 1980s and 1990s.

But establishing a causal link between large-scale, long-term global warming and the elimination of specific species in a particular region isn't easy. The fungus-related frog deaths in Costa Rica "could be a roll of the dice one time, or it could be several interconnected factors contributing to the problem," said Ben Orlove, a professor of environment science and policy at the University of California, Davis. Habitat destruction, pesticides and other factors have all been blamed for amphibian declines.

DOJ_NMG_0009263

Still, the demise of amphibians is part of a far-larger pattern. The earth has witnessed five known extinction waves affecting many species. What makes the current one different, scientists have concluded, is that it is likely to have been triggered mainly by human activity.

Bird, mammal and amphibian species are disappearing in recent decades at a rate estimated at 100 to 1,000 times as high as the expected, natural extinction rate. In the past 500 years, human activity has forced 844 species to extinction, according to the World Conservation Union, a Switzerland-based agency whose members include some 82 states, 111 government agencies and other groups involved in ecology and conservation.

Amphibians are in the deepest trouble. They may be particularly vulnerable because they go through several life-cycle stages, making them prey to more predators and environmental shifts. And while they perform the nifty trick of absorbing oxygen through their skin, that probably makes them more susceptible to toxins and infection.

According to the Global Amphibian Assessment, a large, world-wide study that reported its findings in 2004, about 43% of amphibian species are declining, 27% are stable and less than 1% are increasing. The status of the rest isn't known.

Almost certainly, factors such as loss of habitat, pesticides and change in land-use patterns contribute to the decline in amphibian species across the globe. "The assumption, then, was that [amphibians] would do just fine in protected areas" such as Costa Rican cloud forests, said James P. Collins, a professor at Arizona State University in Tempe and chairman of the Declining Amphibian Populations Task Force. But since Costa Rica's harlequin-frog population is diminishing anyhow, "the climate-change explanation attracts attention," he said.

Last fall, scientists and conservationists met in Washington and drew up a global action plan to save the world's frogs, toads and salamanders from oblivion. The estimated cost over five years: more than $400 million to move their populations from threatened areas, breed them in captivity or conduct studies.

In Costa Rica, Mr. Pounds and his colleagues studied air and sea surface temperatures from 1973 to 2000 and found that rising temperatures enhanced cloud cover over tropical mountains, leading to warmer nights and cooler days. The change appears to have favored the chytrid fungus, which grows and reproduces best at temperatures from 63 to 77 degrees Fahrenheit. One solution for the harlequin frogs might be to move their populations to altitudes where the fungus doesn't thrive as well, Mr. Pounds says.

But key questions remain unanswered. "Climate change may be helping the fungus spread, but we don't know where the fungus came from" or whether it can survive without amphibians, Mr. Pounds says. "These are the parts of the story that aren't entirely clear."

Frog Killer Is Linked To Global Warming (NYT)

By Andrew C. Revkin

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

Scientists studying a fast-dwindling genus of colorful harlequin frogs on misty mountainsides in Central and South America are reporting today that global warming is combining with a spreading fungus to kill off many species.

The researchers implicate global warming, as opposed to local variations in temperature or other conditions. Their conclusion is based on their finding that patterns of fungus outbreaks and extinctions in widely dispersed patches of habitat were synchronized in a way that could not be explained by chance.

If the analysis holds up, it will be the first to link recent climate changes to the spread of a fungus lethal to frogs and salamanders and their kin. The chytrid fungus, Batrachochytrium dendrobatidis, has devastated amphibian communities in many parts of the world over the last several decades.

But experts on amphibian disease and ecology are divided over the finding, which is being published today in the journal Nature. Several scientists criticized the paper yesterday, saying it glossed over significant sources of uncertainty; others said it was important evidence that warming caused by humans was already harming wildlife. Climate scientists have linked most of the recent rise in the earth's average temperature to the buildup of greenhouse emissions from smokestacks and tailpipes.

DOJ_NMG_0009264

The new study was led by J. Alan Pounds, the resident biologist at the Monteverde Cloud Forest Preserve in Costa Rica. In an accompanying commentary, two scientists not involved in the research say it provides "compelling evidence" that warming caused by human activity was already disrupting ecology.

"The frogs are sending an alarm call to all concerned about the future of biodiversity and the need to protect the greatest of all open-access resources - the atmosphere," write the scientists, Andy Dobson, a Princeton University ecologist, and Andrew R. Blaustein, a zoologist at Oregon State University.

More than 110 species of brightly colored harlequin frogs, in the genus Atelopus, once lived near streams in the tropics of the Western Hemisphere, but about two-thirds of them have vanished since the 1980's.

A leading suspect is the chytrid fungus, which in recent decades has killed amphibians from deserts to lowland tropical forests to mountainsides. It is not clear whether the fungus has been spread around the world by human trade in amphibians or whether it has laid largely undetected and has only recently erupted.

Paradoxically, the fungus thrives best in cooler conditions, challenging the theory that global warming is at fault. But Dr. Pounds and his team, in studying trends in temperature and disease around the American tropics, found patterns that they say explain the situation.

Because warming increases evaporation, it can create clouds that tend to make days cooler by blocking sunlight, and make nights warmer by trapping heat. In an interview, Dr. Pounds said those conditions could have created favorable conditions for the spread of the chytrid fungus.

He said that because the seeming extinctions had occurred in lockstep over dispersed field sites, they were hard to attribute to anything other than the broad warming trend that scientists have linked to rising concentrations of greenhouse gases.

But some experts who have read the paper said they were troubled by definitive statements like "Our study sheds light on the amphibian-decline mystery by showing that large-scale warming is a key factor."

Cynthia Carey, an amphibian disease expert at the University of Colorado, said that while both climate and amphibian die-offs were serious problems, this particular paper failed to offer anything beyond circumstantial evidence.

"It is difficult to prove cause and effect on the ground where multiple factors interact in complex ways," she said.

Stephen H. Schneider, a climate expert at Stanford, who has worked with Dr. Pounds on other studies and consulted on this one, acknowledged that uncertainties remained but said the work was significant.

"It's like anything else that's complex," he said. "When you're in the early phases of learning you look for multiple lines of argument, and when they converge with basic theory, you increase your confidence in a connection."

Vanishing Of Frogs, Toads Tied To Global Warming, Study Says (USAT)

By Traci Watson

USA Today, January 12, 2006

A team of biologists and climate scientists says in a new study that it has linked the extinction of a widespread group of animals to global warming.

Writing in today's issue of the journal Nature, the scientists say that more than 60 closely related frog and toad species have vanished from the tropical forests of Latin America during the last few decades, partly because of warming temperatures. The team says this is the first time such a connection has been made.

The research team found a “near lock-step (link) between the timing of losses and changes in climate,” said lead scientist Alan Pounds of the Monteverde Cloud Forest Preserve and Tropical Science Center in Costa Rica. “It's a very striking pattern, and it's hard to find another explanation for it.”

The group did not identify the other contributing causes. Pounds and his team say the warmer temperatures of the late 20th century led to better growing conditions for a fungus that kills frogs and toads.

Other scientists expressed skepticism about the findings. Stephen Corn of the U.S. Geological Survey said the dates recorded for extinctions may not be entirely reliable. The University of Colorado's Cynthia Carey questioned why the new work ignores extinctions of related species after 1998.

DOJ_NMG_0009265

The Earth's average temperature rose roughly 1 degree in the 20th century and could rise 10 more degrees by 2100, according to an international group of scientists convened by the United Nations.

That group and other researchers attribute the warming trend to the use of coal, oil and other fossil fuels, which emit carbon dioxide when burned. Buildup of the gas in the atmosphere can trap heat.

Scientists already have evidence linking higher temperatures to changes in the behavior or range of hundreds of species, such as flowers that bloom earlier in the year.

Scientists in the U.N. group predicted in 2001 that global warming would produce a wave of extinctions. They did not predict they'd see evidence so quickly.

“None of us expected that we'd be seeing massive extinctions in five years,” said Camille Parmesan of the University of Texas. She was not on the Pounds team but found the link between extinction and global warming “very convincing.”

Pounds and his colleagues compared when a species was last seen with climate data. They found that roughly 80% of the extinct species were spotted for the last time just after a particularly hot year. For example, the Monteverde harlequin frog hasn't been seen since 1988, one year after a warm year.

Pounds and his team theorize that the changes in the region's climate are encouraging the growth of a parasite that spread around the world in the 1960s and is a known killer of frogs and toads. Pounds said more work needs to be done to nail down this possibility.

Margin Of Safety Just-in-Time Inventories Make U.S. Vulnerable In A Pandemic (WSJ)

By Bernard Wysocki Jr. And Sarah Lueck

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2006

Like many big hospitals, the University of Utah Hospital carries a 30-day supply of drugs, in part because it would be too costly or wasteful to stockpile more. Some of its hepatitis vaccine supply has been diverted to the hurricane-ravaged Gulf, leaving it vulnerable should an outbreak occur closer to home. About 77 other drugs are in short supply because of manufacturing and other glitches, such as a drug maker shutting down a factory.

"The supply chain is horribly thin," says Erin Fox, a drug-information specialist at the Salt Lake City hospital.

In the event of a pandemic flu outbreak, that chain is almost certain to break. Thousands of drug-company workers in the U.S. and elsewhere could be sickened, prompting factories to close. Truck routes could be blocked and borders may be closed, particularly perilous at a time when 80% of raw materials for U.S. drugs come from abroad. The likely result: shortages of important medicines -- such as insulin, blood products or the anesthetics used in surgery -- quite apart from any shortages of medicine to treat the flu itself.

The very rules of capitalism that make the U.S. an ultra-efficient marketplace also make it exceptionally vulnerable in a pandemic. Near-empty warehouses are a sign of strong inventory management. Production of drugs takes place offshore because that's cheaper. The federal government doesn't intervene as a guaranteed buyer of flu drugs, as it does with weapons. Investors and tax rules conspire to eliminate redundancy and reserves. Antitrust rules prevent private companies from collaborating to speed development of new drugs.

Most fundamentally, the widely embraced "just-in-time" business practice -- which attempts to cut costs and improve quality by reducing inventory stockpiles and delivering products as needed -- is at odds with the logic of "just in case" that promotes stockpiling drugs, government intervention and overall preparedness.

A report issued last month by the Trust for America's Health, a public-health advocacy group in Washington, concluded that 40% of the states lack enough backup medical supplies to cope with a pandemic flu or other major disease outbreak.

"Most if not all of the medical products or protective-device companies in this country are operating almost at full capacity," says Michael Osterholm, director of the Center for Infectious Disease Research and Policy at the University of Minnesota. "That's the reality of today's economy: just-in-time delivery with no surge capacity."

The U.S. government says it is trying to address the problem, elevating the possibility of a flu outbreak to a national security concern. Rajeev Venkayya, a special assistant to President Bush for biodefense, says the pandemic flu threat calls for a national response similar to a "moonshot," alluding to the successful 1960s Apollo program.

DOJ_NMG_0009266

President Bush has vowed to spend $2.8 billion to help jump-start development of a next-generation cell-culture flu vaccine. Currently flu vaccine production relies on a decades-old process of growing viruses in individual fertilized chicken eggs. The viruses are inactivated to make a vaccine.

Cell-culture technology means the viruses are grown in living cells -- often mammalian kidney cells -- that multiply on their own. The technology is already used in producing vaccines against hepatitis, chickenpox and shingles. In theory, cell-culture technology should allow manufacturers to produce enough flu vaccine for every American within six months of the start of a pandemic.

The Securities and Exchange Commission recently said it will allow companies to book revenue on sales of vaccines or bioterrorism remedies to the government, even if the companies hold onto the stockpile -- as the U.S. government often prefers. Under current accounting rules, companies must ship the product to record the revenue, a major disincentive for vaccine manufacturers.

Yet those steps largely fail to address weaknesses in the supply chain. The severe acute respiratory syndrome outbreak in 2003 in Canada offers a case in point. When SARS hit, the country's largest nurses' union complained about a shortage of N95 masks after much of the existing supply was shipped to Asia, where the disease hit hardest.

These masks protect against contracting flu by filtering out at least 95% of certain airborne materials during normal breathing. Some nurses in Canada had to use less-protective masks when caring for SARS patients. Others were rationing the supply. In some cases, they were told to save their masks in plastic bags and reuse them from one shift to the next, Barbara Wahl, former president of the Ontario Nurses' Association, told a Canadian commission investigating SARS in 2003.

The main companies that manufacture the masks -- 3M Co. and Kimberly-Clark Corp. -- had to scramble to meet the sudden demand because, like many companies, they didn't have an existing stockpile.

The outbreak was relatively brief and limited in location -- a minor blip compared with what would likely happen with pandemic flu.

'Albertson's Syndrome'

Supply-chain breakdowns are one reason the economy could go into a tailspin should there be a pandemic flu outbreak. A Congressional Budget Office study of the economic impact of a severe pandemic, released late last year, estimated a nearly $700 billion hit to the U.S. economy, or about a 5% decline in economic output during a one-year span, about equal to a medium-sized recession.

One significant concern is what Michael Leavitt, the secretary of health and human services, described in an interview as the "Albertson's syndrome," referring to the grocery-store chain. At the first sign of panic, all supplies disappear from shelves, something that routinely happens when there is the threat of even a modest storm.

The Grocery Manufacturers Association, which represents food retailers and distributors, estimates that the time it takes for manufacturers and wholesalers to deliver on a retailer's order has shortened to fewer than four days from nearly eight days in 1999. Respondents to an association survey "are targeting even shorter cycle times of three days," the survey said. Rick Blasgen, a former ConAgra Inc. executive and chief executive of the Council of Supply Chain Management Professionals, says food retailers and producers "can't afford just-in-case inventory."

The issue of stockpiling extends beyond food to vaccines. The U.S. government has generally been reluctant to pay companies to produce extra vaccines and create a reserve capacity. It's one reason so many companies have dropped out of vaccine manufacturing. In the case of flu vaccines, there is too much wasted medicine in "good" years, when the flu season isn't severe and people choose not to get vaccinated. Vaccines are tossed away at a loss for the corporations.

"Investors punish companies for having excess capacity they don't use," says Dr. Osterholm.

Today's worrisome flu strain, known as H5N1, has infected and killed millions of poultry, and killed about 70 humans in Asia. Recently it has spread to Turkey and infected at least 15 people there. Nobody knows if the H5N1 virus will mutate in ways that promote human-to-human transmission, which is what health officials fear would trigger a pandemic. A vaccine produced by Sanofi-Aventis SA has proved effective against H5N1 in early trials in humans, but the company hasn't scaled up manufacturing of it. Food and Drug Administration-approved antiviral medications, which could treat exposed individuals, are in short supply.

DOJ_NMG_0009267

To some former Pentagon officials working on biodefense on Capitol Hill, the only way for the country to prepare for a possible pandemic is to think of health-care preparedness in military terms. This means moving away from a just-in-time system to planning for a just-in-case scenario in the manner of national-security policy makers.

The Pentagon, for instance, goes through intense planning and pays for reserves of everything from bullets to jet fuel. It even forces rivals to collaborate on Pentagon projects and wields its clout as a buyer of weapons.

Some steps are in motion to take pages out of the Pentagon playbook. A bill introduced last fall by North Carolina Republican Sen. Richard Burr would provide some relaxation of the antitrust laws. It would allow the government to convene meetings with drug makers to discuss manufacturing and distributing biodefense products including those related to pandemic flu.

Current Law

Industry executives say they feel that under current law, companies can't share basic knowledge that would be helpful in planning for an outbreak. "What we're suggesting to the administration is something discretionary and only under declaration of an emergency," says Billy Tauzin, a former congressman from Louisiana who now heads the pharmaceutical industry's leading trade organization.

Mr. Tauzin, though, also hinted at going a tad further, saying it would be helpful if "the administration determines to allow two of our companies to collaborate on a product -- an antiviral or vaccine or similar product." Such proposals might raise worries about collusion in an industry that already enjoys considerable pricing power and patent protection on its products.

Some experts suggest the U.S. government should promise to purchase a fixed amount of flu vaccine -- despite the cost and the likelihood that some of the money would end up being wasted. Canada, for instance, has contracts with vaccine makers to cover most of its population. The largest contract is with ID Biomedical Corp. (recently acquired by GlaxoSmithKline PLC) for about eight million flu vaccine doses per year. That takes much of the risk out of the company's business, but still lets it manufacture additional doses for the private market or for other needy buyers.

Dr. Osterholm has called for a program of "critical product continuity" to see the U.S. through the worst of pandemic disruption. He proposes identifying items that are essential to people's health and safety and then finding a way, possibly through government funding or tax incentives, to create emergency stocks or extra production capacity for them. High on his list of "critical products" are tools for fighting flu itself, such as face masks, ventilators to help the sickest patients survive and syringes to administer a vaccine if one becomes available.

In a pandemic, Dr. Osterholm says, "if we don't sell automobiles or jewelry...that wouldn't be the same as running out of critical medicines." He likens his idea to the well-equipped fire departments at international airports, which don't respond to many crises but are ready if a plane crashes.

Dr. Osterholm, who also is associate director of the Department of Homeland Security's National Center for Food Protection and Defense, says the country also needs reliable supplies of food and water, the ability to keep heat working in northern climates and medical products for non-flu-related illnesses. The U.S. has 105,000 ventilators, most of which at any given time are in use. The federal stockpile of medical products has about 4,500 more. In a pandemic, tens of thousands more would be needed.

The federal government has allocated grants worth $5 billion over three years to states and hospitals to increase medical preparedness, including surge capacity at hospitals. But the money was used for other priorities as well, such as improving medical labs and disease surveillance. Not all of it has been spent.

"You can't plan for a surge capacity in an emergency room of 500 or 1,000 patients from the 20 you see in a day," says Michael Bishop, a Bloomington, Ind., emergency physician who used to be on the board of directors for the national trade association for emergency physicians. "Nobody could afford to do that. You can't have 10 doctors and 100 nurses sitting around waiting for something to happen."

Eminent Domain Laws Get First State High Court Test Since U.S. Supreme Court Ruling (LAW/AP)

By Andrew Welsh-huggins, The Associated Press

DOJ_NMG_0009268

AP, January 12, 2006

Ohio Supreme Court heard arguments Wednesday pitting a suburban Cincinnati city against a couple trying to save their home in a long-anticipated hearing that included a rare outburst of applause by spectators.

The city of Norwood is trying to use eminent domain to seize remaining properties for a developer who wants to build a $125 million project of offices, shops and restaurants. The city says the tax revenue will boost its economic fortunes.

Homeowners Carl and Joy Gamble say the city abused its authority to seize property by declaring the neighborhood deteriorating, a less severe condition than blighted.

The case is the first challenge of property rights laws to reach a state high court since the U.S. Supreme Court last summer allowed municipalities to seize homes for use by a private developer.

Property rights' advocates, business groups and backers of city planning are watching the Ohio case because of the precedent it could set as more than a dozen states consider bans against governments taking homes to boost economic development.

A decision is expected by summer.

At issue was this line from the Ohio Constitution: "Private property ought and shall ever be held inviolate, but always subservient to the public welfare."

Visiting Judge James Brogan challenged the Gambles' attorney to explain what the court should do given last summer's U.S. Supreme Court decision.

"What's the principled way for this court to decide under the Ohio Constitution that it guarantees more protection to the property owner -- property rights -- than the U.S. Supreme Court was prepared to do?" said Brogan, sitting in for Justice Alice Robie Resnick, who excused herself from the case without giving a reason.

Attorney Dana Berliner said the state leaders who wrote Ohio's constitution recognized there were times when property would have to be subservient to public needs.

"But they were also saying those were important rights. That's something that's not in the U.S. Constitution," she said.

Timothy Burke, a lawyer representing Norwood, said deterioration is a common measure when applied to redevelopment projects in cities.

"Deteriorating is a legitimate standard to be used in determining whether or not an urban renewal project and use of eminent domain is appropriate," he told the court.

Lawrence Elleman, an attorney for the Norwood developers, said the city's law was very specific in its definition of a rundown neighborhood, including things like "faulty street arrangements," or dead-end streets.

That caught the interest of Chief Justice Thomas Moyer.

Many older neighborhoods have streets that could be called "faulty in their design," said Moyer, who himself lives in Bexley, an older Columbus suburb. "But people like living on those streets."

Berliner said the city's standard was far too vague and could apply to almost any neighborhood in Ohio.

"As the members of this court drive home today, I ask you to think about which of the dozens of neighborhoods you pass would not be deteriorating under Norwood's definition," Berliner said.

At one point, Brogan asked Burke why the court should pay so much deference to a city council that stands to make $2 million a year in revenue from the project.

Burke responded that the responsibility for determining land use is up to local elected officials.

"They've lived there all their lives, they've walked those neighborhoods, they've seen how it has changed," he said.

That prompted Justice Maureen O'Connor to ask, "Couldn't the same argument be made for the homeowners?"

Several people attending the hearing in support of the Gambles laughed and applauded, leading to a gentle rebuke from Moyer: "Please, do your applauding outside."

Justice Judith Ann Lanzinger said she was concerned about the origin of the developer's plan.

"Does it make any difference that it appears that the private developer was the one that started this ball rolling?" she said. "Should it be of concern when we're talking about whether this is truly public use or if it's private use with public incidental benefit?"

DOJ_NMG_0009269

Burke said the question is moot because the development ultimately was the product of lengthy deliberations between the city and Rookwood Partners.

"In the end, I don't think it makes any difference who initiates it," he said.

Appeals Court Takes Up 2003 Meskwaki Election Case (AP)

AP, January 12, 2006

IOWA CITY, Iowa -- A federal appeals court in St. Louis was scheduled to hear arguments Thursday on whether a lower court judge erred by dismissing a lawsuit challenging the Meskwaki tribal elections in 2003.

The lawsuit stems from an internal power struggle that began nearly three years ago when the Meskwaki tribal council and its chairman, Alex Walker Jr., were overthrown by a new set of leaders. The new council, led by Homer Bear Jr., was picked by the tribe's hereditary chief after Walker's council ignored recall petitions.

The ensuing political dispute played out in state and federal courts and led to a costly, seven-month shutdown of the Meskwaki casino, located on the tribal settlement west of Tama. The tribe, with 1,200 members, officially is known as the Sac and Fox of the Mississippi in Iowa.

The dispute ultimately was settled after tribal members participated in a series of elections overseen by the federal Bureau of Indian Affairs.

As a result, four Walker council members were removed and the Bear council was put in power. The casino reopened in December 2003.

The lawsuit before the 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals originally was filed in 2004 by the election officials appointed by Walker.

In their lawsuit, Walker supporters argue that the BIA mishandled oversight of the election and illegally interfered in the process. They also claim that Aurene Martin, assistant secretary of the BIA, violated agency policy when she rejected an appeal of the election results.

In March, U.S. District Judge Linda Reade, in Cedar Rapids, threw out the lawsuit, saying it was a matter for tribal courts to decide. Walker supporters are appealing that decision.

In briefs filed with the court, the Walker supporters suggest BIA officials may have been influenced by lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who was hired by the Bear council after the elections. Abramoff made headlines last week when he pleaded guilty to charges of influence peddling.

"Was improper pressure applied and influence wielded at the agency level?" wrote attorney Fred Dorr, who is representing Walker supporters.

Justice Department attorney Elizabeth Peterson argued that Reade was correct in dismissing the case, citing repeated appeals court rulings protecting tribal sovereignty.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Some Crack Cocaine Prison Terms Shorter Since Ruling On Sentencing Guidelines, Study Says (AP)

By Mark Sherman, ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, January 11, 2006

WASHINGTON – Some federal judges are handing out shorter prison terms for crack cocaine crimes since last year's Supreme Court decision giving judges more discretion in sentencing, a report said Wednesday.

Defendants in the study received prison terms averaging 11 years, but those terms were less than what is called for in 20-year-old sentencing guidelines, according to the Sentencing Project, a nonpartisan group that backs alternatives to lengthy prison sentences.

The Supreme Court ruled a year ago that judges do not have to follow the sentencing guidelines.

DOJ_NMG_0009270

The analysis focused on crack because the congressionally established guidelines punish some crack cocaine offenses more severely than powder cocaine offenses. A person must possess 100 times more powder cocaine than crack cocaine to receive a comparable sentence, under the guidelines.

The report looked at a very small sample of 24 cases in which judges wrote opinions explaining the prison sentence and cited the Supreme Court ruling. There were more than 5,400 people sentenced for crack offenses in 2003, the latest year for which statistics are available.

"When judges are given flexibility to consider the full merits of each case, they are likely to impose stiff penalties for serious offenses, but will distinguish these from cases in which the defendant is less culpable or less of a threat to public safety," co-authors Ryan King and Marc Mauer wrote.

Still, a federal appeals court last week overturned the sentences in two Rhode Island cases included in the study, ruling that U.S. District Judge Ernest Torres impermissibly substituted a 20-to-1 ratio for Congress' 100-to-1 ratio. The defendants received five years, four months and 15 1/2 years, respectively, when the guidelines called for at least seven years, three months and 19 1/2 years, respectively.

Prosecutors also have appealed other cases, including one in West Virginia in which Brian Moreland was given a 10-year sentence for selling crack worth $450 when the guidelines set a range of 30 years to life in prison. U.S. District Judge Joseph R. Goodwin said the harsher sentence for Moreland "would not only be unreasonable, but also unconscionable."

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has warned of growing disparity in jail terms and "a drift toward lesser sentences" since the court ruling.

Congress created the guidelines in the 1980s mainly to reduce disparities between judges. But the high court said making the guidelines mandatory violated a defendant's Sixth Amendment right to a jury trial because they call for judges to make factual decisions that could add to prison time, such as the amount of drugs involved in a crime.

Under the Supreme Court ruling, the guidelines now are only advisory. As a result, federal judges are free to sentence convicted criminals as they see fit, but they may be subject to reversal if appeals courts find them "unreasonable."

Judges Show More Leniency On Crack Cocaine (WSJ)

By Gary Fields

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON -- In the wake of the Supreme Court's decision a year ago making sentencing guidelines advisory rather than requirements to be followed, some federal judges appear to be giving more lenient sentences in cases involving crack cocaine, according to an analysis released yesterday.

The study by the Sentencing Project, a Washington research and advocacy group for criminal-justice policy, may reinvigorate the debate about the racial disparity in sentences for crack-cocaine defendants, who are primarily minorities, and powder-cocaine defendants, who are more likely to be white and more affluent.

The study examined 24 crack-cocaine cases in which judges explicitly discussed the reasoning behind their sentencing decisions in the context of the 2005 Supreme Court ruling that allowed them to use the sentencing guidelines as advisory rather than as requirements.

In 21 of the 24 cases, the judges sentenced defendants to less time than they likely could have received under the sentencing guidelines. Under the guidelines, for instance, a person who possesses five grams of crack cocaine will get the same sentence as someone who sells 500 grams of powder cocaine -- although there is little physiological difference in the two.

Sen. Jeff Sessions, an Alabama Republican, said he intended to introduce a bill this year that will propose changing the law to reduce the disparity between the amounts of crack cocaine and powder cocaine necessary to give a defendant the same sentence. He and Utah Republican Sen. Orrin Hatch co-authored a bill in 2003 that would have reduced the disparity to 20-to-1 -- from 100-to-1 -- but it got little support.

"I still believe the guidelines are not appropriate on crack and powder cocaine," said Sen. Sessions. "I think we need to make some improvements there based on the reality of what's going on in the courts of America. This study does seem to indicate that judges would tend more to the 20-to-one ratio rather than 100-to-one."

DOJ_NMG_0009271

The Sentencing Commission, which declined to comment on the study, has long supported altering its guidelines on crack-cocaine crimes to bring the penalties and amounts more in line with powder cocaine. In 1995, the Sentencing Commission sent Congress an amendment which would have equalized the penalties on the two forms of cocaine, but Congress rejected the amendment. Similar recommendations from the commission in 1997 and 2002 were ignored by Congress.

At least two of the cases highlighted in the study have been overturned by appeals courts in the past week. In one case, Rhode Island Chief District Court Judge Ernest Torres sentenced a crack-cocaine defendant to just over five years in prison, although the sentencing guidelines called for him to be sentenced to between seven and 12 years.

In handing down the sentence, the judge wrote that the 100-to-1 ratio was "excessive" and "not reasonable." However, a three-judge panel on the First Circuit Court of Appeals in Boston ruled last week that Mr. Torres had erred in handing down the sentence.

"Laboring in uncharted waters, the lower court jettisoned the guidelines and constructed a new sentencing range," the appeals court wrote.

Drugs And Racial Discrimination (NYT)

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

The mandatory sentencing laws that have swept this country since the 70's have clearly done more harm than good. The inmate population has skyrocketed, driving prison costs to bankrupting levels, while having no impact at all on the drug problem. By taking away judicial discretion, the laws have led the country to write off first-time offenders who might have deserved second chances and to imprison addicts who could otherwise have been effectively and less expensively handled through treatment programs.

The laws have also discriminated against members of minority groups, who are disproportionately singled out for harsher mandatory sentences, often because of where they live. That issue has come into sharp focus in New Jersey, where a panel of criminal justice officials has recommended that the state revise a law that mandates more severe sentences for people convicted of certain drug crimes committed within 1,000 feet of school property.

The law appears to have had no impact at all on the actual pattern of drug dealing. But it has created a profoundly discriminatory sentencing pattern, which treats minority defendants unfairly while undermining confidence in the criminal justice system.

Offenders who live in cities, where populations are dense and the schools numerous, tend to fall under the drug-free-zone laws, not because they peddle drugs to minors, but because they live near schools. Offenders who live in suburban and rural areas, where drug abuse is just as common but where schools are more spread out, tend to fall outside the law, so they receive lighter sentences.

As a consequence, the report found, just about every offender incarcerated for a drug-free-zone offense in New Jersey is either black or Hispanic, even though those two groups make up only about a quarter of the population. Not a single one of the offenders had sold drugs to a minor, and fewer than 2 percent had actually committed offenses on school property.

The so-called urban effect of these laws is hardly unique to New Jersey. More than 30 states have passed such laws since the 1980's, thus turning whole swaths of largely black and Hispanic urban areas into extra-penalty zones. Though widely emulated around the nation, the 1,000-foot rule appears arbitrary and without basis in law. The New Jersey panel's study wisely recommends reducing the size of the zones and changing the law so it actually targets the few people who sell drugs at or near schools - without discriminating against minorities.

The broader message of this study is that the country can't just imprison its way out of the drug problem. Coping with this issue - while reducing prison costs - will require a complex set of strategies, including drug abuse treatment and prevention services and increased judicial discretion in sentencing.

News Elicits Sadness, Not Shock (WP)

By Eric M. Weiss And Robert E. Pierre

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0009272

The news that D.C. Council member Marion Barry failed a court-ordered drug test in the fall drew sighs, prayers and a call for him to take a leave from his council seat. But at his old haunts and among his constituents, what was missing yesterday was a sense of surprise.

For many, this is the fourth decade of the sometimes rocky, sometimes inspiring marriage between Barry, the former four-term mayor who now represents Ward 8 on the council, and the residents of his adopted city. If there was one feeling, it was an amalgam of sadness, empathy and deja vu.

"I just think it's a damn shame," said Addie Cook, who had been among the Union Temple Baptist Church members who welcomed him back after he served six months for cocaine possession following his 1990 arrest at the Vista Hotel, where he was videotaped smoking crack.

Sources said Barry tested positive for cocaine during routine screening in connection with his guilty plea to two misdemeanor tax charges in October.

Yesterday, Barry held a news conference as he was being discharged from Howard University Hospital but would not discuss the drug test. During his two-day hospital stay, he was treated for diabetes and hypertension, said his doctor, Robert H. Williams, who appeared at Barry's side. The 69-year-old former mayor and civil rights leader is also a cancer survivor.

When asked whether Barry's condition was affected by the presence of any illegal drugs, Williams said: "I know nothing about that. I've told you what we treated him for, and that is a fact. We treated him for those two conditions and those conditions only."

Barry, wearing a black overcoat and a fedora, looked vibrant. He said he was in good spirits. "My lawyer has instructed me or anybody else not to have any comments on anything outside my medical situation," Barry said.

Regarding his medical treatment, he said: "I didn't wish these things on me. I find it very disturbing that a person can't have simple medical procedures without you all sensationalizing it. People suffer every day. I empathize with them."

The drug test that Barry failed was required as a part of a pre-sentencing investigation, said two sources familiar with the case. Now he is undergoing voluntary drug testing as part of his private treatment to help establish that he is making an effort to stay drug free, said the sources, who asked not to be named because the case is pending.

For many in the city yesterday, their first reaction was to wish Barry luck in his continuing struggles with drugs.

"If the reports are true, my heart goes out to Marion," Mayor Anthony A. Williams (D) said in a statement. "I hope he is able to get the help he needs and to take care of his health."

One Ward 8 leader said that should be a higher priority than his council work.

"He cannot help people in Ward 8 until he helps himself. That should be his number one priority," said longtime activist Phillip Pannell, who suggested Barry take a leave of absence from the D.C. Council. "He needs to be away from politics, away from the phone and staff, and deal with his health situation."

Others, however, said Barry has been productive in the last year, advocating for the city's poorest ward.

"He's in the mix," said Arrington Dixon, a former member of the D.C. Council who lives and works in Ward 8. "That's what we want him to be."

But regulars at Players Lounge, one of Barry's favorite haunts, said the former mayor often drinks there, even though he has admitted to abusing alcohol in the past.

Barry's tax case involved his failure to pay most of his federal and D.C. income taxes for six years after his fourth term as mayor ended in January 1999. Prosecutors said he received more than $530,000 in income over the six years but did not document most of it.

Richard A. Houck Jr., chief of the U.S. probation office in the District, said yesterday that he could not discuss specifics of Barry's case. He said it's clear, however, because of Barry's guilty plea to tax charges Oct. 28, that the probation office would -- and did -- conduct a routine pre-sentencing investigation of his situation.

In such investigations, defendants awaiting sentencing are automatically screened for seven drugs, including marijuana and cocaine, according to the office's protocol, and defendants generally are asked to submit to the testing immediately or shortly after their first court appearance.

DOJ_NMG_0009273

"Mr. Barry was not singled out," Houck said. "This is our routine . . . . The whole pre-sentence process is about us determining the circumstances of an individual -- their past, their present."

Cocaine typically remains in a person's urine and can be detected in standard drug tests for 48 to 72 hours after use, according to screening experts. If a defendant fails a drug test, the probation office's pre-sentencing report will include that information. The report is confidentially shared with the judge and lawyers several weeks before the sentencing hearing. But the probation office does not typically request additional tests.

"In this kind of case, we are not supervising an individual," he said. "We are investigating him."

In Barry's case, prosecutors could choose to scrap a plea agreement on the tax charges because a failed drug test could be viewed as a breach of the agreement. But unless there's a pattern of continuing drug use, it is unusual in such cases for prosecutors to do so.

U.S. Magistrate Judge Deborah A. Robinson has discretion in deciding whether Barry's infraction merits jail time or other sanctions at sentencing. Houck said some defendants who have failed a drug test were ordered to undergo drug treatment and prove their progress through subsequent testing. If the drug use continued, some have faced additional jail time or more restrictions.

Many of Barry's Ward 8 constituents said the latest revelation about drug use sent the wrong message to young people whom he has long championed.

Hannah Hawkins, who runs the Children of Mine after-school program, said she addressed some teenagers in her program who suggested that the former mayor might have been set up.

"He knew what he was doing was wrong," she said she told them. "He let the youth down. Very few people, especially in Ward 8, have been loved and respected by our youth as much as he has."

The few council colleagues who agreed to talk about Barry's situation used the vocabulary of addiction and recovery.

"If it's true, I look at it as a message for those who are struggling with their own demons and have spouses or loved ones in the same situation," said council member Jim Graham (D-Ward 1), who has had his own struggles with drinking. He said that Jan. 30 will mark his 29th year of being sober.

"Even after many, many relapses, the fact that he is in treatment is a good thing," Graham said. "I'm not making excuses for him. He will be judged by others."

If Barry is incarcerated, he would not have to give up his council seat and could even introduce legislation from his jail cell, but he could not cast council votes, according to D.C. Council rules.

Barry would have to relinquish his council seat only if convicted of a felony, said Charlotte Brookins-Hudson, the council's general counsel. Barry pleaded guilty to a misdemeanor tax charge.

Marion Barry's Decision (WP)

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

IF CITIZEN JOHN DOE failed a drug test ordered by a court after he pleaded guilty to misdemeanor tax charges, there is little likelihood that the matter would be up for discussion on this page. But when the case involves a public official who has sworn to uphold the law, the issue becomes a matter of public concern. The case takes on even greater significance when the official has a history of run-ins with the law, including a record of illegal drug use. Such is the case with D.C. Council member and former mayor Marion Barry (D), who, as The Post reported yesterday, tested positive for cocaine use in a court-ordered drug test after his tax case plea in the fall.

It's likely that news of Mr. Barry's failed drug test has provoked a collective groan throughout a city that over the years has been forced to live through episode after episode of the four-term mayor's personal troubles. The District, however, has managed to survive Mr. Barry's behavior in the past, and the city can be expected to do so again. The more important question has to do with Mr. Barry himself. Already scheduled to be sentenced for failing to file tax returns, Mr. Barry is now looking at the possibility of going to jail for the maximum 18 months because he failed the terms of his release on the tax charges. Regardless of whether he serves time or receives some other court-ordered sanction, two larger questions are on the table: Can Marion Barry overcome the demons within that drive his self-destructive behavior? Is he up to the job of representing the residents of Ward 8 on the D.C. Council?

DOJ_NMG_0009274

If, as has been reported, Mr. Barry has started treatment for drug use, that is an important step -- though one he has taken before, with much fanfare. If the council member successfully completes treatment and remains drug-free, he, and the city, will be better for it. In the meantime, the Ward 8 constituents who sent him to the D.C. Council are without the effective representation they deserve. That, of course, has been the problem that has plagued the nation's capital during Marion Barry's 30-year political career: His scrapes and infractions with the law have drawn him -- as they continue to draw him -- away from the demands of his public office.

Mr. Barry regards himself as a survivor and a person who, at 69, is still up to the rigors of public service. But this latest bout with the law and drugs -- and the unresolved questions of his future -- ought to lead Mr. Barry to consider the interests of Ward 8 and the city and to ask himself if the time has come to finish his course as a public servant. We know that personal considerations probably weigh heavily in the balance. However, Marion Barry, in our view, needs less time in the public limelight so he can devote more attention to the problems of Marion Barry. He has the opportunity to step aside so that others may step up to the task of public service. He should take it.

POLICE BLOTTER (FLJOURNAL)

By Marjory Raymer

The Flint Journal, January 12, 2006

FLINT - Ten people were arrested in drug raids on three homes Sunday as part of a special initiative paid for through a federal grant.

Police searched east-side homes at 1277 Broadway Ave., 1610 Bennett Ave. and 3009 Dakota Ave. with warrants after drug buys at the homes, according to a news release from Flint Police Chief Gary Hagler.

Police seized $1,866 in cash, $1,000 worth of cocaine, $150 worth of marijuana, $100 worth of heroin and $100 worth of ecstasy in the raids.

The 10 arrested face a total of 13 felony and 19 misdemeanor charges.

The sweep by the force's Crime Area Target Team and Community Policing was part of the federally funded Weed and Seed Program, which targets blighted areas to reduce crime and promote economic revitalization.

The U.S. Justice Department awarded $225,000 to the United Way for the program on the east side of Flint earlier this year. It was the third such grant.

U.S. Finds California-Mexico Tunnel (CNN)

CNN.com, January 11, 2006

(CNN) -- U.S. border patrol agents investigating a caved-in road discovered a tunnel linking the United States and Mexico, the third such passage found in three years near the San Ysidro, California, crossing, authorities said Wednesday.

Lauren Mack, a spokeswoman for U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement agency, said agents found the 35-foot long, 3-foot-by-3-foot tunnel on Monday.

"It's unclear what it was used for, but inside we found trash and other evidence indicating people had been inside recently," Mack said.

That evidence has given investigators good leads, she added.

The tunnel -- which Mack described as "primitive" -- surfaced in U.S. territory in a strip of land between the border fence and a public parking lot. It's just west of the San Ysidro port of entry into the United States, one of the busiest land border posts in the world, she said.

A longer, more sophisticated tunnel was discovered in the same area in 2003, when a man was spotted lifting bales of marijuana from it and loading them into a pickup, Mack said. A tunnel found in 2004 was a link to the sophisticated underground passage, she added.

Tightened border security since the September 11, 2001, attacks is the likely cause for an increase in U.S. to Mexico tunneling, Mack said. At least 15 tunnels have been found in California and Arizona since 9/11, she said.

DOJ_NMG_0009275

"We've now got a dedicated tunnel task force, which works with the [Drug Enforcement Administration] and border patrol to proactively look for tunnels," Mack explained.

Another Suspension For Skeleton Team (NYT)

By Lynn Zinser And Bill Pennington

The New York Times, January 11, 2006

The top competitor on the United States men's skeleton team, Zach Lund, was suspended yesterday after testing positive for a masking agent at a World Cup event last month in Europe.

Also yesterday, a New York Supreme Court judge declined to overturn the suspension of the United States skeleton coach, Tim Nardiello.

The international skeleton federation suspended Lund pending the outcome of an investigation by the United States Anti-Doping Agency.

Jim Shea Sr., president of the United States Bobsled and Skeleton Federation, confirmed that Lund, who holds the No. 1 ranking in the world, tested positive for using Propecia, an anti-baldness drug.

"It's on the banned list; no question, he screwed up," Shea said in a telephone interview. "He lost his spot on the World Cup team, and it's possible he won't be able to go to the Games. On a personal level, it's so sad. He's worked so hard to get here. I know Zach Lund, and I know Zach Lund is not a cheat."

Lund, 27, was preparing for a World Cup competition in Germany yesterday and could not be reached for comment. His father, Mac Lund, said in a telephone interview from his home in Salt Lake City that his son had been using an anti-baldness product for several years.

"Zach began taking a hair restorer product, pro something, I don't remember the exact name, about six years ago," Mac Lund said. "I don't know whether he still takes it or if he stopped."

Propecia has been listed as a prohibited substance by both the United States and international anti-doping agencies for more than a year because it can act as a masking agent for steroids. Propecia contains finasteride, which is also banned as a masking agent. In some studies, finasteride has been found to prevent the detection of certain steroids like nandrolone and testosterone.

Last October, the Canadian bobsledder Giulio Zardo was suspended for two years for refusing to submit to a drug test. Zardo had quit the Canadian team despite being an Olympic gold-medal contender after a drug sample he gave in March 2005 tested positive for finasteride, according to a report in The Toronto Star. Zardo said he had been taking Propecia since 2000 for hair loss.

It is not yet clear whether Lund's positive test, which was administered by the international federation after a competition in December, has been forwarded to the United States Anti-Doping Agency, which generally adjudicates positive tests by American athletes.

Lund had previously disclosed taking Propecia on his drug-testing profile, but it is unclear whether Lund's previously declared use of the anti-balding drug sufficiently explains the positive test, or how harsh his penalty would be if he was found guilty of its use. Any lengthy suspension would rule Lund out of the Olympics, which begin Feb. 10 in Turin, Italy. U.S.A.D.A. officials declined to comment on the case yesterday.

The United States Olympic team for Turin has been hit by a string of incidents that could leave it depleted. The figure skater Michelle Kwan has pulled out of the national championships and would need to petition for a place on that team, and Bode Miller, the country's top skier, is in trouble with his federation for comments he made about alcohol use.

Lund has been a vocal supporter of Nardiello since his suspension was announced Dec. 31. Yesterday, New York Supreme Court Judge James Dawson upheld that suspension, which came in the wake of sexual harassment accusations by several athletes. Nardiello had hoped for an injunction that would allow him to rejoin the skeleton team for this weekend's World Cup event in Königssee, Germany, but Dawson ruled that Nardiello must instead follow the procedures set forth in the bobsled and skeleton federation's handbook, which call for an internal hearing or binding arbitration.

DOJ_NMG_0009276

Dan Goodwin, vice president and counsel for the federation, said Nardiello's lawyer, James Brooks, and federation representatives had tentatively scheduled the arbitration hearing for Monday and Tuesday. The sides must first agree on an independent arbiter.

"We're on a fast track, expediency is important," Goodwin said. "Still, we must be sensitive to make sure it's fair for everybody, not just the coach but for those making the complaints. Arbitration is the right forum. We will be putting out all the facts and evidence."

Alan Howard, a lawyer for the federation, said yesterday that there were multiple complaints against Nardiello and that those who had made accusations were being invited to attend the hearing.

Brooks ruled out an appeal of Dawson's decision.

Skeleton Racer Lund Suspended After Dope Test (REU)

Reuters, January 12, 2006

LONDON (Reuters) - America's skeleton world number one Zach Lund has been suspended by the International Bobsleigh and Tobogganing Federation (FIBT) pending an investigation into a positive drugs test at a World Cup event last month.

"He has been suspended pending the completion of an investigation by the appropriate agencies in the U.S., namely the U.S. Anti-Doping Agency (USADA) which is a sanctioned entity of WADA (World Anti-Doping Agency)," FIBT media officer Donald Krone said on Wednesday.

Lund, 26, tested positive for anti-baldness drug Propecia, which is on the banned list because it can act as a masking agent. He could now miss the Winter Olympics in Turin, starting on February 10.

"It's on the banned list -- no question he screwed up," U.S. Bobsled and Skeleton Federation President Jim Shea Sr., told the New York Times.

"He has lost his spot on the World Cup team and it's possible he won't be able to go to the Games.

"On a personal level, it's so sad. He's worked so hard to get here. I know Zach Lund, and I know Zach Lund is not a cheat."

Lund's father Mac told the newspaper his son had started using an anti-baldness product about six years ago.

Suspended Racer Optimistic (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

One day after he was suspended for testing positive for a masking agent at a World Cup event, Zach Lund, the top slider on the United States skeleton team, expressed optimism about his chances of being reinstated for the Olympics.

"I have all the hope in the world," Lund said yesterday. "Until they tell me I'm not going, I'm going to believe I'm going to the Olympics. I know I'm an Olympian."

The Winter Olympics begin Feb. 10 in Turin, Italy.

The United States Bobsled and Skeleton Federation confirmed that Lund, who is ranked No. 1 in the world, tested positive for using Propecia, an anti-baldness drug. Propecia contains finasteride, which is also banned as a masking agent.

Lund said he had taken hair-restoration products since 1999 and had always declared them on his medical forms. The United States federation granted him a Therapeutic Use Exemption, which provides a way for athletes to use some banned medications.

"For anyone to think he's using this to mask anything is ridiculous," the skeleton coach, Tim Nardiello, said. "Zach is the best skeleton slider in the world right now, and it would be a crime for anyone to think this of him."

Nardiello has run into problems himself after several female athletes accused him of sexual harassment. He has been placed on paid administrative leave, and on Tuesday a New York State Supreme Court judge refused to reinstate him.

Lund received a letter from the International Bobsleigh and Skeleton Federation provisionally suspending him until a hearing Jan. 20 or Jan. 23.

Yesterday, Lund said his lawyer, Howard Jacobs, was encouraged after meeting with officials from the United States Anti-Doping Agency.

DOJ_NMG_0009277

2 Men Schemed To Drive Black Family Out Of Home, Indictment Says (REU)

By Niraj Warikoo

Reuters, January 12, 2006

DETROIT - Two Taylor, Mich., men - angry that an African-American family moved onto their block - hatched a plot to drive them out by burning down their house, said federal officials in an indictment released Wednesday.

In detail reminiscent of the Jim Crow era, the federal filing describes how at least two white men conspired to terrorize a Downriver family simply because of their race.

One night in July 2002, the two men, Wayland Mullins and Michael Richardson, gathered at the home of Mullins' mother in Taylor. Across from that home, the Doster family had recently purchased a house.

The two white men plotted that night to burn down the Doster's house "in order to frighten them and prevent them from moving into their new home," the indictment reads.

The men are charged with violating the Doster's civil and housing rights because of their race. They also are charged with conspiring to lie to investigators about their role in the hate crime, and the use of a fire in committing a felony. Each of the four counts carries a maximum sentence of 10 years in prison and a $250,000 fine.

The men "were seeking to keep minorities out of their neighborhood by the most violent means available," said U.S. Attorney Stephen Murphy, the top law enforcement officials in southeastern Michigan. "We have poured as many resources as we can in this particular case to try to rectify that."

After an upswing in hate crimes over the past year, Murphy has said he wants to crack down on bias crimes in metro Detroit.

The Doster family put up with years of racial harassment in their home, including racially charged graffiti, the arson and insults. Fed up with the abuse, Reginald Doster, a computer administrator, moved out in August 2005 along with his wife and daughter.

After the two suspects held their meeting on July 28, 2002, they, along with some other unidentified men, walked over to the Doster home. Then, "they broke a window at the back of the house, poured gasoline into the home, and ignited the gasoline, causing fire and smoke damage to the house," says the indictment.

In ensuing months, the two men lied to Taylor police and the FBI, say federal prosecutors. At one point, Richardson tried to finger an innocent man in the arson. Richardson is currently serving a four-year sentence in prison for misleading investigators in the arson. His attorney, James Gerometta, a federal public defender, could not be reached for comment Wednesday.

In the spring and summer of 2004, Richardson told agents he would try to secretly record conversations between himself and Mullins that would make Mullins guilty. But Richardson then told Mullins he was wearing a transmitter so that he wouldn't say anything that would get him charged, the indictment says.

Mullins could not be reached Wednesday. It is unclear whether Mullins has an attorney, Murphy said. He is scheduled to appear in court Friday.

More men may be involved in the arson, Murphy said, so federal agents are still investigating the case.

Dearborn Heights Drug Bust (WXYZ-TV)

By Glenda Lewis

WXYZ-TV, ABC 7, Detroit, January 11, 2006

Wednesday, 5 men were arrested after the ATF and local law enforcement officials set up a sting to catch them robbing a pharmacy.

Michigan Pharmacy was previously robbed of $15,000 worth on controlled substances.

ATF agent Vera Fedorak, who participated in the sting, said "Obviously it's a concern for the community, ATF and the local law enforcement."

The robber came into the Dearborn Heights pharmacy with what he said was a bomb. ATF agents and local law enforcement were on the premise, with one posing as the store owner. They were able to apprehend one man at the pharmacy and also 4 others.

DOJ_NMG_0009278

Michigan Pharmacy owner Khalid Saad said he was glad to help ATF agents catch the men who had been robbing his store.

The drug sting may result in federal charges.

Wilcox Sentenced To Federal Prison (CLEVEDB)

By GREG KAYLOR, Banner Staff Writer

Cleveland (TN) Daily Banner, January 11, 2006

A Polk County man who plead guilty last October to possessing an explosive device has been sentenced to 5 1/2 years in a federal prison by a federal judge.

U.S. District Court Judge Curtis L. Collier sentenced Danny M. Wilcox, 39, of Reliance, late last week, according to Carl Maskew, Bradley County Sheriff's Office liaison with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms.

Wilcox is one of three people arrested and charged with the crime.

Wilcox and his alleged accomplice, Glenda Cross, 41, took part in assembling the device that investigators learned was to be used in a murder plot against the ex-husband of Cross.

"BCSO's Criminal Investigations Unit received a tip on Nov. 5, 2004 of a possible explosive device at a residence in the Dalton Pike Trailer Park," said Bob Gault, media relations officer for BCSO.

When deputies checked the residence, an "improvised explosive device" was found, Gault added. Officials set up a perimeter around the trailer park and evacuated more than a dozen residences within close proximity of the device.

Two bomb squad officers from the Cleveland Police Department and ATF agents removed the device and detonated it in a nearby field.

"Investigation revealed a plot to use the device against Cross' former husband, leading to her arrest and that of Jerry L Adams, 38, for attempted first-degree murder, conspiracy to commit first-degree murder, and possession of a prohibited weapon," said Gault.

Adams plead guilty in state court to conspiracy to commit second-degree murder and possession of an explosive. He is serving an eight-year sentence at the Tennessee Department of Corrections, noted Gault.

Cross is due back in Bradley County Criminal Court for a March 6 hearing.

n CPD TeleServe Officer Tom Castello filed a report for the owner of a local car wash concerning the theft of change.

According to the report filed Monday, Barry Massengill stated someone had removed money from several computerized cash machines at his North Lee Highway business.

The incident was believed to have been occurring during late December, until Sunday.

No sign of forced entry was noted, according to the report.

The Criminal Investigations Division is in charge of the investigation.

IMMIGRATION:

12 Indicted In Alien Smuggling (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, January 12, 2006

Three suspected ringleaders of two major alien-smuggling organizations and nine accomplices have been indicted by a Texas federal grand jury on charges of trucking more than 600 illegals from the El Paso area to Dallas and beyond during the past two years.

All but three of the gang members were taken into custody this week by U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) agents, assisted by the U.S. Border Patrol. Two of the gang members were identified in indictments unsealed Friday, and another is in La Tuna Federal Correctional Institution on a previous alien-smuggling conviction.

"These unscrupulous smugglers operate ruthlessly and with no regard for the human beings whose lives they endanger," said ICE special agent in charge Kyle Hutchins, who heads the agency's El Paso field office. "During this investigation, our special agents encountered various groups with 35 to 79 people crammed in trailers for the nonstop nine-hour trip to Dallas from El Paso with no food and limited water.

DOJ_NMG_0009279

"The only way to enter or exit the trailers was through trailer doors, which were sometimes padlocked," Mr. Hutchins said.

The gang members were identified as residents of El Paso County and Dallas. The arrests culminated a two-year undercover investigation.

ICE spokesman Dean Boyd said Mike Price, 53, his wife, Fabiola del Carmen Moguel de Price, 39, and Sam Jarvis, 52, headed two separate organizations that generated more than $1.6 million in smuggling fees between March 2003 and October 2005.

He said Mr. Jarvis and the Prices, all of Socorro, Texas, originally worked together, but the Prices left the Jarvis organization in 2003 to establish their own alien-smuggling enterprise.

Mr. Boyd said one of the smuggling loads intercepted included 28 illegal aliens that Ronald Dean Anglin, 54, a co-leader of the Price organization, attempted to sneak past a Border Patrol checkpoint near Sierra Blanca, Texas. The aliens were concealed in a large plywood box covered with a blue tarp on top of a flatbed trailer, he said.

Mr. Jarvis purportedly offered drivers of 18-wheel rigs $300 for each illegal alien they concealed and hauled to the Dallas area in their trailers.

Mr. Boyd said the two gangs smuggled Brazilians, Colombians, Hondurans, Salvadorans, Guatemalans, Nicaraguans, Ecuadoreans and Mexicans. Depending on the nationality, he said, the gangs charged each alien between $1,500 and $6,000 to be smuggled into the United States and later brought to Arizona, Colorado, Oklahoma, Illinois, Florida and New York.

Both organizations housed the aliens in "drop houses" throughout El Paso County after smuggling them into the United States from Ciudad Juarez, Mexico, Mr. Boyd said.

He said Mr. Price, his wife and Mr. Jarvis were charged with conspiracy to smuggle aliens.

Ex-Embassy Driver Admits Smuggling Aliens (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, January 12, 2006

(AP) - ALEXANDRIA, Va.-A former driver for the Saudi Embassy in Washington pleaded guilty Tuesday to smuggling aliens into the United States.

Mohamed Abdel Wahab Yakoub, 61, admitted he used Saudi Embassy letterhead to obtain diplomatic visas from U.S. embassies for several Egyptians and Filipinos.

Yakoub, an Egyptian, faces up to 10 years in prison when he is sentenced in April on a single count of smuggling aliens. He will be subject to deportation after the sentencing.

Yakoub sold visas for $5,000 to $7,000. Court documents indicate he helped at least six illegal aliens gain entry to the U.S. in 2000 and 2001. He was fired by the Saudi embassy in 2002.

The Joint Terrorism Task Force, which helped investigate, said it had no indication the scheme had any connection to terrorism.

TAX:

Ex-county GOP Chairman Pleads Guilty To Tax Evasion (CHASGAZ)

By Tom Searls, Staff writer

Charleston Gazette, January 12, 2006

A former Kanawha County Republican chairman has agreed to plead guilty to tax evasion by using some of his employees' withholdings to pay for his wife's Mercedes-Benz.

Steven L. Miller admitted in an information filed by Assistant U.S. Attorney Hunter P. Smith Jr. that he "evaded and defeated approximately $38,000 of the federal personal income taxes, trust fund taxes and Trust Fund Recovery Penalties due and owing by him" to the federal government.

DOJ_NMG_0009280

Miller had apparently withheld federal taxes and trust fund money from employees' pay, placing it in a separate bank account at the Putnam County Bank, but never passed it on to the federal government.

- advertisement -

Internal Revenue Service agents led the investigation of Miller from 1999 through 2000. The IRS has been aggressive in investigating such cases because employees may not qualify for Social Security, Medicare or unemployment benefits if taxes that have been withheld from their pay are never remitted to the federal government.

Miller also owed unpaid personal income taxes.

A federal information usually indicates a defendant is cooperating with investigating authorities. The information against Miller was filed Wednesday.

IRS agents found that Miller tried to hide his personal income, as well as not paying the employees' payments prior to paying other creditors. In November 1999, he received a payment from a client and deposited it in a Colorado bank under the name of his wife.

Later that month, four checks totaling $3,500 were written to Miller from that account, while later that month a check for $10,500 from the Colorado account was deposited in Miller's personal account at the Putnam County Bank.

In December 1999, Miller wrote a check for $7,000 from the Putnam County account to his son. In 2000 he wrote a check from the Putnam trust account for $1,300 to make a payment on his wife's 1994 Mercedes. Then in October 2000, the information shows, he used some of the funds to pay a loan secured by his wife's car at another bank.

Miller was a candidate for U.S. attorney for the Southern District of West Virginia in the early 1980s. His ex-wife, Peggy Miller, was Kanawha County clerk.

It was uncertain when Miller, who was a resident of South Charleston, will be sentenced or if he is continuing to practice law.

Another accused tax evader, Charleston resident Carl Kennedy, is scheduled to be sentenced today in federal court for similar charges.

Wife Of Indicted NYPD Detective Pleads Not Guilty To Tax Charge (NSDY/AP)

By Ken Ritter, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, January 12, 2006

LAS VEGAS -- The wife of a former New York police detective accused of working as a mob hit man pleaded not guilty Wednesday to three charges of filing a false income tax return.

Frances Eppolito was ordered released without bond and was appointed a federal public defender pending a trial set for March 13. She told U.S. Magistrate Judge Lawrence R. Leavitt she had been arrested earlier in the day in Las Vegas.

Family members who attended the brief arraignment at the U.S. District Courthouse in Las Vegas declined to comment.

Eppolito and her husband, Louis Eppolito, were named in a three-count felony indictment handed up Tuesday. Each is accused of filing false federal income tax returns for $127,386 in income in 2000, $8,654 in income in 2001 and a net loss of $1,297 in 2002.

The defendants had substantial income "from screenplay writing business activity," the indictment said.

Each could face up to three years in federal prison and a $100,000 fine if convicted on each count, Internal Revenue Service spokeswoman Mercedes Manzur said.

A spokeswoman for U.S. Attorney Daniel Bogden said she had no immediate information about whether Louis Eppolito had been arrested or ordered to surrender on the charges.

He was free on bond living in the New York area, where he is awaiting trial next month on charges that he and his former detective partner, Stephen Caracappa, accepted thousands of dollars to work for the mob while they were still in the New York Police Department.

Both men have pleaded not guilty.

DOJ_NMG_0009281

The former partners were arrested last March in Las Vegas, where they lived across the street from each other since retiring in the early 1990s. Authorities have accused the detectives of using their access to police information to give mob associates the names of confidential informants. Each faces up to life in prison if convicted.

Eppolito is the author of a 1992 autobiography, "Mafia Cop: The Story of an Honest Cop Whose Family Was the Mob." The son, grandson and nephew of Mafia members described his family background, a decorated police career and what he called false charges of Mafia involvement.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Democrats Sharply Question Alito (REU-Y2)

By Thomas Ferraro And Joanne Kenen

Reuters, January 12, 2006

Senators critical of the Bush administration aggressively questioned Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito on Wednesday. His wife briefly left the confirmation hearing in tears.

In the third day of hearings, Democratic senators accused Alito of being evasive on issues ranging from abortion to presidential powers to past membership in a conservative alumni group at prestigious Princeton University.

South Carolina Republican Sen. Lindsey Graham (news, bio, voting record) told Alito: "I am sorry that you've had to go through this. I am sorry that your family has had to sit here and listen to this."

While Alito appears headed for confirmation by the full Republican-led Senate later this month, several Democrats made clear that after a relatively gentle start of proceedings on Monday and Tuesday, they were waging an election-year fight.

Alito, pressed repeatedly about his membership two decades ago in the alumni group that opposed efforts to admit more women and minorities to the university, said, "I'm not any kind of a bigot."

"I believe you," Graham said.

At one point, Alito's wife, Martha-Ann, was crying in the crowded hearing room and then left. She returned about an hour later and sat behind her husband.

President George W. Bush has nominated Alito, 55, a federal appeals judge the past 15 years, to replace retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, often the swing vote on abortion and other social issues on the nine-member court.

Sen. Richard Durbin (news, bio, voting record), an Illinois Democrat, began the day's Senate Judiciary Committee hearing, saying he was troubled Alito had not disavowed a 1985 memo in which he wrote that "the Constitution does not protect a right to an abortion."

"I'm concerned that many people will leave this hearing with a question as to whether or not you could be the deciding vote that would eliminate the legality of abortion," he said.

OPEN MIND

Alito, who wrote the memo as a Reagan administration attorney two decades ago, has not said how he would rule if abortion came before him on the high court. But the nominee reaffirmed his vow to keep an open mind and respect legal precedent and noted the landmark 1973 decision that legalized abortion had been upheld repeatedly.

Sen. Charles Schumer (news, bio, voting record), a New York Democrat, said, "Judge Alito has responded, but he has not answered."

Sen. Patrick Leahy (news, bio, voting record) of Vermont, the committee's top Democrat, said Democrats were also troubled by what they saw as inconsistencies in many of Alito's answers.

Alito listed membership in the since-disbanded alumni group, Concerned Alumni of Princeton, or CAP, in a 1985 application for a job in the Reagan administration. He told the panel he had no recollection of any involvement with the group.

Sen. Edward Kennedy (news, bio, voting record), a Massachusetts Democrat, quoted a 1983 essay, "In Defense of Elitism," from the alumni group's magazine that read, in part: "People nowadays just don't seem to know their place. Everywhere one turns, blacks and Hispanics are demanding jobs simply because they're black and Hispanic."

DOJ_NMG_0009282

Alito, a member since 1990 of the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, denounced the essay as offensive and said he did not know the group had promoted such positions.

Kennedy told reporters later, "It's extraordinary to me that this nominee can remember all 67 of his dissents in great detail -- in great, great, detail and he still is mystified about his association about a CAP organization that he used as a job reference."

Nerves Fray At Alito Hearing Democrats Turn Up Heat On Supreme Court Nominee (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — The third day of Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito's confirmation hearings took a contentious turn Wednesday as Democrats grilled him about his ethics and membership in a controversial Princeton alumni group.

Alito's wife, Martha-Ann, walked out of the hearing room in tears as Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., apologized to an unflappable Alito for the Democratic challenges.

"Judge Alito, I am sorry that you've had to go through this," Graham said. "I am sorry that your family has had to sit here and listen to this."

Martha-Ann Alito returned to the room later.

Several Republicans predicted confirmation for Alito, a judge on the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. "You're going to serve as an outstanding justice," said Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kan.

The incident with Alito's wife followed hours of questions from Sens. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., and Russ Feingold, D-Wis., about a decision by Alito not to recuse himself from a 2002 case involving Vanguard, which held his investments.

Alito called the suggestion that the case would have affected his mutual funds "preposterous."

Another recurring theme was Alito's involvement in Concerned Alumni of Princeton, a group whose membership he touted on a 1985 job application that asked him to demonstrate his "philosophical commitment" to Reagan administration policies. Some members of the group, formed in 1972 just after Princeton went coed, suggested that the university had lowered academic standards to admit women and minorities. Alito graduated in 1972.

Kennedy expressed incredulity at Alito's repeated assertions that he does not remember belonging to the group. Alito said he doesn't share some members' views on women and minorities. "I disavow them; I deplore them," he said.

For the third day, abortion was a prime topic. Alito has been tapped to succeed retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, a swing vote on abortion and other issues.

Alito called the high court's 1973 decision in Roe v. Wade, which made abortion legal nationwide, "a precedent that's entitled to respect," but he wouldn't say whether he still believes "the Constitution does not protect a right to an abortion," as he wrote in 1985.

The Republican Majority for Choice, a group that supports abortion rights, announced its opposition to Alito.

Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., a member of that group, has not said how he'll vote on Alito.

An Intense Experience For Family Members, Too (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 11 - While the nominee at a confirmation hearing at least gets to respond to criticisms, his family members and supporters are obliged to sit stiffly and stoically behind him as a backdrop for the cameras.

Many nominees and their family members have described the experience as excruciating, and Martha-Ann Alito is not likely to disagree.

On Wednesday, more than eight hours after the hearing was called to order, Mrs. Alito began to weep when a supportive senator, Lindsey Graham, a South Carolina Republican, was questioning her husband, who was seated a few feet in front of her.

Mr. Graham was making the point that criticisms of Judge Alito's integrity were unfair, and he chose to do so by posing mock-accusatory questions intended to demonstrate how implausible the claims were.

Judge Alito had explained his failure to recuse himself from a case involving a mutual fund in which he had an interest because of an oversight and said that the issue was of no consequence to his holdings.

DOJ_NMG_0009283

"I am baffled as to why you would make a conscious decision in this situation not to recuse yourself," Mr. Graham demanded. "Do you have an explanation?"

"There's no reason why I would make such a conscious decision," Judge Alito replied. "I had nothing whatsoever to gain by participating in this case, and nobody has suggested that I did."

When Mr. Graham asked him in the same fashion, "Are you really a closet bigot?" - because of his membership in a Princeton alumni group that opposed the university's affirmative action program - Judge Alito said he was "not any kind of bigot," to which Mr. Graham agreed.

At that point, Mrs. Alito began to sniffle audibly. She hurried to a corner of the hearing room, then went into an anteroom, where she sobbed for a few minutes. She later returned to the hearing room.

Democrats Target Alito's Credibility (WSJ)

By Jeanne Cummings

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Democratic strategy to derail Judge Samuel Alito's Supreme Court appointment is centered on raising doubts about the nominee's credibility and persuading senators he would curb or end abortion rights.

In three days before the Senate Judiciary Committee, Judge Alito's straightforward testimony has served as a strong counter to their campaign. But the Third U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals judge has declined to amend his 1985 assertion that the Constitution doesn't protect the right to an abortion, helping Democrats make some headway on the issue.

Democrats may have lost points, however, when Judge Alito's wife, Martha, left the hearing room in tears after Republican Sen. Lindsey Graham of South Carolina apologized for the treatment of her husband. She later returned. Alito supporters sent emails about the incident, blaming Democrats for going too far.

During his testimony, Judge Alito declined to endorse Chief Justice John Roberts's testimony that Roe v. Wade, the 1973 abortion-rights case, is a settled precedent of the Supreme Court. Judge Alito told senators that he wasn't sure what Chief Justice Roberts meant by the word "settled."

Yesterday, the Republican Majority for Choice, an organization of Republicans who support abortion rights, said it "regrettably" will oppose the nomination. "Judge Alito seems by all measures to be an experienced and capable jurist, but one who is out of step with mainstream Americans on the issue of abortion and maintaining the legal right to choose," the group said in a statement.

Four Republican senators, including Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, serve on the group's advisory board, but won't necessarily take its position when deciding how to vote on the nomination. The others are Rhode Island's Lincoln Chafee and Maine's Olympia Snowe and Susan Collins, who have all expressed reservations about Judge Alito's nomination.

Democrats, who hold 44 Senate seats and often count Vermont Independent James Jeffords among their ranks, aren't talking about a filibuster, for now. That decision will be made after the hearings, aides said. Even without a filibuster, Judge Alito may face a tight floor vote if three or four Republicans oppose him because of his stance on abortion.

Democrats fear that Judge Alito would move the court to the right because he would succeed departing Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, a conservative on many issues who sometimes tilted left as the swing vote on discrimination, abortion and civil-rights cases.

To make their case, Democrats must poke holes in Judge Alito's testimony and argue that senators shouldn't trust his assurances that if confirmed, he wouldn't pursue a conservative agenda. On civil and disability rights, Democrats have highlighted cases in which Judge Alito ruled on the side of government or business -- claiming that is his pattern. But Judge Alito's 15-year tenure on the appeals court allows him to call attention to cases where he instead sided with the complainant.

The Democrats' two-phase strategy during the hearings involves first asking questions to establish Judge Alito's position and then pursuing a line of questions challenging it. Yesterday Sen. Edward Kennedy (D., Mass.) followed this template when probing Judge Alito's membership in the Concerned Alumni of Princeton, a group opposed to integration of the campus. Citing a timeline that showed Princeton alumni were sent two letters highlighting the group's work, Sen. Kennedy challenged Judge Alito's testimony that he joined the organization one year later, unaware of one of its missions: opposing enrollment of women, blacks and homosexuals.

DOJ_NMG_0009284

Judge Alito said he doesn't remember why he joined in 1985, but he thinks it was because he was troubled by opposition to a Reserve Officers Training Corps office on the Princeton campus. Sen. Kennedy produced a 1985 issue of Concerned Alumni's publication that declared ROTC is "popular" once again. Judge Alito said he recalled the ROTC struggle was continuing. Sen. Kennedy said the nominee's answers don't "add up."

Write to Jeanne Cummings at jeanne.cummings@wsj.com18

Alito Turns Aside Democrats' Criticism (AP)

By David Espo

The Associated Press, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito turned aside Democratic attacks on his judicial record and credibility at contentious confirmation hearings Wednesday that left his wife in tears.

"If I'm confirmed I'll be myself," said Alito, a 15-year veteran of a federal appeals court, named to succeed Justice Sandra Day O'Connor for a swing seat on the high court.

Challenged by Democrats, Alito repeatedly said he had no memory of involvement with the conservative Concerned Alumni of Princeton, though he highlighted his membership in a 1985 job application for the Reagan administration.

He repudiated the opinions expressed in articles in the organization's magazine. "They're not my views ... I deplore them," he said of writing that contained material that was racist, sexist and homophobic.

Under persistent questioning, Alito also declined for a second straight day to say whether he believes, as he did in 1985, that the Constitution contains no right to an abortion. "I don't think it's appropriate for me to speak about issues that could realistically come up" before the courts, he said.

Alito, 55, was unflappable for hours on end in marathon questioning before the Senate Judiciary Committee. But his wife, Martha-Ann Bomgardner, grew emotional near the end of the day and left the hearing room weeping.

"Judge Alito, I'm sorry that you've had to go through this. I am sorry that your family has had to sit here and listen to this," said Sen. Lindsey Graham. A moment earlier, the South Carolina Republican had offered Alito a chance to defend his integrity, asking whether he was a "closet bigot."

"I'm not any kind of bigot, I'm not," said Alito.

"No sir, you're not," Graham agreed.

Alito's wife returned with him following a brief recess.

The nominee commands the support of all 10 Republicans on the Senate Judiciary Committee, and while the Democrats could delay his approval by the panel they cannot block it. His prospects for confirmation by the full Senate are also strong, although Democrats have not ruled out the possibility of a filibuster that could require supporters to post 60 votes in the 100-member chamber.

Still, unlike Chief Justice John Roberts last fall, Alito may draw the opposition of all eight Democrats on the Judiciary panel, and partisan maneuvering was evident Wednesday.

Abortion triggered one incident. Sen. Richard Durbin, who supports abortion rights, told Alito that his 1985 written view on abortion "does not evidence an open mind. It evidences a mind that sadly is closed in some areas."

Sen. Tom Coburn of Oklahoma, saying he wanted to "razz" Durbin, soon noted that the Illinois Democrat had himself changed his mind on abortion. "For 45 years, Senator Durbin was adamantly pro-life, and he wrote multiple, multiple letters expressing that up until 1989," said Republican Coburn.

Later, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy pressed the committee's chairman, Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., to subpoena records at the Library of Congress that might shed light on Alito's membership in the conservative Princeton group.

"If I'm going to be denied that, I'd want to give notice to the chair that you're going to hear it again and again and again and we're going to have votes of this committee again and again and again until we have a resolution," said the Massachusetts Democrat.

DOJ_NMG_0009285

Specter, bristling, said, "I'm not concerned about your threats to have votes again, again and again. And I'm the chairman of this committee. ... And I'm not going to have you run this committee."

The tempest proved short-lived. Specter later announced the committee would have access to the records.

Kennedy questioned Alito sharply about the organization, which drew notice for opposing admission practices that resulted in rising numbers of women and minority students at the Ivy League school.

"If I had received any information at any point regarding any of the matters you referred to ... I would never have had anything to do with it," said Alito, who listed his membership in the group on a 1985 job application for the Reagan administration but now says he does not recall anything about it.

Outside the committee room, Kennedy was scathing.

"He can remember all 67 dissents ... in great details," he said of Alito and his judicial record. "But he can't remember anything about this organization."

Those judicial dissents drew the attention of several Democrats, as did other rulings over the course of Alito's 15-year tenure on the appeals court.

Durbin cited rulings in cases involving a black man accused of murder, a retarded man who had been sexually molested and an injury at a coal work site.

He said that in each case, Alito had made rulings that favored the powerful at the expense of the powerless. "I find this as a recurring pattern, and it raises the question in my mind whether the average person, the dispossessed person, the poor person who finally has their day in court ... are going to be subject to the crushing hand of fate when it comes to your decisions."

Alito defended his rulings one by one, then was offered a chance for a general reply.

He cited a case in which a "high school student had been bullied unmercifully by other students in his school because of their perception of his sexual orientation, been bullied to the point of attempting to commit suicide."

The school board refused a request from the parents to move their child to a different school, but Alito said, "I wrote an opinion upholding their right to have him placed in a safe school in an adjacent municipality."

Underscoring the political significance of the nomination, Durbin had scarcely completed his 20 minutes of questioning when the nominee's supporters circulated written material titled, "A sampling of cases where Alito rules for the `Little Guy.'"

Democrats countered with a document of their own. It accused Republicans of distorting Alito's record by "citing uncontroversial cases with obvious outcomes or by distorting the facts or outcomes of the cases they cite."

Alito's views on abortion were a recurring theme for Democrats.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., picking up where Durbin had left off, asked Alito why he felt comfortable renouncing 20-year-old statements he had made questioning the principle of one person, one vote, when he wouldn't do the same on Roe v. Wade.

Alito said once again there are cases making their way through the courts on abortion.

Feinstein noted four voting rights cases currently pending that raise questions of whether the principle of one person, one vote has been violated.

"If you're willing to say that you believe one man, one vote is well settled and you agree with it, I have a hard time understanding how you separate out Roe," she said.

Alito Disavows Controversial Group (WP)

By Dale Russakoff

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

As a Princeton alumnus and professional basketball player, Bill Bradley in 1973 renounced his membership in Concerned Alumni of Princeton, calling it a "right wing" organization that opposed the admission of women and minorities to the school.

Two years later, another distinguished alumnus and future U.S. senator, Bill Frist, co-wrote a report denouncing the group for "grossly inaccurate" attacks on the school's policies and a "narrow ideological perspective" that had done "a disservice to the university."

DOJ_NMG_0009286

Supreme Court nominee Samuel A. Alito Jr.'s membership in this group, which he touted among his conservative credentials in a 1985 application for a political appointment in the Reagan Justice Department, touched off a bruising political battle yesterday during the third day of confirmation hearings.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (Mass.) and other Democrats demanded to know why the son of an Italian immigrant would take credit for membership in a "radical" group that opposed increased enrollment of women and minorities, while Republicans and a White House spokesman branded that line of questioning as "pathetic," "scurrilous" and an effort to assign "guilt by association."

The group was founded in 1972 by Princeton alumni who were troubled that the university had recently begun admitting women and who said Princeton had lowered its standards to admit more minorities.

Alito, a 1972 Princeton graduate, testified yesterday that he has no recollection of joining the group, and that he would not have done so if he had known of its writings about women and minorities. "I deplore those statements," he said. "I would never be a member of an organization that took those positions."

He said he assumes he joined only because he supported the return of ROTC to the Princeton campus. As an undergraduate, Alito was a member of Princeton's Army ROTC unit when it was expelled from the campus -- a move that he said "rankled" him because "the attitude seemed to be that the military was a bad institution and that Princeton was too good for the military."

The Army ROTC unit was back on campus by the time Alito wrote his 1985 job application, but he said the Navy and Air Force units were not.

Throughout its existence, the now-defunct group was widely reported in major newspapers and magazines to be against increased admission of minorities and women -- positions advanced in its magazine, fliers and letters to alumni. Republicans released a 1985 newspaper article that said the group also was defending the Army ROTC unit then.

Democrats declared themselves "incredulous" that Alito was unaware of the group's attitudes toward women and minority students, and that his explanations for why he joined the group and mentioned it on an application did not add up. Kennedy read aloud a number of passages from the group's magazine, Prospect, that attacked women, minorities and gays.

One 1983 article, titled "In Defense of Elitism," began: "People nowadays just don't seem to know their place. Everywhere one turns, blacks and Hispanics are demanding jobs simply because they're black and Hispanic. The physically handicapped are trying to gain equal representation in professional sports. And homosexuals are demanding the government vouchsafe them the right to bear children."

Alito said he had never seen the article and called the view in it "antithetical" to his beliefs. Republicans released disclaimers from Prospect saying that all articles reflected the opinions of the authors and were not official positions of Concerned Alumni of Princeton.

White House spokesman Steve Schmitt said Kennedy was "attributing to the judge words he never said or wrote and explicitly repudiates" because the Democrats were "unable to challenge Judge Alito's mastery of the law and his stellar 15-year record on the appellate court."

Sen. Richard J. Durbin (D-Ill.) read aloud the comments of 1975 Princeton graduate Diane Weeks who had worked for Alito when he was U.S. attorney in New Jersey.

"When I saw Concerned Alumni of Princeton on that 1985 job application, I was flabbergasted," Durbin quoted Weeks as saying in the Nation magazine. "I was totally stunned. I couldn't believe it. CAP made it clear to women like me we were not wanted on campus. And he is touting his membership in this group in 1985, 13 years after he graduated? He's not a young man at this point. . . . I'm very troubled by this and if I were in the Senate, I would want some answers."

Alito responded that Weeks was "one of many women whom I hired when I was U.S. attorney. And I think that illustrates my attitude toward equality for women."

In an interview yesterday, Weeks said: "The reason I'm flabbergasted is that from my personal experience with Sam, he does not discriminate against women, minorities or anyone else. He is a merit-based thinker. That's who he is. I cannot understand for the life of me why he would have even associated himself with Concerned Alumni of Princeton."

DOJ_NMG_0009287

At Kennedy's request, and with Alito's blessing, Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) said the panel will examine the group's records to get "all the facts." The records are in the Library of Congress in the private papers of William Rusher, a former publisher of the National Review magazine. Rusher allowed the New York Times to review the records last year, and the newspaper found no evidence that Alito was active in the organization or was a major donor to it.

Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.) called the attacks on Alito "guilt by association," adding, "I am sorry that your family has had to sit here and listen to this." Alito's wife, Martha, left the room in tears, returning after a break.

Alito's Ties To Controversial Group Probed (LAT)

By Johanna Neuman

The Los Angeles Times, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON -- In 1972, at the height of one of the most tumultuous times in higher education, a group of Princeton University graduates staged their own form of protest against the changes they saw around them.

As college campuses roiled with demonstrations over the Vietnam War, feminism and free speech, the Concerned Alumni of Princeton -- co-chaired by wealthy alumni from the classes of 1921 and 1930 -- had its own narrower agenda: fighting the admissions policy that opened classroom doors to women and minorities.

Defunct for almost 20 years and largely forgotten, the organization on Wednesday became a central issue in the Supreme Court confirmation hearings of Samuel A. Alito Jr., who graduated from Princeton in 1972.

"I did not join this group . . . because of any attitude toward women or minorities," Alito told the Senate Judiciary Committee. "What bothered me about the Princeton administration . . . was the treatment of ROTC" -- which Alito joined as an undergraduate and which lost its contract with the university during the Vietnam protests.

With senators clamoring for papers that might shed light on Alito's involvement in the group, and reporters rushing to the university to review documents in the school's Seeley G. Mudd Library, the spotlight intensified on the organization whose purpose was to preserve a Princeton of men -- mostly white, mostly wealthy and many conservative.

Last November, the college paper, the Daily Princetonian, noted that in the first issue of Prospect -- the Concerned Alumni of Princeton magazine -- founder Shelby Cullom Davis, then one of the university's largest donors, had written of his Princeton ideal. It was embodied, he wrote, in the alumni he saw at his father's 50th reunion -- "a body of men, relatively homogenous in interests and backgrounds, who had known and liked each other over the years during which they had contributed much in spirit and substance to the greatness of Princeton."

Princeton began admitting women as undergraduates in 1969, when Alito was a sophomore. In a fundraising letter a few years later, according to research by the liberal group People for the American Way, Concerned Alumni of Princeton urged "a more traditional undergraduate population" and a quota that would keep number of female students at 1,000 out of 4,400.

"A student population of approximately 40 percent women and minorities will largely vitiate the alumni body of the future," said the letter.

Defenders of the organization argue that it has been misrepresented in the mainstream media and on liberal blogs, part of a smear campaign against Alito.

"It's a huge diversion and a bit of a desperation tactic," said Dinesh D'Souza, who edited Prospect in 1984 and is now a conservative scholar at Stanford University's Hoover Institution. "It was a conservative organization well within mainstream conservative thought. There was nothing extreme or racist. It attacked racial preferences. It never did take a position against cohabitation."

Still, the organization left a string of sound bites that liberal critics seized on Wednesday to portray the group -- and, by extension, Alito -- as insensitive to a generation of gains by women and minorities.

"Coeducation has ruined the mystique and camaraderies that used to exist," T. Harding Jones, a classmate of Alito's and the first editor of Prospect, told The New York Times in 1974.

William A. Rusher, one of the group's original board members and a former editor of the conservative magazine National Review, talked about Concerned Alumni of Princeton on Wednesday in a question-and-answer session on the magazine's Web site.

DOJ_NMG_0009288

The organization, he said, was "concerned over various liberal tendencies that had developed in the Princeton administration." He added, "I will always remember fondly the Princeton I knew, and regret what has happened to it."

He quoted a colleague approvingly as saying that Princeton, known to its graduates as Old Nassau, had become "just another liberal joint."

The Democrats' Last Roar, By Way Of Princeton (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

It looked to be a second dreary day in the confirmation hearings of Supreme Court pick Samuel Alito, as the senators droned and the nominee dodged. Then, just before lunch, the old lion roared.

Actually, it started as a growl. The gray-maned Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) read quotations published by a conservative Princeton group to which Alito belonged, protesting that blacks, Hispanics and women "don't know their place" and suggesting medical experiments for gay Princeton students.

Paying no heed to Alito's anxious insistence that he was not active in the group, Kennedy then pounced on Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.). "Mr. Chairman, if I could have your attention, I think we ought to vote on issuing a subpoena" for the group's records, Kennedy said, his voice rising and his face flushing.

Specter, awakened from a reverie by Kennedy's sudden outburst, protested that this was the first he was hearing of the issue and banged his gavel to indicate that it was time to move on. But this only inflamed Kennedy more. "If I'm going to be denied that, I'd want to give notice to the chair that you're going to hear it again and again and again and we're going to have votes of this committee again and again and again until we have a resolution."

Specter, now fully appreciating the ambush, hollered back. "Well, Senator Kennedy, I'm not concerned about your threats to have votes again, again and again," he admonished. "And I'm not going to have you run this committee." He banged the gavel again.

The hearing room was transformed. The nominee's wife, Martha Ann Alito, sighed. Alito's White House handler, Dan Coats, started working his BlackBerry. The reporters began tapping on their keyboards. Kennedy took a sip of water, flashed a tight smile at Alito, then a broader smile in the direction of the photographers in the pit.

Thus did Democrats take their last stand against Alito. It had become clear that the committee, with unified GOP support, would clear the judge. Surveying the various lines of attack against Alito -- his opposition to abortion, his support for a powerful president, his conflict-of-interest issues -- Democrats concluded that their best hope was in Alito's membership in a group opposed to gains by women and minorities. Clarence Thomas had Anita Hill. Alito would have the Concerned Alumni of Princeton.

Whatever the charge's merits, it drew blood.

As several more Democrats joined Kennedy's assault -- Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (Del.) donned a Princeton baseball cap for the occasion -- Alito's replies grew more frantic. "I disavow them. I deplore them. They represent things that I have always stood against and I can't express too strongly," he told Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.).

"If you don't mind the suspicious nature that I have, it's that you may be saying that because you want to get on the Supreme Court, that you're disavowing this now because it doesn't look too good," said Graham, trying to help Alito. "I'm going to be very honest with you," Graham continued. "Are you really a closet bigot?"

Alito's ears turned scarlet. "I'm not any kind of bigot," he said, emotionally. "I'm not." Behind him, Martha Alito had had enough. She stood up, tissue in hand, and rushed to the back of the room, where Capitol Police whisked away the tearful woman. She didn't return for an hour.

The day started well enough for Alito. Sen. Orrin G. Hatch (Utah) continued to lob such softballs -- "Did you go out of your way to rule against workers?" -- that even his GOP colleagues had to smile. The nominee earned chuckles for joking that if court sessions were televised, "our Nielsen numbers would be in the negative."

But Kennedy ended the grins. "I've testified to everything that I can recall," the now-testy nominee said.

DOJ_NMG_0009289

Kennedy, participating in his 23rd Supreme Court confirmation, started a schoolyard brawl with the committee chairman, demanding a subpoena of the Princeton documents.

"You and I see each other all the time and you have never mentioned it to me," Specter protested.

Kennedy said he had sent a letter making the request.

"We actually didn't get a letter," the chairman said.

"You did get a letter."

"Now, wait a minute: You don't know what I got."

"Yes, I do, Senator, since I sent it."

The longtime legislators continued to bicker until Specter erupted: "I take umbrage at your telling me what I received. I don't mind your telling me what you mailed. But there's a big difference between what's mailed and what's received. And you know that."

The great postal debate proved moot after lunch, when Specter announced that the custodian of the Princeton papers would turn them over without a subpoena. He scolded Kennedy for starting a "tussle." "Senator Kennedy and I frequent the gym at the same time and talk all the time, and he never mentioned it to me," he said.

Kennedy was no longer the lion: "I regret I haven't been down in the gym since before Christmas," he explained. "So I missed you."

Senators Show Claws At Hearing, Sling Zingers (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, January 12, 2006

The Alito confirmation hearings had been a largely placid affair, but things got downright personal yesterday between members of the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Sen. Tom Coburn, Oklahoma Republican, accused Democrat Whip Richard J. Durbin of Illinois of hypocrisy while panel chairman Arlen Specter and Sen. Edward M. Kennedy fell out over mail delivery.

With senators coming and going, Mr. Specter, Pennsylvania Republican, instituted a rule that no more comments could be made about another member unless that member was there to defend himself. At one point, a visibly distraught Martha Alito, who had sat behind her husband through the entire hearings excused herself from the room to regain her composure.

The brouhaha came after many observers had decided that Democrats had been neutered during the first two days, mastering the art of softball pitches. The Washington Post had called the sessions "a most tender roast of Alito."

Not yesterday.

The sharpest exchange came after Mr. Kennedy accused Mr. Specter of lying about whether he had gotten a letter requesting more information from the Library of Congress that Mr. Kennedy said would shed light on Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr.'s membership in Concerned Alumni of Princeton.

"We actually didn't get a letter," Mr. Specter said.

"You did get a letter," interrupted the Massachusetts Democrat.

Then Mr. Kennedy tried invoking a parliamentary challenge to Mr. Specter, the chairman nearly snapped his little wooden gavel as he called the meeting back to order.

"If I'm going to be denied that, I'd want to give notice to the chair that you're going to hear it again and again and again and we're going to have votes of this committee again and again and again until we have a resolution," Mr. Kennedy said.

A testy Mr. Specter snapped back: "I'm not concerned about your threats to have votes again, again and again. And I'm the chairman of this committee. ... And I'm not going to have you run this committee."

But Mr. Specter's staff was later able to get the records Mr. Kennedy wanted without issuing a subpoena.

The most personal exchange came after Mr. Durbin took up the matter of abortion with the nominee.

He told Judge Alito that he could not support a nominee who would not uphold the Supreme Court precedents that guarantee the federal right to abortion. He then quizzed the nominee about the 1985 job application essay he wrote in which he said there was no basis for abortion rights in the Constitution.

DOJ_NMG_0009290

When it was Mr. Coburn's turn to question the nominee, he turned the spotlight to Mr. Durbin.

"For 45 years, Senator Durbin was adamantly pro-life and he wrote multiple, multiple letters expressing that up until 1989," he said. Today, "he is a very strong advocate for the abortion stance and a free right to choose."

All the while, a Coburn staffer held aloft a large blue placard of a blown-up letter by Mr. Durbin when he was in the House.

"Thank you very much for taking the time to express your opposition to abortion," Mr. Durbin wrote in 1989. "I believe we should end abortion on demand, and at every opportunity I have translated this belief into votes in the House of Representatives."

Mr. Durbin, who had left the hearing room by the time Mr. Coburn's turn to speak had come, issued a statement explaining his change of position on the matter.

"Senator Durbin reconsidered his position on abortion after meeting with victims of rape and incest and weighing the implications of making all abortions illegal," spokesman Joe Shoemaker said. "Senator Durbin has always been forthright about his thinking on the subject and has made his position clear to the voters over the course of more than 12 elections. In contrast, Judge Alito has not made clear whether or not he still stands by his 1985 job applications to the Reagan Justice Department."

Alito Accused Of Racism (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, January 12, 2006

Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee yesterday raised the volume of their objections to the Supreme Court nomination of Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr. by grilling him over his ties to a Princeton alumni group that they called racist and misogynist.

They also accused Judge Alito of always ruling against "the little guy" and of evading their questions on abortion and such other hot-button issues as his membership in Concerned Alumni of Princeton, which opposed the admission of women to the all-male school.

"Explanations about the membership in this sort of radical group and why you listed it on your job application are extremely troubling," said Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat. "And, in fact, I don't think that they add up."

Mr. Kennedy demanded during yesterday's hearing that records about the group be subpoenaed, and panel chairman Arlen Specter secured access to the documents during yesterday's lunch break. By yesterday afternoon, staffers for Democrats and Republicans were going through the records at the Library of Congress, a task expected to be finished by this morning.

Republicans dismissed the dust-up -- the most dramatic exchange in three days of hearings -- as a desperate, last-ditch effort by Democrats to stop certain confirmation of Judge Alito.

"Your critics are, I think, grasping at any straw to tarnish your record," said Sen. Charles E. Grassley, Iowa Republican.

"It's kind of like we're in the fourth quarter of a football game, and you're the quarterback," he said. "Your team is way ahead here in the fourth quarter, and opponents are very desperate, keep trying to sack you and aren't doing a very good job of it."

But it did get to Judge Alito's wife, Martha, who sat directly behind him.

Sen. Lindsey Graham, South Carolina Republican, questioned the nominee about his association with the alumni group in an effort to portray Democratic accusations as ridiculous.

"Are you really a closet bigot?" he asked.

"I am not any kind of bigot. I'm not," Judge Alito replied.

"No, sir, you're not," agreed Mr. Graham. "You seem to be a decent, honorable man."

During the exchange, Mrs. Alito left the hearing room in tears. She later returned to her seat and resumed her constant smile for the rest of the day.

"Graham's statement brought out some long-held emotions about how he was being characterized," former Indiana Sen. Dan Coats, who is assisting the Bush administration on the nomination, told reporters later. "Her emotions just caught up with her after 21/2 days of hearing her husband's record mischaracterized."

Several Democrats made it clear yesterday that after a placid first two days, they were waging an election-year fight.

DOJ_NMG_0009291

Sen. Charles E. Schumer, New York Democrat, expressed frustration with Judge Alito's answers on abortion, in which the nominee said he could not commit to voting one way or another and had to keep an "open mind" on issues that might appear before the court.

"Judge Alito has responded, but he has not answered," Mr. Schumer complained.

Democrats also said they didn't believe Judge Alito's "open mind" reassurance on abortion, which he gave Tuesday.

Sen. Richard J. Durbin, Illinois Democrat, said the judge's past statements, including a 1985 job application letter in the Reagan administration, reveal "a mind that sadly is closed in some instances."

Much of the Democratic questioning yesterday suggested that Judge Alito was unwilling to give the "little guy" a fair shake in the courtroom.

"I find this as a recurring pattern," Mr. Durbin said. "It raises the question in my mind whether the average person, the dispossessed person, the poor person who finally has their day in court ... are going to be subject to the crushing hand of fate when it comes to your decisions."

Judge Alito, who was an earnest student throughout school, disagreed and discussed one case in which he ruled against schoolyard bullies.

"This was a case in which a high school student had been bullied unmercifully by other students in his school because of their perception of his sexual orientation," the judge told senators. "He'd been bullied to the point of attempting to commit suicide."

After the school board tried blocking the parents' attempts to move him to a different public school, Judge Alito sided with the family.

But Mr. Kennedy led the inquisition on the Concerned Alumni of Princeton.

In a 1985 job application for a position in the Reagan administration, Judge Alito noted his membership in the group, which published a magazine, and was founded by alumni upset that the previously all-male university had admitted women.

Judge Alito's "affiliation with an organization that fought the admission of women into Princeton calls into question his appreciation for the need for full equality in this country," Mr. Kennedy said in a statement he distributed with copies of articles from the group's publication.

"People nowadays just don't seem to know their place," author H.W. Crocker III wrote in a 1983 issue of the magazine. "Everywhere one turns blacks and hispanics are demanding jobs simply because they're black and hispanic, the physically handicapped are trying to gain equal representation in professional sports, and homosexuals are demanding that government vouchsafe them the right to bear children."

Judge Alito rebuked the sentiments and said he had no recollection of the group. He said that he must have joined because he was in the Reserve Officer Training Corps, and the group also opposed the expulsion of Princeton's ROTC program from campus during the anti-war years of the 1960s and 1970s.

Conservative activists, meanwhile, were eager to point out that Mr. Kennedy was on shaky ground accusing the nominee of associating with people opposed to the inclusion of women in private institutions.

The eight-term senator belonged to an all-male social club -- the Owl -- at Harvard University. The Owl refused to admit women until it was forced to do so during the 1980s, according to records kept by the Harvard Crimson, the student newspaper.

A Kennedy spokeswoman said it was an entirely different matter.

"No one can question Senator Kennedy's commitment to equality, justice and civil rights," said Laura Capps. "What he was part of was a social club, not a radical group pushing a radical agenda."

Anyway, she said, even though women were admitted to the university during Mr. Kennedy's tenure, they weren't fully integrated to the campus until much later.

Democrats Press Alito On Conservative Background (LAW)

By T.r. Goldman, Legal Times

Legal Times, January 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0009292

Democrats pushed and prodded Samuel Alito Jr. on Wednesday, the second full day of questioning the Supreme Court nominee, trying to find holes in his explanation for his membership in a conservative Princeton alumni group and to pin down his views on the constitutionality of abortion.

For the most part, Alito stood them down and, in his cautious monotone, provided the same answers he did the day before to the 18 members of the Senate Judiciary Committee.

The panel's eight Democrats tried their hardest to elicit more comprehensive answers from Alito, who has spent the past 15 years as a judge on the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

From their perspective, Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., scored a victory of sorts in the controversy over Alito's disputed membership in the Concerned Alumni of Princeton University, a body Alito described as a "conservative alumni group" in his now-infamous 1985 application to the Justice Department's Office of Legal Counsel.

The group, founded in the early 1970s, had publicly bemoaned the fact that Princeton University was admitting too many minorities and women. The group's magazine had also published several inflammatory articles.

"Everywhere one turns, blacks and Hispanics are demanding jobs simply because they're black and Hispanic," read an excerpt from one article that Massachusetts Democrat Sen. Edward Kennedy had blown up into an exhibit for the hearings.

"Did you read this article?" Kennedy asked Alito.

"I disagree with all of that," responded Alito, raising his modulated tone for perhaps the first time. "I would never endorse that. I never have endorsed that. If I thought that's what the organization stood for, I never would have joined."

Alito repeated the claim he had made the day before, that he had "racked his brain" and could not remember why he had joined the group. The best explanation he could offer, he said, was his displeasure at the university's attitude toward ROTC, which had been banned at one point but had returned to the campus before Alito graduated in 1972. Alito had been a member of an ROTC unit.

Toward the end of the day Wednesday, however, Schumer was able to elicit a bit more satisfying explanation for Democrats.

Said Schumer: "You somehow plucked this group, which you now say you somehow have no recollection. Why that group? Why was it plucked out and put on the application?"

Answered Alito: "You have to look at the question I was responding to. What I was trying to outline were things relevant to obtaining a political position."

It was the first time Alito had conceded to what many considered obvious: his need to show the Department of Justice, then under the highly conservative influence of Attorney General Edwin Meese, that his conservative bona fides were in order.

"That was the answer he should have started with," said Illinois Democrat Sen. Richard Durbin, after the hearing had ended for the day. "It helps some. I just wish he hadn't gone through this tortuous process to get us there."

Indeed, the pressure evidently got to Alito's wife, Martha-Ann Bomgardner, who at one point late in the day left the hearing room in tears after Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., publicly apologized to the family because they had to endure what he termed the often baseless allegations that accompany a Supreme Court nomination process. "The emotions caught up with her after two-and-a-half tense days," said former Sen. Daniel Coates, R-Ind., who has been charged with shepherding Alito through the nomination process. She later returned to the room.

Earlier in the day, Durbin, the first Democrat to question Alito on Wednesday, asked him why he could assert the constitutionality of Brown v. Board of Education, which struck down racially enforced school segregation, and Griswold v. Connecticut, which established the right to marital privacy, but not the right to an abortion.

The Brown decision, said Alito, was based on the 14th Amendment, while Griswold was based on that amendment's due process clause, and, he added, that particular holding "is not likely to come before the 3rd Circuit [and] not likely to come before the Supreme Court."

Abortion issues, he said, are involved in litigation "at all levels."

As he did on Tuesday, Alito acknowledged that a comment on the same 1985 job application -- that he was "particularly proud" of his contributions to cases in the solicitor general's office which argued that the "constitution does not protect a right to an abortion" -- was an accurate statement 20 years ago.

DOJ_NMG_0009293

"The things that I said in the 1985 memo were a true expression of my views at the time from my vantage point as an attorney in the solicitor general's office. But that was 20 years ago, and a great deal has happened in the case law since then," Alito said.

Alito once again refused to say what his opinion on the matter is today, although he repeated his promise to follow the pattern he laid out in Tuesday's testimony: Once he'd viewed the case through the lens of stare decisis, he would approach the case "the way I approach every legal issue ... and that is to approach it with an open mind and to go through the whole judicial process."

Kennedy's questioning of Alito on his membership in the Princeton alumni group led to a brief but heated argument between Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., and Kennedy, who said he'd sent Specter a letter asking the committee to subpoena the group's records from William Rusher, a former leader of the Princeton alumni association.

"We're entitled to this information," said Kennedy, who said he had mailed Specter the request some weeks earlier and could not understand why Specter had not responded to it. "I take umbrage at your telling me what I received," said Specter, somewhat sharply. "There's a big difference in what's mailed and what's received... . We're in the middle of a round of hearings. This is the first time you have personally called it to my attention, and I will consider it in due course," Specter added, before slamming the gavel down and continuing the proceedings.

It was later determined that Rusher's papers had been donated to the Library of Congress but that no member of the Judiciary Committee had yet asked to look at them. By early afternoon committee staffers were already at the library reviewing the documents. A report in The New York Times last November concluded that Alito, as he had testified earlier, had played no major role in the group.

Alito Leaves Door Open To Reversing 'Roe' (WP)

By Amy Goldstein And Charles Babington

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

The once-sluggish confirmation hearings for Supreme Court nominee Samuel A. Alito Jr. turned confrontational yesterday, as the nominee signaled he might be willing to revisit the ruling that legalized abortion nationwide and Democrats pummeled him over his membership in an alumni group that wanted to restrict enrollment of women and minorities.

Tempers flared openly between the Senate Judiciary Committee's Republican chairman and eldest Democrat, and the nominee's wife fled the marbled hearing room in tears before the day ended with Republicans predicting that Alito will win confirmation, although by a slim margin.

Throughout the day's more than seven hours of questioning, Democratic senators regularly accused Alito of giving incomplete, inconsistent answers. Republicans accused Democrats of being unfair. At one point, Sen. Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.) complained after Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) read aloud magazine excerpts published in the 1980s by Concerned Alumni of Princeton and espousing views Kyl branded as "very scurrilous."

The drama of the hearings' third day nearly overshadowed the significance of the position Alito staked out on the landmark abortion case, Roe v. Wade . Senators also branched into new territory: Alito's record from 15 years on the Court of Appeals for the 3rd Circuit on cases involving religion, immigrants seeking to prevent deportation, and criminals' rights.

Alito edged closer to suggesting that he might be willing to reconsider Roe if he is confirmed to the high court, refusing, under persistent questioning by Democrats, to say that he regards the 1973 decision as "settled law" that "can't be reexamined." In this way, his answers departed notably from those that Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. gave when asked similar questions during his confirmation hearings four months ago.

Yesterday, Alito said that Roe must be treated with respect because it has been reaffirmed by the high court several times in the past three decades.

But when Sen. Richard J. Durbin (D-Ill.) peppered Alito with questions about whether the ruling is "the settled law of the land," the nominee responded: "If 'settled' means that it can't be reexamined, then that's one thing. If 'settled' means that it is a precedent that is entitled to respect . . . then it is a precedent that is protected, entitled to respect under the doctrine of stare decisis." Stare decisis is a legal principle that, in Latin, means "to stand by that which is decided."

DOJ_NMG_0009294

During Roberts's confirmation hearings, he, too, was reluctant to disclose how he would vote if asked to overturn Roe . But during the 2003 hearing on his nomination to the Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit, he had said he viewed the ruling as settled law.

And during Roberts's hearings to become the nation's chief justice, Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) had asked, "Do you mean settled for you, settled only for your capacity as a circuit judge or settled beyond that?" Roberts replied: "Well, beyond that, it's settled as a precedent of the court."

After his exchange with Alito yesterday, Durbin told reporters: "Sam Alito would not use those same words. It really, I'm afraid, leaves open the possibility that we are considering the nomination of a justice who will change 30 years of law in this country, a dramatic change to the American society."

Sen. Tom Coburn (R-Okla.) suggested that Durbin is ill-suited to challenge Alito's views on abortion because Durbin once opposed abortion rights and changed his mind.

Alito told several senators that he felt constrained from saying whether he regards Roe as settled because abortion remains a live issue in the courts. Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.) reminded Alito that he has willingly said other areas of the law were settled even though they remain in play and that, in a 1985 application for a promotion in the Reagan administration's Justice Department, he had written he did not believe the Constitution protects the right to an abortion.

"It was one sentence," Alito replied. "And it certainly is not an attempt to set out a comprehensive view on the subject."

The day's most sizzling exchanges involved Alito's assertion, in the same job application, that he had belonged to Concerned Alumni of Princeton, a group that at that time had rallied conservatives and drawn considerable public notice.

Alito told the committee he does not remember joining the now-defunct group -- founded in 1972, the year he graduated from Princeton University -- and does not know anything about it. Democrats challenged him sharply, wondering aloud if he used the club to impress Reagan conservatives but now wants to distance himself from its outspoken opposition to efforts that brought more women and minorities to Princeton.

The committee's ranking Democrat, Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (Vt.), said Alito's forgetfulness seemed too convenient. "If he didn't know what they stood for, he had to be about the only person in America who didn't know what they stood for," Leahy said.

At midday, Kennedy employed large blue charts showing quotes from articles published in the group's magazine, Prospect. "People nowadays just don't seem to know their place," a November 1983 article said. "Everywhere one turns, blacks and Hispanics are demanding jobs simply because they're black and Hispanic. . . . Homosexuals are demanding the government vouchsafe them the right to bear children. . . . And now come women."

Alito said he had read none of the articles, adding, "I would not have anything to do with statements of that nature."

Kennedy then called on Specter to subpoena records on the alumni group held in the Library of Congress. Noting that the group had received significant press coverage, Kennedy said the records might show Alito was more involved than he has acknowledged.

Kennedy said Specter had ignored his letter to him last month seeking the documents. The chairman retorted that he had never seen it. "I take umbrage at your telling me what I received," he said. When Kennedy persisted, Specter snapped, "I'm not going to have you run this committee."

Their quarrel cooled after Democratic and Republican staff members went to the Library of Congress to review the documents. But emotions rose again in the late afternoon when Alito's wife, Martha, clutching a tissue, raced to the back of the hearing room in tears, then was ushered by security guards through a side door, after debate over the alumni group resumed.

She left during an exchange in which Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.), an Alito supporter, played devil's advocate by summarizing the Democrats' attacks. He asked Alito, "Are you really a closet bigot?"

"I'm not any kind of bigot. I'm not," Alito said.

Graham told Alito he believed him because of "the way you have lived your life and the way you and your wife are raising your children" and, referring to the Democrats' criticisms, said, "I am sorry that your family has had to sit here and listen to this." At that point, Martha Alito rose and left her front-row chair immediately behind her husband, returning about an hour later.

DOJ_NMG_0009295

On other issues, Alito told Sen. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.) that some judges have gone too far in trying to remove religious activities from public life. He cited public school teachers who refused to let children read a short Bible story or display a hand-drawn picture of Jesus. "You have to treat religious speech equally with secular speech," Alito said.

Later, Sen. Herb Kohl (D-Wis.) said that, as an appeals court judge, Alito had seldom sided with immigrants who were trying to win asylum or block deportation. Alito replied that he was following Congress's clear-cut laws on immigration policy.

"My role is not to substitute my judgment for that of the immigration judge," he said. "My job is to say, 'Could a reasonable person have reached the conclusion that the immigration judge did?' "

As Democrats tried to pry loose Alito's views on abortion, a group supporting abortion rights, Republican Majority for Choice, announced it is opposing his nomination. Five GOP senators are on its advisory committee, including Specter.

Asked about the group's stance, Specter, who has said he will not decide how he will vote until after the hearings, said: "I did not participate in their decision."

Alito Demurs When Asked If Roe V. Wade Is Settled Law (KRT)

By Stephen Henderson And James Kuhnhenn

Knight Ridder, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON - In tense exchanges with Democratic senators Wednesday, Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito refused to declare that Roe v. Wade is settled law and stopped short of statements that Chief Justice John G. Roberts made before becoming a judge and that he reaffirmed during his confirmation hearings last September.

Alito's reluctance makes it easier for critics to brand him as a justice who could help overturn the 33-year-old ruling, which extended constitutional protection to abortion rights. It could also cost him Democratic support in the Senate, already lower than what Roberts enjoyed.

Roberts won 22 Democratic votes when the Senate confirmed him last September. Alito will almost certainly get fewer, though his Republican support appears solid enough to ensure his confirmation, barring any future stumbles.

Democrats turned more aggressive in questioning Alito on Wednesday, his third day of testimony, zeroing in not only on abortion but also on his membership in the Concerned Alumni of Princeton. Alito listed the conservative group in a 1985 application for promotion while a lawyer in the Reagan administration.

At the insistence of Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., committee chairman Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., agreed to review Library of Congress papers belonging to William Rusher, a founder of the Concerned Alumni of Princeton and publisher of the National Review, a conservative magazine.

The group formed in 1972 partly in opposition to Princeton's decision to admit women. CAP members have also opposed expanded minority admissions.

Alito testified that he didn't recall when or why he joined the group. He said he rejected the group's views on women and minorities. But he said he shared its support for keeping Reserve Officer Training Corps programs on campus. The New York Times reported in November that a review of Rusher's papers revealed no evidence that Alito played a major role in the organization.

Alito fended off hostile questions with a low-key, unflappable manner, and most Democrats appeared reluctant to force much of a confrontation with him. The most pointed exchanges came when they tried to nail him down on abortion law.

Alito strongly endorsed the idea that judicial precedent merits respect by later courts, and he said several times that Roe v. Wade deserved the "respect" that other precedents get. He also agreed that Casey v. Planned Parenthood, the 1992 Supreme Court ruling that reaffirmed Roe v. Wade, was a precedent entitled to "respect" and that it strengthened Roe's authority.

But when Sen. Richard Durbin, D-Ill., pressed him to go further, Alito demurred, effectively refusing to state that the Supreme Court shouldn't consider overturning Roe.

"Do you believe (Roe v. Wade) is the settled law of the land?" Durbin asked.

"If `settled' means that it can't be re-examined, that's one thing," Alito said. "If `settled' means that it is a precedent that is entitled to respect as stare decisis and all of the factors that I've mentioned come into play, including the reaffirmation and all of that, then it is a precedent that is protected."

DOJ_NMG_0009296

Alito repeated that he was unable to go further because abortion litigation is constantly coming before the court, and it would be inappropriate to commit himself on a question he may have to rule on, should he be confirmed.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., seized on that line.

"You were willing to give your view on one man, one vote," Feinstein said. "And yet there are four cases pending in the court right now on one man, one vote. I have a hard time understanding how you separate out Roe."

Alito said he didn't think it was appropriate to talk about issues that could come up before the court, explaining that he had no problem talking about cases such as Brown v. Board of Education, the 1954 ruling that outlawed racial segregation in public schools, because a legitimate challenge to desegregated schools was very unlikely to come before the court.

Feinstein said Alito's response troubled her, but she wouldn't say how she would vote on his confirmation.

Ed Gillespie, a former Republican National committee chairman who has been escorting Alito through the Capitol, drew a distinction between a judge accepting Roe as "settled law," which is what Democrats asked Alito to embrace, and "settled precedent," the term Roberts used in his confirmation hearing.

Settled law would be the standard for appellate court judges because they have to apply Supreme Court precedent to lower-court decisions, Gillespie said. He argued that settled precedent would not have the strength of settled law because the Supreme Court justices could still overturn it.

Specter said that while Democrats argued that Alito stopped short of Roberts' characterization of Roe, "I think they're probably pretty close on that."

In what could be a complication for Alito, the Republican Majority for Choice, an organization representing pro-abortion rights Republicans, announced its opposition to Alito on Wednesday.

"The reality is that Judge Alito would not have to vote to overrule Roe in order to be the architect of the denial of a woman's right to choose," the group said. "He could give lip service to respecting Roe while upholding the numerous legislative efforts to chip away at reproductive freedom."

The group's advisory committee includes moderate Republicans Sens. Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island, Susan Collins and Olympia Snowe of Maine, and Specter.

Specter, chairman of the Judiciary Committee, questioned Alito on abortion and later praised him for his extensive answers. After Wednesday's hearing he said he wasn't party to the group's statement and would reserve judgment on his vote.

The other three senators aren't members of the committee, but are members of a bipartisan "Gang of 14" that could determine whether a Democratic-led filibuster against Alito succeeds.

Snowe, in a statement, said she would fully review Alito's record before deciding whether to support him. Snowe spokeswoman Antonia Ferrier said the Republican Majority for Choice notified Snowe of its stand on Alito.

"Their views don't necessarily reflect hers," Ferrier said. "But she will take them into account."

Graham said he saw no reason why Alito's views would be the kind of "extraordinary circumstance" that the "Gang of 14" has said would be necessary to mount a successful filibuster. Graham is one of the 14.

Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kan., a panel member who's a staunch abortion opponent, said he was "pretty certain" he would vote for Alito. But, he added, "I'm not happy. I would love for him to be there and say, `Look, I don't think Roe is in the Constitution. And he's obviously not saying that. He's leaving the issue open."

Still, Brownback conceded that any court nominee who opposed Roe outright would be filibustered. "So you're left like this, if he answers Roe either way, he's caught."

Alito Remains Unruffled In Testy Hearings (LAT)

By Maura Reynolds And Richard Simon

The Los Angeles Times, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — Senate Democrats turned up the heat on Supreme Court nominee Samuel A. Alito Jr. on Wednesday, prompting testy exchanges during his confirmation hearing and ardent defenses from Republicans — one of which moved Alito's wife to tears.

DOJ_NMG_0009297

As Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) defended the nominee against what he said were unfair insinuations about his membership in a conservative alumni organization, Martha Alito began quietly to weep behind him.

As Graham continued with an apology to the family, she left the hearing room to compose herself.

"Judge Alito, I am sorry that you've had to go through this. I am sorry that your family has had to sit here and listen to this," Graham said.

The moment — captured on television although unnoticed by many in the hearing room — capped a day of mounting tension as Democrats grilled Alito on what have become the hearing's two focal issues: his views on abortion and his membership in the now-defunct Concerned Alumni of Princeton.

Alito, 55, sat placidly through it all, repeating — with little apparent irritation — responses that did not placate his critics. But the attacks by Democrats did no apparent damage to Alito among Senate Republicans, most of whom have expressed support for him.

The federal appellate judge seems headed for confirmation by the GOP-controlled Senate unless Democrats mount a filibuster against him — which appears unlikely at the moment.

On his second day of questioning, Alito continued to resist answering whether the Supreme Court's 1973 Roe vs. Wade decision, which legalized abortion nationwide, should be considered "settled law."

On the alumni group, Alito repeatedly insisted that he could not remember joining it and could not explain why he put it on a job application when applying for a promotion within the Justice Department in 1985, when Ronald Reagan was president.

"As I've said, I don't have a recollection of having anything to do" with the group, Alito said. "So all I can say is that I put it down in the '85 form, and therefore I must have been a member at around that time."

Alito, a graduate of Princeton University, listed his membership in the group when asked to provide information about his "philosophical commitment to the policies of [the Reagan] administration."

The group, founded in 1972, was controversial because some of its members publicly opposed Princeton's efforts to increase its numbers of female and minority students. They argued that such efforts could result in the admission of some students who did not meet the school's standards.

Questions about Alito's link to the group moved front and center during Wednesday's hearing in part because it appeared to crystallize for Democrats why they say they can't trust assurances by Alito that, as a high court justice, he would keep an open mind on politically controversial legal disputes.

Giving his take on Alito's mention of the group on his job application, Sen. Richard J. Durbin (D-Ill.) told reporters: "In this situation, Alito was trying to establish his credentials with the Reagan administration. He was providing red meat for the right wing."

Other Democrats on the Judiciary Committee said they were unconvinced that someone of Alito's acumen could have forgotten details about the group.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) complained that in his view, Alito's answers on the issue "don't add up."

Kennedy displayed a series of placards featuring quotes from articles in the group's magazine, Prospect, that disparaged minorities, gays and disabled people. The senator asked Alito whether he endorsed such views.

"I've testified to everything that I can recall relating to this, and I do not recall knowing any of these things" about the organization, Alito said. "And many of the things that you've mentioned are things that I have always stood against."

Alito said he could not recall whether he joined the group when he graduated from the university in 1972 or if he did so later, in the 1980s. He said he believed he could only have become a member for one reason: to fight against any effort to disband the school's ROTC program, in which he had participated as an undergraduate.

The emotional moment involving Martha Alito occurred in the late afternoon, after Graham charged that Democrats were pursuing a strategy of "guilt by association."

"How have you lived your life? Are you a closet bigot?" Graham asked.

"I'm not any kind of a bigot; I'm not," Alito replied calmly.

DOJ_NMG_0009298

Graham began to list people who had praised Alito, including other judges and former colleagues. As he spoke, Martha Alito slowly began to cry. By the time Graham apologized for the strain of the hearings on Alito's family, she was gathering her things to leave the room.

After a few minutes in a back room, Martha Alito returned to the hearing for the rest of the session.

"The pressure of all this, and the insult added to injury, just got to be too much," Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas) said.

Earlier, the Democratic focus on Concerned Alumni of Princeton prompted one of the day's dust-ups between committee members.

Kennedy asked Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), the panel's chairman, to subpoena the personal papers of one of the group's founders, which are at the Library of Congress.

"I'd move that the committee go into executive session for the … sole purpose for issuing the subpoena of those records," Kennedy said.

Specter expressed surprise, saying that despite Kennedy's assertion that he had sent him a letter about the documents, this was the first time he was aware of the issue.

"I take umbrage at your telling me what I received," Specter said. "I don't mind your telling me what you mailed. But there's a big difference between what's mailed and what's received."

Kennedy did not back down, telling Specter that if his subpoena request was denied, "You're going to hear it again and again and again, and we're going to have votes of this committee again and again and again until we have a resolution."

Specter snapped back: "I'm not going to have you run this committee and decide when we're going to go into executive session."

In the end, the confrontation over the documents fizzled. During lunch, Senate staff members contacted the group's founder, William A. Rusher, who granted them permission to review the documents. The aides were poring through them late into the evening, searching for mentions of Alito.

As the tone of Democrats' questions grew more caustic Wednesday, Republicans suggested they were acting in desperation.

Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa) told Alito: "You're the quarterback and your team is way ahead here. And opponents are very desperate, trying to sack you, and aren't doing a very good job of it. And they haven't hit you all day now — for two days."

He added: "You're going to keep getting these last-minute Hail Marys thrown at you. So just bear with us."

Alito's 1985 job application also figured into the sparring about abortion. In seeking his promotion, which he received, Alito wrote that he disagreed with the Roe vs. Wade decision that abortion rights were protected by the Constitution.

On Tuesday, Alito had said that as a high court justice, he would keep an open mind on the issue. But he resisted efforts by Democrats to get him to agree that the Roe vs. Wade decision was "settled law."

The parrying over that continued Wednesday, with Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) asking: "You do not agree that it is well-settled in court?"

"I think that depends on what one means by the term 'well-settled,' " Alito responded. He then went on to discuss the importance of a judge reviewing all sides in a case.

Feinstein interrupted to note that he had provided more expansive answers on other subjects, including some currently before the Supreme Court.

"I have a hard time understanding why you separate out Roe," she said, and then backtracked.

"I understand why. If you say one thing, you upset my friends and colleagues on [the Republican] side. If you say the other, you upset those of us on this side. But the people are entitled to know."

Alito replied: "I don't think it's appropriate for me to speak about issues that could realistically come up" before the Supreme Court.

"OK, I'll let you off the hook on that one," Feinstein said.

Committee questioning is to continue today, followed by testimony from outside witnesses, including friends and associates of the nominee.

DOJ_NMG_0009299

Democrats Take Aggressive Tack; Alito Is Unfazed (NYT)

By Richard W. Stevenson And Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 11 - Democrats tried with increasing frustration on Wednesday to elicit more specific views from Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr. about abortion and other topics and sought to build a case against his nomination to the Supreme Court by raising questions about his character and consistency.

From the opening moments of the third day of hearings by the Senate Judiciary Committee, Democrats, aware that Judge Alito had made it through the first two days without significant damage to his prospects of confirmation, struck an aggressive tone. [Excerpts, Page A26.]

They challenged him on elements of his record and statements during questioning on Tuesday. And they successfully pressed the panel chairman, Senator Arlen Specter, Republican of Pennsylvania, to obtain records that they said might shed light on the judge's membership in a Princeton alumni group that has been characterized as opposing co-education and affirmative action.

Senator Patrick J. Leahy of Vermont, the ranking Democrat on the committee, started the proceedings by stating that members of his party "have been troubled by what we see as inconsistencies in some of the answers" on subjects including voting rights, presidential power, Judge Alito's failure to recuse himself from a case involving a potential conflict of interest and his involvement with the Princeton alumni group.

Rebutting Judge Alito's statement on Tuesday that he would take to the court an "open mind" on abortion rights, Senator Richard J. Durbin, Democrat of Illinois, said the memorandum that Judge Alito wrote in 1985 stating that he did not believe that there was a constitutional right to abortion "evidences a mind that, sadly, is closed in some areas."

The partisan volleys seemed to sail over or past Judge Alito, who politely but resolutely declined to be drawn out on abortion, executive authority and other issues. He often sat impassively as the committee members debated his qualifications and forthrightness.

"Your critics are, I think, grasping at any straw to tarnish your record, and that's unfortunate," Senator Charles E. Grassley, Republican of Iowa, said.

The Democrats' questions and implications about her husband's record appeared to get to Judge Alito's wife, Martha-Ann. She began crying as Senator Lindsey Graham, Republican of South Carolina, defended her husband's character and rejected any suggestion that his membership in the alumni group made him a bigot, Mrs. Alito retreated to an anteroom, sobbing for some minutes.

"Let me tell you, this guilt by association is going to drive good men and women away from wanting to sit where you're sitting," Mr. Graham said.

Democrats and their aides on the committee said they were resigned to the fact that Judge Alito would win approval on the committee with its 10-member Republican majority. All eight Democrats appear likely to vote against the nomination.

The Democrats' strategy appeared to be aimed at raising questions about the credibility of Judge Alito's explanations about the alumni group and recusal that could be used in the confirmation floor debate.

The most intensive substantive exchanges were again over abortion. Judge Alito repeatedly turned aside efforts by Mr. Durbin and other Democrats to have him to agree that Roe v. Wade, the 1973 Supreme Court decision that established that there is a constitutional right to abortion, was "settled law," a phrase that Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. assented to last year in his confirmation hearings.

Judge Alito agreed only with the proposition that Roe was an important precedent that should be given deference like any other precedent relevant to a constitutional dispute.

"It is a precedent that has now been on the books for several decades," Judge Alito said. "It has been challenged. It has been reaffirmed. But it is an issue that is involved in litigation now at all levels."

Mr. Durbin responded that he was "concerned that many people will leave this hearing with a question as to whether or not you could be the deciding vote that would eliminate the legality of abortion, that would make it illegal in this country, would criminalize the conduct of women who are seeking to terminate pregnancies for fear of their lives and the doctors who help them."

DOJ_NMG_0009300

Overturning Roe would not make abortion illegal but would leave the question in the hands of states.

In a colloquy with Senator Dianne Feinstein, Democrat of California, Judge Alito sought to explain why he agreed to comment on other landmark cases like those that outlawed segregation and guaranteed one-person, one-vote, but would not engage in a discussion of Roe.

Ms. Feinstein asked whether Judge Alito did not agree that Roe "was well settled in court."

He said, "It depends on what one means by the term 'well settled.' "

Ms. Feinstein said that she understood that it was difficult to answer such a sensitive question, "but the people are entitled to know."

Judge Alito said it was reasonable to presume that school desegregation and one-person, one vote were beyond judicial debate, while aspects of the abortion issue continued to come before the courts.

"I don't think it's appropriate for me to speak about issues that could realistically come up." he said. "And my view of Brown v. Board of Education, for example, which was one of the cases that was cited in connection with this issue about where someone in my position should draw the line, seems to me to embody a principle that is now not subject to challenge, not realistically subject to being challenged."

Democrats made another attempt to link Judge Alito to the views of some members of the Concerned Alumni of Princeton, a group that Judge Alito listed being a member of when he applied for a job in the Reagan administration.

Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts, read from an essay published in 1983 in a magazine put out by the group.

"Everywhere one turns, blacks and Hispanics are demanding jobs simply because they're black and Hispanic, the physically handicapped are trying to gain equal representation in professional sports, and homosexuals are demanding that government vouchsafe them the right to bear children," the essay said, according to Mr. Kennedy.

Mr. Kennedy asked whether Judge Alito had read the essay. Judge Alito responded that he had not, that he had not known at the time that members of the group espoused such views and that the sentiments expressed in the passage read by Mr. Kennedy were antithetical to his.

Mr. Kennedy suggested that Judge Alito had not provided an adequate explanation of why he had joined the group and included it in an application for work in a conservative administration. The senator said that he had questions about "this sort of radical group and why you listed it on your job application" and that Judge Alito's explanations did not "add up."

Mr. Kennedy, seemingly trying to inject some vigor into a lagging effort to defeat the nomination, provoked a confrontation with Mr. Specter by demanding that the chairman take the committee into executive session to subpoena documents about the group in the Library of Congress.

Mr. Specter, annoyed, said he would consider the issue, suggesting that Mr. Kennedy delayed his request to present it at the hearing for dramatic effect. After lunch, Mr. Specter announced an agreement to review the documents and said Democratic and Republican lawyers had gone to the library to study them.

The New York Times previously reviewed the documents, which are in the papers of William A. Rusher, an early leader of the group and a former publisher of National Review. The Times reported in November that the documents and others at Princeton gave no indication that Judge Alito was among the major donors to the group and was not active in it. In an online interview on Wednesday with National Review, Mr. Rusher said he did not remember Judge Alito.

"He certainly was not very heavily involved in CAP, if at all," he said.

Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr., Democrat of Delaware, raised the possibility that Judge Alito had noted his membership as a way to signify his conservative leanings and enhance his chances of being hired.

In later comments to Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, Judge Alito appeared to accept that explanation.

"I was applying for a position in the Reagan administration, and my answers were truthful statements." he said when Mr. Schumer asked why he listed the Princeton group as one of just two groups to which he belonged. "But what I was trying to outline were the things that were relevant to obtaining a political position. I mentioned some very minor political contributions. I didn't mention contributions to charitable organizations."

DOJ_NMG_0009301

Surprise End Unlikely As Alito Refuses To Take Bait (FT)

By Patti Waldmeir In Washington

Financial Times, January 12, 2006

Some of the most dramatic moments in US Senate history have involved battles over the confirmation of Supreme Court justices – think Robert Bork and Clarence Thomas. But those who were looking for a good, nationally televised political fistfight this week at the confirmation hearings of Judge Samuel Alito have so far been disappointed.

Mr Alito has proved a monochrome, dispassionate and unflappable witness, ignoring insult, slight and political controversy, never taking the bait of those allied against him.

This has made for crushingly tedious political theatre. Even some of the senators seem to be losing interest: when the hearings resumed on Wednesday after lunch, only six out of 18 members of the Senate judiciary committee were present – and one immediately left. It was a heavy blow for the massive press corps: even the political lobbyists in the audience, who had worked so hard to ignite a national culture war over his nomination, were hunched over their Blackberries reading e-mails, or gazing into space.

Mr Alito's performance – which involves answering every question unemotionally and legalistically, no matter how aggressive or passionate the questioner – may not make for high television ratings. But all the signs suggest that the sheer weight of his worthy if tedious performance will eventually crush the opposition.

Wednesday's long grilling by the judiciary committee focused largely on a couple of issues that seem unlikely to derail the nomination: Mr Alito's fleeting membership in a college alumni group that opposed the admission of women and minorities to Princeton University in the 1970s; and his participation in a legal case tangentially involving Vanguard mutual funds, at a time when he held such funds in his investment portfolio.

Ethics experts say Mr Alito was not required to recuse himself from the Vanguard case – although he promised to do so when nominated as a federal judge. Republican lobbyists see Democratic senators' focus on the case as a sign of desperation.

The issue of Mr Alito's membership in Concerned Alumni of Princeton – which he listed on a 1985 job application to the Reagan Justice Department – is more problematic. Mr Alito says he cannot remember joining the group, but that if he did, it would have been because of the group's views on military service, not minorities. And while this explanation did not seem to satisfy many senators, it does not seem the sort of thing to sink a nomination.

Alito Pressed On Precedent, Privacy (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON - Midway through Senate confirmation hearings, Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito has deftly parried questions on hot-button issues ranging from abortion to the limits of presidential power.

No memorable phrases. No conspicuous stumbles. And - most important - no searing images of what life in "Judge Alito's America" might be like.

To the frustration of anti-Alito groups staking out front seats in the hearing room, Democrats have been slow to get traction on issues critical to their base.

"Too many senators allowed him to be evasive," says Nan Aron, founder of the Alliance for Justice and a leading activist in the 1987 defeat of the nomination of Judge Robert Bork. The anti-Bork campaign turned on a grim depiction of life for women, minorities, and the poor in "Judge Bork's America."

Many Republicans used their rounds of questioning to directly rebut issues raised by Democrats. Senate aides often distribute talking points to challenge a line of argument in real time, as it is being made in the Senate hearing room.

"He is saying as little as he needs to be confirmed and hasn't made many mistakes that trouble a majority of senators whose votes he needs," says Carl Tobias, a professor at the University of Richmond Law School.

DOJ_NMG_0009302

But unlike Chief Justice John Roberts, Mr. Alito did not default to refusing to answer a question because "the issue is likely to come before the Court," he adds. "He has tried to wade in and engage the questions. The answers aren't always as specific as the senators would like, but he can't go too far, either. He'd have to recuse himself."

While many court watchers are predicting a party-line vote in the Senate Judiciary Committee, the 10 Republicans and eight Democrats say they are keeping an open mind.

The most divisive issue - on both sides of the aisle - is the constitutional status of abortion rights. Most Democrats and moderate Republicans, including Senate Judiciary Committee chairman Arlen Specter, support the principles of the 1973 Roe v. Wade decision. As he did in last year's Roberts hearings, Mr. Specter led off with questions on whether Roe v. Wade constituted a "super precedent," because it has been reaffirmed 38 times.

While agreeing that the Constitution protects a right to privacy - a point made by every nominee since Judge Bork - Alito did not agree that it was such settled law that its principles should not be reexamined. "I personally would not get into categorizing precedents as super precedents or 'super-duper' precedents (Specter's signature phrase)," he said.

In a deliberately balanced response, Alito said he agreed "with the underlying thought when a precedent is reaffirmed, that strengthens the precedent," but added that he didn't "want to leave the impressions that stare decisis [following precedent] is an inexorable command because the Supreme Court has said that it is not." He said he would approach the issue with an open mind.

In a signal of divisions within GOP ranks, Sen. Brownback (R) of Kansas, a prospective presidential candidate in 2008, cited all the precedents for the 1896 Plessy v. Ferguson case that legalized racial segregation, later reversed by the historic 1954 Brown v. Board of Education case outlawing segregated schools. But, aware that the issue could provoke a Democratic filibuster, he backed off pressing Alito for further response.

Senators also pressed Alito on the limits of executive powers, especially related to recent controversies over President Bush's authorization of domestic spying by the National Security Administration. He said that no president was above the law, but declined to say whether he thought that the White House exceeded its authority.

He also declined to say whether Bush abused executive powers by using presidential signing statements to override the intent of Congress. He said he would need to know the specifics of the case and go through the judicial process. In February 1986, Alito drafted a memo arguing that presidential signing statements should "assume their rightful place in the interpretation of legislation."

Democrats are also pressing Alito on issues of personal values and ethics.

In the closing rounds of questions, one of the most frequently cited documents is a 1985 job application to the Reagan Justice Department, in which Alito wrote: "I am particularly proud of my contribution in recent cases in which the government has argued in the Supreme Court that racial and ethnic quotas should not be allowed and that the Constitution does not protect a right to an abortion."

From The Left, Calls To Press Alito Harder (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 11 - Opponents of Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr.'s nomination to the Supreme Court expressed growing frustration Wednesday at the course of his confirmation hearings, saying that Democratic senators were struggling in their effort to build a strong case against him and that his confirmation appeared increasingly inevitable.

Several said they had been particularly distressed after the first day of questioning of Judge Alito by the Senate Judiciary Committee, and had expressed that concern in calls and e-mail messages to Democratic aides on Tuesday. One Democratic aide said the results of that could be seen on Wednesday in the tougher challenges and follow-up questions to Judge Alito, though by day's end, Judge Alito's opponents said he had again largely escaped efforts to force him to answer questions about his views and record.

DOJ_NMG_0009303

"Every answer he gives he gives himself a little out," said Kim Gandy, president of the National Organization for Women. "It's frustrating to me as a lawyer to not be able to say, 'Your Honor, instruct the witness to answer the question.' I've thought several times there is a follow-up question I would ask if I were up there."

Ms. Gandy said Republicans had, to some extent, hamstrung Democrats by creating a public expectation that they would antagonize Judge Alito.

"So I think the Democrats are leaning over backwards to be extremely, very, very nice," she said. "I don't think it's an un-nice thing to ask follow-up questions and really expect the nominee to answer the question."

Nan Aron, president of the Alliance for Justice, a liberal group and a member of the coalition, argued that Americans would turn against Judge Alito if they learned more about his views from the hearings.

"It would be helpful to expose this record more, and to discuss it in terms that are meaningful to most Americans throughout the country," Ms. Aron said. "Our polling shows that once individuals learn about his record, they move into the opposition column. And it seems to me there are certainly some points to score - his record should be sufficient in and of itself to doom his chances."

Opponents of Judge Alito's nomination were decidedly restrained in criticizing their political allies in the Senate, saying they understood the difficulties the Democratic senators faced and that Judge Alito was turning out to be a more adept nominee than they had expected.

Several singled out two senators for posing strong challenges to Judge Alito - Richard J. Durbin of Illinois and Charles E. Schumer of New York - and said Democrats had been particularly effective in putting Judge Alito on the defensive on his assertion that he had no memory of his membership in a Princeton alumni organization that had opposed the recruitment of minorities and women.

But with the clock on the hearings running down, several said the Democrats had not made major progress in trying to tarnish Judge Alito, and that hopes of a filibuster - much less an actual defeat of Judge Alito's nomination - were dimming. By contrast, they said Republicans had been effective in trying to put Democrats on the defensive for being harsh, particularly after television shots showed Judge Alito's wife, Martha-Ann, crying and leaving the hearing room.

Mr. Durbin declined to comment directly Wednesday when asked about criticism by liberal groups of the way Democrats were handling the meeting. But, he said, "I think today was a better day in terms of important questions that were asked and answered. Yesterday laid the groundwork, but today we got down to the critical issues."

There was some debate among activists about whether the problem was a reflection of Judge Alito's skill in deflecting questions or a weakness in the way Democratic senators questioned him. Whichever the case, there was a consensus that so far, at least, Americans did not know as much about Judge Alito as his opponents had hoped they would by this late point.

"There are many more questions and issues that they still need to pursue with him," said Hilary O. Shelton, director of the Washington office of the N.A.A.C.P.

Some opponents of the nomination said that, notwithstanding Judge Alito's skills as a witness, they were pleased by the course of the hearing.

"I honestly think we're at a good stage at this point in the hearings," said Ralph G. Neas, president of the People for the American Way, a liberal advocacy group.

Other Democrats were doubtful.

Even Mr. Durbin, the Democratic whip, held out little hope that Judge Alito would be defeated. Asked if the confirmation was inevitable, he responded, "I don't want to jump to that conclusion at this moment."

Democrats Target Alito, But Miss The Mark (CHIST)

By Robert Novak

Chicago Sun-Times, January 12, 2006

Edward M. Kennedy, the 73-year-old liberal lion of the Senate, did not so much roar as huff and puff Tuesday, as he faced Judge Samuel Alito. He and other Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee who had spent weeks preparing for Alito's Supreme Court confirmation hearing seemed to be shooting blanks at President Bush's nominee.

DOJ_NMG_0009304

Kennedy appeared to have lost his fastball in the 19 years since he eviscerated nominee Robert Bork. But Alito is a deceptively more difficult target. While Bork appeared a flamboyant scholar eager to expound his worldview, Alito came over as a cautious lawyer dealing in fine print and footnotes. Republican senators had feared the nominee's uninspiring style would undo him, but they now feel it actually carried the day.

Failure to make a direct hit on Alito suggests a transcendent defeat for the Democratic judicial confirmation strategy crafted by Kennedy. It did not block all conservatives for appellate courts and failed to dissuade Bush from naming conservatives to the Supreme Court. To stop Alito required an auto wreck at this week's hearings, which always was unlikely considering his style.

It was not that Kennedy did not try his best on Tuesday. His legal aide, James Flug (an expert on judicial assassination), had stocked the senator with multiple scripts. But Kennedy seemed bogged down with his material, flitting from one subject to another, without focus. That seemed a generic problem for most Democratic senators. Sen. Joseph Biden spent 11 minutes in the preamble before he got around to his opening question.

Republicans were amused at Democrats stressing Alito's membership in the Concerned Alumni of Princeton because of the organization's alleged fight against admission to the university of women and African Americans. Alito testified he could barely remember his connection with CAP, but said he joined to protest Princeton's expulsion of the ROTC from campus.

What had worried Alito's strategists in advance was a concerted attack on his civil rights decisions that might erode support among moderate Republicans. But Alito's bland, lawyerly style prevailed when Biden raised the 1995 decision on a lawsuit by Barbara Sheridan against the DuPont Co. charging sex discrimination. Alito was outvoted 11-1 when the court ruled in Sheridan's favor. "After listening to Alito," said Republican Sen. Lindsey Graham, "you think the other 11 judges missed the boat."

Alito's dry style encouraged the pretense that the Judiciary Committee Democrats were engaged in a serious inquiry into the nominee's judicial philosophy. Actually, liberal special interest groups demanded a response to this nominee that was more vigorous than the passive opposition to John Roberts as chief justice. As a result, the only Democratic senator who now can be counted on to vote for Alito is Sen. Ben Nelson, running for re-election this year in the very red state of Nebraska.

In this week's hearing, Biden typically did not disguise the political stakes involved in this confirmation process: the conservative Alito replacing Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, a swing voter who usually has swung left. Biden asserted that O'Connor was "the fulcrum on an evenly divided court," so that filling this seat is more important than Roberts replacing Chief Justice William Rehnquist.

Senators Charles Schumer and Dick Durbin, two of the Senate's most partisan Democrats, have tried this week to escalate the intensity level of the hearings by asserting that the burden of proof was on Alito to show that he deserves to be on the Supreme Court. Just how he was supposed to do that was not spelled out. But that extraordinary heightening of the standards of confirmation would relieve the senatorial inquisitors from responsibility for measuring a nominee's fitness.

Schumer, at the end of the committee table in seniority, had to spend the entire day Tuesday watching his colleagues shooting blanks before he got his chance to fire the real thing. Schumer was well prepared, with a senatorial third degree of Alito demanding repeatedly to know whether he believed in a constitutional protection of abortion. That question led off a harsh, carefully scripted interrogation of the nominee. It made Chuck Schumer look mean and nasty, but that hardly derailed Sam Alito.

O'Connor Casts A Long Shadow On The Nominee (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 11 - The Constitution does not say what criteria the Senate should use in deciding whether to confirm a Supreme Court nominee.

But at least one clear test has emerged over the first three days of Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr.'s confirmation hearings. This nominee must, it seems, continually refer to and, if at all possible, endorse the views of the woman he aims to replace, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor.

Senators from both parties have frequently used Justice O'Connor's opinions as a basis for questioning Judge Alito. The heavy emphasis on her work is a testament to her disproportionate influence on the court in her 25 years of service, and a reminder of the important role Judge Alito will assume if he is confirmed.

DOJ_NMG_0009305

As two senators noted in their opening statements, Justice O'Connor has cast the decisive vote in almost 150 cases, many of them of great moment.

Whenever the opportunity arose, Judge Alito and his supporters highlighted instances in which he had ruled as she had. He invoked her name on 9 occasions, and he had good things to say about her decisions 10 times. On Tuesday, Senator John Cornyn, Republican of Texas, ticked off areas in which the two judges had agreed.

"Justice O'Connor and Judge Sam Alito both set limits on Congress's commerce power," Mr. Cornyn said. "Sandra Day O'Connor and Sam Alito both struck down affirmative action policies that had strict numerical quotas. And both - this ought to be a shocker to some based on what we've heard here today - is that both Justice Sandra Day O'Connor and Judge Sam Alito have criticized Roe v. Wade."

Democratic senators, on the other hand, worked hard to show that Judge Alito and Justice O'Connor were at odds, particularly in an important abortion case.

In his opening statement, striking a theme that has run through the hearings, Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, asked rhetorically, "Are you in Justice O'Connor's mold or, as the president has vowed, are you in the mold of Justices Scalia and Thomas?"

President Bush has said he would try to appoint justices like Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas, the court's two most conservative members.

By Wednesday morning, Senator Tom Coburn, Republican of Oklahoma, had grown frustrated with all the O'Connor talk. "The fact that you have to fit the Sandra Day O'Connor mold is really a misapplication," he said. "There is no precedent that would say that."

Judge Alito said he would be his own person, but not before offering one more tribute. "No nominee can ever be a duplicate of someone who retires," he said, "and particularly when someone retires after such a distinguished career and such a historic career as Justice O'Connor. Nobody can be expected, as a nominee, to fit that mold."

Judge Alito gave no indication, beyond saying he respected precedent and would proceed with an open mind, about whether he would follow the joint opinion Justice O'Connor signed in Planned Parenthood v. Casey, a 1992 decision affirming the constitutional right to abortion found by Roe v. Wade in 1973. Casey was, however, a 6-to-3 decision, and Judge Alito will not be in a position to move the court away from its support of the core right to abortion.

But Justice O'Connor did provide the crucial fifth vote in the court's last major abortion ruling, in 2000, striking down Nebraska's ban on what were called "partial birth" abortions. The court will soon decide whether to hear a challenge to a similar federal law, and in that case Judge Alito could alter the course of the court's abortion jurisprudence.

Judge Alito participated in the Casey decision in 1991 as an appeals court judge, and he seemed a little defensive in explaining his dissenting vote to uphold a Pennsylvania law that required women to notify their husbands before having abortions. The Supreme Court took the opposite view the next year.

All he had been trying to do in his dissent, Judge Alito explained, was to understand what Judge O'Connor had meant in some earlier decisions.

"There were just a few hints in those opinions about what she meant," Judge Alito said. "Based on the information that I had from Justice O'Connor's opinions, it seemed to me that this was not what she had in mind. Now, that turned out not to be a correct prediction."

In another exchange, asked whether he agreed with Justice O'Connor's statement in a 2004 decision that "a state of war is not a blank check for the president when it comes to the rights of the nation's citizens," Judge Alito did not hesitate.

"Absolutely," he said. "That's a very important principle."

In defending his dissent in a 10-to-1 decision of his court in an employment discrimination case, Judge Alito also invoked Justice O'Connor.

"When the issue went to the Supreme Court" in another case, he said, "Justice O'Connor wrote the opinion for the Supreme Court, and she agreed with my analysis."

In 1996, Judge Alito voted in dissent to strike down a law regulating the possession of machine guns, citing United States v. Lopez, a 1995 Supreme Court case that struck down a law banning the possession of handguns near schools.

DOJ_NMG_0009306

Senator Jon Kyl, Republican of Arizona, was quick to note the lineup in the Lopez case. "By the way," Mr. Kyl said, "it was one of those decisions that Justice O'Connor was in the majority, a 5-4 decision in which her position could be characterized as the swing vote."

On Wednesday, Judge Alito said he would follow Justice O'Connor's approach in religion cases.

"Justice O'Connor pointed out something that's very critical in this area," he said. "She said there is a big difference between government speech endorsing religion and private religious speech. And private religious speech can't be discriminated against. It has to be treated equally with secular speech."

From the moment he was nominated in October, Judge Alito has made clear his fondness and admiration for Justice O'Connor. That was based in part, he said in remarks accepting the nomination, on something she had done at his first argument before the Supreme Court in 1982, an occasion that filled him with "a sense of awe."

"I also remember," he said, "the relief that I felt when Justice O'Connor, sensing, I think, that I was a rookie, made sure that the first question that I was asked was a kind one. I was grateful to her on that happy occasion, and I am particularly honored to be nominated for her seat."

Loose Lips Sink . . . (WP)

By Richard Cohen

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

The only thing standing between Joe Biden and the presidency is his mouth. That, though, is no small matter. It is a Himalayan barrier, a Sahara of a handicap, a summer's day in Death Valley, a winter's night at the pole (either one) -- an endless list of metaphors intended to show you both the immensity of the problem and to illustrate it with the op-ed version of excess. This, alas, is Joe Biden.

The reviews for Biden's first crack at Samuel Alito, the humorless Supreme Court nominee, were murderous. The New York Times had Biden out on Page One -- normally a position to kill for -- only this time it was not a paean to his considerable merits, but an account of how it took him nearly three minutes of throat-clearing to ask his first question and then took the rest of his allocated 30 minutes just to get in four more. He concluded with about half a minute still left to him -- something of a personal best that even he had to acknowledge.

"I want to note that for maybe the first time in history, Biden is 40 seconds under his time," he told Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, no clipped speaker himself.

The Post had a similar account of Biden running off at the mouth. In that piece, Dana Milbank wrote that during Biden's round of questioning, he "spoke about his own Irish American roots, his 'Grandfather Finnegan,' his son's application to Princeton (he attended the University of Pennsylvania instead, Biden said), a speech the senator gave on the Princeton campus, the fact that Biden is 'not a Princeton fan,' and his views on the eyeglasses of Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.)."

The tragedy is that Biden, who is running for president, is a much better man and senator than these accounts would suggest. But his tendency, his compulsion, his manic-obsessive running of the mouth has become the functional equivalent of womanizing or some other character weakness that disqualifies a man for the presidency. It is his version of corruption, of alcoholism, of a fierce temper or vile views -- all the sorts of things that have crippled candidates in the past. It is, though, an innocent thing, as good-humored as the man and of no real policy consequence. It will merely stunt him politically.

'Tis a pity. Biden occupies the sensible center of the Democratic Party. He supported Bill Clinton's crime bill (more cops, fewer assault rifles) which helped the Democrats fight the talk-show calumny that they were pro-crime and anti-cop. In his maturity, he has emerged, along with some appropriate gray hair, as one of his party's most important -- and knowledgeable -- voices on foreign policy. Even on Iraq, an area where too many Democrats forgot that there was any reason for war, Biden took a decidedly centrist -- and defensible -- position. He voted to authorize the president to go to war but has since characterized that vote as "a mistake."

"It was a mistake to assume the president would use the authority we gave him properly," Biden said in November on "Meet the Press" -- adding that if he were allotted a do-over, he'd vote no. Since this approximately reflects my own position, I am inclined to appreciate its wisdom. But even before that vote, Biden was urging President Bush to seek international support for the Iraq effort, not to move precipitously, and to have a postwar plan. Bush, listening to you-know-who, did what the voices told him.

DOJ_NMG_0009307

The seniority that makes Biden so knowledgeable on foreign policy -- a conversation with him is always instructive -- is also what cripples. He has been in the Senate since 1973 and suffers, as nearly all senators do sooner or later, from the conviction that he and his colleagues are the center of the world. After all, no one -- with the possible exception of family members -- ever tells a senator to shut up. They are surrounded by fawning staff and generally treated as minor deities. They lose perspective, which is why, now that you've asked, they talk and talk at these hearings. They are convinced the world is watching. Actually, it's only a half a dozen shut-ins on C-SPAN -- and, of course, the nearly catatonic press corps. Everyone else is playing computer solitaire.

Biden ran for president once before -- and then, too, his mouth went off on its own. (In 1988, his stump speech was perilously similar to the one used by Neil Kinnock, Britain's Labor Party leader.) This time seems no different, except the loss is greater. Foreign policy, Biden's specialty, is the number one issue. He has much to say -- and then too much to add. He is an anatomical disaster. His Achilles' heel is his mouth.

Congresswomen Deem Alito Unfit (WT)

By Amy Fagan And Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, January 12, 2006

Democratic congresswomen yesterday said Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr.'s failure to define abortion as a guaranteed right makes him unfit to sit on the Supreme Court, but senators said they are taking a wait-and-see approach.

"We believe that Judge Alito poses a direct threat to the rights of women in America," 20 House Democrats wrote in a letter urging senators to block President Bush's nominee. House members have no formal role in confirming presidential nominees.

At issue is Judge Alito's position on Roe v. Wade, the 1973 Supreme Court decision that found a constitutional right to an abortion. The nominee wrote in 1985, while serving in the Reagan administration Justice Department prior to becoming a judge, that he did not believe the Constitution guarantees the right to an abortion and advocated that it be overturned.

Senators sought to have Judge Alito explain that position in this week's Senate Judiciary Committee hearings. Unlike Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr., who during his hearings last year called Roe "settled law," Judge Alito would only say it was precedent and all precedents should be given weight.

Republican senators on the Judiciary Committee were satisfied with that answer, but many committee Democrats and outside interest groups, who consider abortion rights sacrosanct, were not.

Vicki Saporta, president and CEO of the National Abortion Federation, said his answers show Judge Alito would seek to overturn Roe if given the chance.

"I think he's being evasive on purpose. I think he's done nothing to distance himself from his prior writings and decisions," she said.

Many senators who are not on the Judiciary Committee are traveling overseas or busy with home-state constituent work, but their aides said they will review hearing transcripts before they vote.

"I don't know who the real Samuel Alito is or what his true views are," said Sen. Barbara A. Mikulski, Maryland Democrat, who has been watching the televised proceedings. "Is he just telling us what we want to hear? What is his judicial philosophy? What does he believe in -- privacy, the right to executive power?"

Alex Glass, a spokeswoman for Sen. Patty Murray, Washington Democrat, said Judge Alito's comments on Roe were "clearly concerning, particularly in light of the stance John Roberts took" that Roe was settled law.

Still, Ms. Glass said it's too early to decide how her boss will vote or whether the issue merits a filibuster.

Steve Hourihan, spokesman for Sen. Lincoln Chafee, Rhode Island Republican and a member of the "Gang of 14" senators who have agreed not to filibuster any judicial nominee without extraordinary reasons, said that from their vantage point, Judge Alito is not that far off from what Chief Justice Roberts said.

"Right now, he thinks there's basically a lot more to come, and a finer point to put on it," Mr. Hourihan said.

DOJ_NMG_0009308

Sen. Ben Nelson, Nebraska Democrat and another of the 14 senators involved in the no-filibuster deal, hasn't had time to review the specific hearing questions, according to spokesman David DiMartino, but "he hasn't seen anything that's come up that would be problematic to the nominee."

Judge Alito, In His Own Words (NYT)

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

Some commentators are complaining that Judge Samuel Alito Jr.'s confirmation hearings have not been exciting, but they must not have been paying attention. We learned that Judge Alito had once declared that Judge Robert Bork - whose Supreme Court nomination was defeated because of his legal extremism - "was one of the most outstanding nominees" of the 20th century. We heard Judge Alito refuse to call Roe v. Wade "settled law," as Chief Justice John Roberts did at his confirmation hearings. And we learned that Judge Alito subscribes to troubling views about presidential power.

Those are just a few of the quiet bombshells that have dropped. In his deadpan bureaucrat's voice, Judge Alito has said some truly disturbing things about his view of the law. In three days of testimony, he has given the American people reasons to be worried - and senators reasons to oppose his nomination. Among those reasons are the following:

EVIDENCE OF EXTREMISM Judge Alito's extraordinary praise of Judge Bork is unsettling, given that Judge Bork's radical legal views included rejecting the Supreme Court's entire line of privacy cases, even its 1965 ruling striking down a state law banning sales of contraceptives. Judge Alito's membership in Concerned Alumni of Princeton - a group whose offensive views about women, minorities and AIDS victims were discussed in greater detail at yesterday's hearing - is also deeply troubling, as is his unconvincing claim not to remember joining it.

OPPOSITION TO ROE V. WADE In 1985, Judge Alito made it clear that he believed the Constitution does not protect abortion rights. He had many chances this week to say he had changed his mind, but he refused. When offered the chance to say that Roe is a "super-precedent," entitled to special deference because it has been upheld so often, he refused that, too. As Charles Schumer, Democrat of New York, noted in particularly pointed questioning, since Judge Alito was willing to say that other doctrines, like one person one vote, are settled law, his unwillingness to say the same about Roe strongly suggests that he still believes what he believed in 1985.

SUPPORT FOR AN IMPERIAL PRESIDENCY Judge Alito has backed a controversial theory known as the "unitary executive," and argued that the attorney general should be immune from lawsuits when he installs illegal wiretaps. Judge Alito backed away from one of his most extreme statements in this area - his assertion, in a 1985 job application, that he believed "very strongly" in "the supremacy of the elected branches of government." But he left a disturbing impression that as a justice, he would undermine the Supreme Court's critical role in putting a check on presidential excesses.

INSENSITIVITY TO ORDINARY AMERICANS' RIGHTS Time and again, as a lawyer and a judge, the nominee has taken the side of big corporations against the "little guy," supported employers against employees, and routinely rejected the claims of women, racial minorities and the disabled. The hearing shed new light on his especially troubling dissent from a ruling by two Reagan-appointed judges, who said that workers at a coal-processing site were covered by Mine Safety and Health Act protections.

DOUBTS ABOUT THE NOMINEE'S HONESTY Judge Alito's explanation of his involvement with Concerned Alumni of Princeton is hard to believe. In a 1985 job application, he proudly pointed to his membership in the organization. Now he says he remembers nothing of it - except why he joined, which he insists had nothing to do with the group's core concerns. His explanation for why he broke his promise to Congress to recuse himself in any case involving Vanguard companies is also unpersuasive. As for his repeated claims that his past statements on subjects like abortion and Judge Bork never represented his personal views or were intended to impress prospective employers - all that did was make us wonder why we should give any credence to what he says now. •

The debate over Judge Alito is generally presented as one between Republicans and Democrats. But his testimony should trouble moderate Republicans, especially those who favor abortion rights or are concerned about presidential excesses. The hearings may be short on fireworks, but they have produced, through Judge Alito's words, an array of reasons to be concerned about this nomination.

DOJ_NMG_0009309

Senate Civility (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2006

It's a sign of how little Democrats have on Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito that on Day Three of his confirmation hearings they were still pounding away on his membership in an obscure Princeton alumni group that flowered briefly at the judge's alma mater. They can't touch him on credentials or his mastery of jurisprudence, so they're trying to get him on guilt by ancient association.

Senators Ted Kennedy and Chuck Schumer did their best yesterday to imply that Judge Alito was racist and sexist by linking the nominee with the views of some members of Concerned Alumni of Princeton, which back in the 1970s and 1980s took issue with university policies on coeducation and affirmative action. The questioning was mean enough that Judge Alito's wife left the hearing room after GOP Senator Lindsey Graham apologized for the comments of his fellow Senators. "Are you really a closet bigot?" Mr. Graham asked the nominee. "No, sir, you're not."

Judge Alito doesn't recall being a member of CAP, but says that if he was it must have been because he shared CAP's concern about keeping ROTC on campus. For the sin of not recalling, he was then tarred as dishonest. Senator Kennedy demanded to know whether Judge Alito had read various articles on CAP that had appeared more than two decades ago, including an editorial that ran in these columns on January 17, 1985.

Much as we like our own work, even we confess to having forgotten about that editorial. We'd like to think Senator Kennedy reads us so assiduously that he knew just where to look, but something tells us his staff dug it up from our computer archives. But we appreciate the unlikely plug. Our readers can find the editorial on OpinionJournal.com1. As for Judge Alito's prospects, if this irrelevant arcana is the most his opponents have, he can start measuring his new judicial robes.

Kate Michelman, The Public Face Of A Woman's Right To Privacy (WP)

By Linton Weeks

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

Kate Michelman is the face of reproductive rights. It's a thin face with high cheekbones, dark eyes that can light up and a mouth with a corner that upturns at comic moments.

For a generation, Michelman, 63, has been at the forefront of one of this country's thorniest debates. She was president of NARAL Pro-Choice America from 1985 to 2004. She is scheduled to testify this week in opposition to the nomination of Samuel Alito to the Supreme Court. And she has written a new book, "With Liberty and Justice for All: A Life Spent Protecting the Right to Choose."

Last night several hundred friends and well-wishers showed up at the Woman's National Democratic Club near Dupont Circle for cheese, wine and a celebration Michelman's book and her mission. Guests included former secretary of state Madeleine Albright, Del. Eleanor Holmes Norton and Rep. Jim Moran (D-Va.).

"One reason I wrote this book," Michelman told the crowd, "was to hopefully inspire young women and men."

Michelman's interest in abortion rights is personal. In the late 1960s she was a Pennsylvania homemaker, married to a college professor. She had put her career in early childhood development on hold to start a family.

"I had married my childhood sweetheart at age twenty," she writes. "I was a practicing Catholic who accepted the Church's teaching that birth control was a sin. Like many other Catholic wives, I practiced the 'natural' means of contraception -- the rhythm method -- and believed the claim that breast-feeding prevented pregnancy. I exploded every myth. We had three daughters in three years."

In 1969 her husband walked out on her. Several weeks later, she learned she was pregnant. She was desperate. She felt she could not have a fourth child while trying to raise the other three single-handedly. She attempted suicide. Then she decided to get an abortion. She needed her husband's permission and the approval of the hospital's all-male review board. She received both.

The abandonment and the circumstances surrounding her abortion were the low points of her life, she said. Eventually she went to work, remarried and became the political force that now wants to take her zealousness for privacy rights beyond the women's movement.

DOJ_NMG_0009310

Before the soiree she drank a little celebratory champagne with her youngest daughter, Anya, and talked about the single issue that has driven her.

The Alito hearing, she said, triggers memories of the Robert Bork confirmation hearings in 1987. Michelman was scheduled to testify then, too. But she and leaders of other advocacy groups decided that Bork was going to cook his own goose, so she decided not to speak.

She is also reminded of the Clarence Thomas hearings in 1991. She did testify then. Like Alito, Michelman said, "Thomas also said he was open-minded" on the landmark abortion-rights case, Roe v. Wade .

But he has tried at every opportunity to overturn that decision, she said.

When she talked of hard things, her soft voice hardened.

Now at a life juncture, Michelman is plotting her next steps. She wants to be a spokeswoman for personal rights who "is not constrained by organizational restraints or party politics."

She hopes to "expand people's understanding of what it means to be pro-choice. And it doesn't mean to be pro-abortion."

She said the right to privacy is a fundamental American value whether it involves a woman's body or governmental wiretapping.

She said she has always been a serious person. As a teenager in Ohio, she listened to news and Senate hearings on a shortwave radio. Her idea of fun, she said, was organizing a Christmas tree sale to benefit Mexican farmworkers in her community.

Asked how she relaxes, she sat forward on the edge of her seat. "I don't!"

But she likes to make food from scratch. "I love cooking, love doing things very authentically."

Ideally, she would like to live in medieval fashion, without many modern conveniences. "I love washing dishes."

And she:

Reads a lot. She has been enjoying a novel by Ian McEwan and a book about the Constitution. "I read every word in every paragraph," she said.

Sleeps little. "If I get two or three hours a night I am lucky," she said.

Exercises every day. "I am disciplined."

She is not that attuned to popular culture, daughter Anya says. But Michelman is hooked on "24," the warp-speed, torture-laden thriller Fox series. And she has seen "The Lord of the Rings" several times.

Personality tests, she said, always told her what she already knew. She is an introvert. Her personal story, she said, pushed her into prominence. Still, it was only after she had been president of NARAL for a few years that she went public with her own abortion story.

Introducing Michelman, Frances Kissling, president of Catholics for a Free Choice, encouraged everyone to buy lots of copies. "We want her book on the bestseller list."

She and others testified to Michelman's energy and focus.

Albright told everyone that Michelman had provided "a voice for those who didn't have a voice and a brain for those who didn't have a brain."

She said Michelman kept the women's movement motivated and that the timing of her book with the Alito hearings was fortunate.

Fred Michelman said living with Kate was "like riding a tiger."

As for the face of the abortion rights movement, her husband of almost 34 years smiled and said, "It's a face I know so well."

Losing The Alitos (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

If he'd been born a little earlier, Sam Alito would probably have been a Democrat. In the 1950's, the middle-class and lower-middle-class whites in places like Trenton, where Alito grew up, were the heart and soul of the Democratic Party.

DOJ_NMG_0009311

But by the late 1960's, cultural politics replaced New Deal politics, and liberal Democrats did their best to repel Northern white ethnic voters. Big-city liberals launched crusades against police brutality, portraying working-class cops as thuggish storm troopers for the establishment. In the media, educated liberals portrayed urban ethnics as uncultured, uneducated Archie Bunkers.

The liberals were doves; the ethnics were hawks. The liberals had "Question Authority" bumper stickers; the ethnics had been taught in school to respect authority. The liberals thought an unjust society caused poverty; the ethnics believed in working their way out of poverty.

Sam Alito emerged from his middle-class neighborhood about that time, made it to Princeton and found "very privileged people behaving irresponsibly."

Alito wanted to learn; the richer liberals wanted to strike. He wanted to join R.O.T.C.; the liberal Princetonians expelled it from campus. He was orderly and respectful; they were disorderly and disrespectful. The experience was so searing that he mentioned it in the opening of his confirmation hearing 37 years later.

In 1971, Fred Dutton, an important Democratic strategist, acknowledged the rift between educated liberals and the white working class. In a short book, "Changing Sources of Power," Dutton argued that white workers had "tended, in fact, to become a major redoubt of traditional Americanism and of the antinegro, antiyouth vote."

The New Deal coalition, including Catholics and white ethnics, was dying, he argued, and should be replaced by a "loose peace coalition" of young people, educated suburbanites, feminists and blacks.

That plan wasn't stupid, but it didn't work. The party has been in a downward spiral ever since. John Kerry lost the white working class by 23 percentage points. He lost among his fellow Catholics. He lost the election.

After every defeat, Democrats vow to reconnect with middle-class whites. But if there is one lesson of the Alito hearings, it is that the Democratic Party continues to repel those voters just as vigorously as ever. The Democrats have amply shown why they remain the party of gown, but not town.

First, there was the old subject of police brutality. If you listened to the questions of Jeff Sessions, a Republican, you heard a man exercised by the terror drug dealers can inflict on a neighborhood. If you listened to Ted Kennedy, you heard a man exercised by the terror law enforcement officials can inflict on a neighborhood. Kennedy railed against "Gestapo-like" tactics. Patrick Leahy accused Alito of rendering decisions in a "light most favorable to law enforcement."

If forced to choose, most Americans side with the party that errs on the side of the cops, not the criminals.

Then there was the old hawk-dove divide. If you listened to Lindsey Graham, a Republican, you heard a man alarmed by the threats posed by anti-American terrorists. If you listened to Leahy or Russ Feingold, you heard men alarmed by the threats posed by American counterterrorists. The Democratic questions implied that American counterterrorists are guilty until proved innocent, that a police state is being born.

If forced to choose, most Americans want a party that will fight aggressively against the terrorists, not the N.S.A.

Then there were the old accusations of bigotry. Kennedy misleadingly and maliciously asserted that Alito had never written a decision on behalf of an African-American. But those wild accusations don't carry weight any more. Rich liberals have been calling white ethnics bigots for 40 years.

Finally, and most important, there is the question of demeanor. Alito is a paragon of the old-fashioned working-class ethic. In a culture of self-aggrandizement, Alito is modest. In a culture of self-exposure, Alito is reticent. In a culture of made-for-TV sentimentalism, Alito refuses to emote. In a culture that celebrates the rebel, or the fashionable pseudorebel, Alito respects tradition, order and authority.

What sort of party doesn't admire these virtues in a judge?

The big story of American politics, which was underlined by every hour of the Alito hearings, is that some time between 1932 and 1968, the DNA of the Democratic Party fundamentally changed. In 1932, the Democrats had working-class DNA. Today, the Democrats have different DNA, the DNA of a minority party.

The Alito Spectacle: Senators (USAT)

USA Today, January 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0009312

"I'll try to make this painless," Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., said as he began questioning Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito during confirmation hearings Tuesday. No such luck.

For the next 30 minutes, Biden engaged in a rambling, self-indulgent soliloquy on his views on the Constitution, his dislike for Princeton University (Alito's alma mater), his grandfather's philosophy and even on another senator's eyeglasses. Questions for the nominee, whose decisions on the Supreme Court would affect every life in America? There were just five. They ate up triple the time Alito was allowed for answers.

During two days of hearings, it has seemed that for every senator who questioned Alito thoughtfully — and there were several — three others were more interested in hearing themselves talk. Enough senatorial hot air was expelled to fill blimps from sea to shining sea.

On the Republican side, Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., even acknowledged that he was using Alito as a political prop. "This is really not about you, so you don't have to listen. I'm talking to other people right now," Graham told Alito during one "question." He was lecturing colleagues who had criticized President Bush for using wartime presidential powers in ways that put him above the law.

Others wasted time with phony questions. "Are you against women and minorities attending college?" asked Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah. The only input Alito was allowed was an "Absolutely not, Senator. No." Then the speech continued.

The Judiciary Committee might learn something from the pointed questioning by its leaders, both former prosecutors. Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., led off with tough queries about Alito's views on abortion, the right to privacy and executive power. He pressed him with pertinent follow-ups.

Ranking Democrat Patrick Leahy of Vermont grilled the nominee about treatment of enemy combatants, wiretap surveillance of Americans without a court warrant, and Alito's ruling in a case involving the strip-search of a child during a drug raid. Like Specter, he seemed genuinely interested in Alito's answers and didn't interrupt.

Bloviating is nothing new to politics, of course, or to the Senate. Nor is the partisanship that has raised it to gale force. But when senator after senator focuses more on scoring snappy sound bites than on learning a nominee's views, the public is ill-served and the Senate's credibility is undermined. More important, so is confidence in the independence of the court.

Given the stakes, it's too bad so many senators seem so disinterested in gathering facts to make an informed, independent choice.

Painless? Only for the bloviators.

The Alito Spectacle: Nominee (USAT)

USA Today, January 12, 2006

If the Judiciary Committee is inept at questioning Supreme Court nominees, the damage is doubled by the fact that Samuel Alito, like other recent nominees, is very good at the game of saying as little as possible.

Hour after hour, he has geared his responses to avoid anything attention-grabbing — or even very informative. As a result, his views on most issues remain mostly guesswork.

The silence, though, tends to reinforce doubts raised by Alito's record — more so than Chief Justice John Roberts' did at his confirmation hearings four months ago. For example, Roberts described the court's 1973 abortion ruling, Roe v. Wade, as settled law in 2003 and "settled as precedent" last fall. Yet Alito, who once aggressively disputed that decision, wouldn't go that far. He said Tuesday that it's an "important precedent."

Similarly, Alito only backhandedly recognized as a precedent the 1965 decision that established the underlying doctrine of privacy, overturning a state's ban on use of birth control. On a second case extending that principle, he acknowledged agreement with "the result." But in legal terms, that leaves open whether he accepts the decision itself as another precedent for keeping Big Brother out of the nation's bedrooms.

Among the most vexing issues heading for the court are disputes over extraordinary powers claimed by the Bush administration in the war on terrorism. Alito said he agrees with the principle enunciated by retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor that "a state of war is not a blank check for the president." Unknown is where he thinks the limits lie. Alito shouldn't prejudge prospective cases, but he gave little to help senators assess whether he would protect citizens from government excess. President Bush claims the power to imprison Americans without trial and to eavesdrop on them without court review.

DOJ_NMG_0009313

Almost every Supreme Court nominee since Robert Bork has employed this strategy of earnest vagueness out of reasoned fear that forthrightness would bring defeat.

When Bork was nominated in 1987, he readily expanded on his long history of provocative views, attacking court decisions that legalized abortion, prohibited poll taxes and required equal representation in legislative districts. He was rejected, 58-42.

Just a year earlier, Antonin Scalia, a renowned legal conservative, refused even to say what he thought of the 1803 case that established the court's authority to interpret the Constitution. He was confirmed, 98-0.

With today's court so narrowly divided on so many critical issues, the strategy of silence amounts to low short-term politics at high long-term risk. There is an alternative, of course: Choose nominees whose views don't need to be hidden to gain bipartisan support. But that appears to be an ambition too grand for such partisan times.

Bush Sets Focus On Health Care For 2006 Agenda (WSJ)

By John D. Mckinnon And Sarah Lueck, Staff Reporters Of The Wall Street Journal

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON -- President Bush, searching for a way to ease Americans' anxiety about the economy and to respond to business and consumer alarm over health costs, is gearing up to focus on health care as a centerpiece of his 2006 domestic agenda.

The White House is unlikely to propose major new federal spending. Instead, it is considering expansions of several earlier proposals aimed at using market forces to improve the quality and restrain the rapidly rising cost of health care.

The White House has been frustrated that the president isn't getting more credit for an economy marked by steady growth, low inflation and falling unemployment. Talking more about health care is part of its response. "Health care is obviously a big challenge, and ... creates angst on the part of the American people," Mr. Bush's economic adviser, Allan Hubbard, said in an interview this week. "Employers are spending more money on health care, and that's robbing people of wage increases," he said.

The president is likely to sound similar themes in the State of the Union address later this month. In Louisville, Ky., yesterday, Mr. Bush called health care "an unmanageable cost" for businesses. Rejecting government-directed care as a solution, he said the ideal health system "is one in which there is a direct connect between provider and customer, [and] where there's transparency in the pricing system." In a likely signal of what is to come, the president urged Congress to expand health savings accounts, or HSAs. Created in 2003, HSAs allow Americans to set aside money tax-free to pay health costs if they choose high-deductible health insurance.

Among the proposals Mr. Bush is considering are:

• Providing bigger tax breaks for Americans who buy their own health insurance to balance tax breaks available to workers who get health insurance through employers.

• Encouraging broader use of HSAs in the hope that giving consumers more control over their health-care spending will make them more cost-conscious.

• Helping consumers get more information about health-care providers' prices and performance to make them better shoppers.

Building on past Bush proposals, the new White House focus on health -- beyond the government's Medicare program -- is intended to give Republicans an election-year answer to many of the worries that voters have about the fast-changing economy. In many voters' minds, those worries appear to be overshadowing the good economic news about the pace of growth and falling unemployment.

Opinion polls show health care near the top of Americans' concerns. Last month's Wall Street Journal/NBC News survey, for example, showed health care ranking behind only the war in Iraq on the list of issues the public wants the federal government to address. While 41% identified the war as a top priority for Washington, 33% identified health care, exceeding the 28% who pointed to job creation and economic growth.

DOJ_NMG_0009314

While many experts and a growing number of business executives see reason to restructure the health-care system, politicians have shied away from wholesale changes since the failure of the Clintons' initiative in the 1990s.

The Bush White House is unlikely to repeat what is widely seen as the Clintons' overreaching, but the outlines of the health-care system it envisions are becoming clear. It would rely less on generous insurance provided by employers that insulate individuals from the cost of their choices. Instead, it would rely much more on market forces, individual (as opposed to employer-provided) insurance, tax credits to help the uninsured, provider competition and using the Internet to provide consumers with more, better data about the care quality and prices charged by doctors and hospitals.

Improved information about the quality of doctors and hospitals would be valuable to people with HSAs, who according to some surveys, "don't feel like they've got enough useful information to make the best decisions about their care," said Mark McClellan, a former White House adviser who now oversees Medicare. He has been pushing the giant program for the aged and disabled to link government payments to the quality of care, instead of the volume of care. Medicare, for instance, is experimenting with paying hospitals a bonus if they perform well on preset quality standards.

A slim new book, "Healthy, Wealthy & Wise," by former Bush advisers R. Glenn Hubbard and John F. Cogan, along with Daniel Kessler of the Hoover Institution, outlines the case for moving in the direction that the Bush administration is heading. It argues that "the unintended consequences of a handful of public policies" -- including tax and health-insurance rules -- "are in large part responsible for the problems of the health-care system" because they hinder "the proper functioning of markets." (See excerpts and more information1.)

Mr. Bush's proposals are likely to draw fire from conservatives for not going far enough. And they will draw fire from Democrats and unions, who fear the administration would undermine the employer-based system and, by making individuals pay for more of their own health, discourage people from getting preventive health care. "I think this is a classic risk shift onto individuals that is both unpalatable to people and bad policy," said Jared Bernstein of the Economic Policy Institute, a liberal Washington think tank.

Analysts on both sides express skepticism that Mr. Bush, unable to persuade Congress to embrace his Social Security proposals, can make much headway this year.

Write to John D. McKinnon at john.mckinnon@wsj.com4 and Sarah Lueck at sarah.lueck@wsj.com5

Bush To Aim For Tight 2007 Budget: Card (REU-Y2)

By Susan Cornwell

Reuters, January 12, 2006

The Bush administration's upcoming budget blueprint for the U.S. government will "tighten the belt," White House chief of staff Andrew Card said on Wednesday.

Speaking to the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, Card gave no budget details in a speech that was short on particulars and long on reminders that the country was at war and that sacrifices were required. He also spoke mysteriously about a "dark cloud that seems to be gathering around the political world" but did not explain.

Card said the U.S. Congress did not appear to be in the mood to do anything about Social Security reform this year but thought lawmakers could tackle the issue in 2007 with President George W. Bush helping lead the way.

The White House was in the final stages of drafting a "very disciplined" new budget for fiscal 2007, starting October 1, Card said.

"It will fund the appropriate priorities of winning the war on terror, securing the homeland, but it will say, 'Tighten the belt,'" he said.

The administration faces budget pressures stemming from the war in Iraq and the cost of rebuilding in the Gulf Coast after the devastation from hurricanes Katrina and Rita in August and September.

Card said the 2007 budget will "make the tough decisions about which programs are necessary, and fund them appropriately but exercise prudence with the taxpayers' money."

DOJ_NMG_0009315

Bush also will continue calling for tax cuts he initiated in his first term to be made permanent, Card said. The White House had considered launching a push this year for broad tax-code changes but is delaying that amid fears it could prove too controversial in a congressional election year.

The White House's effort to overhaul the Social Security system, which has an uncertain financial future as increasing numbers of Americans retire, has stalled and Card was not optimistic about congressional action on it this year.

"I think the reality is that Congress is predisposed not to do the heavy lifting that is necessary for Social Security reform in 2006 but they definitely should be prepared to start lifting in 2007," he said.

Inside The Beltway (WT)

By John Mccaslin

The Washington Times, January 12, 2006

Good stuff

One well-known politician in Washington was overheard this week discussing his personal angst regarding a widely heard political commentator in town and his repeated violation of the "off-the-record" rule.

"Every time I tell him something, and explain that it is 'off the record,' I hear it broadcast the next day. And every time I confront him about it, he says: 'I know it was off the record, but it was too good not to use.' "

Who knows anymore?

In light of news yesterday that D.C. Council member and former Mayor Marion Barry tested positive for cocaine after a recent court-ordered drug test, maybe a joke circulating around the John A. Wilson Building isn't such a stretch of the imagination: that his honor wasn't really "robbed" at gunpoint in his apartment kitchen recently; rather, it was "a drug deal gone bad."

Honest politician

"Unfortunately, we Republicans have taken earmarking to an unprecedented level. It is now our responsibility to clean it up."

That's an honest assessment from Rep. Jeff Flake, Arizona Republican, who is out to reform the practice of earmarking — spending items slipped into appropriations bills without congressional oversight.

In a letter to House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Mr. Flake goes so far as to say that it is "no secret that over the past several months, our reputation as a governing majority has taken a beating. It is clear that continuing ... indictments, possible indictments, plea deals, tainted campaign contributions, etc., has severely eroded public trust."

Worse yet, he said, disgraced lobbyist "Jack Abramoff reportedly referred to the Appropriations Committee as a 'favor factory.' "

And here's the kicker: "No one who has seen the process firsthand, as we have, would honestly dispute his characterization," Mr. Flake told his Republican boss.

All about money

The National Republican Senatorial Committee (NRSC) has been keeping close tabs on Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, who is out raising money for Democrats this week, even though his name continues to surface in the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal.

Those in charge of Republican campaign coffers find it ironic that Mr. Reid, despite the cloud hanging over his head, has been raising money in Western Republican "red" states that backed President Bush in 2004 (his final stop today is Nebraska, having stumped for cash earlier this week in Arizona, Colorado, Utah and Idaho.)

Mr. Reid has called the Abramoff affair a "Republican scandal," telling Fox News viewers: "So don't lump me in with Jack Abramoff. This is a Republican scandal. Don't try to give any of it to me."

Nevertheless, the NRSC continues to peddle as many links as it can find between the Democrat and the disgraced lobbyist, not the least being a letter Mr. Reid wrote in 2002 to Interior Secretary Gale A. Norton on behalf of an Abramoff client.

"The day after Reid penned his letter, clients of Abramoff donated $5,000 to Reid's leadership [political action committee]," the NRSC states.

Madison's notes

DOJ_NMG_0009316

Don't look now, but that's former Attorney General Edwin I. Meese III participating in this week's contentious Senate Judiciary Committee hearings for Supreme Court nominee Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr.

Or at least that's the Heritage Guide to the Constitution, co-edited by Mr. Meese, sitting on the desk of Sen. Tom Coburn, Oklahoma Republican, as he takes in Judge Alito's testimony this week surrounding the nominee's interpretation of the Constitution.

"It's obviously playing a significant role in the Alito hearings," Rebecca Hagelin, vice president of the Heritage Foundation, tells us.

The thick volume contains the opinions of more than 100 of the nation's top legal analysts who have examined, line by line, the Constitution and its contemporary meaning. They zero in on the original intent of the Framers as the authoritative standard of constitutional interpretation, relying heavily on their early writings, particularly the "invaluable" notes taken at the Constitutional Convention by James Madison.

Treasury Undersecretary Says He's Paid To Worry (USAT)

By David J. Lynch

USA Today, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — From his Treasury Department office overlooking the White House, Timothy Adams scans the globe trying to spot economic brushfires before they become infernos.

Right now, he doesn't see much to worry about. But he's still looking. “If I weren't paid to worry, I would argue that the glass is half full and there's a lot that we should celebrate. But my job isn't to celebrate; it's to think about how this all could go awry,” Adams, undersecretary of Treasury for international affairs, said recently.

Many things could derail the locomotive of global growth. In an interview, Adams singled out imbalances in the world economy, oil prices and China's stability.

Last year, the Chinese minister of public security acknowledged 74,000 incidents of mass protest. Most involve peasant anger over illegal land seizures, local government corruption or environmental woes. The discontent has done nothing to disrupt the economy or the river of foreign investment flowing into China. So far.

“Global industry has been extremely sanguine in their outlook for China … as a manufacturing, export and production platform. But there are a lot of risks there, and those risks bear close watching because any disruptions in China will have global implications,” he said.

Adams, 44, is preparing for his fourth trip to Beijing in the six months he's been in this job. He moved into one of the department's top posts after serving as chief of staff to then-Treasury secretary Paul O'Neill and several years as a Washington consultant. He also worked in the administration of President George H.W. Bush.

Each week, Adams receives a variety of financial intelligence reports from Treasury experts.

The department's “blue-chip early-warning system” monitors countries around the world for evidence of brewing currency, debt or banking crises. Adams wouldn't say whether his analysts have spotted any.

Current imbalances in the global economy will eventually adjust, Adams said. The only question is whether they move into balance gradually or with a painful crash.

Believing that today's calm won't last forever, Treasury officials also routinely carry out financial war-gaming to practice their handling of potential crises.

“We still are in extraordinarily benign conditions,” Adams said.

“… I suspect that whatever the crisis we have to address in the future — and we will — will probably come from someplace we least expect.”

Into The Oversight Void Step The Inspectors General (Washington Post)

By Christopher Lee

Washington Post, January 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0009317

When a Chicago newspaper reported in 2004 that Illinois ranked last in federal disability payments to veterans, the secretary of veterans affairs -- prodded by House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and other influential lawmakers -- turned to his department's inspector general for an explanation.

After four months, 1,900 interviews and a review of 2,100 disability claims, a team of 36 auditors found reasons that veterans in top-ranked New Mexico got an average of $12,004 in annual disability payments while Illinois veterans received $6,961. Their 192-page report made eight recommendations for addressing the inequity, and the Department of Veterans Affairs is implementing many of them.

"It's a really big project," said Michael L. Staley, assistant inspector general for auditing, who led the effort. "Our national reviews generally take about 11 months, and we accomplished this from January to April."

For their labor, Staley and his team recently picked up the Alexander Hamilton Award. The annual honor recognizes the foremost effort by an inspector general to improve the efficiency and effectiveness of executive branch operations.

Created by an act of Congress in 1978, "IGs," as they are known, can trace their roots to the Continental Army, which had an inspector general independently assess the readiness of combat troops. Their modern mission is to foster integrity and efficiency in government through the prevention and detection of waste, fraud and abuse.

Initially Congress created 12 independent audit and investigative offices, and every affected agency opposed them. Over the past 27 years, inspectors general have become a fixture of the bureaucracy. Their ranks have grown to 57 -- more than half appointed by the president -- and their offices employ 11,400 auditors, investigators, inspectors and other professionals.

The role of inspectors general has taken on new prominence, as one-party control of Capitol Hill and the White House has dampened the appetite in Congress for close oversight of the executive branch, analysts say.

"They are becoming the de facto overseers of government," said Paul C. Light, a professor of government at New York University and the author of a book on IGs. "As congressional oversight has declined sharply over the last decade, many IGs are getting into areas that were once reserved for the investigatory committees of Congress. And many, but not all of them, have risen to the challenge. . . . Some of these reports are very hard-hitting."

Clay Johnson III, deputy director of the Office of Management and Budget, agreed that Congress is not "as aggressive as it needs to be," but not because the GOP dominates the levers of power.

"The executive branch pays more attention to whether we spend money on real needs and whether we get what we pay for than Congress does," said Johnson, who heads the President's Council on Integrity and Efficiency, an umbrella group of 29 presidentially appointed inspectors general. "That has nothing to do with which party is in charge of what branch."

In 2004, the most recent year for which figures are available, inspectors general processed 189,500 complaints, identified $18 billion in potential savings through audits, and were instrumental in nearly 6,500 prosecutions that led to convictions or settlements with the Justice Department. They collected $3.5 billion in fines, settlements and voluntary repayments, making the $1.9 billion spent to fund them look like a bargain.

Notable reports last year included a finding by the Transportation Department IG that the Federal Aviation Administration's inspection program had failed to address safety risks posed by airline industry cost-cutting and the rapid growth of budget carriers. A report by the Justice Department IG found that the FBI's failure to detect the Sept. 11, 2001, hijacking plot stemmed in part from "widespread and long-standing deficiencies" in the way the agency handled terrorism and intelligence cases.

Last year, the special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction found federal mismanagement complicated by corruption among government contractors and Iraqi officials that led to at least one criminal indictment.

And more than 350 investigators, auditors and evaluators from the inspectors general offices at the Department of Homeland Security and other departments were dispatched to scrutinize federal spending in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina.

The job can bring as much grief as acclaim. Before becoming IG at the Corporation for National and Community Service in 2002, J. Russell George, then a staff director for a House subcommittee, called around to current and former IGs to ask what the job was like: "The vast majority of them said, 'Don't do it,' " he said.

George was told that IGs considered too aggressive by the White House can be perceived as too docile by Congress. He took the job anyway, and last year he was promoted by President Bush to be the inspector general overseeing the Internal Revenue Service.

DOJ_NMG_0009318

"There's no question that being an IG is difficult," said George, who says he likes his work. "It's human nature that people many times do not like to be criticized or to be told that what they are doing is either wrong or could be done better. That is exactly what we as IGs have to do."

Some IGs are as controversial as the agencies they oversee.

Pentagon Inspector General Joseph E. Schmitz resigned in September after learning that he was the target of a congressional inquiry into whether he had blocked two criminal probes. Janet Rehnquist resigned the IG's post at the Department of Health and Human Services in June 2003, ending a controversial 22-month tenure in which she improperly kept a firearm in her office and initiated personnel changes that led at least 20 senior managers to retire, resign or be reassigned. That same summer, U.S. Postal Service Inspector General Karla W. Corcoran retired after a federal investigation found that she abused her authority, spent more than $1 million on each of three employee award ceremonies and conducted questionable personnel practices.

A few critics say the work of inspectors general has been undermined by politics. A 2004 report by the Democratic staff of the House Government Reform Committee found that fewer than 20 percent of inspectors general appointed by Bush had audit experience, while nearly two-thirds had held political positions, such as working for a GOP member of Congress or in a Republican White House. Under President Bill Clinton, more than 60 percent had audit experience and fewer than one-quarter had held political positions, the report said.

Yet, as Light, the government professor, pointed out, "Yes, there are more politicals, but some have become very aggressive IGs."

Clark Kent Ervin, a Texan who served in Bush's gubernatorial administration, got the inspector general's job at the Department of Homeland Security through a recess appointment because the Senate would not schedule a confirmation vote. Once in, Ervin became a thorn in then-Secretary Tom Ridge's side, issuing reports critical of spending and management practices at DHS agencies. He left in December 2004 (the expiration of his appointment) when it became clear that the White House would not renominate him.

"Here's a guy who was being groomed as a political type, but they canned him as quickly as possible," Light said.

Kenneth M. Mead, the IG at the Transportation Department, said inspectors general must set politics aside and "speak truth to power."

"It's important that the IG be a player," Mead said. "If you don't go after the big issues, you can be marginalized. I think it's important that we're not just sitting around looking at vouchers."

Lawmakers Move To Cut Lobbyists' Influence Scandal Jars Loose Stuck Legislation (USAT)

By Jim Drinkard

USA Today, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — A scramble is on to write new rules restricting how lobbyists ply their influence trade as the capital is embroiled in a spreading corruption scandal.

Bills aiming to chill the relationships between lobbyists and members of Congress, stalled for months, are now on a fast track as leaders battle the perception of misconduct. “These scandals aren't going away,” said Rep. Marty Meehan, D-Mass., a sponsor of one proposal to curb lobbyists' influence. “What we know is probably only a fraction of the story.”

The rush began last week when Jack Abramoff, a former top lobbyist, pleaded guilty to fraud and conspiracy charges and agreed to help prosecutors investigating corruption on Capitol Hill and in the Bush administration.

Abramoff plied congressmen and their aides with trips, free meals and entertainment. He gave thousands of dollars in campaign contributions and steered thousands more — including raising more than $100,000 for President Bush's re-election in 2004.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., and House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., have ordered packages of new ethics rules intended to take effect before lawmakers face voters in November.

House Rules Committee Chairman David Dreier, R-Calif., who is drafting the House package, said it likely will include a ban on members of Congress taking fact-finding trips paid for by private interests.

Nearly $20 million has been spent on such trips since 2000, and they have come under scrutiny because Abramoff used trips — sometimes including golf at exclusive courses — as tools of influence.

Dreier said he also is looking at increasing the amount of information available on lobbyists' activities, including their campaign contributions and fundraising efforts.

"Greater transparency, greater disclosure … that is first and foremost," he said. "We need to expand the respect that the American people have for the institution, which is not all that high right now."

Current lobbying rules exempt "grass-roots" lobbying — sophisticated and often expensive efforts to generate public pressure on Congress through advertising, mail and e-mail. They also don't require lobbying coalitions to disclose the interests behind them.

Also under consideration: requiring lawmakers to fully disclose when they hop corporate planes for political travel and to reimburse the plane's owner for the full value of the flight.

Now, no such disclosure is required, and lawmakers have to reimburse only the priceof a first-class commercial ticket.

In the Senate, the bill drafting has been assigned to Sen. Rick Santorum, R-Pa. Spokesman Robert Traynham says Santorum is looking at restrictions on gifts from lobbyists, privately paid travel and fundraising.

Santorum and Dreier are looking at bills such as Meehan's and a similar one advanced by Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., and Rep. Christopher Shays, R-Conn., for ideas. They aim to complete draft bills by early next month.

Paul Miller, president of the American League of Lobbyists, a trade association, says the definition of lobbying also needs to be re-examined. Lobbying reports are filed by those who directly contact Congress or the executive branch. That leaves out others who seek to influence the government indirectly, including public relations consultants, Miller notes.

Ethics watchdog groups said new rules will mean little unless they are enforced, noting that the scandal arose at a time when congressional ethics enforcement was largely on hold.

"The House ethics committee is dead, and the Senate committee is not known to be effective," said Larry Noble, director of the non-partisan Center for Responsive Politics. "No matter what rules they put in, if they don't get a working enforcement mechanism, it's going to be meaningless."

Hill Weighs Curbs On Lobbying (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

Congress is poised to pass measures early this year that would clamp down on lobbying activity and possibly end some lawmaker travel.

Lawmakers are moving quickly to devise lobbying legislation and to approve it soon after Congress returns later this month. The rush has been caused by recent lobbying scandals, including the guilty plea last week of lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who is cooperating with prosecutors in a corruption investigation of Congress.

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) have delegated to colleagues the writing of bills that would increase lobbying disclosure and restrict the ways that lobbyists and lawmakers interact. Hastert said he is considering an outright ban on privately paid travel as one component of such a bill.

"Our intention is to have a very strong package," said Ron Bonjean, a spokesman for Hastert. The speaker, who skipped a planned trip to Asia in part to work on the lobbying proposal, expects the House to pass a bill "as soon as possible," Bonjean added. Rapid action is also expected in the Senate.

The details of that legislation have not yet come into focus. Proposals are coming from members of both political parties. A touchstone for all sides, however, is the plan introduced last month by Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Rep. Christopher Shays (R-Conn.). Rep. David Dreier (R-Calif.), who is Hastert's emissary on the issue, has consulted with McCain and said yesterday: "We're going to use a lot of what he has as a basis from which we'll proceed."

The McCain bill would beef up lobbying disclosure considerably and cover grass-roots lobbying campaigns, which now go unreported. It would also require lobbyists to report each fundraising event that they host or sponsor for candidates for federal office, including the amount raised.

DOJ_NMG_0009320

In addition, the McCain bill would require lobbyists to report the donations they give to lawmakers directly and at events that honor lawmakers or entities that they created or control. It would also require lobbyists to disclose quarterly -- which would be twice as often as they file now -- any gift worth more than $20 that they give to lawmakers or their aides, including meals and tickets to events.

But one particularly powerful group is gearing up to oppose several of the most sweeping proposals: lobbyists. Lobby organizations ranging from the U.S. Chamber of Commerce to the American Society of Association Executives (ASAE) are concerned that some of the measures under consideration would overburden them with paperwork or unfairly limit their ability to do their jobs. They are already planning to lobby against those parts of any new lobbying law.

"We need to sit down with people up there and give them some honest understanding of what can and what cannot be done," R. Bruce Josten, a Chamber executive, said, referring to Congress.

Josten worries that too much paperwork might bury lobbying groups and prove costly without much payoff for the public. He also doubts whether grass-roots lobbying disclosure is practical or wise. Jim Clarke of the ASAE has reservations about a ban on privately paid travel because it might isolate members of Congress from interest groups.

"Requiring us to write down every meeting we have with staff and members -- what will the public get from that? Nothing," said Paul A. Miller, president of the American League of Lobbyists. Miller frets that a ban on gifts to lawmakers would disadvantage small lobbyists in favor of their bigger colleagues who can offer sizable campaign contributions.

Miller said he expects extensive lobbying by lobbyists on the legislation.

But not all lobbyists think that is a good idea. "It would be foolish for the lobbying community to go up and fight these things," said Ralph Hellmann of the Information Technology Industry Council. "In the current environment, anything the lobbying community says is not good for itself will end up happening."

Lobbyists' Emergence Reflects Shift In Capital Culture (WP)

By Thomas B. Edsall

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

Corporate lobbyists Mark Valente III and Troup Coronado don't have to hang out in the hallways of Capitol Hill, waiting to buttonhole Rep. John M. Shimkus (R-Ill.). Both men have more convenient ways of reaching the lawmaker.

Valente is the treasurer of Shimkus's political action committee, the John S Fund. And Coronado, who lobbies for BellSouth, played host at a Dec. 17 fundraiser for Shimkus at MCI Center. Guests made contributions -- $1,000 per person, $1,500 per couple -- to his reelection campaign, and in turn they got to take in a Bon Jovi performance from the BellSouth suite.

There is nothing exceptional about Valente's relationship with Shimkus, or Coronado's fundraising party. But they do illustrate the capital's changing mores.

Although the excesses of Jack Abramoff have captured the news, a wide range of other practices -- rarely publicized and fully legal -- reflect the steady dismantling of the wall between lobbyists and members of the House and Senate.

Fallout from the Abramoff scandal is likely for a time to chill certain aspects of the capital culture, in which access to power on Capitol Hill is lubricated by lobbyist-funded meals, travel and campaign contributions, according to congressional veterans of both parties. But some public interest advocates believe the relationships between lobbyists and politicians have become so institutionalized in recent years that fundamental change is unlikely, absent changes in the law. Among the examples:

· Since 1998, lobbyists have served as treasurers of 79 lawmakers' campaign committees and leadership PACs, according to the Center for Public Integrity. These committees often pay for senators and House members to enjoy such fundraising events as golfing in Palm Springs, Calif., and fishing tournaments off the Florida Keys -- outings at which the lobbyists will also be prominently in attendance.

· Major trade associations have bought Capitol Hill townhouses for fundraisers so that lawmakers can quickly go back to cast votes and then return to the event.

· At election time, many lobbyists put on a new hat and become political consultants, guiding incumbents to reelection. Afterward these lobbyists return to their traditional roles, being able now to ask for votes from those they helped put in office.

DOJ_NMG_0009321

"The border has broken down. Not only has it broken down, it's sort of 'barbarians at the gate,' " said Lawrence F. O'Brien III, a Democratic lobbyist. "There is sort of the naked 'Well, we are one, you are us' type of notion between the members of Congress and the lobbying community downtown."

The change in standards of what is objectionable versus what is commonplace is suggested by a nearly forgotten uproar nearly two decades ago. On Feb. 3, 1987, newspapers disclosed that then-Sen. Lloyd M. Bentsen (D-Tex.), chairman of the Finance Committee, had set up a "breakfast club" for lobbyists who donated $10,000 to his campaign committee.

The implied bargain -- money for access -- struck many as just too obvious. Three days later, Bentsen ended the breakfasts and acknowledged that his error of judgment had been "a doozy."

Now, every day Congress is in session, there are lobbyist-organized fundraisers for senators and representatives -- at breakfast, brunch, lunch or dinner -- at which the basic transaction is little different than what got Bentsen in hot water. Take Dec. 14, 2005:

Lobbyists for BNSF Railway and United Parcel Service held a luncheon for Rep. Jim Gerlach (R-Pa.) at the Associated General Contractors townhouse ($1,000 per PAC, $500 a person), according to the Web site for the National Republican Congressional Committee. A few blocks away, according to the NRCC, lobbyists for MasterCard, Time Warner and DuPont honored Rep. J. Gresham Barrett (R-S.C.) at Tortilla Coast ($1,000). That evening, Promia Inc.'s Adrian Plesha hosted a reception for Rep. John E. Sweeney (R-N.Y.) at his East Capitol Street home -- $5,000 for "sponsors," $1,000 for PACs and $500 for individuals.

The pivotal point in Washington's changing culture, according to lobbyists and congressional ethics analysts, came in 1995, shortly after Newt Gingrich and his "Republican Revolutionaries" roared to power in the 1994 midterm elections. Tom DeLay, the new majority whip, and his allies began the "K Street Project" -- the pressuring of trade associations and lobbying firms to hire Republican, and to contribute to Republican campaigns if they wanted access to key leaders and committee chairmen in the House.

"We're just following the old adage of punish your enemies and reward your friends. We don't like to deal with people who are trying to kill the revolution. We know who they are," DeLay told The Washington Post.

DeLay announced last week he will not try to regain his former post of majority leader, even if he is cleared in a Texas trial over allegations of illegal fundraising. But his absence does not necessarily mean the lobbyist-lawmaker relationship will change on Capitol Hill.

One lawmaker hoping to move up in the GOP leadership is Rep. John A. Boehner (Ohio), chairman of the House Education and the Workforce Committee. He maintains the lobbyist-financed Freedom Project, with a lobbyist as treasurer and an all-lobbyist executive board. It has raised $5.94 million over 10 years and has contributed $3.26 million to fellow Republicans.

Some 2003-2004 expenditures include $21,990 at Sam and Harry's steakhouse, $16,189 in fees at Manassas's Robert Trent Jones Golf Club and $5,990 for lodging at La Quinta Resort & Club near Palm Springs.

"What used to be considered in Washington conduct to be hidden was turned into conduct to be flaunted," said Fred Wertheimer, president of Democracy 21, a group seeking campaign finance changes.

Although DeLay was a catalyst, some of the cultural changes he represented preceded him. And Democrats participated with vigor.

In 1981, then-Rep. Tony Coelho (Calif.), chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, began to "marry" businesses seeking legislation with Democratic lobbyists, especially former staffers. The maneuver gave the businesses better access and turned many into contributors to the DCCC.

That same year, the Republican firm Black, Manafort and Stone became the first in which partners served both as political consultants to candidates for federal office and lobbyists on behalf of corporations and trade associations.

Lobbyists also have unprecedented sway with the national party organizations. They held all the top positions at the 2004 GOP convention in New York.

The House GOP leadership has also brought them directly into the legislating process, institutionalizing the practice of using large networks of lobbyists to help "whip" bills by keeping vote counts and finding ways to persuade wavering members to vote with the caucus.

DOJ_NMG_0009322

Recent years have even shown how the traditional lobbyist-lawmaker financial pipeline can flow in both directions. In addition to helping legislators raise reelection money, lobbyists have received large sums from politicians' PACs for vaguely defined services.

The soon-to-be-closed Alexander Strategy Group, for instance, received funds from committees associated with acting House Majority Leader Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) and DeLay -- $386,552, and $392,740, respectively.

DeLay's wife, Christine, and three former top aides -- Edwin A. Buckham, James W. Ellis and Tony C. Rudy -- worked for Alexander Strategy Group. Gregg Hartley, Blunt's former top political aide and now a lobbyist, defended the payments and said the money was paid "to utilize the services of several individuals who assisted with staffing, fundraising, strategy and operational services for the development, implementation and resource generation for a very effective and absolutely legal political campaign committee." Stanford political scientist David Brady said that in terms of overt corruption, this era does not compare to the gilded age of "robber barons" in the 19th century. Simon Cameron, a senator from Pennsylvania at that time, said of his colleagues: "An honest politician is one who, when he is bought, will stay bought."

L. Sandy Maisel, director of the Goldfarb Center for Public Affairs and Civic Engagement at Colby College, said the issue now is less a matter of criminality or overt corruption than a change in standards: "Congress as an institution now defines as ethical actions that would be derided elsewhere in society."

Let All The Sunshine In (WT)

By Paul M. Rodriguez

The Washington Times, January 12, 2006

As John Boehner said when he threw his hat into the House majority leader's race, "adding more new rules isn't the answer" to clean up real and perceived egregious behavior now embroiling Congress as a result of the Rep. Tom DeLay, Jack Abramoff and Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham's disgraceful crimes.

Indeed, instead of adding more rules, how's this for a good government concept? Simply eliminate the very rules that sprang out of the Watergate-era campaign finance laws or many of the "reforms" following the House Bank and House Post Office scandals.

The concept isn't as far fetched as it sounds. Consider that it's one that has served well the residents of the Commonwealth of Virginia. The model is simplicity itself -- there are no restrictions governing political donations or gift giving other than making all of it public.

What a refreshing thought when one stops for a minute to ponder that, so far as memory serves, such a system has not led to any scandals in Virginia. Total transparency between donors and recipients, actual dollar amounts and specific goodies received are all put into the public domain for anyone to see, report and contemplate.

The major political parties have been fighting such rules since the 1974 Federal Campaign Act was signed into law to, basically, maintain some political advantages and loopholes. The sad fact is that, with approval by the Supreme Court, the only losers have been the American people and the First Amendment.

That said, the reality is that the large percentage of lobbyists (like journalists and government workers) are honest, good people. So the Abramoff's of this world really stink up the joints for all of us.

So it's rather ironic really when one considers that it's been under conservative Republican rule in the last few years that produced the McCain-Feingold legislation to supposedly -- yet again -- clean up campaign finance rules. Anyone remember the much-ballyhooed 527 political action committees?

Like prostitution, politics is as old as human kind. Maybe not much of a difference but the fact remains that each generation has seen its fair share of hookers and money scandals. And though laws are on the books to outlaw prostitution (except in certain locales in Nevada), no one has given serious consideration to outlawing politicians.

Instead, we've seen laws passed to protect pols from themselves and, arguably, to protect us from them. The sad fact is that our free speech rights to "speak" via political contributions -- whether individually or in groups -- have been abridged. Congress and the courts have theorized that losing some of these rights is okay if it's in the greater interest of the body politic. Something about a camel's nose in the tent springs to mind.

DOJ_NMG_0009323

The result has been a body of laws, regulations and rulings that even experts in campaign finance and ethics law find confusing. So, how about trying something Virginia knows works?

Simply allow any American to givetoanypolitician(or wannabe) as much money as they want. And let anyone buy any politician or senior staff anything of value -- including a Rolls Royce or a yacht a la the Cunningham fiasco. Just make it all public within 30 days down to the last penny.

"Oh my God," I can hear naysayers scream, "you can't do that! Then the millionaires would buy up every politician and the little people would get suckered!" Really?

Consider the scores of millions spent by the likes of New Jersey Gov. John Corzine for his state's top job (and previously for the Senate seat), and New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg's lavish spending -- twice. Obviously, people can made up their minds when there's full public disclosure.

When the Republicans took over Congress in 1994 they promised to clean up the culture of corruption in Washington after 40 years of Democrat power. They promised to apply the laws of the land to themselves. They promised to live by the spirit of ethics, not just the rules. And Democrats joined them gladly after the myriad scandals from the late 1980s into the early 1990s.

The simplicity of the GOP "Contract with America" was its appeal. Republicans gambled that the public would support such common sense rules. They believed in the power of the people. So how about trusting the people yet again? We're all not as stupid as lawmakers or interest groups make us out to be.

Rep. David Drier, the California Republican who chairs the House Rules Committee, has been tasked by Speaker Dennis Hassert to come up with some lobbying rule changes. How about this David -- just scrap all the rules and truly shine the light on all that hidden money giving. Make it all public.

Arizona Legislator May Join Race To Succeed DeLay (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON -- As the two front-runners slowed, a third candidate edged closer to entering the nasty Republican contest to pick a successor to the party's fallen majority leader, Rep. Tom DeLay.

Rep. John Shadegg stepped up calls seeking support from colleagues, and his allies were optimistic that the six-term Arizona lawmaker will offer a more change-oriented alternative to the two establishment figures in the field: Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R., Mo.) and Rep. John Boehner (R., Ohio), chairman of the House Education and Workforce Committee.

Last evening, Mr. Shadegg's office said no final decision had been made on the leadership race, but issued a statement critical of Reps. Blunt and Boehner for not being aggressive enough, in the congressman's words, "to clean up our act in the wake of the recent ethics scandals and get back to the agenda that brought us the majority in the first place."

"At the end of the day, he hinted, he'd be in the race. I don't know what his decision is," said Speaker Dennis Hastert (R., Ill.), who spoke by telephone with Mr. Shadegg. Neither Mr. Blunt nor Mr. Boehner appears close to the 116 votes needed to win. With so many Republicans uncommitted, Mr. Shadegg has the potential to shake up the race, forcing at least a second ballot and greater discussion of changes that many members are demanding.

"I'd say uncommitted is leading by two lengths," said Rep. Charles Bass (R., N.H.), one of those encouraging Mr. Shadegg's candidacy.

"I think it's important to pin these people down," said Rep. Jeff Flake (R., Ariz.), a Shadegg ally. "I'm not convinced those running realize the trouble we're in as a party and that a modest course correction won't do."

The jockeying takes place against a background of scandal and drift within Republican ranks that threatens the party's hold on the House going into November's elections. Mr. DeLay's decision to surrender the majority leadership post came just days after his friend, lobbyist Jack Abramoff, pleaded guilty to three felonies in federal court and promised to cooperate in a larger Justice Department probe that likely will touch other lawmakers as well.

The party was stunned by the actions of former Rep. Randall "Duke" Cunningham, a California Republican who resigned from Congress in November after pleading guilty to taking bribes in exchange for helping steer contracts to defense companies.

DOJ_NMG_0009324

The Abramoff and Cunningham scandals cast light on the dangers of lawmakers earmarking funds in spending bills for favored projects, a practice common to both parties, but which has grown under Republican rule. Mr. Flake argues that whoever succeeds Mr. DeLay must address not only lobbying abuses but internal institutional changes within the House.

Reps. Blunt and Boehner are both promising overhauls, but the two men are so closely linked to the Washington lobbying community that they have trouble convincing their colleagues that they will be real advocates for change. In frustration, each camp has stepped up its behind-the-scene attacks on the other. As the race turns nastier, a fresh face such as Mr. Shadegg could be at an advantage.

The Republican Study Committee, representing House conservatives, will hold a retreat in Baltimore before the Feb. 2 leadership elections. An effort to move up the party deliberations by a week -- something that might have helped Mr. Blunt -- failed yesterday. A petition drive began to require that nearly all of the leadership posts except the speakership be thrown open for fresh elections.

The timing of the Baltimore retreat could help Mr. Shadegg, a former RSC leader. He showed an ability to reach out to moderates when he quietly won a foothold in the leadership at the beginning of this Congress. Mr. Hastert has since tapped him to lead a series of dinners with Republicans on immigration issues -- a divisive issue. He has been an ally in promoting legislation to help small, sole proprietorships gain access to cooperative health insurance.

Congress Watch: Few Expect Dark Horse In House GOP Race (USNEWS)

By Paul Bedard

U.S. News and World Report, January 12, 2006

House Republican lawmakers do not think that a third candidate will move forward this week to challenge Ohio Rep. John Boehner and Missouri Rep. Roy Blunt for the House majority leader's post.

Senators hope to strip oil taxes from Katrina bill (12/21/05)

Frist predicts Jan. 20 Alito confirmation (12/19/05)

Aides say Bush has bottomed out (12/13/05)

More from Washington Whispers

More from Nation & World

"It's just too late to get in," said a key GOP leadership aide. However, added another, if neither Blunt nor Boehner can nail down the job within the next six to eight days, a move could be made to seek a consensus candidate. The leading alternative there, said several leadership officials and GOP consultants, is Rep. Tom Reynolds, head of the National Republican Congressional Committee. Insiders close to the two campaigns to replace Rep. Tom DeLay as the permanent majority leader said that while Blunt is the leader, Boehner is gaining ground.

"Boehner is making good progress, so Blunt may have some vulnerability," said a key source, who added that Blunt's position as House whip should make it easy for him to nail down the job quickly. "If we don't see Blunt wrapping it up this week, then all bets are off," added the insider. A Republican consultant who was involved in the 1998 coup and installation of Dennis Hastert as speaker said that the first week is critical.

"If you can't nail it down then, the members start looking for somebody else. And in that case, anybody could emerge," he said. Meanwhile, socially and fiscally conservative members want a candidate who is close to them on their issues, but one said Tuesday that they don't expect to persuade a member from their caucus to enter the race.

House Republicans Outline Lobbying Reform Ideas (REU-Y2)

By Richard Cowan

Reuters, January 12, 2006

The two candidates vying to become the next U.S. House of Representatives majority leader set forth their ideas on Wednesday for stamping out ethics problems that have threatened Republicans' control of the chamber beyond this year.

Ohio Republican Rep. John Boehner (news, bio, voting record) called for outlawing the earmarking of federal funds for special-interest projects sought by lobbyists, which do not go through the regular oversight process in Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0009325

In a letter to House Rules Committee Chairman David Dreier, Boehner called for "enacting a ban on unauthorized earmarks for private entities that serve private interests at the expense of the public interest."

Boehner, a 16-year House veteran, said, "We all need to acknowledge that the system is spinning out of control and that it's time to do something about it."

Annual spending bills have become a magnet for such projects, which critics call special-interest "pork."

Boehner's only opponent so far in the race for majority leader is Acting Majority Leader Roy Blunt of Missouri, who offered his own set of ethics reforms.

Blunt, in his fifth two-year House term, called for banning privately-funded travel for House members and aides or at least requiring advance approval of such travel.

Rep. Tom DeLay, who is battling money laundering charges in a Texas court, told fellow Republicans on Saturday he had decided to permanently vacate the position of majority leader, the number 2 leadership position behind Speaker. House Republicans are to vote on his replacement on February 2.

House Republicans have put ethics and lobbying reform at the top of their legislative agenda this year, following lobbyist Jack Abramoff's recent guilty pleas in an expanding fraud and bribery investigation.

At least one Republican representative is known to be under investigation related to the Abramoff probe and many more could be drawn into the scandal. Abramoff deposited millions of dollars into lawmakers' coffers on behalf of himself, his wife and casino and American Indian clients.

DeLay took expensive trips to London and Scotland in 2000 that were paid for by Abramoff.

Besides travel restrictions, Blunt has proposed new limits on political contributions made by Indian tribes and called for quicker disclosures of lobbying expenditures.

Boehner also called for better disclosure of lobbyists' contributions to federal campaigns.

Both Boehner and Blunt received political contributions since 1999 from Abramoff or the Indian tribe or casinos he represented, according to the private Center for Responsive Politics. Boehner said he has not received "a single penny" from Abramoff. Last week, Blunt said he was donating to charity Abramoff-related campaign contributions.

In Majority Leader Race, Lobbying Rules Are The Easy Target (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 11 - With the need for new ethics and lobbying rules emerging as a central theme in the race for House Republican leader, the two contenders on Wednesday engaged in an arms race over who supported the most stringent changes.

Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio, trying to appeal to fiscal conservatives unhappy with an explosion in pet projects being inserted in broad spending bills, proposed banning such "earmarks" unless they received individual Congressional scrutiny and approval.

"We all need to acknowledge that the system is spinning out of control and that it's time to do something about it," Mr. Boehner wrote in a letter to Representative David Dreier of California, the Rules Committee chairman who is leading a Republican effort to assemble a proposal to overhaul rules for lobbyists. Mr. Boehner said the plan should also end lobbying rule exemptions for advocates for government-financed institutions like universities.

Representative Roy Blunt of Missouri, Mr. Boehner's rival for the position of majority leader, backed Speaker J. Dennis Hastert's proposal to eliminate Congressional travel paid by special interest groups. Mr. Blunt's other proposals include penalties on lobbyists for violations of the Congressional gift ban. It is now improper only for lawmakers to accept gifts of more than $50, not for a lobbyist to provide such gifts.

It was not just the leadership rivals seeking to replace Representative Tom DeLay who sought to up the ante over Congressional ethics.

DOJ_NMG_0009326

Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, the House Democratic leader, wrote Wednesday to Mr. Hastert, asking him to join her in urging the House ethics committee to investigate the conduct of Representatives Bob Ney of Ohio, Mr. DeLay of Texas and other lawmakers whose names have emerged in a federal lobbying inquiry.

"To restore the integrity of the House in the eyes of the American people, the conduct of those members and staff whose unethical behavior has severely damaged the reputation of the Congress itself must be immediately and fully investigated," Ms. Pelosi wrote. She blamed Mr. Hastert's decision to replace the ethics committee chairman and to institute other changes for paralyzing the panel in 2005.

In the wake of a guilty plea to corruption charges by the lobbyist Jack Abramoff and the conviction of a California lawmaker on bribery charges, Mr. Hastert has conceded that a review of lobbying rules is necessary and has given the job to Mr. Dreier. Congressional Democrats are preparing their own proposals.

Representatives Boehner and Blunt are trying to establish their credentials on lobbying changes in part to offset criticism that they have their own well-established links to Washington's lobbying community and that neither would represent a significant departure from the reign of Mr. DeLay.

Mr. Blunt, No. 3 in the House leadership, has been filling in for Mr. DeLay, who stepped aside after being indicted on campaign-finance charges in Texas. Mr. Boehner, chairman of the Education and the Workforce Committee, had held the No. 4 position in the leadership after Republicans won control of the House in 1994 but lost the job in 1998.

Some House Republicans are advocating a broader leadership review beyond the vacant majority leader's post and say that some new blood is needed at the top.

"We have been mired in the mud of Jack Abramoff, and our message has been lost," said Representative Todd Tiahrt of Kansas, who has said he wants the No. 3 position held by Mr. Blunt. "In order to regain the faith and confidence of the American people, the speaker must have new faces on his leadership team. The status quo may lead to minority status."

While Mr. Blunt is ahead in public pledges of support, having 62 of the 116 needed compared with Mr. Boehner's 35, Mr. Boehner's lobbying plan struck a chord with Representative Jeff Flake of Arizona, one of the House conservatives who had pushed to replace Mr. DeLay permanently.

Mr. Flake has sought to rein in the growth in pet projects that end up in the final versions of huge spending bills without previous consideration by Congress, preventing them from being eliminated without defeating the entire bill. Watchdog groups say that earmarks have contributed to lobbying abuses as contractors and others seeking the special spending go to extremes to win support from influential lawmakers.

"Leadership candidates are going to have a difficult time convincing the Republican conference that they're serious about reform without a proposal for earmark reform," Mr. Flake said.

Some lawmakers and senior Republicans said the fact that neither contender had been able to wrap up the race leaves the door open for others to jump in, with Representative John Shadegg of Arizona mentioned as a possible contender. Republicans on Wednesday dropped plans to move the election forward to conclude it before the Jan. 31 State of the Union address. Instead, they said, it will take place on Feb. 2.

House Members Weigh Blunt's Reputation, Ties To DeLay (SCCD)

By Sam Hananel

The State College Centre Daily, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON - If Rep. Roy Blunt is chosen the new House majority leader, it will be in large part because of his reputation as a consensus builder and a good listener.

Should colleagues pass him over for the No. 2 House post, the Missouri Republican can blame his close ties to former Majority Leader Tom DeLay and the desire for a clean break from controversy and scandal, according to members of Congress and other observers.

Clear divisions are already emerging in the camps that have committed to supporting Blunt or his main opponent for the position, Rep. John Boehner, R-Ohio. The election is expected early next month.

DOJ_NMG_0009327

As of Wednesday afternoon, Blunt had at least 62 publicly declared supporters while Boehner claimed more than 30 supporters. It takes 116 votes from GOP members to win the post.

"Roy is a Midwestern conservative," said Rep. Christopher Shays, R-Conn., a GOP moderate backing Blunt and a longtime critic of DeLay.

"He understands that a Republican in Connecticut is different than a Republican in Missouri and there needs to be room in our party for both," Shays said. "Roy has done a good job of reaching out to moderates and conservatives alike."

While DeLay, R-Texas, gave new meaning to the word "arm twisting," Blunt has taken a gentler approach to corralling the votes needed to pass legislation. He has served as both majority whip and majority leader since DeLay was forced aside to face money laundering charges, and the experience could give Blunt an edge in the race against Boehner.

"Roy Blunt has been enormously effective for two reasons: He has a servant's heart and he listens. Both are prerequisites for leadership," said Sen. Jim Talent, R-Mo.

Rep. Jo Ann Emerson, R-Mo., praised Blunt's performance filling in for DeLay. Despite a rocky start, he was able to push through controversial measures to cut the budget and trim spending.

"Roy did a very good job in very difficult circumstances, having to do both his whip job and be temporary majority leader," Emerson said. "He's an excellent consensus builder and he's able to work well with all of the different factions within our conference."

But some members want something else. Rep. Anne Northup, R-Ky., who is backing Boehner in the race, wants to send voters a message that Congress is cleaning house.

"When all the same people are at the leadership table, patterns develop, deferences occur," Northup said. "And John Boehner has been out of that circle, and I think he will bring fresh ideas and a fresh perspective and shake that up."

That perspective is catching on after disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff pleaded guilty last week to federal charges in a congressional corruption investigation. Investigators are now focused on several members of Congress and their aides, including a former aide to DeLay.

Blunt's rise in the leadership ranks is closely tied to DeLay and his own connections to Abramoff or his clients could derail his leadership bid. Blunt spokeswoman Burson Taylor says all the congressman's dealings with lobbyists were ethical.

"For Blunt, DeLay is both an asset and a liability," said Stuart Rothenberg, an independent political analyst in Washington. "DeLay empowered Blunt and Blunt was clearly his guy and was loyal to DeLay. But at the same time, he kind of carries the aroma of DeLay, and some people might want to put on a whole new scent."

When Boehner was elected to the House 15 years ago, he championed ethics reform amid a scandal involving the House bank and Democrats. He became part of the Republican leadership when the GOP gained a majority in 1994, but was ousted four years later in an internal party struggle.

Yet Boehner, too, is linked closely to lobbyists. In 1995, he was criticized for handing out campaign checks from the tobacco industry to colleagues on the House floor.

The two Republicans who began a petition last week calling for elections to replace DeLay - Reps. Jeff Flake of Arizona and Charlie Bass of New Hampshire - are now urging their colleagues not to endorse either candidate until they offer detailed reform plans to end the wave of corruption.

Blunt made that pitch when he officially launched his candidacy Sunday. He pledged to "regain the trust and confidence of our constituents by enacting new lobbying reforms and enhanced penalties."

But Flake is already expressing doubts about Blunt's commitment to reform. Flake wants to end the practice known as "earmarking" - inserting costly local projects into big spending bills.

Flake said Boehner's has a great record because he opposes earmarks.

"There's a stark contrast between him and Blunt on that regard," Flake said. "Blunt is a champion of earmarks."

New Majority Leader Election Date Rejected (AP)

By Andrew Taylor

The Associated Press, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON -- House Republican leaders Wednesday rejected calls to move up the election of a new majority leader to replace Tom DeLay before President Bush's State of the Union address Jan. 31. Rep. Roy Blunt claimed more than half the votes needed to win, even as a potential new candidate, John Shadegg, R-Ariz., publicly weighed a run.

Speaker Dennis Hastert decided Wednesday to stick with a Feb. 2 caucus election scheduled after DeLay, facing trial in Texas on charges of laundering campaign funds, said last weekend he would not try to regain the job.

Supporters of Missouri Rep. Blunt, currently the No. 3 Republican in the House as party whip, had called this week for holding the election before the House reconvenes Jan. 31. Blunt, who has been acting as majority leader since DeLay's indictment, is seeking election to the job in a race against Ohio Rep. John Boehner, chairman of the House Education and the Workforce Committee.

At the same time, some House Republicans are pressing for more sweeping changes in their leadership. Rep. John Sweeney, R-N.Y., is drafting a petition calling for elections for several junior leadership posts. Every position but Hastert's would be at stake.

"There ought to be a full review and commitment by those who present themselves as leaders to a new agenda so we can re-instill the confidence of the American people," said Sweeney.

Sweeney's maneuver reflects sentiment among some rank and file Republicans such as Mary Bono and Dan Lungren of California and Jeff Flake of Arizona for new faces at the leadership table. Simply replacing DeLay is not enough, Bono says.

"The problem people are seeing is they want new leadership and that's not offering enough new leadership," said Bono.

In a separate bid to recover the GOP's standing with voters in the wake of a lobbying scandal, Hastert has suggested banning privately funded congressional trips, a senior Republican lawmaker said Wednesday.

Rep. David Dreier, R-Calif., said GOP leaders were "seriously considering" the need to eliminate all privately financed travel. "That would be a very strong statement. We want to be bold," said Dreier, chairman of the House Rules Committee.

In the leadership race, Blunt claims to have more support than Boehner has. But with many Republicans undecided and some calling for a third alternative, and Rep. John Shadegg, R-Ariz., has conspicuously declined to take himself out of the running.

"I am very definitely still considering (a run)," Shadegg said. "I've come to the conclusion we need significant change."

Sixty-two lawmakers are publicly supporting Blunt and 34 are supporting Boehner according to tallies released by the rival campaigns. Both say they have additional supporters who have not approved disclosure of their names. It would take 116 votes to claim the post.

DeLay, who had tried to get the election delayed until February in hopes that he would be tried and acquitted in a Texas court by then, announced last Saturday he would not seek re-election. He made the announcement after several Republicans expressed concerns about his ties to lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who pleaded guilty last week to three federal felony charges related to congressional influence peddling.

U.S. House Republicans Set Majority Leader Election On Feb. 2 (BLOOM)

By Laura Litvan

Bloomberg, January 12, 2006

Jan. 11 (Bloomberg) -- U.S. House Republicans set an election to replace Tom DeLay as majority leader for Feb. 2, two days after President George W. Bush's annual State of the Union address.

House Republicans will meet that day at 1 p.m. to hold their first contested leadership elections since 1998. Representative Roy Blunt of Missouri and John Boehner of Ohio are both vying for the majority leader job and a third candidate -- John Shadegg of Arizona -- has indicated he might join the race.

``I think he's looking at it very seriously," said Representative Charles Bass, a New Hampshire Republican, who said he talked to Shadegg today.

DeLay stepped aside from the leadership post in September after being indicted by a Texas grand jury on money laundering charges. On Jan. 7 Delay said he wouldn't try to return to the post even if his trial ends in an acquittal. His announcement last week set off the race to replace him.

DOJ_NMG_0009329

Blunt, who has served as acting majority leader since late September, has lined up 56 Republicans who support his election as majority leader, his aides said. Boehner, the chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, has been endorsed by more than 30 lawmakers, his aides said.

House Speaker Dennis Hastert said Saturday that the election would be held the week of Jan. 30. Some House Republicans, including Representative Clay Shaw of Florida, had urged Hastert to call Republicans back to Congress earlier. In a letter to Hastert this week, Shaw and four other Florida Republicans said the elections might ``overshadow" Bush's speech.

Across-the-Board Votes On House GOP Leaders Sought (LAT)

By Mary Curtius

The Los Angeles Times, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — Rank-and-file House Republicans on Wednesday launched a push to require every member of their leadership but Speaker J. Dennis Hastert to face elections for their posts Feb. 2, saying the step was necessary to convince the public that the party was serious about ethics and lobbying reform.

Rep. John E. Sweeney (R-N.Y.) planned to start circulating a petition as early as Wednesday night asking for broad elections. The move underscored many House Republicans' belief that their leaders needed to do more to respond to the unfolding corruption scandal involving former lobbyist Jack Abramoff, if the party was going to keep its congressional majority in the November elections.

Only days ago, House Republicans appeared set to hold a single election to replace Tom DeLay, who had resigned as majority leader, the No. 2 leadership position in the House. DeLay has been indicted in Texas on campaign finance-related charges unrelated to the Abramoff case.

But under Sweeney's petition, House Republicans would hold elections for five leadership posts in addition to picking a successor to DeLay as majority leader.

"Most of this year, I have felt like our leadership needed new people at the table," said Rep. Anne M. Northup (R-Ky.), a conservative who normally is supportive of the leadership. "The fact is that they are tired."

She added: "I have not seen evidence of our leadership being able to stand up to special interests. I think it is important that every person in leadership is on the spot and has to convey to us why they should continue in leadership."

Republican concerns about the fallout from the lobbying scandal also echoed through the race to replace DeLay.

So far it has been a two-way competition between DeLay's hand-picked successor, Rep. Roy Blunt (R-Mo.), and Rep. John A. Boehner (R-Ohio), chairman of the House Education and the Workforce Committee.

Rep. John Shadegg (R-Ariz.) was said by lawmakers to be close to announcing that he would also run for majority leader, urged on by members who feared that Blunt and Boehner were too closely tied to DeLay.

"I've talked to Shadegg a number of times," said Rep. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.). "We'd all benefit if he runs…. I think he is leaning in that direction."

DeLay stepped down from the majority leader post in September after a Texas grand jury indicted him on money-laundering charges. He had hoped to clear up the Texas charges and regain his leadership job, but that ambition was dashed when Abramoff pleaded guilty this month to attempting to bribe and corrupt members of Congress. Three former senior DeLay staffers were implicated in the federal case.

Rank-and-file House Republicans circulated a petition demanding that a permanent successor to DeLay be elected, a move that forced DeLay's decision last weekend not to try to reclaim his leadership position.

Encouraged by their success, a coalition of conservative and moderate Republican lawmakers was "emboldened to talk about things that have been bothering them for a long time" and to push for broader and deeper ethics reforms, said one Republican lawmaker, speaking on the condition of anonymity because of the political sensitivity of the issue.

Hastert (R-Ill.) has scrambled to respond. He has announced he will push for new ethics rules and restrictions on lobbyists when Congress returns Jan. 31 from its winter recess.

Ron Bonjean, Hastert's press secretary, declined to respond Wednesday to the move to seek broad leadership elections.

DOJ_NMG_0009330

For the time being, lawmakers and political analysts said, Hastert's position as speaker is thought to be secure, although he too had ties to Abramoff. Hastert sent a letter to Interior Secretary Gale A. Norton in June 2003, asking that she block a casino that Abramoff's tribal clients thought would threaten their own casino profits.

Just days before Hastert wrote to Norton, tribes represented by Abramoff contributed more than $20,000 to Hastert's political action committee.

"My instinct is that he's safe, but what you're starting to pick up is a new dynamic that's surfaced … for the first time," said Mike Franc, director of government relations for the Heritage Foundation, a conservative think tank. "There is a growing desire on the part of the rank-and-file membership to have a fresh beginning — a sense that you have to do something that is a clean break from the previous practices."

Rep. David Dreier (R-San Dimas), charged by Hastert with putting together a lobbying rules reform package, said one measure under consideration would put restrictions on the so-called revolving door of lawmakers and their staffers leaving Congress to take lobbying positions and then returning to lobby Congress.

Another measure under consideration would end the widespread practice of allowing private groups to fund congressional trips. Political MoneyLine, a nonprofit organization that tracks money in politics, says that private organizations have spent about $20 million in the last five years on trips for members of Congress.

Hastert and other members have in the past defended the practice, saying it saves taxpayers money and helps educate lawmakers about important issues. But trips are being scrutinized by federal investigators as one way that lobbyists and other groups seek to unduly influence members of Congress. One trip that has received media attention is DeLay's sojourn with Abramoff to a luxury golf resort in Scotland in 2000.

Some members said that simply banning such trips did not address the root cause of the GOP's problem as the party prepares to face voters in November: a leadership that, in their view, has allowed ethics problems to go unanswered for too long.

Northup, the Kentucky lawmaker, said she called for all members of the leadership except Hastert to stand for election during a conference call Hastert held with Republican lawmakers Monday.

Rep. Dan Lungren (R-Gold River) said he had worked out the language of the election petition with Sweeney, and would help him seek the 50 signatures it takes to call a meeting of House Republicans to vote on holding broad elections.

"This is really coming to a head because of the Abramoff stuff," Lungren said. "I'm not suggesting there is a single member of the current leadership or a single staffer of the current leadership who has involvement with him, but we need to do our due diligence."

Lungren said Republicans could not afford to elect another majority leader who might, in a few weeks, face accusations that he was closely tied to Abramoff.

Even if 50 members sign the petition, Lungren acknowledged, it is far from a forgone conclusion that a majority of Republican House members would agree to broaden the elections beyond replacing DeLay.

"Obviously, there are those who would not like to see this go forward," Lungren said. "They would like to presume that we don't need to do this … but we need to show voters that we confront this issue."

Texas Redistricting Is One More Hurdle For DeLay (NYT)

By Rick Lyman

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

HOUSTON, Jan. 11 - Representative Tom DeLay is in the toughest re-election campaign of his 11-term House career, a battle that might be decided not only by his legal problems, but also by the Congressional redistricting plan he spearheaded in 2003.

The redistricting led to the loss of six Democratic seats in Texas in 2004, but it also shifted thousands of Democratic voters to strong Republican districts. Among those, Mr. DeLay's 22nd District added several Democratic-leaning parts of Galveston County; several political analysts estimate they may have raised the district's Democratic vote around 5 percent.

"There is huge irony here," said Richard Murray, a University of Houston political scientist. "Six Democrats in Congress were eliminated, but the seventh victim may turnout to be the author of the plan."

DOJ_NMG_0009331

Should Mr. DeLay survive, as expected, a March 7 primary challenge by three Republican opponents, in November he will face a former Democratic congressman, Nick Lampson, whose district once included those parts of Galveston County now in Mr. DeLay's district.

Mr. Lampson lost his seat in 2004 when his district, the Second, was reconfigured into a Republican-dominated one. He moved into the 22nd District last April, he said, with the intention of taking on Mr. DeLay.

"I'm not running against him because he took my district," Mr. Lampson said, seated in a two-room suite of campaign offices in Clear Lake. "I'm running against him because I think I was a better member of Congress than he was, and I can be again."

Mr. DeLay, who has been a regular presence in the district in recent weeks, paused on his way out of a speech to the Rotary Club of Pasadena South to reflect on the race ahead.

"Of course, it's going to be a tough race," he said, spinning in his right palm a silver dollar a constituent had just given him as a good-luck piece. "The entire Democratic machine has come down here from all over the country after me."

Local Republican leaders play down the chances that Mr. DeLay will be defeated in a district that remains predominantly Republican.

"The only people who consider this possible are clearly delusional," said Eric Thode, Republican chairman in Mr. DeLay's home county of Fort Bend. "It's not a competitive district. It's not even an issue."

Without question, Mr. DeLay has had a rough patch.

Indicted by a Travis County grand jury in September for state campaign finance law violations, he was forced to step down from his post as House majority leader temporarily. Next, a longtime political associate, Jack Abramoff, was indicted, then pleaded guilty last week to public corruption charges under an agreement to cooperate with federal prosecutors. Mr. DeLay, who failed to have his own case expedited, permanently resigned as majority leader on Saturday, saying he did not want his travails to become a distraction for the party.

Now, he will be running for re-election while standing trial in Austin on money laundering charges in a case over campaign financing that Mr. DeLay paints as politically motivated. Meanwhile, Washington waits to see what other indictments might flow from the Abramoff scandal.

"I think there is a 50-50 chance DeLay won't even be in the race in November," said Calvin C. Jillson, a political scientist at Southern Methodist University in Dallas.

If he does stay in the race - and Mr. DeLay insists he will - he has the demographics of the 22nd District to bolster him.

"Despite everything, it's extremely difficult to dislodge Tom DeLay in a district with such a strong Republican base and a strong, straight-ticket Republican voting trend," said Ted Delisi, a Republican strategist in Austin.

Yet the district has changed since 2003, and not in Mr. DeLay's favor. Running in the reconfigured district for the first time in 2004, Mr. DeLay won handily, but with a smaller margin than in previous elections: 55 percent compared with his Democratic opponent's 41 percent.

The district spreads across the southern rim of the Houston metroplex, from Galveston through the southern Houston suburbs of Harris County and into more rural Brazoria County and Fort Bend County, which includes Mr. DeLay's hometown of Sugar Land.

"I am sure the Democrats are going to pour money into this race," said Jared Woodfill, the Harris County Republican chairman. "But I think the congressman is going to be successful in March and in November. What is different this cycle is that people on both sides have started working harder and earlier."

Mr. DeLay is opposed in the Republican primary by Michael Fjetland, who has run against him before; Pat Baig, a former teacher and political novice; and Tom Campbell, a Houston lawyer who lives in Sugar Land and served in Washington as general counsel to the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration during the administration of the first President Bush.

Supporters of Mr. DeLay portray Mr. Fjetland and Ms. Baig as mischief-makers with little financing. Mr. Campbell, the latest entrant, appears to have solid credentials as a conservative Republican and promises to raise $400,000 to fight Mr. DeLay over the next two months.

DOJ_NMG_0009332

"He seems like a decent enough guy," Mr. Woodfill said of Mr. Campbell, "but the fact is he has not been active in the party. And he hasn't got much time to mount a serious campaign."

Mr. Campbell said that his outsider status would help him with voters weary of Mr. DeLay's hard-knuckled politics.

"Congressman DeLay has employed an 'ends justified the means' approach and, somewhere along the way, has cut corners and engaged in ethical lapses," Mr. Campbell said before a campaign event at a Houston law firm Wednesday. "This is an uphill battle, but Tom DeLay has been kind enough to come part way down the hill."

The general election in November is further complicated by the emergence of another former congressman, Steve Stockman, an ardently conservative Republican who also once represented a part of what is now the 22nd District. Mr. Stockman has said he may run as an independent, a move Republican leaders fear might cost Mr. DeLay votes.

Wade Webster, a Republican precinct chairman in Clear Lake, said he thought the party would stand behind Mr. DeLay, for now.

"It's going to be tougher, yes, with all the bad publicity and the innuendos and what-not," he said. "Until something more definitive comes out, I'm supporting him. But I retain the option to change my mind."

Democrats, meanwhile, happily cite polls suggesting that Mr. DeLay is in jeopardy and insist that his problems will undermine him in the district, even if it is Republican.

In a poll for The Houston Chronicle last March, for instance, 40 percent of the respondents in Mr. DeLay's district said their opinion of him had dropped in the previous year. And a USA Today/Gallup poll in early December showed Mr. DeLay with a favorability rating of just 37 percent, and had him losing to an unnamed Democratic opponent 49 percent to 36 percent.

Mr. DeLay and his supporters question the polls' methodologies and say his support is significantly stronger. "We have our own internal polls showing us doing much better," Mr. DeLay said, flipping that silver dollar.

He paused and held up the dollar between his thumb and index finger.

"Am I allowed to keep this?" he asked. "What do you think? Am I allowed to keep this?"

Houston TV Stations Withhold Ads Attacking DeLay (REU-Y2)

By Jeff Franks

Reuters, January 12, 2006

Several Houston television stations withheld a political ad on Wednesday accusing U.S. Rep. Tom DeLay of corruption after a lawyer for the former House majority leader said the ad was false and could lead to legal action.

The ad, sponsored by public interest groups Campaign for America's Future and Public Campaign Action Fund, calls for DeLay to resign because of his indictment in Texas on campaign finance charges and his links to disgraced Washington lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

"All four of the major broadcast stations (in Houston) contacted to air the ad, as well as Time Warner cable, have stated they either will not run the ad or will keep it off the air for further review," according to a statement sent out by DeLay's office.

Some of the stations said during their newscasts they were looking at the ad to determine its credibility or that they had found some of the allegations to be questionable. The ad was supposed to run for a week, starting on Wednesday.

In a letter to the stations, DeLay attorney Donald McGahn said the ad was "reckless, malicious and false, casting Mr. DeLay in a false light by accusing him of unsubstantiated criminal conduct. Such accusations are actionable."

"We demand that you refuse or otherwise cease airing the advertisement, so as to avoid any liability," the letter said.

Public Campaign Action Fund national campaigns director David Donnelly said DeLay was trying to prevent people in his Houston-area district from knowing what "he's up to with corrupt lobbyists in Washington."

"When powerful lawmakers corrupt the political process and get caught, they often try to bully the media to try to prevent them from doing their job," he said in a statement.

Despite the menacing language in the letter, DeLay spokeswoman Shannon Flaherty said McGahn was not threatening to sue the television stations, although at least one of them reported he was.

DOJ_NMG_0009333

Abramoff sent shock waves through Washington last week when he pleaded guilty to fraud charges and admitted giving lavish gifts and trips to lawmakers in return for special treatment. He has agreed to cooperate with prosecutors investigating corruption in Congress.

DeLay, who received campaign contributions from Abramoff and associates over the years, has described the lobbyist as a good friend.

After Abramoff's guilty plea, DeLay announced he was giving up trying to regain his position as House majority leader, which is the second most powerful Republican in the House of Representatives.

He stepped down from the post in September after he was indicted in Texas on charges of conspiracy and money laundering linked to campaign contributions raised by his Texans for a Republican Majority political action committee for the 2002 Texas Legislature elections. DeLay has denied any wrongdoing.

Survey Highlights Employees' Hankering For Training (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

Most federal employees like their jobs and even more are motivated by pride in their work, but almost half would like additional training to improve their job performance, according to preliminary results of a survey by the Merit Systems Protection Board.

Nearly 37,000 full-time government employees from 24 agencies participated in the survey, conducted last year. A summary of the findings appears in this month's Issues of Merit newsletter, published by the board's office of policy and evaluation, headed by Steve Nelson .

Although 64 percent of survey respondents said they have received sufficient training to do their jobs, 46 percent said they would like additional training so that they can improve on their work.

A huge majority, 81 percent, said the extra career development should be financed by their agencies and provided through formal training sessions. Slightly fewer, 77 percent, supported on-the-job developmental programs, the newsletter said.

Still, only 33 percent indicated that they had used career development plans to alert supervisors to their training expectations. Only 48 percent saw their supervisors as providing opportunities to improve their skills and performance, the survey found.

"These results suggest that better communication between employees and their agencies may be necessary if federal employees are to receive the training they need," the newsletter said.

In the MSPB survey, 71 percent of the employees said they liked their jobs, and 98 percent said they took pride in their work.

Interestingly, only 60 percent said they think their jobs are secure, possibly a sign that efforts to reduce federal spending and contract out work might be changing perceptions about federal employment. In the survey, 57 percent of rank-and-file employees and 62 percent of supervisors said their offices had been downsized in the past five years.

About 70 percent of survey respondents said they would be motivated by a hypothetical cash award of $1,000 or increased chances of promotion. Only 40 percent said they were satisfied with the recognition and awards they receive, and 61 percent said they were satisfied with their pay, according to the newsletter.

The MSPB findings, for the most part, appear in line with other recent surveys.

A 2004 report from the Office of Personnel Management found 55 percent of employees were satisfied with the training they had received for their current jobs. But only 35 percent of the employees were satisfied with their opportunities to get a better job, and only 40 percent told OPM that they were satisfied with the policies and practices of their senior leaders.New Leader for Postmasters

Dale Goff , the postmaster in Covington, La., has been elected president of the National Association of Postmasters.

He began his career 36 years ago as a postal assistant in New Orleans and has served as a postmaster for 26 years. He has served as Louisiana state president and as national secretary-treasurer with the association, which represents the interests of about 42,000 postmasters, postal officers and retirees in Congress and at postal headquarters.

DOJ_NMG_0009334

Goff and his wife, Becky, have moved to Alexandria, where the association has its main office. He succeeds Wally Olihovik , who served for four years.New AU Program Chief

Robert M. Tobias has been named director of public service executive education programs at American University's School of Public Affairs.

He will lead the Key Executive program, which allows federal managers and executives to earn a master of public administration degree. Tobias will continue to head AU's Institute for the Study of Public Policy Implementation, one of the sponsors of the "Best Places to Work in the Federal Government" rankings.

Tobias, a former president of the National Treasury Employees Union, has served on the Internal Revenue Service Oversight Board. He is a member of the National Academy of Public Administration.

Applications are being accepted for the Key Executive program, and the university will host an open house at 6 p.m. today. For information, call Jacqueline McLaughlin Linde , an assistant dean, at 202-885-6248.

The Reliable Source (WP)

By Amy Argetsinger and Roxanne Roberts

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

HEY, ISN'T THAT . . . ?

Vice President Cheney and Don Rumsfeld at Clyde's of Gallery Place on Tuesday night. The veep and defense secretary took their wives to a Department of Defense dinner at the recently opened branch of the restaurant, creating quite the security fuss in Chinatown -- many black sedans, men with earpieces. Upstairs in the private Piedmont Room, they nibbled on hors d'oeuvres (crab cakes, smoked salmon and dim sum) and then enjoyed Maryland crab soup and New York strip steaks.

Army Is Poised To Kill Spy-Plane Effort (WSJ)

By Jonathan Karp

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2006

The U.S. Army is poised to cancel a Lockheed Martin Corp. spy-plane program valued at as much as $8 billion, in the face of competing budget priorities and problems in the aircraft's development, according to industry and government officials.

The Army suspended funding for the Aerial Common Sensor surveillance plane in September as a result of concerns about the plane's cost and size, and asked Lockheed to offer alternative solutions. People familiar with the program said the Army is expected to announce the ACS's termination as early as today, the end of a 60-day period during which Pentagon officials reviewed Lockheed's four proposals.

The decision would also be a blow to Lockheed's main partner in the program, Empresa Brasileira de Aeronautica SA, or Embraer, the Brazilian aircraft company hoping to break into the U.S. defense market.

Spokespeople for the Army, Lockheed and Embraer declined to comment, saying they hadn't been informed of a final decision about the spy-plane program. It is unclear whether the Army will seek to preserve some of the technology developed for the program for future use.

The likely demise of the spy-plane program, valued at up to $8 billion over several years, underscores the complexity of Pentagon efforts to transform the way it develops weapons. The battlefield surveillance and eavesdropping plane was meant to serve the Army and the Navy, with the underlying premise that creating a joint-service program would bolster its support inside the Pentagon and on Capitol Hill. But it proved difficult to reconcile the two services' missions and equipment specifications at the cost that Lockheed originally proposed.

Given the Pentagon's budget pressures amid the military operations in Iraq, the Navy's increasing ambivalence toward the Army-led spy plane and inevitable program delays and cost increases, the Army concluded it was a losing battle. "In the big scheme of things, ACS loses out," said an Army official. "Anytime you have a wounded weapons program, the sharks circle." The Army's head of acquisitions recommended canceling the program in December, but Army Secretary Francis Harvey decided to extend the review by a month, this official said.

Lockheed, based in Bethesda, Md., the U.S.'s biggest defense contractor by sales, has conceded it made mistakes in projecting weight, power and technical issues for the proposed spy plane. It has been scrambling for months to salvage the program, which unraveled with unusual speed for a company that has supplied the Pentagon with surveillance, combat and cargo planes for decades.

DOJ_NMG_0009335

In August 2004, Lockheed beat out Northrop Grumman Corp. and won an $879 million initial-development contract for the spy plane by proposing a modified version of an Embraer 50-seat passenger jet. As it became clear that the array of sensors and radar would make the plane too heavy to fly, Lockheed proposed switching to a larger Embraer airframe or a modified business jet made by Canadian plane maker Bombardier Inc. In November, it also proposed to strip some equipment out of the original Embraer plane or to keep working on the electronics.

Army officials say the need for battlefield surveillance and eavesdropping remains a priority. The service is expected to focus on upgrading aging propeller-driven planes that perform the task under a contract led by Northrop.

Endless Probe, Secret Result (USAT)

USA Today, January 12, 2006

Washington investigations, especially those by independent counsels, can roll on for years, eating taxpayer dollars long after their original purpose has been achieved.

So it is with the investigation of former Housing secretary Henry Cisneros, now in its 11th year.

Cisneros, accused of paying hush money to an ex-mistress and misleading officials about it, pleaded guilty in 1999 to lying to the FBI and was fined $10,000. His former paramour and others pleaded guilty to charges of bank fraud and making false statements. President Clinton, on his last day in office, pardoned Cisneros and the woman.

The independent counsel law has expired. Clinton and Cisneros are on to new careers. But the investigation, which has cost $22 million since David Barrett was appointed independent counsel in 1995, isn't officially over. The reason isn't known. Barrett says only that the investigation was extended to explore accusations that attempts had been made to obstruct the investigation and related misconduct. Several news organizations, citing anonymous sources, have reported that those accusations involve the Internal Revenue Service and the Justice Department. Barrett's report was completed by August 2004, but it has been sealed by a special federal court that oversees independent counsels. Lawyers for people named in it have filed more than 140 motions to keep their clients from being identified publicly.

In October, the court announced it would release the full report only to some members of Congress. But legislators from both sides of the aisle demanded that the entire report be made public.

The problem is the court could still black out large portions to protect the privacy of those named. Some in Congress, particularly Sen. Chuck Grassley, R-Iowa, worry that IRS abuses could go unexposed. "The American taxpayers have spent a lot of money on this report, and they deserve the right to see it," Grassley says.

We agree. So does Barrett, whose office will close after the report's imminent release.

It seems obvious now that Barrett's investigation, like so many others, took too long, cost too much and achieved too little. But at least those failings were the result of honorable intentions: to expose and punish corruption by public officials.

Burying his report now serves no such noble goal. Instead, it would give wrong-doers even more reason to believe they can abuse the public's trust, confident that their actions would be hidden from the public's view.

Credit Where It's Due (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2006

Perhaps Dustin Hoffman's rich adviser had it right when he pronounced in "The Graduate" that the future is in "plastics." Last year the credit card industry handled more than $2 trillion in consumer transactions and gobbled up nearly $30 billion in fees, according to the Nilson Report newsletter on the credit card industry. These fees are now the source of mounting angst among retailers, which have launched 47 antitrust lawsuits against the credit card companies for alleged collusion in setting these fees.

Retailers have also rushed to Washington demanding that Congress impose a de facto price cap on credit card charges -- as Australia and the European Union have already done. This campaign against credit card fees and the clamor for price controls sound eerily familiar. A few years ago dim-witted politicians employed price controls to try to limit fees for using ATMs. In localities where that was tried, the result was not lower fees, but fewer ATMs, and thus much less convenience for customers.

DOJ_NMG_0009336

Once upon a time, credit cards were the playthings of the rich. But today credit (and debit) cards are a ubiquitous feature of the U.S. economy, with three of four adults owning either credit or debit cards as America moves closer to becoming a "cashless society." Certainly the shift toward plastic payments suggests the industry is satisfying its customers.

The controversy surrounds the way Visa and MasterCard and their issuing banks make money -- which is by collecting what is called an "interchange fee" from merchants. This fee averages about 1.75% of the sales price of the good or service purchased. The average convenience store paid $31,000 in interchange fees in 2004 -- a figure approaching the average per-store pretax profit of $36,000. The retailers say this charge is a "hidden transaction tax on consumers."

This complaint ignores the value added that the credit card company provides. Consumers benefit in an obvious way: They don't have to carry around wads of cash, because the credit card bank essentially holds the funds for them. Retailers benefit too: They don't have to deal with cash transactions, which minimize theft at the cash register. They receive a guaranteed payment from the bank that issues the credit card (i.e., no bounced checks). Most importantly, they lure customers into their stores by accepting a credit card of choice. If the retailers didn't think these benefits exceeded the costs of the interchange fee, they could simply refuse to accept credit cards at the register.

That said, many small retailers operate on thin profit margins and there does appears to be some merit to their complaint that credit card fees have risen above the levels one would expect in a perfectly competitive market. Interchange fees in the U.S. are among the highest in the world.

These fees, according to a recent study by economists at the Federal Reserve Bank of Kansas City, have also been paradoxically trending upward in recent years when the industry's costs due to technology and economies of scale have been falling. But these rising interchange fees have also corresponded with lower annual fees charged to cardholders and increasingly lucrative incentive packages to entice shoppers to pay with plastic: cash back rewards, airline frequent flyer miles, and even exotic benefits like free "concierge service" to get tee times on the golf course.

We're all in favor of more competition to drive down interchange fees. But the argument retailers are making that this industry operates as a cartel is highly unpersuasive. There are five major competitors in the credit/debit card market aggressively vying for customers: Visa, MasterCard, American Express, Discover, and the newest player, Star.

Meanwhile, mega-retailers such as Wal-Mart and Sears are using their market power to cut separate deals with credit card companies to lower their interchange fees. Wal-Mart and Target also want to establish their own banks so they can reduce interchange fees. Federal regulators should welcome this development.

Another merchant recourse is to offer price discounts to customers who pay cash. Retailers could also band together and start their own credit card competitor to Visa and MasterCard. Antitrust laws have typically winced at this kind of relationship, but in this case the Justice Department should consider that such arrangements could lower costs to consumers and foster competition.

The worst option is the one retailers seek most fervently: price controls. We now have several years of evidence from Australia and other nations that have gone this route. Studies indicate that lower retail prices haven't materialized. Instead, retailers have mostly pocketed the savings, while Visa and other card companies have withdrawn the popular rebates and bonus awards while increasing the annual fees they charge to card holders.

In other words, consumers were the losers, which is what inevitably occurs when governments intervene in markets that aren't broken. That's why Congress and the courts should keep their paws off this industry and let the market give credit, where credit is due.

OTHER NEWS:

World Economy Expanding (USAT)

By David J. Lynch

USA Today, January 12, 2006

If things go according to plan, the world economy will chug along nicely through the new year.

That would be comforting news if things ever did go according to plan.

DOJ_NMG_0009337

Actually, 2006 could see plenty of nasty surprises. For one thing, the world economy, though expanding, is dangerously imbalanced. The resulting U.S. current account deficit — reflecting the gap between the nation's ravenous appetite for imports and its anemic savings — is now at levels that many experts fear could trigger a run on the dollar, soaring interest rates and global economic pain.

Meanwhile, investment is pouring into risky emerging markets as if the past decade's turmoil in Argentina, Turkey, Thailand and Russia never happened.

And all that stands between a barrel of oil and a triple-digit price tag is a strike in Nigeria, unrest in Venezuela or revolution in Saudi Arabia.

For all that, both the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank expect solid global growth of 3.2% this year, about the same as in 2005.

If prognosticators seem sanguine, perhaps it's because many of the same warning signals flashed red one year ago, and yet, the economy still barreled ahead, even overcoming epic natural disasters.

"2005 was a year that has lulled a lot of investors, policymakers and government officials into a dangerous and false sense of complacency," says Stephen Roach, chief economist for Morgan Stanley in New York.

Terror attacks. A trade war with China. Even a historic epidemic of potentially lethal "bird flu." There's no end to the list of potential economic catastrophes that could arise this year.

But three dangers — mushrooming global imbalances, vulnerable emerging markets and volatile oil prices — seem especially noteworthy.

To many economists, the swollen U.S. current account deficit looms as the biggest potential hazard. In a nutshell, the United States spends too much and saves too little, and Asia saves too much and spends too little. (Moribund Europe doesn't do enough of either.)

No one knows for certain when the day of reckoning will come. But Roach, and many others, say the USA and the world cannot go on like this indefinitely.

"There are significant downside risks to the global economy … financial markets right now are not pricing in any of these risks," warns Nouriel Roubini, a former White House economist in the Clinton administration who runs the influential www.rgemonitor.com website.

Last year, the U.S. financed its excessive spending by selling almost $800 billion worth of Treasury securities to foreign central banks and investors.

At 6.4% of total economic output, that's an unprecedented level for a major economy. The U.S. is able to get away with such profligacy largely because the dollar plays a uniquely central role in global commerce.

But here's how a crisis could unfold: If foreigners conclude the dollar was headed for a fall because of the enormous U.S. deficit, they would cut back on purchases of U.S. debt. To entice them to buy, the Federal Reserve would have to raise interest rates, perhaps significantly. Higher interest rates could choke off economic growth, even as the falling dollar ignited inflation by boosting the prices of imported goods.

In 2005, the dollar defied predictions of an inevitable decline. But it is unlikely to keep doing so, according to Roubini.

The greenback benefited last year from a one-time change in U.S. tax law that encouraged companies to repatriate foreign profits and from the Fed's rate increases.

The tax provision has expired, and the Fed is believed to be near the end of its monetary tightening.

"Our ability to finance ourselves depends upon the willingness of foreign central banks to hold dollars. That willingness is going to be shrinking (this) year," Roubini says.

Even under optimistic assumptions, once the crisis hits, the economic pain in the USA could be like nothing the country has suffered in decades.

An abrupt end to the USA's ability to obtain sufficient foreign financing could send the dollar into free fall, cutting 21% to 28% from its value, according to research by Sebastian Edwards, a professor at UCLA's Anderson School of Management. That would increase the price of a $21,000 foreign-made sedan to almost $27,000, unless dealers opted to absorb the blow.

DOJ_NMG_0009338

In the first year, 3.6% to 5% would be slashed from per capita economic growth. That would almost certainly push the USA into recession, perhaps for several years, according to Edwards, who presented his findings at last summer's annual Federal Reserve conference in Jackson Hole, Wyo.

"Never in the history of modern economics has a large industrial country run persistent current account deficits of the magnitude posted by the U.S. since 2000."

Another danger might be brewing in the so-called emerging markets. Capital flows this year into developing nations in Latin America, Asia and Central Europe are expected to hit a record $345.2 billion, according to the Institute of International Finance. That surpasses the previous high set in 1996, just before the Asian financial crisis, and is up 62% in the past two years.

Emerging markets enthusiasts shrug off reminders of the euphoria-and-collapse cycles that hit Thailand in 1997, Russia in 1998, and Argentina in 2000. It's different this time, say firms such as JPMorgan. Countries, particularly in Latin America, have built up foreign-exchange reserves that should allow them to ride out any financial crisis and have introduced economic reforms that give their economies greater stability. Rather than depend on private capital flows from rich countries as they did in the 1990s, developing nations now rely on strong export industries.

Bond holders are so impressed that they regard emerging market securities as little riskier than U.S. Treasuries, according to the JPMorgan Emerging Markets Bond Index Global (EMBIG). In late 2002, investors demanded an additional 91/2 percentage points of yield as compensation for the risk involved in holding emerging markets bonds compared with U.S. Treasuries. Today, the spread on the EMBIG is down to little more than 2 percentage points.

But emerging markets also have had the economic winds at their back for the past couple of years. Strong global demand boosted commodity prices, a major help for soybean exporters such as Argentina and oil producers such as Venezuela. And U.S. interest rates were so low, yield-hungry investors — including normally cautious pension funds — were drawn into countries such as Brazil or Hungary.

Now, global growth is slowing, and U.S. rates are higher. "There's a lot to worry about," says Desmond Lachman of the American Enterprise Institute, who was among the first to warn of problems in Argentina before its historic default.

While no one is predicting a repeat of the problems that rocked half a dozen countries in the 1990s, emerging markets remain vulnerable to sharp changes in the global environment. If the dollar tanks, their surging exports would stall. Higher oil prices could deal them a double whammy, inflating their energy costs while depressing the economies of major customers.

Any unexpected mishap could cause the spreads between emerging market debt and U.S. securities to balloon, making it more expensive for corporations in developing countries to finance their operations, Lachman says.

Politics also might complicate the economic outlook, especially in Latin America. Elections are scheduled in eight countries this year, including presidential and legislative contests in Brazil and Mexico. The voting takes place amid a clear drift away from the free-market policies favored by the United States.

So far, little of this seems to be making an impression. "The markets seem to be pricing in close to zero probability of something going wrong," Barclays Capital wrote in a Dec. 8 note to clients.

One year ago, no one predicted twin hurricanes would wreck much of the U.S. Gulf Coast oil infrastructure, sparking gas shortages and soaring pump prices. But today, with oil prices at about $64 per barrel, it doesn't take much imagination to conjure up fresh scenarios of price jumps.

Spare oil supplies amount to 1.9 million barrels per day, down from more than 6 million a day three years ago. Any event that idles significant output for a prolonged period — political turmoil in Venezuela, revolution in Saudi Arabia, a general strike in Nigeria — would threaten the world economy.

"With spare production capacity so low, the market is particularly vulnerable to a supply shock," the World Bank said in its 2006 economic forecast.

If oil supplies were cut by 2 million barrels per day, prices would hit $90 a barrel this year and remain at $70 next year, according to the World Bank. The price spike would add 2.6 percentage points to the inflation rate, which is 2.1% now, and cut global growth in half.

DOJ_NMG_0009339

How likely is such a price spike? Goldman Sachs oil analyst Arjun Murti spooked markets in March with a forecast of a "super spike" taking oil prices as high as $105 per barrel. On Dec. 12, he reiterated that view in a note to clients, adding that "non-existent spare capacity" supported the prediction.

John Kingston, global director of oil for Platts, is more optimistic. He expects prices to ease this year with new producing wells in the Gulf of Mexico, Russia and Nigeria boosting the market's cushion.

Still, he frets that continued Iraqi turmoil could pinch. Daily exports there of 1.4 million barrels remain below prewar levels, according to Platts. Anti-U.S. insurgents last year mounted 96 attacks on the country's aging network of pipelines and production facilities, or one every four days. There is little reason to expect quick improvement.

"The spot that concerns me the most is Iraq, and not so much the insurgents," he says. "The oil industry there has been held together by spit and bailing wire. … It's antiquated and needs massive capital investment."

To those such as Roach, who are inclined to emphasize the risks that things won't go exactly as expected, the links between potential problems are the most worrisome element. The USA's fat current account deficit could sink the dollar. As it plummets, emerging markets' exports dry up and oil prices, which are denominated in dollars, rise. In no time, what starts as one country's difficulty becomes a global contagion.

"This is what we signed up for when we bought into globalization," Roach says. "The next global adjustment or downturn most likely will reverberate very quickly around the world with a speed we haven't seen before."

2006 Rally Keeps Chugging (WSJ)

By Scott Patterson

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2006

In another late-day surge, stocks pushed higher, overlooking an earnings gaff by chemical behemoth DuPont and a jump in oil prices.

Monday and Tuesday, stocks also rallied late in the day to finish near their highs. Such end-of-day spurts are typical of strong markets, analysts said.

"If you dissect periods where the market is rallying overall, you'll find an intraday pattern that starts out on the weak side and finishes with strength," said Kenneth Tower, chief market strategist at CyberTrader. "It's another positive for this market rally."

One pivot point for stocks Wednesday was the 11000 level on the Dow Jones Industrial Average. At the opening bell, the average dipped from yesterday's close of 11011.58 and tested 11000. It bounced higher, then slid once again. By the end of the day, the Dow average tested 11000 four times, and even dipped below it twice. After the fourth test, the industrials moved decisively higher and finished up by 31.86 points to 11043.44.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index added 4.49 points to 1294.18 and the Nasdaq Composite Index gained 11.04 to 2331.36.

Such action is created by new money flowing into the market on dips, analysts said. Each time the market declined, "we got a new wave of buying," said Peter Cardillo, chief market analyst at S.W. Bach. Zigzag patterns that end on a high note are a strong sign for stocks, he said, and could mean that "the bull is getting ready to stampede."

Despite the strong action, some market watchers remain concerned that investors are getting ahead of themselves. A slower-than-expected holiday season and high oil prices will ultimately catch up with stocks, they say, and the January rally "is going to end with a slow-motion slowdown," said Barry Ritholtz, chief market strategist at Ritholtz Capital Partners.

Investors have already looked past negative earnings news from two Dow components. Wednesday, shares of DuPont fell 3.3% after it cut its fourth-quarter earnings guidance8, citing disruptions in operations due to hurricanes Katrina and Rita. Tuesday, an earnings whiff by Alcoa, also a Dow component, nicked the average in early trading, losses it made up by the closing bell.

Treasury bonds declined Wednesday after an auction of $13 billion in five-year notes drew a poor response, with just 29% of the buyers coming from foreign bidders.

Crude-oil prices, down earlier, recently jumped 57 cents to $63.94 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange after the Energy Information Administration said crude-oil inventories fell more than expected last week.

DOJ_NMG_0009340

Investors also eyed comments by Timothy Geithner, head of the New York branch of the Federal Reserve. Mr. Geithner said the economy remains "remarkably stable" and that inflation, excluding food and energy, "has been quite moderate."

Last Tuesday, minutes from the Fed's December meeting indicated policy makers may be closer to winding up their 18-month rate-raising campaign sooner rather than later, which triggered a five-day rally that helped push the Dow industrials past 11000 for the first time since June 2001.

In major market action:

Stocks rose9. On the Big Board, where 1.7 billion shares traded, 1,896 stocks rose and 1,460 fell. On the Nasdaq Stock Market, where 2.4 billion shares traded, 1,544 rose and 1,479 declined.

Bonds slid10. The benchmark 10-year Treasury note slipped 8/32, or $2.50 for every $1,000 invested, to yield 4.401% Wednesday. The 30-year bond fell 14/32 to yield 4.642%. Yields move inversely to prices.

The dollar was mixed.11 It traded at 114.35 yen, up from 114.31 yen late Tuesday, while the euro rose to $1.2088 from $1.2068.

The Church Of GDP (WP)

By Robert J. Samuelson

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

What's the dominant religion of the past 100 years? The answer isn't Christianity with its 2.1 billion followers, or Islam with its 1.3 billion. It's the idea of economic growth, the Church of GDP. Countless countries have embraced rapid growth as a cure to their ills. Getting richer is now an almost universal craving. And yet the worship of growth inspires enormous ambivalence. It is widely seen -- especially in already wealthy societies -- as morally corrupting: the mindless pursuit of empty materialism (do flat-panel TVs really make us better off?) that drains life of spiritual meaning and also wrecks the environment.

Exactly wrong, says Benjamin Friedman.

Friedman, a Harvard economist, has written a hugely provocative book ("The Moral Consequences of Economic Growth") arguing that rapid growth is morally uplifting. "Economic growth -- meaning a rising standard of living for the clear majority of citizens -- more often than not fosters greater opportunity, tolerance of diversity, social mobility, commitment to fairness, and dedication to democracy," he writes. Further, the opposite is true. Poor growth feeds prejudice, class conflict and antidemocratic tendencies.

Look at history, he says. In the United States, exploding economic growth after World War II coincided with a broad expansion of rights for women, blacks and the poor. During the prosperous Progressive Era, from roughly 1895 to 1919, the "idea of mass high school education first took hold." In 1912 the federal government created a Children's Bureau to discourage child labor. The same year, Congress passed the 17th Amendment, switching the election of senators from state legislatures to popular vote. In 1919 it passed the 19th Amendment, giving women the vote.

Good times often played out similarly in Europe. From 1850 to 1870, Britain's per capita income rose 35 percent. In 1870 the government opened civil service jobs -- until then reserved "for candidates with family connections" -- to competitive testing. Comparable reforms broadened the military's officer corps. Religious tolerance improved; no longer was membership in the Church of England required to teach at Oxford and Cambridge. After the Franco-Prussian War of 1870, France also prospered: In 1875 it adopted universal male voting; in 1881 and 1882 it embraced compulsory schooling up to age 13.

Nazi Germany is, of course, the classic case of the converse: that growth's absence is morally destructive. From 1929 to 1932, German industrial production dropped 42 percent; in 1932 unemployment was 44 percent. The rest is history. Friedman offers other examples. The Ku Klux Klan (anti-Catholic and anti-Jewish as well as anti-black) flourished in the 1920s, which he describes as a period of disappointing growth.

People, Friedman argues, instinctively compare themselves to "two separate benchmarks: their own (or their family's) past experience, and how they see people around them living." When living standards rise rapidly, more people feel optimistic, unthreatened and tolerant. Friedman also cites Adam Smith's insight that commerce fosters trust, civility, mutual dependence and legal protections (contracts, property rights). Economic growth isn't mainly about greed and exploitation.

Case closed? Well, not exactly.

DOJ_NMG_0009341

One problem with Friedman is Friedman. His meticulous scholarship unearths much contrary evidence. In the United States, the Great Depression didn't diminish democracy; instead, it "fostered a broader commitment to opportunity and mobility for all citizens." Britain passed momentous reforms (unemployment insurance, old-age pensions) from 1908 to 1911, a period of weak growth. Among poorer countries, many (Chile, South Korea, China) first achieved rapid growth under authoritarian regimes, though Chile and South Korea are now democratic.

Friedman's view of the 1920s is also dubious. Agriculture aside, America was mainly prosperous. The KKK's strength reflected raw prejudice -- and perhaps a sense of a threat created by economic growth, which left farms and small towns behind.

Friedman has identified a tendency, not an iron law. Still, his moral case for economic growth is solid. It's true that growth alone rarely creates happiness. Beyond a certain income, happiness depends on family relationships, a sense of belonging, personal beliefs. But growth surely can cure misery. In the 1700s, life expectancy in France was 25 years, and about 30 percent of infants died before their first birthday. Now life expectancy in advanced countries is almost 80 years, and infant mortality is usually less than 1 percent. Anyone who cares about world poverty must favor economic growth.

Another moral plus: Societies whose politics focus on the gaining and sharing of prosperity can promote their own stability. First, everyone can win. Second, though remaining economic conflicts can be nasty, they're easier to mediate than religious or ethnic differences -- where one side must face eternal damnation or discrimination. It's no accident that the United States and Britain are the oldest successful democracies.

But Friedman mostly misses the real growth predicament facing most advanced societies. It's not environmental spoilage. As he notes, most rich societies protect their environments through tougher antipollution regulations. In the past two decades, U.S. emissions of sulfur dioxide are down 54 percent, he reports. Whether global warming will break this environmental truce remains to be seen.

The immediate dilemma involves the welfare state. It requires fast economic growth to generate the income and government revenue to pay all the promised benefits. But the mounting costs of those benefits -- especially as populations age in the United States, Europe and Japan -- may stifle growth through higher taxes and budget deficits. If so, the welfare state may cause the stagnation and strains against which Friedman warns. The dilemma for most rich societies is that they are wedded both to advancing materialism and to policies threatening that advance. Friedman would have strengthened his point by clearly saying so.

As Bernanke Era Begins, Former Fed Governors Expect Change (KRT)

By Kevin G. Hall

Knight Ridder, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON - Imagine that you wake up one morning with the power to rattle or rally financial markets across the globe, determine the strength or weakness of the U.S. dollar and encourage or discourage the purchases of cars or homes across America.

That's the power Ben Bernanke will wield when he replaces Alan Greenspan as the chairman of the Federal Reserve. The 79-year-old Greenspan will retire Jan. 31, the same day the Senate will confirm Bernanke, 52, and begin his era.

A shy academician, Bernanke is expected to distinguish himself from Greenspan as more of a consensus-builder and clear-speaking communicator. He must do it while still establishing his authority over an institution historically run by strong-willed chairmen with deeper real-world experience than he brings to the role.

Short of the presidency, few jobs affect the lives of ordinary Americans more tangibly than the Fed chairman, yet few citizens know much about the Fed. So mysterious are its workings that transcripts of its closed-doors meetings are kept classified for five years.

Over the past 27 years, there have been only three Federal Reserve chairmen, and only 13 in the Fed's 92-year history. A change atop the secretive institution is a big deal, as rare as a papal installation.

The Fed's mission is to control the money supply in ways that boost employment and dampen inflation. It does so by effectively setting bank-lending rates to individuals and businesses, which in turn accelerates or slows economic activity.

DOJ_NMG_0009342

For the past 25 years, two towering Fed chairmen - Paul Volcker and Greenspan - have steered the world's largest economy. On Volcker's watch, inflation was wrestled to the mat. During Greenspan's tenure, the end of the Cold War ushered in a truly global economy with the United States as its engine.

Those are tough acts to follow. And Bernanke, a seasoned academic from Princeton University who served on the Fed from 2002 to 2005, arrives without the clout that either man carried on Wall Street or in Washington. Only time will tell if that makes him less effective than his predecessors.

History is clear on one point, however: Incoming Fed chairmen tend to face early tests. Less than 10 weeks into the job in 1987, Greenspan wrestled with a stock market crash.

Bernanke arrives facing an expected economic slowdown late this year. He must decide by March whether to break a string of what's expected by then to be 14 straight quarter-point rate hikes, which began in June 2004. He also must decide how to deal with America's heavy reliance on foreigners buying Treasury debt, weak regulatory control over hedge funds that can roil markets and concerns that the nation's hot housing market is cooling and could nosedive.

Five former Fed governors told Knight Ridder in interviews that Bernanke will have to earn the trust of financial markets. The five also expect Bernanke to be more considerate of opposing viewpoints than was Greenspan, who sometimes left Fed governors feeling that their views were marginalized.

"When the chairman made his recommendation at the start of the go-round, the game was up, it was over. Everybody knew what the chairman would be in favor of," Laurence Meyer, a Fed governor from 1996 to 2002, said in an interview.

In his 2004 book "A Term at the Fed," Meyer doubted whether he made a difference because "I ended my term not sure I had ever influenced the outcome of an FOMC meeting, but it never stopped me from trying." He was referring to the Federal Open Markets Committee, the Fed's policy-making unit.

Greenspan's dominance sometimes chafed his colleagues.

Princeton University professor Alan Blinder, who was Fed vice chairman from 1994 to 1996, felt that Greenspan didn't give his views sufficient weight. He's the only governor to fall out publicly with Greenspan, who's so revered in Washington that Bob Woodward named his flattering Greenspan biography simply "Maestro."

Blinder alleges that Greenspan and a few senior Fed staffers dubbed "the barons" essentially ran the Fed with little serious input from others.

Blinder and Bernanke rotated the job of chairman in Princeton's big-ego economics department. The department included Paul Krugman, a liberal economist and controversial columnist. That experience leads Blinder to expect Bernanke to be more collegial and open to the views of others as Fed chairman than Greenspan was.

"I'm pretty sure Ben Bernanke, coming out of the environment that he does, and being the person that he is, would rather use these occasions to engage in discussions and real debate with the committee," Blinder said.

Some other ex-Fed governors agree that Greenspan wasn't exactly a first among equals - he was a first without equals, fully in charge.

"I think Blinder is probably on the mark there," said Lyle E. Gramley, a Fed governor from 1980 to 1985. "When the greatest central banker that ever lived talks ... it does tend to have an intimidating influence on the committee."

To be sure, there were times when Greenspan sensed between meetings that he had weak support on the board. There's an unwritten rule that the chairman will resign if he loses a vote on a rate-setting action, so Greenspan took care either to persuade his colleagues of his position beforehand or to adopt rival views as his own before the vote.

"I never monitored Alan Greenspan's phone calls, but I just bet you he could sense those times, and I can bet you he got on the phone with key members of the committee," said Edward M. Gramlich, a former Fed governor whose 1997-2005 term overlapped with Bernanke's. "Whether Ben will sense that and do that is an open question."

Unlike his predecessor, Bernanke enters the big job with the benefit of Fed experience. That means he knows how difficult it is for the Fed to read the nation's economic pulse, said Alice Rivlin, a Fed vice chairman from 1996 to 1999.

"Its decisions are made in the light of considerable uncertainty," she said, adding that "there's never a clear road map of the future."

DOJ_NMG_0009343

That's why Greenspan is so widely hailed. His instincts and confidence in his judgment made him authoritative. He saw through the mist; only time on the job will reveal whether Bernanke's judgment is equipped with similar fog lights.

"Greenspan was a very independent thinker; he looked at very different data than everybody. He often came to the table with very different views than the staff and had to persuade them," Meyer recalled. "Bernanke is much more a conventional thinker and is much more close with staff. He's more likely to come to the table with a position consistent with the staff forecast."

That's not necessarily good.

For example, Meyer and Fed staffers were pushing for higher interest rates in the mid-1990s to ensure that the economy didn't overheat and spark inflation. But Greenspan correctly intuited that productivity - worker output per hour - wasn't being measured adequately. He held rates low and his view proved correct, as inflation didn't rise and his policy fostered the late `90s boom.

"What we're (going to be) missing is this unique Alan Greenspan. There's just no way of getting around it," Meyer said. "Bernanke needs to keep himself open to views outside the staff, and make sure there are enough ideas (from) outside."

Stem Cell Research Funding In Md. Raises Bioethics Issue (BSUN)

By Jennifer Skalka And Jonathan Bor

The Baltimore Sun, January 12, 2006

Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr.'s $20 million plan for funding stem cell research sparked sharp criticism Wednesday from scientists and legislators after a key state official disclosed that preference will be given to work on non-embryonic stem cells.

With leading Democratic legislators renewing their call for support of embryonic stem cell research, the lines were clearly drawn for a debate that will dominate the General Assembly session that began Wednesday. Some Ehrlich allies argue that state dollars spent primarily on adult stem cell lines will advance science and thrust Maryland into the forefront of stem cell research. Many scientists say that cells derived from embryos hold the most promise for scientific breakthroughs.

Either way, Maryland appears poised to join a growing number of states spending money on stem cell research in the wake of a federal prohibition on funding research involving new embryonic stem cell lines.

Ehrlich discussed his plan to commit $20 million in state money to stem cell research at a news conference Wednesday in Baltimore, calling on lawmakers to forgo political wrangling in favor of good science.

But hours later, Ehrlich's top science adviser, Chris Foster, said he doesn't believe the money would be best spent on embryonic stem cell research.

"I don't think at this time that we need to" fund embryonic cell research, said Foster, deputy secretary of the Department of Business and Economic Development. "I think there are other ways to solve the problem."

Foster said the state would entertain applications for embryonic research but there would be a preference for non-embryonic research, a position that brings Ehrlich closer to President Bush on this contentious issue.

Four years ago, Bush halted federal funding of embryonic stem cell research except for some existing cell lines, prompting some states to begin providing support.

The governor's proposal includes $13.5 million for a new Center for Regenerative Research at the university's BioPark. Henry Fawell, a spokesman for Ehrlich, said the $20 million for research is a one-year allocation that would likely be followed by future requests for funding.

Initially, Ehrlich's plan brought cheers from proponents of the research, who had thus far labored fruitlessly to get him to back state funding. Paul Schurick, Ehrlich's communications director, told reporters Tuesday evening that the administration would not impose restrictions on how the research money would be used.

And during his news conference Wednesday morning, Ehrlich -- joined by first lady Kendel Ehrlich, Howard County Sen. Sandra B. Schrader and others -- implored lawmakers to help him "make sure the science prevails to push us forward."

"I would hope we keep the politics to a minimum; that is my sincere hope," Ehrlich said. "I will attempt to do so."

That there would be a preference for non-embryonic research disappointed and confused some officials and scientists.

DOJ_NMG_0009344

"That's not been the understanding or the indications that I think many of us had had," said William E. Kirwan, chancellor of the University System of Maryland. "Certainly I'd be anxious to hear if there's been any different thinking than what was presented today."

Research involving embryonic stem cells is controversial because it requires the destruction of embryos that could otherwise develop into babies. So far, scientists have created stem cell lines by using embryos donated by couples who had produced more embryos at in-vitro fertilization labs than they needed.

Embryonic stem cells are the master cells that give rise to every specialized tissue in the human body, including those making up bone, blood, the heart, brain and spinal cord. Many scientists believe they could be used to generate replacement tissues for people suffering from diseases from Parkinson's to diabetes.

Though these scientists say such cells hold the best promise for restorative treatments because they are the most flexible, others are focusing on so-called "adult" stem cells that are programmed to create specific tissues. Some researchers, for instance, hope they can cure heart disease with transplants of cardiac stem cells.

Several leading stem cell researchers said favoring proposals for non-embryonic research would defeat the purpose of state funding -- to support projects for which federal funding is limited.

"This certainly won't fly in the community of people who are actively seeking the state's support for embryonic stem cell work," said Dr. John Gearhart, a leading stem cell researcher at the Johns Hopkins School of Medicine. "There is no evidence that these other sources give cells that have the same properties as embryonic stem cells."

"That's exactly the opposite of what I think is needed," said Dr. Curt Civin, a Hopkins cancer researcher studying ways to harness stem cells to treat childhood leukemia. "The hole in our funding is for embryonic stem cell research."

Civin also expressed concern that the preference for non-embryonic research would skew the process of choosing the most deserving projects.

But Dr. Paul Fishman, a neurologist at the University of Maryland Medical Center, said Ehrlich's approach might have merit. He said many experts think that treatments derived from adult stem cells, as opposed to embryonic stem cells, are closer to being realized. Some biotech companies prefer working with non-embryonic stem cells because they feel the technology could yield profits faster, he said.

"If the goal is fostering biotech, that strategy may have some value," Fishman said.

Foster, an electrical engineer, said the Maryland Technology Development Corp. will appoint an expert committee to review all proposals and award grants to the most deserving.

By giving greater weight to proposals involving adult stem cells, the committee will avoid the political furor that could arise if it awards much of the money to embryonic research, he said.

"I don't want to get bogged down in politics," Foster said. "If we're going to spend state money and it's going to embryonic research, it will generate so much debate and controversy we'll make no progress."

Gearhart disagreed.

"This kind of proposal is certainly not one that will take politics out of stem cells," he said. "It will do nothing but inflame and reinvigorate the push for funding for embryonic stem cell research in the state."

Del. Samuel I. Rosenberg of Baltimore, who along with fellow Democrat Sen. Paula C. Hollinger of Baltimore County is proposing $125 million over five years for embryonic stem cell research, said Foster's statements took him by surprise.

"This is not where the need is in terms of priorities," he said. "You've got the feds not involved because of political pressure from the right wing."

Susan O'Brien, executive director of Maryland Families for Stem Cell Research, said preference for non-embryonic research "puts politics back in this issue."

The research proposal surprised top officials at the University of Maryland, Baltimore. They were expecting the governor to announce his commitment to support the new center, which had been in the works for some time, but did not anticipate a research component to his proposal.

"That's completely new," said David J. Ramsay, president of the University of Maryland, Baltimore. "We were talking about the facility. He actually sprung this as a surprise yesterday."

DOJ_NMG_0009345

The governor's office says, however, that Ehrlich has always backed stem cell research and simply took the time to give the issue proper consideration.

"The governor has many stakeholders in this issue that he has had conversations with," said Ehrlich spokesman Henry Fawell. "Like any other chief exec with a major announcement, he's entitled to keep certain components of his proposal private."

Ehrlich Proposes Stem-cell Funding (WT)

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, January 12, 2006

BALTIMORE -- Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. yesterday proposed $20 million in state funds for stem-cell research.

The research funds, under the governor's proposal, would be disbursed through a committee controlled by his administration, alleviating concerns among Maryland religious groups that the studies would involve embryonic stem-cell research, considered a form of abortion by some.

"Clearly, no one is going to be funding embryonic, because in 25 years, there have been nothing but miserable failures," said Nancy Fortier, an associate director at the Maryland Catholic Conference. "Nonembryonic is what is being used to treat cancer, blindness, heart disease, Parkinson's disease. The $20 million is going to be distributed by capable, unbiased people on a review board."

Still, the governor did not rule out embryonic research.

"If it's embryonic with the best chance for therapeutic results, it will be embryonic," said Mr. Ehrlich, a Methodist.

Mr. Ehrlich said a committee, yet to be named, at the Maryland Technology Development Corporation (TEDCO), "will make those decisions."

Chris Foster, deputy secretary at the Department of Business and Economic Development, will work with TEDCO to select the eight- to 12-person review committee.

Mr. Foster, a gubernatorial appointee and former federal researcher, said the committee will include representatives from research universities like Johns Hopkins University and the biotechnology industry and will solicit proposals for research.

"We'll use a model very similar to NIH. We know how they work," Mr. Foster said.

Mr. Ehrlich did not support an attempt last year by Democratic legislators to fund stem-cell research, including embryonic stem-cell research. The bill stalled in the Senate.

Del. Samuel I. Rosenberg, Baltimore Democrat, and Sen. Paula C. Hollinger, Baltimore County Democrat, who were last year's sponsors, are again sponsoring bills in their respective chambers that would provide $25 million over five years for stem-cell research.

Mr. Ehrlich's one-year proposal includes $13 million for a new Center for Regenerative Research at the University of Maryland at Baltimore, where he made his announcement yesterday.

Mrs. Hollinger said that the governor's proposal was "a step in the right direction, but that in order to do it right, we need to pass our legislation."

TEDCO, she said, doesn't "have the scientific or bioethics expertise." Mrs. Hollinger's bill would create a Maryland Scientific Peer Review Committee that would award grants through the Department of Health and Mental Hygiene.

Susan O'Brien, spokeswoman for Maryland Families for Stem-Cell Research, called TEDCO a "political peer review," instead of "scientific peer review."

"It absolutely has to have scientific peer review, not a politically appointed board," she said.

Mr. Ehrlich, in response, said, "What's not political? What we're trying to do is maximize science, not divide people."

TEDCO was created in 1998 by the state legislature and exists to promote "technology-based economic development." It is governed by a 15-member board appointed by the governor with "advice and consent of the Senate," according to its Web site.

Maryland Families for Stem-Cell Research is headed by former Gov. Harry Hughes, whose wife has Parkinson's disease. Mr. Hughes was supposed to attend the governor's press conference yesterday, but did not come because of a "family emergency."

Stem Cell Hype And Hope (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0009346

By David A. Shaywitz

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

The apparent fabrication of results by South Korean researcher Hwang Woo Suk has already prompted a serious reevaluation of stem cell science, and the release this week of Seoul National University's final report on the affair is certain to add fuel to the fire. Many detractors of stem cell research (and, privately, even some proponents) have begun to wonder whether this might mark the beginning of the end. More likely this controversy -- and the ensuing scrutiny and self-reflection -- will provide exactly what our discipline needs most: the opportunity to modulate the extravagant expectations for this research while we reaffirm our underlying commitment to it.

The rapid ascent of stem cell research into the spotlight reflects the collision of exciting science with uncharted ethics. President Bush's Aug. 9, 2001, prohibition on the use of public funds to create new human embryonic stem cell lines ignited interest in this field, even as it made it much more difficult for American scientists to conduct the research. The concern that important medical science was being deliberately thwarted by the federal government enraged many patient advocates and further ratcheted up the demand for results.

Meanwhile, stem cell research itself trudged ahead slowly, for all the usual reasons -- as well as some unique ones. Scientific research is notoriously difficult, and progress typically incremental; human embryonic stem cells also happen to be intrinsically difficult to grow. Moreover, government restrictions severely hampered the ability of researchers to pursue the best science and discouraged many bright young investigators from entering the field.

As the demand for results far outstripped the ability of researchers to supply them, a seller's market emerged in which goods were overvalued and even low-quality merchandise was snatched up by eager buyers. This is the context in which Hwang's studies appeared.

While most in the field of stem cell research were shocked by the reports of fraud, the shock was only one of degree; it is common knowledge that the bar for publication in this field often has appeared remarkably low, with even well-respected research journals seeming to fall over one another for the privilege of publishing the next hot paper. The result of this frenzy has been an entire body of literature that is viewed with extreme skepticism by most serious stem cell investigators.

The good news is that underneath all this mess, stellar science really is happening. Stem cells have proved even more captivating than we could have imagined, and understanding the process by which a stem cell progressively differentiates into a specialized cell such as a neuron or a pancreas beta cell is perhaps the most compelling biology question for our generation. Stem cells have sparked our interest for good reason.

But we're not going to figure out how they work overnight; it will take a very long time and require our best minds, as well as our collective effort (and, ideally, our collective dollars). Translating this knowledge into clinically meaningful applications is certain to take even longer and present still more challenges -- yet it should be achievable. If the current controversy were to cause us to precipitously abandon this exciting area, it would be a catastrophic shame.

What we really need is to refine our expectations for this research. This doesn't mean we should scale back our ambitions or demand less of our researchers. Rather, we need to recognize just how arduous and painstaking good science usually is and remind ourselves that data do not become dogma when published, but only when independently validated.

Difficult or not, good research is the only responsible way to proceed. If the promise of stem cells is to be fulfilled, the pursuit will require a solid scientific foundation, one grounded in reliable, reproducible facts and not simply supported by hype and hope.

States, Flush In Election Year, Loosen Up (WSJ)

By Deborah Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2006

Facing fat budget deficits, the Bush administration is preparing a tight 2007 budget that squeezes most domestic programs. Flush with cash, state governors across the country are doing the opposite.

That includes members of Mr. Bush's party and the opposition. Republican Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger of California proposes a $222 billion bond offering because, he says, "we need more roads, more hospitals, more schools ... more, more, more." Democratic Gov. Janet Napolitano of Arizona seeks "$100 million in smart tax relief that strengthens our economy and invests in new technologies."

DOJ_NMG_0009347

In "State of the State" speeches now echoing through state capitols, others propose a beefed-up minimum wage and tax credits to help with energy costs. It's a far cry from the somber tones many governors struck earlier in the Bush era, as they struggled with the plunge in revenue that followed the 2001 recession.

Confronting a similar shortfall, the federal government has cut taxes and continued spending at a rapid rate -- on wars in Afghanistan and Iraq, on farm and highway bills, on a Medicare prescription-drug benefit. But many governors spent the first half of this decade cutting expenses and raising taxes to meet state balanced-budget requirements. The revenue surge that accompanied economic recovery has left them in the black at an opportune time: the 2006 election season.

"The revenue picture has improved very significantly," said Sujit Canaga Retna, a fiscal analyst with the Council of State Governments. "So, as a result of that, we see a number of projects geared towards economic development and long-term infrastructure needs."

Mr. Retna and other fiscal experts caution that states still face expenses in the next few years that will be a challenge, no matter how good the books look now. Among them is Medicaid, which continues to outpace the rate of state revenue growth, according to the Kaiser Family Foundation.

On average, Medicaid costs accounted for about 17% of states' general-fund budgets in 2005, up from 12% in 1995. Only K-12 education funding exceeds Medicaid as a percentage of general-fund expenditures. "Medicaid ... has not shown any signs of slowing down or losing its position as the fastest-growing component of state budgets," says Arturo Perez, a fiscal analyst with the National Conference of State Legislatures.

States also face growing costs associated with employee pension plans, many of which are underfunded, as well as retiree health-care costs. Nicholas Jenny, senior policy analyst at the Nelson A. Rockefeller Institute of Government, says states could "run ... into a ditch" by overreacting to today's flush treasuries.

Yet state executives aiming to survive the 2006 elections -- which include 38 gubernatorial races -- are eyeing voter-friendly ways to spend the extra cash. Several governors have proposed tax cuts and projects that they say will stimulate long-term economic development and make states healthier in the long run.

In Arizona, Ms. Napolitano has proposed tax credits for businesses that provide health care for employees and a three-day "sales tax holiday." In her address earlier this week, she also proposed spending $100 million on border security, saying such efforts "will mean big future payoffs" and help the state "to deal with the crisis down the road."

Tax relief also is on the agenda in Kansas, where Democratic Gov. Kathleen Sebelius is looking to eliminate the property tax on new business equipment. In New York, retiring Republican Gov. George Pataki, a potential 2008 presidential candidate, seeks a property-tax rebate, among other cuts.

Few welcome the changed fiscal picture more than Republican Gov. Bob Riley of Alabama, who drew criticism for proposing $500 million in higher taxes earlier in his term. Now he is calling for a five-year $200 million tax cut, including an annual "sales tax holiday." He's also seeking $500 million to fund school construction, along with a $1 billion increase in other education funding.

"This record surplus exists because we fought for fiscal discipline, and because our workers, our industries and our economic-growth strategy have succeeded in putting Alabama's economy on the right track," Mr. Riley says.

Perhaps the most ambitious plan was proposed by Gov. Schwarzenegger. He's pushing for a 10-year, $222 billion infrastructure plan while noting that "a strong economy has produced billions of dollars of unexpected revenues." Over the next two decades, he says, the Golden State will need to lay out $500 billion on infrastructure projects.

Mr. Schwarzenegger warns that the "structural deficit" in California's state budget may soon return. But after politically debilitating battles with public employees in 2005, he's proposing to increase the minimum wage by $1 an hour and to boost education funding by several billion dollars.

With winter heating bills an issue among voters, several governors have called for state outlays to help residents cope. In Idaho, Gov. Dirk Kempthorne proposed a $63 million plan to give every resident a $50 energy-relief check, while Gov. Pataki called for a $500 heating-fuel tax credit to "thousands of seniors across New York."

DOJ_NMG_0009348

Whether state legislatures go along with the governors' plans remains to be seen. Credit-rating agencies also are watching what states do with their surpluses; some states are seeking to replenish their "rainy day" funds, which were drained during the fiscal crisis.

"It is time to even out the ride," notes Democratic Gov. Christine Gregoire of Washington. "While the roller coaster is fun at the amusement park, it is no model for state budgeting."

Robin Prunty, a director with the ratings concern Standard & Poor's, said that while some targeted tax reduction or reserve replenishment is to be expected, a favored approach is "any tax-reduction measure that's nonrecurring and where you're not reducing the tax base."

Gov.'s Top Aide To Woo Donors (LAT)

By Robert Salladay

The Los Angeles Times, January 12, 2006

SACRAMENTO — Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger is dispatching his newly appointed chief of staff to woo wealthy Republican donors for his reelection effort, injecting his most influential policy advisor into the job of collecting money for his campaign.

Susan Kennedy, once a top-level Democrat, will play a key role in the governor's reelection bid, the administration confirmed Wednesday. She is being paid campaign funds in addition to her $131,000 government salary and will mix freely with influential contributors.

Campaign finance experts and legislative Democrats questioned why Kennedy — the lead negotiator on major decisions in the Schwarzenegger administration — would be allowed to attend private meetings with donors when many have business before the administration.

Paul S. Ryan, associate legal counsel at the Campaign Legal Center in Washington, D.C., said allowing donors access to Kennedy creates "the appearance of corruption in California. If you are fortunate to afford the price of admission, then you automatically gain access that the vast majority of Californians do not have."

Appointed last month to the highest-ranking position in the Schwarzenegger administration, Kennedy is a former Democratic Party executive and aide to former Gov. Gray Davis. She has nevertheless vowed loyalty to the Republican governor and his 2006 reelection effort.

California law allows her to attend fundraisers for the governor and work on his campaign, as long as she is doing it on her own time.

Under Davis, however, an informal rule prohibited staff members — including Kennedy — from attending any fundraisers, said Steve Maviglio, a former spokesman for Davis.

Schwarzenegger communications director Rob Stutzman said Kennedy would take vacation days to meet donors and work on the campaign, and would "absolutely" separate her policy job from the fundraising effort. He said that "her insight strategically on how the campaign will proceed will be invaluable."

Maviglio, who now works for Assembly Speaker Fabian Nuñez (D-Los Angeles), said Democrats see problems with Kennedy and other Schwarzenegger officials moving back and forth between policy discussions in the Capitol and meetings with donors. The governor's former chief of staff, Patricia Clarey, took time off from her government job to serve as Schwarzenegger's campaign manager last year.

A "Join Arnold 2006" memo sent to donors Tuesday outlines a conference call and a series of luncheons planned for Schwarzenegger and contributors. The meetings will include "briefings from senior campaign officials, including the governor's chief of staff, Susan Kennedy," according to the memo, a copy of which was obtained by The Times.

"The concern is that you are offering donors, in exchange for campaign contributions, access to a decision maker that the rest of us don't have," said Derek Cressman, founder of TheRestofUs.org, a Sacramento nonprofit organization that monitors state and federal campaign finance laws.

Ryan of the Campaign Legal Center said contributors might benefit more from access to high-ranking aides than to the elected official hosting the fundraiser.

DOJ_NMG_0009349

"The staff member often has more experience in a particular subject area than the elected official. The actions of that official are going to reflect the advice they get from the advisor," he said.

Kennedy's appointment last month shocked the political establishment. Conservative Republicans, already concerned that Schwarzenegger was drifting too far left, were appalled that he would hire the former abortion rights activist and Democratic political operative to help him run the government.

Stutzman said some Republicans were concerned that Kennedy would have access to secret financial information about the Republican Party. He said Kennedy would not be privy to that kind of information, but "she is absolutely going to know reelection strategy."

The memo suggests that Schwarzenegger has begun his reelection fundraising effort in earnest, after tapping his donors for about $50 million last year in the unsuccessful special election campaign. The governor is expected to raise another $50 million for his reelection. His fundraising has already eclipsed that of Davis — who was recalled from office in part because of perceived excesses in raising money.

Schwarzenegger's political schedule with Kennedy is busy for the next few weeks. Planned for hotels and country clubs from Jan. 18 to Feb. 9, the eight meetings are known among campaign workers as "donor maintenance" events. The information dispensed is often cursory and broad, but the gatherings allow a donor access to the highest ranks of government.

Some Capitol interests, such as environmentalists and consumer groups, have complained in the past of not having direct access to the governor's staff. But this month, lobbyists say, the administration has been more willing to reach out to non-donors, holding a series of meetings in the Capitol to outline the governor's agenda.

The "Join Arnold 2006" briefings with Kennedy are being hosted by the top tier of the Schwarzenegger money machine. The memo was sent to potential donors by a group of 30 major supporters, such as former U.S. Secretary of State George P. Shultz and California Chamber of Commerce President Allan Zaremberg.

The hosts of the gatherings include some of California's biggest developers, who could benefit from Schwarzenegger's $222-billion proposal to rebuild the state's overburdened freeways, schools, ports and waterways.

The Jan. 18 meeting is scheduled for the Island Hotel in Newport Beach and will be co-hosted by George L. Argyros and William Lyon, both major housing developers. Argyros is the former U.S. ambassador to Spain and a major donor to President Bush and the Republican Party.

The campaign has also arranged a Feb. 1 meeting at the Regency Club in Los Angeles, co-hosted by real estate developer Rick Caruso. Developer Alex Spanos, owner of the San Diego Chargers, is hosting a fundraising meeting the next day at the Sutter Club in Sacramento.

The memo shows that Schwarzenegger is linking his legislative agenda to the reelection effort this year. It mentions the rebuilding plan, which is now before the Legislature. Kennedy is leading negotiations to get the package through the Assembly and Senate, both controlled by Democrats.

"As the governor is fond of saying, he cannot do this job alone," the campaign memo tells potential donors. "He is looking to us, California's business leaders and the leaders in the communities where we live, work and raise our families to help him communicate his message to the voters during the 2006 election campaign."

State law prohibits linking campaign contributions to specific governmental decisions. But the Political Reform Act of 1974 says nothing about barring elected officials and government aides from discussing policy at fundraising events, according to the state Fair Political Practices Commission.

Kennedy, who declined to comment, has been unapologetic in the past about her new loyalty to Schwarzenegger, a relationship that developed after a year of private meetings between the two. And she has acknowledged that politics would inevitably bleed into her policy job.

"Are there politics involved in legislative strategy? Absolutely," Kennedy told The Times recently. "My job is to help Gov. Schwarzenegger, and I won't hesitate for one second to do that. Obviously, that means helping people who support him in the Legislature."

Outside Audit Forecast: More Pension Freezes (WSJ)

By Ellen E. Schultz, Charles Forelle And Theo Francis

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2006

Look for more companies to cut back on pension benefits as an unusual alignment of financial conditions makes such moves more lucrative than usual.

Two trends have emerged in the broad shift away from traditional pensions, which provide workers set benefits based on their salary and years of service. Financially strapped companies such as airlines and auto makers are garnering much of the attention as they seek to ditch their badly underfunded pension liabilities and try to stay afloat.

Meanwhile, relatively healthy companies -- many with fully paid-up pension plans -- are seeking to shift to retirement programs that put more of the burden for savings and planning on employees. (How safe is your pension? See Personal Journal1.)

Last week, International Business Machines Corp. informed 117,000 workers in its U.S. pension plans that they will stop earning additional benefits after 2007, saving an estimated $2.5 billion to $3 billion over five years in the process, including the impact of other changes. Verizon Communications Inc. froze its pension for 50,500 managers last month, saving $3 billion in the coming decade.

Effective Jan. 1, many workers at Hewlett-Packard Co. and Sears Holdings Corp. also stopped building benefits in their plans. The companies said they are enhancing their 401(k) plans, which typically involve employee contributions that may be matched all or in part by employers.

Current interest rates offer employers the possibility of a particularly big income boost if they freeze their pensions, effectively wiping out part of a debt owed to future retirees. While assets in a plan still will be paid out when workers retire or leave the company, benefits don't grow with additional years on the job.

There is no legal barrier to freezing a pension unless it is prohibited by a union contract. Verizon, for example, unilaterally froze the pensions of its managers, but changes to pensions for its union employees are subject to negotiations.

"I wouldn't be surprised if many of the largest [companies] are in fact evaluating" pension freezes, said Vadim Zlotnikov, chief investment strategist for Sanford C. Bernstein & Co. Mr. Zlotnikov says the potential for locking in bigger accounting benefits is one of several reasons big pension sponsors might choose to freeze a pension now.

Under accounting rules, companies calculate how much they expect to pay out in pensions over the lives of their employees, including amounts workers haven't earned yet, and then reflect that amount as a liability on their books.

When a company freezes its pension -- halting the buildup of additional benefits for employees -- it is no longer obligated to make some of the payments it had planned. That allows the company to reduce the value of the liability it was carrying on its books, which generates accounting gains that are counted as income. Although this "income" isn't money that can be spent, it can affect the stock price and often management's pay incentives.

Benefits consultants, which earn fees in part by helping employers restructure pension plans, have begun telling clients that competitors are considering changes. Hewitt Associates LLC says that 29% of 152 companies it surveyed recently were considering closing some of their pensions to new employees, and 16% of 157 companies said they might freeze benefit accruals for some or all of current participants.

Today's low long-term interest rates allow companies to lock in particularly high gains. The value of a future obligation in today's dollars is bigger when interest rates are low, because the employer would have to put more money aside at prevailing rates to meet the payments when they come due.

Short-term rates, which contrary to long-term rates have been trending higher in recent months, offer the potential for even bigger gains to companies with so-called "cash-balance" plans, such as IBM, Verizon, H-P, Sears and many other big companies. Under these plans, workers have hypothetical "accounts" to which the employer credits interest each year, often tied to short-term rates. Higher short-term rates means higher interest credits. That, too, raises the pension obligation, and in turn, the savings from reducing the obligation.

Thus, by freezing their U.S. plans at a time when both long- and short-term interest rates are creating bigger liabilities, many companies stand to reap a bigger benefit by reducing their obligation. The companies can lock in the savings today, even if, like IBM, the benefits won't stop growing for two more years.

DOJ_NMG_0009351

Meanwhile, employers also are worried that proposed pension-accounting changes proposed by the Financial Accounting Standards Board might make their profits more volatile.

It is impossible to say for sure which companies will follow in the footsteps of IBM and Verizon. Technology and telecom companies such as Lucent Technologies Inc., BellSouth Corp. and Electronic Data Systems Corp., like IBM, Verizon, H-P and Sears, have cash-balance plans that could generate gains if frozen in the current interest-rate environment.

Spokesmen at all three companies declined to comment or said they weren't aware of any plans to change their plans. Lucent is among those reviewing options, says a person familiar with the matter.

IBM wouldn't break out the specific effects of freezing the U.S. pension, but says they account for about a third of its expected savings from pension changes. Nor would it identify how much its projected savings are offset by the estimated cost of increasing 401(k) contributions, which the company announced last week as well. IBM officials said the company began examining a pension freeze in earnest sometime early in 2005, and that the current interest-rate environment didn't play a role in the decision.

Verizon too, didn't disclose how much of the $3 billion in savings it expects will come from freezing the pension, nor would it say how much the savings are offset by increased 401(k) costs. The company declined to comment on whether the interest-rate environment played any role in its decision; it said the decision was driven by its merger with MCI, which didn't offer managers a pension.

An H-P spokesman said the company froze its pension for competitive reasons. "I wouldn't say [interest rates] played a significant role," he said. H-P didn't freeze its entire plan; rather, it closed it to younger employees and new employees, a move similar to what NCR Corp., did in 2004. NCR also has a cash-balance plan.

Sears said it froze its plan because traditional pensions have "become competitively unaffordable," and cause "significant volatility in a company's earnings and cash funding requirements."

Companies like Sears, which has an underfunded pension, get cash savings when they freeze their plans in addition to the pension income that boosts the bottom line. Because the obligation is reduced, the plan immediately becomes better-funded, which ultimately reduces or eliminates the need for the company to make cash contributions to the pension fund. Freezing its pension reduced Sears's pension liability by $80 million.

Clinton In Deal To Cut AIDS Treatment Costs (NYT)

By Donald G. Mcneil Jr.

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

Former President Bill Clinton plans to announce today that his foundation has negotiated lower prices on AIDS tests and on two important AIDS drugs.

Four companies, from the United States, India and China, will offer rapid H.I.V. tests for 49 cents to 65 cents, which will reduce the typical cost of a test in poor countries by half, Mr. Clinton said in a written statement. Another four companies - three from India and one from South Africa - will make the antiretroviral drug efavirenz for as little as $240 per patient per year. One of the Indian companies, Cipla, will also make the antiretroviral abacavir for $447.

The most common three-drug combination pill for H.I.V. now costs $136 per year, so the new drugs, even at steep discounts from the thousands of dollars they cost in the West, can easily triple the cost of therapy. But as patients become resistant to their first-line drugs, doctors must have new options.

The William J. Clinton Presidential Foundation acts as a broker, meeting with the health ministries of about 50 poor countries in Africa, Asia and Latin America and with drug makers.

Clinton Charity Gets Price Cuts For AIDS Drugs In Poor Countries (WSJ)

By Mark Schoofs

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2006

Former President Bill Clinton is expected to announce today that his foundation has secured price discounts on medicines for AIDS patients in developing countries and for HIV test kits.

DOJ_NMG_0009352

The price reductions -- involving nine companies from five countries -- cover two AIDS drugs usually used on patients who have become resistant to first-line medications or who develop unbearable side effects. The deal reduces by 30% or more the cost of already cut-price products offered in most poor countries. The William J. Clinton Foundation's first agreement with generic-drug makers for major price reductions came in October 2003.

Today's announcement will mark the foundation's first foray into reducing the price for second-line AIDS drugs. Second-line regimens are between seven and 30 times as expensive as first-line therapies, according to Doctors Without Borders, a relief organization.

"We're very concerned that in the next few years there will be a dramatic increase in need for second-line drugs, and we fear they won't be available or that they will be very expensive," says Daniel Berman, coordinator of Doctors Without Borders' Access to Essential Medicines Campaign.

While the Clinton program generally offers the lowest price for the drugs and tests its agreements cover, it is only one of many pipelines through which developing countries can purchase drugs. Most brand-name pharmaceutical and generic-drug companies offer their own discount plans. In addition, private companies and nonprofit charity groups make purchases on their own.

More than 240,000 people in Africa, the Caribbean and other developing parts of the world receive drugs through the foundation's agreements. The World Health Organization estimates that more than one million people now receive AIDS medicines in the developing world.

The Clinton team worked to lower prices by helping obtain cheaper ingredients to manufacture drugs. For example, one chemical ingredient accounts for most of the cost of making the drug abacavir. The foundation found an alternative supplier willing to slash the price for that ingredient, according to people at the foundation and at the manufacturing company, Matrix Laboratories Ltd. of India.

To make efavirenz another raw material is crucial but expensive, so the foundation approached a university researcher and asked him to develop a cheaper method of synthesizing that ingredient, which he has done.

"They are really providing a very comprehensive assistance program and are very sensitive to the commercial needs of companies," said Nimmgadda Prasad, executive chairman of Matrix Laboratories of Bangalore, India. Because the Clinton Foundation has 50 eligible countries in its purchasing consortium, it offered high enough volumes to justify lower margins, Mr. Prasad said.

Under the Clinton deal to be announced today, the drug efavirenz will be produced by three Indian generics firms -- Cipla Ltd., Ranbaxy Laboratories Ltd. and Strides Arcolab Ltd. -- and one South African generics maker, Aspen Pharmacare Holdings Ltd. The drug abacavir will be produced only by Cipla. Under the deal, efavirenz would sell for no more than $240 per patient per year, and abacavir for no more than $447 as long as orders meet volume and other specifications.

Four companies will manufacture HIV "rapid tests" -- which can determine a person's HIV status in less than 20 minutes -- for between 49 cents and 65 cents per test. The companies are Chembio Diagnostics Systems, a unit of Chembio Diagnostics Inc. of Medford, N.Y.; Orgenics Ltd. of Yavne, Israel, owned by Inverness Medical Innovations Inc. of Waltham, Mass.; Qualpro Diagnostics of India, and Shanghai Kehua Bio-Engineering Co. of Shanghai.

In the U.S. and Europe, abacavir is marketed as Ziagen by GlaxoSmithKline PLC. In the U.S., efavirenz is marketed as Sustiva by Bristol-Myers Squibb Co.; in most of the rest of the world it is marketed as Stocrin by MSD, the international trademark of Merck & Co.

Beating Up On Wal-Mart (WP)

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

AMERICAN BUSINESS has few whipping boys so irresistibly whippable as Wal-Mart Stores Inc., whose treatment of employees, competitors and suppliers conjures cold-eyed corporate heartlessness. It's hard to root for Wal-Mart; one might as easily cheer on Scrooge or the shark in "Jaws." But state lawmakers in Maryland are preparing to impose legislation on the retailer so arbitrary that it may achieve the near-impossible feat of casting Wal-Mart as the victim.

DOJ_NMG_0009353

The Maryland bill would force firms with more than 10,000 in-state employees to spend at least 8 percent of their payrolls on workers' health insurance plans or make compensatory payments to the state. Only three other Maryland employers have more than 10,000 workers on their payrolls -- Johns Hopkins University, Northrop Grumman Corp. and Giant Food Inc. -- and they already meet or exceed the 8 percent threshold. Apparently, only Wal-Mart, with about 15,000 full- and part-time employees in Maryland, does not; thus the bill applies uniquely to Wal-Mart.

Maryland's legislature passed the bill last year, but Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) vetoed it. Lawmakers, urged on by big unions, appear on the verge of overriding the veto despite furious lobbying by Wal-Mart. The legislators, joined by Giant Food (Wal-Mart's unionized competitor), insist disingenuously that they are not singling out the big-box retailer but are merely setting a standard. Yet hundreds of smaller companies in Maryland that fail to meet the 8 percent spending threshold for health care are untouched by the legislation; in total their uninsured employees may be a greater drain on the state's health system than Wal-Mart's. The bill's backers say that Wal-Mart, because it is so large, bears a special obligation to set a good example. But since when do states have the right to penalize firms simply because they are big and successful?

The Maryland bill is a legislative mugging masquerading as an act of benevolent social engineering. It is true that skyrocketing health care costs and the growing ranks of uninsured workers represent a burden on the state's health system that other corporations in effect help subsidize. But Wal-Mart employees, like the employees of other large retailers that employ many low-wage workers, are only slightly more likely to collect Medicaid benefits than the national average. And unlovable as it may be, Wal-Mart serves low- and middle-income people, both by creating entry-level and part-time jobs for people who might otherwise be unemployed and by saving its moderate-income customers a staggering amount of money.

The legislation has prompted imitators in 30 states. Where it passes, no one should be surprised by unintended consequences. Wal-Mart and other targeted firms may shift jobs or planned facilities elsewhere. Many low-wage younger workers may still opt out of health coverage even if offered a more generous plan. In trying to address the national problems of health care and uninsured workers, lawmakers in Maryland and other states could inflict on themselves a new set of problems while failing to solve the underlying one.

Russia Won't Block U.S. On Iran (WP)

By Dafna Linzer

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

The Bush administration, working intensely to galvanize international pressure on Iran, has secured a guarantee from Russia that it will not block U.S. efforts to take Tehran's nuclear case to the U.N. Security Council, American and European officials said yesterday.

The commitment, made in a Tuesday night phone call between Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, will likely help the United States and its European allies win support from key countries weighing a tougher line in response to Iran's resumption of sensitive nuclear work.

Vice President Cheney and British Prime Minister Tony Blair suggested yesterday that Iran now faces the possibility of U.N. economic sanctions if it does not halt nuclear enrichment research it began Tuesday.

According to three senior diplomats who were briefed on the call, Lavrov told Rice that Russia would abstain, rather than vote against U.S. efforts to move the issue from the International Atomic Energy Agency to the Security Council. State Department spokesman Sean McCormack confirmed to reporters that Rice had spoken with Lavrov and other foreign ministers but did not divulge details.

Russia's pledge was good only for when a vote takes place inside the IAEA. U.S. officials said they remain uncertain as to how Moscow, a traditional ally of Iran's, would react if the issue gets to the Security Council, where Moscow is one of five countries with veto power.

Still, Bush administration officials who spoke on the condition of anonymity saw the Russian decision as a victory and said they would spend the next several weeks lobbying China for a similar commitment. "We spent much of our time working on the Russians, but we're now moving the focus to China," said one administration official who would only discuss the backroom diplomacy on the condition of anonymity.

DOJ_NMG_0009354

The White House is hoping the IAEA board will refer Iran's case to the Security Council before President Bush delivers the State of the Union address at the end of the month, according to two senior administration officials.

Four years ago, in his annual address, Bush referred to Iran as a one of three "axis of evil" countries, along with Iraq and North Korea. But his administration has been criticized by friends and opponents for failing to come up with a strategy to curb Iran's nuclear program.

The White House has been pushing for more than two years to bring Iran's case before the Security Council, but only now -- as a result of Iran's recent actions -- has it found a chance to win enough international support to do so. The timing is ideal, U.S. officials said. John R. Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, takes over the presidency of the Security Council for one month beginning on Feb. 1, giving Washington the opportunity to place Iran at the top of the council agenda.

In an interview yesterday with Fox News Radio, Cheney said "the number one item on the agenda" at the Security Council would be a "resolution that could be enforced by sanctions." He cautioned that the process, still in flux, was "speculative at this point" but added, "that will be the next step once the Board of Governors of the International Atomic Energy Agency meets and concludes that the diplomatic track they've been on isn't going to work."

In London, Blair told parliament that sanctions are a serious option. "We don't rule out any measures at all," Blair said. "It is important Iran recognizes how seriously the international community treats it."

The foreign ministers of France, Britain and Germany, who are now closely allied with Washington's position on Iran, are expected to call today for an emergency meeting of the IAEA board to vote on sending Iran's case to New York.

They are assured of winning a majority of the votes from the board's 35 members. But diplomats from all three countries, who spoke on the condition of anonymity, said the meeting may not take place in time for Bush's speech, saying they may need several more weeks to lobby China and other influential board members, such as India. Undersecretary of State R. Nicholas Burns will travel to India next week to press for its support.

"We expect the meeting will most likely take place around the beginning of February," one European official said.

Robert Einhorn, who was assistant secretary of state for nonproliferation until 2001, said it would be best to press Russian and China for more than abstentions. "What we need to do now is get the Russians and Chinese to tell the Iranians they won't be in a position to help them out in the [Security] Council if they go forward with this work," he said. "If the Russians and Chinese told them that, it would have quite an impact in Tehran."

Iran says its program is designed solely to generate electricity, but the Bush administration is convinced Tehran is using it as a pathway to a nuclear bomb. So far, the IAEA has not found proof of a weapons program, but Iran's cooperation with inspectors has been shaky, and many questions remain unanswered.

Iran Defiant As Sanctions From West Likely (AP-Y2)

By Nasser Karimi

AP2, January 12, 2006

The U.S. and Britain said Wednesday that Western countries will likely seek Iran's referral to the U.N. Security Council after it restarted nuclear activity. Iran's president said his country would not be bullied and would push ahead with the program.

British Prime Minister Tony Blair said he could not rule out the possibility that Iran will face economic sanctions.

International impatience with Iran was growing after it broke U.N. seals at a uranium enrichment plant Tuesday and said it was resuming nuclear research after a two-year freeze. Enriched uranium can be used as a fuel for both nuclear energy and nuclear weapons.

"I think the first thing to do is to secure agreement for a reference to the Security Council, if that is indeed what the allies jointly decide, as I think seems likely," Blair told the House of Commons in London, adding that he was in close contact with Washington on the issue.

"We obviously don't rule out any measures at all," Blair said when asked about possible sanctions. "It's important Iran recognizes how seriously the international community treats it."

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said "it is more likely than ever" that the U.N. nuclear watchdog, the International Atomic Energy Agency, will refer Iran to the Security Council. The council could then impose sanctions.

DOJ_NMG_0009355

White House spokesman Scott McClellan said Tuesday if Iran continued on its present course, "there is no other choice but to refer the matter to the Security Council."

McCormack said Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice had discussed the situation by telephone with IAEA chief Mohamed ElBaradei and British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw.

Russia, a longtime ally of Iran, expressed anger as well. Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov talked with Rice, and both sides shared "a deep disappointment" over Iran's move, the Russian Foreign Ministry said.

But Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad shrugged off the international outcry.

"Unfortunately, a group of bullies allows itself to deprive nations of their legal and natural rights," Ahmadinejad told a crowd during a visit to the port city of Bandar Abbas. His speech was broadcast live on state-run television. "The Iranian nation is not frightened by the powers and their noise."

Former President Hashemi Rafsanjani took a sharper tone, denouncing the West's "colonial policy."

"If they cause any disturbance, they will ultimately regret it," the cleric warned in a speech for the Islamic holiday of Eid al-Adha aired on state TV.

"Even if (the Westerners) destroy our scientists, their successors would continue the job," he said. "It would not be easy for them to solve the (nuclear) case by imposing sanctions or anything like that."

Rafsanjani, who was Iran's president in the 1990s, lost to Ahmadinejad in a runoff election in June. The policy of pursuing the nuclear program has become a point of national pride for many Iranians, a rare issue that crosses the reformist-conservative divide.

Rafsanjani now serves as head of the Expediency Council, a powerful body that mediates between the elected parliament and Iran's unelected Islamic clerical leadership, which holds ultimate say in the country.

Iran insists its research is for peaceful energy production only. But the United States suspects Tehran has ambitions to produce nuclear weapons.

"I tell those superpowers that, with strength and prudence, Iran will pave the way to achieving peaceful nuclear energy," Ahmadinejad said. "In the near future, (nuclear) energy will be completely carried out by the Iranian nation."

The president accused the West of seeking to prevent Iran's technological development and control the country by forcing it to buy nuclear fuel abroad.

"They falsely say that they oppose nuclear weapons. They want to have nuclear monopoly to sell it drop by drop at an expensive price and use it as an instrument for domination over nations," he said.

Blair said Iran's decision to restart its nuclear program, coupled with Ahmadinejad's recent inflammatory comments about Israel, "cause real and serious alarm right across the world." Ahmadinejad recently called for Israel to be "wiped off the map" and said the Holocaust was a "myth."

German Deputy Foreign Minister Gernot Erler cautioned against referring the dispute to the Security Council, saying it could further destabilize the Middle East.

Foreign ministers from Britain, France and Germany, who have spent two years trying to persuade Iran to halt its uranium conversion and enrichment activities, will meet in Berlin on Thursday to consider their next step.

___

Associated Press Writer Ed Johnson contributed to this story from London.

A Test Of Wills Between Iran And The West (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 11 - One day after Iran moved to break the internationally monitored seals on its nuclear facilities, a contest of wills between Iran and its adversaries unfolded, with the Europeans threatening to refer Iran to the United Nations Security Council for possible punitive actions and Iran issuing defiant new warnings.

Signaling this strategy, Vice President Dick Cheney, in an interview with Fox News, said Wednesday that the United States would seek the adoption of "a resolution that could be enforced by sanctions, were they to fail to comply with it." Prime Minister

DOJ_NMG_0009356

Tony Blair of Britain told the Parliament the same thing, saying that "we have to decide what measures to take and we obviously don't rule out any measures at all."

Among the possibilities being discussed, various officials said, were a ban on travel by Iranian diplomats, restrictions on new commercial contracts or sports contests and other small steps falling short of what would be the toughest sanction of all - either a ban on oil purchases or on the export of refined gasoline to Iran.

But it was unclear whether the Europeans could get Russia, China, India and other countries to join a consensus for sanctions, making it possible for the Security Council to act on them. Nor was it certain that Iran would change its behavior in response to new pressures.

"The issue cannot be solved by imposing sanctions or similar measures," said Ali Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani, the former Iranian president. The West would regret any such attempts, he warned in a speech on Wednesday as Iran celebrated the Muslim holiday of Id al-Adha.

"I believe the West has played this game too late and played into Iranian hands," said Abbas Milani, director of Iranian studies at Stanford University. "At this stage, they are convinced that the more hardball they play, the more the West will collapse." Mr. Milani said that news reports from Iran suggested that its government had used the last few years to sign up oil deals with various countries to gain their political support, dispersed its nuclear activities to some 300 sites around the country and stockpiled food, medicine and other materials to survive any sanctions.

American and European officials say that two years of efforts to negotiate with Iran, including the discussion of incentives for ending its nuclear programs, has at least brought leading countries of the world closer to a willingness to apply coercion now that talks have failed.

They have indicated that the next phase of pressure is likely to take place a step at a time, perhaps starting with a referral of Iran's case by the International Atomic Energy Agency to the United Nations Security Council early next month.

"A lot of what can be done is simply related to Iran's status in the world," said Mitchell B. Reiss, a policy and planning director at the State Department in the first Bush term. "The Iranians are very sensitive to challenges to their own legitimacy, and there are a lot of things you can do before bringing down the hammer big time."

But others are less sure of such a course of action, and they fear that Iran can string out the process by appearing to cooperate at each phase, peeling off Russian and Chinese support with a show of reasonableness.

"I've been surprised that so many people are acting like referral to the Security Council is some important event that will bring about change in the government of Iran," said an administration official, asking not to be identified as questioning the Western strategy. "I don't buy it."

A second official, asked if the period of diplomacy had now ended, said: "No. Diplomacy just passes to a new phase, one of diplomatic judgment of Iran." Such a judgment, he said, will be easier because of the recent inflammatory comments from its new president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, about wiping Israel off the map.

For the time being, there is no talk of military action against Iran, except hypothetically, in part because any kind of airstrike or covert attempt to sabotage its facilities would provoke retaliations in Iraq, Israel and elsewhere.

A few years ago, for example, Bush administration hawks spoke of the powerfully persuasive effect on Iran of 150,000 American troops in neighboring Iraq. Now, the United States is angrily calling on Iran not to support lethal attacks on American troops by insurgents. There remain some in the Bush administration who say that American officials could have made a greater attempt in the last year or so to reach out to the Tehran government. But there is no indication that Iran was interested.

The American ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, was authorized to engage Iranians in discussions about cross-border infiltration of bombs and other devices used against Americans, but has been rebuffed.

Meanwhile, the United States has concentrated its efforts on trying to isolate Iran diplomatically, proclaiming success repeatedly but without proof that it has gotten anything more than lip service so far.

State Department officials say that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has been concentrating this week on getting Russia on board the campaign to confront Iran. They say Russia has responded with surprisingly tough talk to Iran's rebuff of an offer to enrich uranium on Russian soil, but that Russia could still call for more delays.

China, administration and European officials say, is considered likely to accept sanctions if Russia does.

DOJ_NMG_0009357

In its five years in office, the Bush administration has engaged in a long-running internal debate over how to deal with Iran. Hard-liners at the Pentagon and Mr. Cheney's office argued against having any diplomatic contacts with Tehran.

Some at the State Department say privately that more efforts might have yielded some results, and they got the administration to go along with the European efforts to offer economic benefits last year.

Iran has had two military plane crashes in the last month, for example, and these officials argue that the offer of spare parts for commercial aircraft might have done the trick.

Some conservatives in the administration have begun to play with the idea that the best that could be done is to delay Iran's nuclear bomb-making ability, and the United States should use the time to try to encourage political change within Iran.

A small effort has begun to provide assistance to dissident groups, for example. But a meeting to discuss further openings with Iran as a means to undermine the government was canceled last year after The Wall Street Journal disclosed the plans and hard-liners attacked them as too conciliatory.

Pressure Mounts On Iran As UK Vows To Go To UN (FT)

By Roula Khalaf In London And Daniel Dombey In Brussels

Financial Times, January 12, 2006

Britain yesterday vowed to report Iran to the United Nations Security Council, intensifying diplomatic pressure over Tehran's nuclear programme.

Responding to Iran's decision to resume limited uranium enrichment research, Tony Blair, the UK prime minister, told parliament: "I think the first thing to do is to secure agreement for a reference to the Security Council, [if] that is indeed what the allies jointly decide, as I think seems likely."

European officials warned that Tehran would have to reinstate the seals at its Natanz research facility and refrain from all the activities it announced this week if it wanted to avoid a UN referral. "We made clear in December they had to retain the full suspension. Removing the seals [at the Natanz plant] was the critical step. They've crossed the red line," said one diplomat. "A half-step back will not stop us [in seeking a UN referral]."

A meeting between the British, French and German foreign ministers in Berlin on Thursday is expected to call for an emergency session this month of the International Atomic Energy Agency, the UN's nuclear watchdog, which would then discuss a referral of the dispute to the UN. A referral would require a majority vote in the 35-member IAEA board.

Angela Merkel, German chancellor, will also discuss the issue with George W. Bush, US president, in Washington tomorrow and with Vladimir Putin, Russian president, in Moscow on Monday.

Germany, previously often seen as taking a "softer" policy on Iran than the other large EU countries, now maintains that there is no remaining ground for discussions with Iran, following Tehran's actions this week.

The case for referral will be strengthened by the report for the next IAEA board meeting, in which Mohamed ElBaradei, the agency's director-general, is set to conclude that he has made "no progress" in convincing Iran to reveal more about its nuclear programme, which Tehran maintains is peaceful.

European diplomats also appeared confident that Russia would not oppose a referral although so far Moscow has been reluctant to back such a move publicly.

The diplomats emphasise that over the weekend Russia and China joined with the three other permanent UN Security Council members and sent diplomatic "demarches" calling for Iran to desist from its nuclear research. The demarches also asked Iran to pass on a sensitive document it received from Pakistan's AQ Khan nuclear procurement network in the 1980s that some diplomats see as evidence of Tehran's interest in developing nuclear weapons.

Nuclear experts yesterday cautioned that Iran's current plans posed no short-term risk of large-scale production of nuclear material. Iran on Tuesday said it was planning to install small-scale gas ultracentrifuge cascades at a pilot enrichment plant in Natanz and to feed UF6 gas into the cascades for research purposes.

But experts familiar with UN inspectors' work in Iran said any enrichment was a long way off because some of the centrifuges at the pilot plant had crashed when the plant was shut down in 2004. But diplomats, say even small-scale enrichment would bring Iran closer to mastering the production of fuel that could be used for military or civilian purposes.

DOJ_NMG_0009358

If it reaches the UN Security Council, the first step is likely to be a UN resolution calling on Iran to abide by the demands of the IAEA.

Additional reporting by Bertrand Benoit and Hugh Williamson in Berlin, and Mark Turner at the United Nations

Iran Crosses Last Red Line; UN Sanctions Ahead? (CSM)

By Peter Ford

The Christian Science Monitor, January 12, 2006

PARIS - Iran's abrupt resumption of its nuclear program this week, throwing Tehran's clerical regime into open conflict with the rest of the world, appears to have doomed current diplomatic efforts to curb the country's nuclear ambitions.

Ending a two-year freeze on research into uranium enrichment - an essential step in the production of both nuclear reactors and bombs - Iranian officials reopened the Natanz nuclear research facility on Tuesday. European leaders who had negotiated the research suspension said the move marked the end of their readiness for talks.

Foreign ministers from Britain, France, and Germany, whose two years of diplomatic efforts failed to persuade Iran to drop uranium enrichment permanently, are expected to launch a bid Thursday to refer Iran to the UN Security Council, which could enforce economic and political sanctions. There are signs, for the first time, that Russia and China may not stand in their way.

"We were in crisis management mode, offering dialogue," says a European diplomat close to the negotiations. "Now we have gone through every single red line. We have to move to another stage."

"The European Union door is shut and the Iranians have thrown away the key," added Ali Ansari, an expert on Iranian politics at St. Andrew's University in Scotland. "This was a symbolic slap in the face for the Europeans."

Iran insists its nuclear program is only for peaceful, electricity-generating purposes, and that it therefore has the right under the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT) to develop the full nuclear fuel cycle.

The US, increasingly supported by EU nations, claims Tehran is seeking to build a nuclear bomb. It is also worried by Iran's program to develop a long-range missile that could deliver it to Vienna - or Israel.

A three-year probe by the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) has found no hard evidence that Iran is seeking a nuclear weapon but has raised many unanswered questions. Chief among them is why the Iranian authorities hid large parts of their nuclear program for years, before they were revealed by an exile opposition group in 2002.

"I am running out of patience, the international community is running out of patience" with Iran's evasiveness over nuclear issues, IAEA chief Mohammed ElBaradei told Britain's Sky News television earlier this week.

If enriched to a low level, uranium can be used in power stations. But enriched to a higher degree, it can be used in nuclear warheads. To reassure the world of its peaceful intentions, Iran promised its European negotiating partners in October 2003 to suspend all activities related to the enrichment of uranium in return for political and economic incentives. Iran broke that pledge Tuesday.

While Washington and European governments appear ready to push for United Nations sanctions, which can be imposed only by the UN Security Council, Russia and China - both veto-wielding members of the Council - appear more cautious.

Traditionally Moscow and Beijing have been sympathetic to Tehran, but European diplomats had some success in winning their understanding.

Both China and Russia wrote letters to the Iranian government last weekend urging it to maintain its enrichment moratorium. Tuesday's move snubbed both.

Russian Defense Minister Sergei Ivanov said Wednesday he was "disappointed and worried" by Tehran's decision, which he added was "not following the best case scenario." In Beijing, the chairman of China's National People's Congress, Wu Bangguo, told visiting US lawmakers Wednesday that his government "agreed to working with the United States and especially the EU3 on Iran," according to Mark Kirk, a Republican Congressman.

Recent inflammatory comments by Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad attacking Israel and calling the Holocaust into doubt have not helped Iran's cause abroad. "Ahmadinejad has given them (the Americans) an open goal," says Dr. Ansari. "Even the Russians and the Chinese are getting fed up."

DOJ_NMG_0009359

The first test of the diplomatic waters will come at the "extraordinary" meeting of the IAEA board which the European foreign ministers and EU foreign policy czar Javier Solana are expected to call for on Thursday, after consulting with US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

At the IAEA, Russia may seek to delay a referral of Iran's nuclear program to the UN Security Council because Moscow is still offering one possible way out of the crisis - a proposal that Iran's uranium be enriched in Russia, to ensure that none of it is diverted to illegal military purposes.

Iran hasn't rejected the idea, and is due to send a delegation to Moscow on Feb. 16 to discuss it further. But some observers think Iranians won't take the offer seriously, against a background of prickly relations.

"The history of Iranian-Rusisan is pretty appalling. It's not a track record you'd want to rely on," says Dr. Ansari.

If Iran is referred to the Security Council for violating the NPT by hiding much of its nuclear program for two decades, members will face a number of sanctions options, ranging from a suspension of economic ties to breaking diplomatic relations with Tehran.

None of them is pain-free for the international community, however, say observers.

"Interrupting diplomatic relations would send a powerful signal but its consequences would not be obviously favorable to us, since we would lose direct knowledge of what was going on in Iran," points out François Heisbourg, head of the Strategic Research Foundation, a think tank in Paris.

Refusing to buy Iranian oil - another option - would raise international oil prices to levels that would threaten the world economy, he adds. The Russians, too, are cautious about sanctions, says Yevgeny Bazhanov of Moscow's Diplomatic Academy.

"We're not against sanctions, but think they should be ... targeted to solve the problem. We wouldn't support blanket punishment, or ultimatums, but only sanctions that really work," says Mr. Bazhanov.

The EU is anxious to steer the crisis towards the United Nations if only to head off the prospect of an Israeli strike on Iran's nuclear facilities.

Though some US voices have been raised in favor of a military strike against Iranian nuclear installations, such an attack would undoubtedly prompt Iran to use all its considerable influence among Shiite Muslims in Iraq to undermine US goals there.

"The diplomatic game is the only game in town" when it comes to dealing with Iran's nuclear program, argues Mr. Heisbourg. "It is not working, but I know of no other."

Iran's Nuclear Challenge (WP)

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

IRAN'S RESUMPTION of uranium enrichment dramatically narrows the options of Western governments that hope to prevent its Islamic regime from acquiring nuclear weapons. The breaking of seals at its Natanz plant Tuesday directly violated an agreement Tehran struck with Britain, France and Germany in 2004 to suspend its enrichment program; that should end European hopes that economic favors could be exchanged for a permanent freeze. A Russian offer to enrich Iranian uranium has no greater prospect of success: Tehran announced its new, supposedly experimental work before it had responded to Moscow. Notions of a broader "grand bargain" between Iran and the West have been rendered ludicrous by the rantings of President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, who has denied the Holocaust more vigorously than he has Iran's plans to become a nuclear power. And thanks to better footwork by the Bush administration, European governments no longer have the option of blaming the United States for the failure of diplomacy.

That leaves the strategy that the United States has been pressing all along, which is referring Iran's case to the U.N. Security Council. Such a referral, which must come from the board of the International Atomic Energy Agency, probably won't change Iranian behavior or lead to Security Council action; North Korea has been before the council for three years without result. But having promised that consequence in the event of a resumption of enrichment, European governments must now move forward. To shrink from referring Iran to the Security Council now would strip the West of its remaining credibility in Tehran and all but eliminate the possibility of a peaceful solution.

As it is, the weak response to Iran's last provocation, the reopening of a uranium conversion facility in August, probably encouraged this week's escalation. European governments issued angry statements and helped pass an IAEA resolution that spoke of bringing Iran to the council at some indefinite time. In the following weeks, however, the Europeans returned to the same negotiating strategy that had already failed, offering to resume talks with Iran and backing Russia's intervention. The Bush administration, too, supported this course, in keeping with its strategy of building a coalition rather than squabbling over tactics with allies. The net result was that Iran's belligerence was answered with more appeasement.

DOJ_NMG_0009360

The mullahs are gambling that the same will happen in this case: that European governments will once again temporize or that Russia and China will prevent any meaningful Security Council action. Even if the Europeans respond firmly, and a resolution is adopted by the IAEA, the latter calculation is probably a good one. Russia, which just signed a $1 billion arms sale agreement with Iran, is increasingly hostile to Western initiatives, and China is a major consumer of Iranian oil. So while the means of the Security Council must be tried, Western governments should also begin fashioning a policy of sanctions and containment for Iran that can be applied by a coalition of the willing. That should be coupled with a more concerted effort to support the large part of the Iranian population that yearns to free itself from repressive clerical rule. If there is to be a credible alternative to military action against Iranian facilities -- or the concession of nuclear weapons to a regime that openly advocates wiping Israel from the map -- now is the time for Europe and the United States to agree on it.

Help Us, America . . . (WSJ)

By Farouz Farzami

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2006

TEHRAN -- On the surface, it would appear that pressure from the United Nations and the United States has little effect on the mullahs who rule Iran. The opposite is true.

The best current example is the standoff over Iran's nuclear program. Fearing that the mullahs are secretly developing nuclear weapons, the U.N. wants strict limits on Iran's nuclear program. The country's top nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, and Iran's new president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, have refused to consider any such limits, even after Russia offered a compromise that would permit Iran to enrich uranium on its soil. The president and the top negotiator have been defiant -- on state-run TV recently, Mr. Larijani, thinking several steps ahead, pledged a "crushing response" to any military attack by the U.S. or Israel.

But if you look past this headline-generating bluster, you see that Western pressure is having an effect. The hard-line position of the Iranian government has begun to splinter. There are now three minds about this issue in the Majlis, the Iranian parliament:

• A categorical rejection of the Russian proposal to allow Iran to enrich uranium at its facilities, a compromise that would deny Iran the privilege of enriching uranium on its own soil.

• Modifying the Russian proposal to allow for enrichment to occur in both Russia and Iran.

• Suspending all enrichment until further notice or even to some agreed-upon future date, to defuse tension and rebuild confidence with the European Union.

The existence of these more conciliatory positions in a Majlis completely composed of religious hard-liners is a surprise. (A fourth point of view unrepresented officially, since reformers have been thrown out of the government, calls for Iran to comply with the U.N.'s demands and give up on enrichment of nuclear fuel altogether.)

There is only one reason why these divisions have appeared within the formerly monolithic Majlis: the tough stand by the international community backed by American and Israeli military might. I understand the opposition of liberals in America and Europe to America's military moves in the Middle East, and they are right to be concerned about the continuing loss of life. But they should also appreciate the importance of American power in enforcing global standards. Without U.S. military, economic and diplomatic pressures, the leader-for-life of Libya, Col. Moammar Gadhafi would not be behaving himself today, and the people of Afghanistan would still be under the thumb of the Taliban.

Iran is, of course, not comparable to Libya or Afghanistan, but everyone in Tehran's bazaar knows that any flare-up of tension between Iran and the West has an immediate adverse impact on the Rial, the country's currency, particularly against the U.S. dollar. The slightest Western pressure and Tehran's stock market nose-dives.

Why won't the U.S. take advantage of this? Why not impose smart sanctions on Iran instead of smart bombs, and apply strong international pressure for the formation of independent and secular political parties? Currently, the only parties allowed are

DOJ_NMG_0009361

Islamic ones approved and subsidized by the authoritarian, theocratic regime. We desperately need a push from America and the West to separate church from state in Iran.

If I were an American, I would probably be content with the well-being of myself and my own family, and would be inclined to oppose my country's involvement in Middle East politics -- but I am not an American. I am an Iranian. I am a subject, not a citizen, of a Middle Eastern country with a long history of despotism. My country will not change without help from the West. I wish the only superpower in the 21st century would realize its full potential in diplomacy, economic leverage and, as a last resort, military action -- not just to stop Iran's nuclear ambitions, but to speed up democratization in the region.

I am impatient for it. We have those like Shirin Ebadi, Iran's Nobel Peace Prize winner and prominent reformer, who call for allowing democracy to evolve. But Ms. Ebadi is a rich woman, a member of the country's small elite that has never had to struggle to make a living. Maybe she and those patient ones like her can afford to wait another century for democracy to materialize out of the blue.

Not me. I need help. If America could accept its power and potential, it could begin forcing change right now.

Ms. Farzami is an Iranian journalist who is forbidden to publish in her own country.

A Firebrand In A House Of Cards (NYT)

By Dariush Zahedi And Omid Memarian

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

Berkeley, Calif.

IN defying international monitors and breaking the seals on its nuclear facilities, Iran seems to be courting confrontation. But Western leaders would do well to consider what President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's bravado really says about Iran's likely posture in the region and at the nuclear talks that are scheduled to resume at the end of January. To continue down the path of conflict could be very costly, both for the regional interests of the United States and most of all, for the territorial integrity of Iran.

Mr. Ahmadinejad is surely motivated by ideology and the desire to solidify the position of the security faction within Iran's ruling elite. But he also appears to be acting on the perception that the United States is in a position of considerable, indeed unprecedented, weakness. America's military is overstretched in Iraq and Afghanistan, and Washington has focused on monitoring North Korea's nuclear program rather than Iran's. If threatened, Iran could wreak havoc in Afghanistan, Iraq, Lebanon and Israel. These observations may lead Mr. Ahmadinejad to an incorrect assessment of Iran's strength relative to any American threat.

In fact, Iran has serious domestic frailties, including a shaky economy and its attendant unemployment and popular resentment, not to mention soaring levels of drug abuse and a brain drain. But President Ahmadinejad no doubt takes comfort not only in his belief in divine protection but also in the knowledge that Shiite religious parties aligned with Iran are now the dominant political forces in Iraq, while the American public hardly seems amenable to waging another war in the region. Moreover, Mr. Ahmadinejad very likely believes that the best way to guard against regime change from without is to emulate North Korea by swiftly advancing Iran's nuclear capacity.

The new president also surely knows that even if Iran's nuclear dossier is referred to the United Nations Security Council, meaningful multilateral sanctions against the Islamic Republic will most likely be vetoed by Russia or China. Flush with petrodollars, Iran has become a major purchaser of Russian technology, including roughly $1 billion worth of allegedly defensive weapons that Moscow recently agreed to sell to Tehran. Meanwhile, China, seizing on Iran as a key producer of oil and gas not beholden to the United States, has quickly emerged as one of Iran's largest trading partners.

Given this favorable strategic picture, Mr. Ahmadinejad might even welcome an American or Israeli strike on Iran's nuclear facilities. Tehran could then retaliate against American and Israeli interests by mobilizing its Shiite allies in Iraq, the Persian Gulf countries and Lebanon - or even by making common cause with some Sunni rivals. All the while, Mr. Ahmadinejad's faction in government would make full use of the war footing to marginalize its rivals at home and crush the remnants of Iran's civil society.

But the Iranian regime is not invulnerable, and Washington knows this. Just as Iran can use the Shiite card to create mischief in the region, the United States could manipulate ethnic and sectarian tensions in Iran, which has significant, largely Sunni, minority populations along its borders.

DOJ_NMG_0009362

Many of Iran's ethnic and religious minorities see themselves as victims of discrimination, and they have not been effectively integrated into Iranian economic, political or cultural life. Some two million disgruntled Arabs reside mainly in the oil- and gas- rich province of Khuzestan. The United States could make serious trouble for Tehran by providing financial, logistical and moral support to Arab secessionists in that province. Other aggrieved Iranian minorities would be emboldened by the Arabs' example - for example, the Kurds and the Baluchis, or even the Azeris (though the Azeris, being Shiites, are better integrated into Iranian society). A simple spark could suffice to set off centrifugal explosions.

Furthermore, the plummeting Iranian economy will only worsen if the United States succeeds in referring Iran's nuclear file to the Security Council, whether or not meaningful sanctions follow. Such a referral would accelerate capital flight, deal a blow to the country's already collapsing stock market, devastate its hitherto booming real estate market, and wipe out the savings of a large part of the middle class. It would also most likely result in galloping inflation, hurting Iran's dispossessed, whom the Ahmadinejad administration claims to represent.

In light of these ominous possibilities, both Mr. Ahmadinejad and Mr. Bush would do well to avoid overplaying their hands. They should take a leaf from the book not of Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini the ideologue, but of Ayatollah Khomeini the pragmatic politician. Like Mr. Ahmadinejad, Ayatollah Khomeini argued that the "Zionist entity" should be wiped off the map. But he chose regime preservation over ideology when he ended the Iran-Iraq war and even bought weapons from Israel.

IRAN should endeavor to regain the trust of the international community by engaging in compromise, and the United States should allow this compromise to be sufficiently face-saving for Iran's ruling elite. To regain the confidence of the international community, Iran should accept the Russian offer to process Iranian uranium gas into fuel and voluntarily stop, for a specified time, insisting on its right to do so at home.

In return, the United States should lift its unilateral sanctions from Iran. These sanctions, which include a ban on the sale of aircraft and spare parts to Iran, have absolutely no effect on the regime's nuclear capacity, but they harm Iranian civilians.

Today the incentive for both sides to step away from the brink of conflict is even greater than it was at the end of the Iran-Iraq war. If the United States responds to a perceived Iranian threat by exploiting Iran's ethnic, sectarian and economic cleavages, it is not just the Islamic Republic that will be threatened - Iran itself could be dismembered as well.

Rice Threatens Syria With U.N. Action (AP)

By Anne Gearan

The Associated Press, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice issued a new threat Wednesday to haul a defiant Syria before the U.N. Security Council if Damascus does not cooperate with an investigation into a political assassination in Lebanon.

"The United States has grave and continuing concerns about Syria's destabilizing behavior and sponsorship of terrorism," Rice said in a statement.

Syria has failed to heed U.N. Security Council warnings about its behavior in Lebanon and elsewhere, Rice said.

"We call upon the Syrian regime to respond positively to the requests" of the U.N. investigator looking into the killing of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri, Rice said. "We intend to refer this matter back to the Security Council if Syrian obstruction continues."

The United States opposes "any deals or compromises" with Damascus that would undermine the investigation, she said.

The U.N. probe into Hariri's killing has already implicated Syria, but Damascus has denied the allegations.

Hariri, a Lebanese nationalist who sought to assist his country in wiggling free from Syrian control, was assassinated in a truck bombing Feb. 14 in Beirut. The blast killed 20 other people and set off street demonstrations that forced withdrawal of Syrian forces from Lebanon after nearly three decades.

The United States has not accused Syria outright of ordering Hariri's killing, although it has come close. Washington pulled its ambassador from Damascus shortly after the killing and has since steadily increased pressure on the government of Bashar Assad.

The United States also wants international investigation of other political killings in Lebanon that followed Hariri's death.

DOJ_NMG_0009363

"Syria must once and for all end its interference in the internal affairs of Lebanon," Rice said. "Continuing assassinations in Lebanon of opponents of Syrian domination ... create an atmosphere of fear that Syria uses to intimidate Lebanon."

U.S. Tells Syria To Cooperate, Threatens UN Action (NYT/REU)

By Reuters

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

Condoleezza Rice threatened on Wednesday to send the inquiry into the murder of Lebanon's former prime minister back to the U.N. Security Council if Syrian ``obstruction" continued.

In a strongly worded statement, Rice also voiced grave concerns about what she said was Syria's ``destabilizing behavior and sponsorship of terrorism" and said Damascus must stop interfering in the affairs of neighboring Lebanon.

``Syria must cease obstructing the investigation into the assassination of former Lebanese Prime Minister Hariri and instead cooperate fully and unconditionally as required by U.N. Security Council resolutions," said Rice in a statement.

U.N. investigators have been trying to interview Syrian President Bashar al-Assad as part of an inquiry into the February 14 Beirut murder of former Prime Minister Rafik al-Hariri, an opponent of Syrian domination of his country.

The United Nations announced on Wednesday that Serge Brammertz, a Belgian prosecutor with the International Criminal Court, will be the new head of its investigation.

Rice urged Damascus to respond positively to the request by U.N. investigators to interview key officials.

``We intend to refer this matter back to the Security Council if Syrian obstruction continues," she said.

U.N. investigators have made clear in their reports to the Security Council that senior Syrian intelligence officials and their Lebanese allies were probably behind the killing of Hariri and 22 others. Syria has denied that Assad's government was involved in the assassination.

Rice said Washington rejected any deals or compromises that would undermine the U.N. investigation.

``We are firmly committed to seeking justice and pursuing the investigation to its ultimate conclusion," Rice said.

She also called for the full implementation of U.N. resolutions calling for the disarmament and disbanding of Hizbollah and other militias.

``Syria must once and for all end its interference in the internal affairs of Lebanon," she said.

Continued assassinations in Lebanon of opponents of Syrian domination, including the murder of journalist Gebran Tueni last month, created an atmosphere of fear that Syria used to intimidate Lebanon, she said.

``Syria must cease this intimidation and immediately come into compliance with all relevant Security Council resolutions," said Rice.

Rice Threatens Syria With U.N. Action (NSDY/AP)

By Anne Gearan, Ap Diplomatic Writer

Long Island Newsday, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice issued a new threat Wednesday to haul a defiant Syria before the U.N. Security Council if Damascus does not cooperate with an investigation into a political assassination in Lebanon.

"The United States has grave and continuing concerns about Syria's destabilizing behavior and sponsorship of terrorism," Rice said in a statement.

Syria has failed to heed U.N. Security Council warnings about its behavior in Lebanon and elsewhere, Rice said.

"We call upon the Syrian regime to respond positively to the requests" of the U.N. investigator looking into the killing of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri, Rice said. "We intend to refer this matter back to the Security Council if Syrian obstruction continues."

The United States opposes "any deals or compromises" with Damascus that would undermine the investigation, she said.

The U.N. probe into Hariri's killing has already implicated Syria, but Damascus has denied the allegations.

Hariri, a Lebanese nationalist who sought to assist his country in wiggling free from Syrian control, was assassinated in a truck bombing Feb. 14 in Beirut. The blast killed 20 other people and set off street demonstrations that forced withdrawal of Syrian forces from Lebanon after nearly three decades.

DOJ_NMG_0009364

The United States has not accused Syria outright of ordering Hariri's killing, although it has come close. Washington pulled its ambassador from Damascus shortly after the killing and has since steadily increased pressure on the government of Bashar Assad.

The United States also wants international investigation of other political killings in Lebanon that followed Hariri's death.

"Syria must once and for all end its interference in the internal affairs of Lebanon," Rice said. "Continuing assassinations in Lebanon of opponents of Syrian domination ... create an atmosphere of fear that Syria uses to intimidate Lebanon."

U.S. Threatens To Take Syria To UN For Obstructing Hariri Probe (BLOOM)

By Janine Zacharia

Bloomberg, January 12, 2006

Jan. 11 (Bloomberg) -- The U.S. threatened to take Syria back to the United Nations Security Council if the nation's government continues to hinder a UN investigation into the murder of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri.

``Syria must cease obstructing the investigation into the assassination of former Lebanese Prime Minister Hariri and instead cooperate fully and unconditionally as required by UN Security Council resolutions," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said in a statement today in Washington.

Rice said Syria must ``respond positively" to investigators' requests or the U.S. will ``refer this matter back to the Security Council." Syrian President Bashar al-Assad and Foreign Minister Faruq al-Shara have rejected investigators' requests for interviews, Agence France-Presse reported Jan. 2.

Rice's statement came as Belgian prosecutor Serge Brammertz agreed to take over the UN-authorized probe of the Feb. 14 2005 truck bombing in Beirut that killed Hariri and 22 others. Syria has denied involvement in the attack.

Brammertz, 42, has served since September 2003 as a deputy prosecutor and head of the investigations division of the International Criminal Court at The Hague. Chosen by Secretary- General Kofi Annan, Brammertz succeeds German prosecutor Detlev Mehlis, who resigned after six months to return to his post in Berlin.

Mehlis said Lebanese and Syrian intelligence officials, including Assad's brother and brother-in-law, were implicated in the truck bombing.

Oct. 31 Resolution

Asked about the timing of Rice's statement, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said ``there's been a lot of discussion concerning Syria's failure to comply" with the Security Council Resolution passed 15-0 on Oct. 31 that says Syria must fully cooperate with the inquiry or face economic sanctions.

The Council voted Dec. 15 to extend the Hariri investigation for six months.

Public outrage at the murders forced Syria to comply with international demands to pull its troops from neighboring Lebanon in April.

The withdrawal ended a 29-year presence and led to an election victory in June that gave the anti-Syrian political bloc a majority in Lebanon's parliament.

The U.S. says Syria continues still to influence affairs in Lebanon. She said in her statement that the U.S. ``has grave and continuing concerns about Syria's destabilizing behavior and sponsorship of terrorism."

There was no answer at the Syrian embassy in Washington.

U.S. Ratchets Up Pressure On Syria In Hariri Probe (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Bush administration stepped up pressure on Syria to cooperate with a United Nations inquiry into the killing of a prominent Lebanese politician, threatening to bring Damascus before the world body for international censure.

In an unusually blunt statement, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said the U.S. "has grave and continuing concerns about Syria's destabilizing behavior and sponsorship of terrorism." Washington, she said, would bring Syria back before the U.N. Security Council if Damascus continues to "obstruct" the probe into the killing of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri.

DOJ_NMG_0009365

U.S. officials declined to specify what particular action the U.S. might pursue, but suggested the threat of some form of economic sanctions would be the logical next step. The U.S. also is vowing to seek economic sanctions within the U.N. against Iran because of its nuclear program.

Administration officials said Ms. Rice's statement was timed to underscore U.S. seriousness on the Syria front, but also to play off recent developments that pointed more strongly toward Syrian involvement in the Hariri killing as well as rifts within Syrian President Bashar Assad's government.

The U.S. ultimatum comes as former Syrian Vice President Abdul-Halim Khaddam, now in exile in Paris, has openly accused Mr. Assad of ordering the assassination of Mr. Hariri, a powerful critic of Syria's deep involvement in Lebanese affairs. Mr. Khaddam said in a French radio interview Tuesday that it is his "ultimate conviction" that Mr. Assad personally directed the February truck bombing of Mr. Hariri's motorcade in Beirut.

The U.S. has supported a push by U.N. investigators to interview Mr. Assad. Mr. Khaddam, a veteran Ba'ath Party official who was forced out of office in June, met with the U.N. team last week in Paris.

Ms. Rice, in her statement, suggested that the U.S. suspects Syrian involvement in two other prominent assassinations in Lebanon late last year, one of a prominent journalist and the other of a member of the Lebanese Parliament. Sean McCormack, a State Department spokesman, said the U.S. couldn't "connect the dots" between Damascus and the most recent killings, but "there is certainly very clearly an attempt on the part of some to create this atmosphere of fear and violence in Lebanon."

The U.S., Britain and France tried last year to persuade the other two permanent Security Council members, Russia and China, to include the threat of at least targeted sanctions in a resolution demanding Syrian cooperation in the Hariri killing. Syria withdrew thousands of troops it had stationed in Lebanon for decades amid international pressure following the incident.

Likud Cabinet Ministers To Resign (WT)

The Washington Times, January 12, 2006

JERUSALEM -- Cabinet ministers from the Likud Party were to resign from the coalition government today, signaling an end to a weeklong political cease-fire following the massive stroke that felled Prime Minister Ariel Sharon.

The return to politics-as-usual began yesterday, with parties trading bitter slurs over whether to allow Palestinians to vote in their own elections in East Jerusalem this month and a suggestion that Mr. Sharon's name may remain atop his party's list of candidates for parliamentary elections in March.

Mr. Sharon's doctors reported "further slight improvement" in the ailing leader but cautioned that he could remain in the hospital for months.

Senior Hadassah hospital official Dr. Yair Birenbaum said it was "a little too soon" to say he is out of danger, while another doctor said he "can die tonight [or] go back to normal, relatively normal, life in six months."

Nevertheless, a new poll showed Mr. Sharon's recently formed Kadima party is a strong favorite to form the next government, even with his likely successor, Ehud Olmert, at the helm.

Channel Two said Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu had told his party members to go ahead with the Cabinet resignations, which had been planned for earlier in the week but were postponed after Mr. Sharon's stroke.

The step will have little practical impact on the government, which will serve only as a caretaker until the March elections. Likud hopes to sharpen the distinctions between itself and Kadima as it goes into the campaign.

Labor had already withdrawn its ministers from the Cabinet, meaning the government will be reduced to just six ministers after today.

Tempers flared earlier yesterday in response to suggestions from some of Mr. Sharon's allies that his name could remain at the top of Kadima's list of candidates.

Politicians from both Likud and Labor accused the centrist party of cynically exploiting the prime minister's name, acutely sensitive that Mr. Sharon's plight is liable to attract a large sympathy vote for his party.

Polls in the Ha'aretz and Ma'ariv dailies found that Kadima led by Mr. Olmert would take 44 to 45 seats in the 120-seat parliament, up from previous polls. The Labor Party under Amir Peretz would get 16 to 18 seats while Likud would get 13 to 15, the surveys found.

DOJ_NMG_0009366

"As someone who knows and values Sharon, it pains me that there are various elements around him who are trying to make a political fortune on the back of his illness," said Likud legislator Moshe Kahlon.

Mr. Peretz, who had previously instructed Labor activists to avoid strong campaign rhetoric, promptly reversed his decision.

"The election is starting right now. This is the first phase of the election," he told reporters at the party's election headquarters just outside Tel Aviv, now open for business.

Likud members, meanwhile, reacted angrily to an announcement by Defense Minister Shaul Mofaz that the government has agreed in principle to let Arab residents of East Jerusalem participate in this month's Palestinian parliamentary elections.

Mr. Sharon, before his stroke, had threatened to block voting in the city as long as the militant Palestinian movement Hamas was running candidates.

The United States has pressed Israel not to interfere in the balloting but Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice yesterday raised her strongest objections yet to the participation of Hamas, which is mounting a strong challenge to President Mahmoud Abbas' disorganized Fatah party.

"It remains the view of the United States that there should be no place in the political process for groups or individuals who refuse to renounce terror and violence, recognize Israel's right to exist, and disarm," she said in Washington.

Hamas has carried out nearly 60 suicide bombings against Israelis over the past five years and is considered a terrorist group by the United States. But it remains popular with Palestinians, largely because of its charity work and the provision of basic services that Fatah has failed to provide.

Sharon Physicians Fear Brain Damage (WT)

By Joyce Howard Price

The Washington Times, January 12, 2006

The movement that Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon experienced on both sides of his body after a massive stroke last week bodes well in terms of his survival, but he could live with brain damage, said physicians who treat stroke victims.

"The prime minister's life is still in danger," Dr. Jose Cohen, one of Mr. Sharon's neurosurgeons at Hadassah University Medical Center in Jerusalem, told the Associated Press. "Every day, although we are getting further out of danger, we are still in danger."

Doctors are weaning Mr. Sharon, 77, from sedatives that have kept him in an induced coma to reduce his blood pressure.

Dr. Cohen said the cerebral hemorrhage Mr. Sharon experienced Jan. 4 certainly would have caused cognitive damage.

"There is nothing you can do about that," he said.

Brain damage is experienced in "virtually 100 percent" of patients who suffer the kind of hemorrhagic stroke that felled Mr. Sharon, said Dr. Richard Zorowitz, a specialist in stroke recovery at the University of Pennsylvania Hospital in Philadelphia.

After Mr. Sharon is weaned from the sedatives, his doctors in Jerusalem can assess brain damage and function.

"I personally would not expect him to make a full recovery. ... He'll have to learn to walk and take care of himself all over again. ... It's highly unlikely he could resume his official duties," Dr. Zorowitz said.

Survival beyond a month typically is less than 50 percent for victims of the type of massive brain hemorrhage that Mr. Sharon suffered.

"It is looking better in terms of his survival, but there are still uncertainties in terms of his quality of life and level of function," said Dr. Zorowitz, also chairman of the National Stroke Association's recovery and rehabilitation advisory committee.

On Monday, the prime minister moved his right hand and leg slightly in response to pain stimulation. On Tuesday, movement on his right side increased, and he moved his left hand. Movement on his left side further improved yesterday.

"Injuries to the right side of the brain can cause significant deficits," although not usually as catastrophic as those to the left side, said Dr. Chelsea Kidwell, medical director of the Stroke Center at the Washington Hospital Center.

Dr. Kidwell and Dr. Zorowitz said these brain injuries could result in weakness or numbness on the body's left side, loss of vision in the left eye and paralysis.

Dr. Kidwell said it will have to be determined whether Mr. Sharon will need a feeding tube because some stroke patients have difficulty swallowing.

DOJ_NMG_0009367

Dr. Zorowitz cautioned that the prime minister could be left with "problems of memory, judgment and attention."

He said this could mean Mr. Sharon is no longer articulate and could have cognitive deficits in the "subject matter and content" of his speech.

Israelis' Anger At Evangelist May Delay Christian Center (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

JERUSALEM, Jan. 11 - Israel said Wednesday that it was breaking off negotiations on a tourism project with the evangelical leader Pat Robertson in response to his remarks suggesting that Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's stroke was divine retribution.

"We cannot accept these statements, and we will not sign any contracts with Mr. Robertson," said Ido Hartuv, a spokesman for the Tourism Ministry.

Israel has been in advanced negotiations with American evangelicals over a proposal for a large pilgrimage and tourism center in the hills near the Sea of Galilee, where Jesus lived and preached. Mr. Robertson has been the leading figure in the negotiations. Mr. Hartuv said Israel would be willing to continue the talks without him.

A spokeswoman for Mr. Robertson, Angell Watts, said in a statement from Virginia Beach: "We have not talked to the Israelis on this topic. We continue to maintain our longstanding commitment to the Jewish people and the State of Israel."

Under the proposal, Israel planned to provide at least 35 acres for the project, the Christian Heritage Center, and the evangelicals intended to raise $50 million for construction. Reports have said it would include a theme park, an auditorium and an outdoor theater.

Israel hopes the project would draw large numbers of Christian tourists from around the world and generate thousands of jobs in a thinly populated region that the government has long struggled to develop.

But Mr. Robertson upset many Israelis by suggesting Mr. Sharon's devastating stroke last Wednesday was divine punishment for pulling Israel out of Gaza last summer.

"God considers this land to be his," Mr. Robertson said Thursday on his television program, "The 700 Club." "For any prime minister of Israel who decides he will carve it up and give it away, God said, 'No, this is mine.' "

"I would say woe unto any prime minister of Israel who takes a similar course," Mr. Robertson added.

He went on to say Mr. Sharon was a "very likable person and I am sad to see him in this condition."

Evangelicals are strong supporters of Israel, and have formed alliances with various groups, particularly those opposed to any territorial concessions to the Palestinians. Israel has generally welcomed the political and financial support.

"Evangelicals are the best friends of Israel and they are very, very welcome here," Mr. Hartuv said.

Mr. Sharon's condition improved slightly on Wednesday, his doctors said. "We are pleased that there are small phases of development in the prime minister's condition," Dr. Yair Birenboim, a senior official at Hadassah-Ein Kerem Hospital in Jerusalem, said on Army Radio.

The doctors had said Tuesday that Mr. Sharon, 77, was out of immediate danger, but one of his neurosurgeons offered a more restrained prognosis on Wednesday.

"Until we have passed a few more stages, we are still very cautious," Dr. José Cohen told Israeli television. "We know that every day, although we are getting further out of danger, we are still in danger."

Doctors have been reducing the level of anesthetic since Monday, with the intention of gradually bringing Mr. Sharon out of his medically induced coma. The hospital statement said he remained lightly sedated on Wednesday.

The campaign for March 28 national elections have been on hold since Mr. Sharon's stroke but the politicking has begun to pick up again.

In a poll on Wednesday in the newspaper Haaretz, Mr. Sharon's recently established Kadima Party had gained support in the past week despite the almost universal assumption that Mr. Sharon will not return to political life.

Several polls before and just after Mr. Sharon's stroke indicated that Kadima would win about 40 of the 120 seats in Parliament. But Wednesday's survey found that the centrist Kadima would take 44 seats. Its closest rival, the left-leaning Labor Party, would get 16 seats, and the rightist Likud would take 13. The poll questioned 640 voters, but did not provide a margin of error.

DOJ_NMG_0009368

In the West Bank, Israeli security forces scuffled in the rain and mud with 300 Jewish settlers who tried to prevent the dismantling of an unauthorized settlement outpost south of Jerusalem.

The security forces eventually used tear gas to force out protesters who had barricaded themselves inside a new home near the formal settlement of Neve Daniel. Six protesters were arrested, the police said.

Israel has pledged to remove the West Bank outposts and has taken down some, but dozens remain, according to monitoring groups.

Is The Road Map's Moment Gone? (WP)

By Jim Hoagland

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

The United States, its European and Arab allies, and the United Nations have labored for four months to turn Israel's unilateral withdrawal from the Gaza Strip into a catalyst for the creation of an independent, viable Palestinian state. They are visibly failing.

Law and order have disappeared in the Gaza territory since the Israeli withdrawal. Kidnappings and gunfights, not campaign rallies, are the tools of electioneering there. Financial mismanagement by Mahmoud Abbas's Palestinian Authority has forced the World Bank to freeze $60 million in budget support and effectively move the PA toward bankruptcy in a matter of weeks.

The spiral toward chaos in Gaza and Ariel Sharon's sudden incapacitation by a severe stroke are destabilizing blows to President Bush's proclaimed strategy for transforming the Middle East into a zone of democracies. Bush must reassess whether he can get there from here.

With Sharon in power, the odds on the "road map" diplomatic process delivering the democratic Palestinian state that Bush and Sharon conditionally endorse were slim. Without Sharon in power, the odds drop to virtually zero.

The Gaza withdrawal was the product not of understandings between Sharon and Abbas but of an ambivalent if productive relationship between Sharon and Bush. Ending the occupation of Gaza was above all an Israeli-American arrangement, tied to the expectation that the Israeli prime minister's time in office would begin and end roughly with the American president's tenure.

The eight-year political balance sheet of give-and-take that the two leaders set up underpinned Sharon's formal acceptance of the U.N.-blessed process for creating a Palestinian state. The road map toward peace was a risk that the audacious Sharon was willing to take to secure Bush's backing, not an objective he sought or ever planned.

Just as Europeans abandoned colonialism to improve their own lives and not the lives of the Africans, Arabs and Asians they set free, Sharon ended Israel's occupation of Gaza solely for Israeli security reasons. He would wall in the Gazans with security fences and other measures and remain seemingly indifferent to what became of them.

But Sharon's daring gave Bush, the international community and, most of all, the Palestinians an opening that seemed to promise complete autonomy in Gaza and significant unilateral withdrawals from the West Bank if Sharon won reelection in March.

Sharon's incapacitation and the Gaza upheavals now call that opening into question. No other Israeli politician has the domestic support, the audacity and the force of personality to bulldoze forward historic change in the West Bank by the end of Bush's term. Moreover, the turmoil in Gaza is closing the window of international support for such change.

The road map, like most formulas for peacemaking, is based on the commendable premise that everyone deserves a second or even third chance. Right now the Palestinians are severely testing that article of faith -- at a moment when they have everything to gain from taking responsibility for their affairs and demonstrating political maturity.

Forcing Egyptian police officers and European Union observers to flee their posts for safety hardly suggests maturity. Neither does the decision by the Palestinian Authority to raise salaries and break its commitment to live within the large aid flows that international donors provide. That act triggered the freeze on budget support by the World Bank.

DOJ_NMG_0009369

After Yasser Arafat died, "we hoped for new momentum in the direction of governmental reforms and the fight against corruption," World Bank representative Nigel Roberts told the Israeli daily Haaretz this week. But "Arafatism" lives on without Arafat and has grown worse, Roberts added.

Instead of moving to transform themselves into the nucleus of one of the Arab world's first true democracies -- as Bush, Sharon and their road-map partners pretended the Palestinians quickly could -- the Palestinian territories continue to be angry, explosive ghettos. In Gaza, gunmen who recently were receiving financial rewards for attacking Israelis are now "unemployed" and threaten their neighbors and the Palestinian Authority.

It must be said that four months is a short time to fix the consequences of centuries of occupation of the Palestinians by Turks, Arabs and Israelis, as well as the damage caused by the scandalous insistence of Arab states and the United Nations that the Palestinians remain enclosed in permanent refugee camps, even on their own lands.

Yes, that must be said. But so must this: The striking down of Ariel Sharon at a crucial moment of transformation demonstrates that in the Middle East today, a short time is the only time you've got.

U.S. Wants To Resume N.Korea Nuke Talks (AP)

By Kwang-tae Kim

The Associated Press, January 12, 2006

SEOUL, South Korea — The United States wants to quickly resume nuclear talks with North Korea, the U.S. envoy to Seoul said Thursday, as the top American negotiator headed to China for discussions on the North's nuclear ambitions.

"The United States is eager to resume negotiations as soon as possible so that we can make rapid progress toward the elimination of North Korea's nuclear programs," U.S. ambassador Alexander Vershbow said in a speech in Seoul. "Our negotiators are packed and ready to go."

Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, who arrived in South Korea late Wednesday from Tokyo, said he would seek information in Beijing on the latest North Korean thinking from its closest ally.

Hill's Asia trip comes as six-nation nuclear talks aimed at getting North Korea to abandon its nuclear programs are stalled over Pyongyang's anger at U.S.-imposed sanctions related to alleged counterfeiting and other wrongdoing by the North.

"We'll have to see what the Chinese have heard most recently from the DPRK side, and perhaps they have some very fresh news," Hill said upon arrival in Seoul, referring to the North by the abbreviation of its official name, the Democratic People's Republic of Korea.

His schedule of talks with counterparts in Tokyo, Seoul and Beijing is taking place amid unconfirmed reports that reclusive North Korean leader Kim Jong Il is in China.

The North Korean strongman is widely believed to have gone by train Tuesday to China, his country's closest ally. But the trip has yet to be officially announced by North Korean or Chinese authorities, and his ultimate destination is unknown.

"I must say the trip that Chairman Kim Jong Il took to China was a surprise to all of us," Hill said upon arrival in Seoul. "It's a complete coincidence that I'm in the area at the same time. There is no such plan of any kind" to meet Kim.

In South Korea, Hill talked with his South Korean counterpart Song Min-soon about "ways to resume the nuclear talks and to produce substantial progress," Song told The Associated Press after the closed-door meeting.

China, Japan, Russia, South Korea and the United States have been engaged in negotiations with North Korea since 2003 aimed at persuading it to abandon its nuclear programs. The process resulted in a breakthrough in September when the North pledged to give up its nuclear program in exchange for aid and security assurances. But follow-up negotiations have stalled.

Vershbow said a Treasury Department delegation planned to visit South Korea in about 10 days for consultations with South Korean officials over the alleged North Korean financial activities that led to the sanctions.

In September, Washington slapped the sanctions on a bank in the Chinese territory of Macau, alleging it helped the North distribute counterfeit currency and engage in other illicit activities. The next month, Washington sanctioned eight North Korean companies it claimed were fronts for proliferating weapons of mass destruction.

North Korea denies the allegations.

Vershbow said the Treasury delegation would travel to Macau after visiting South Korea.

DOJ_NMG_0009370

North Korea And Iran Win Special Notice At Spy Center (NYT)

By Douglas Jehl

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 11 - The director of national intelligence, John D. Negroponte, has created new "mission managers" for Iran and North Korea, adding those two countries to a short list of top-priority challenges for American intelligence agencies.

Iran and North Korea join counterterrorism and nuclear counterproliferation as areas of focus for senior management posts that were recommended last year by a high-level presidential commission.

The new managers for Iran and North Korea will be responsible, among other things, for identifying and filling gaps in intelligence on those two countries, Mr. Negroponte's office said Wednesday in announcing the appointments. Joseph DeTrani, who has served most recently as the American special envoy to the six-party talks on North Korea, has been given the rank of ambassador and is taking on the North Korea portfolio; S. Leslie Ireland, a career intelligence officer and Middle East specialist, is to become mission manager for Iran.

Ambassador DeTrani and Ms. Ireland are to provide strategic leadership over American intelligence agencies' work on North Korea and Iran, whose nuclear-weapons programs remain a major concern of the Bush administration, in part because so little is known about them. In its report last year, the Robb-Silberman commission, an independent panel appointed by President Bush, described American intelligence on Iran and North Korea as woefully inadequate.

The other two mission managers appointed by Mr. Negroponte have already assumed their roles. They are Vice Adm. John Scott Redd, retired, director of the National Counterterrorism Center; and Kenneth Brill, the director of National Counterproliferation Center.

Admiral Redd served as executive director of the Robb-Silberman commission, which recommended the creation of the mission-manager posts. Mr. Negroponte has said that the mission managers have his full proxy, and should be expected to play the same role that he would if he could devote his full day to a single issue.

Ambassador DeTrani, who speaks Chinese and French, spent a number of years in East Asia and the Middle East during a career that included senior assignments at the Central Intelligence Agency, according to his official biography. At the C.I.A., his posts included director of European operations, director of the crime and narcotics center, and director of East Asia operations.

Ms. Ireland has served most recently as the executive assistant to Porter J. Goss, the C.I.A. director. According to her official biography, she is also a recipient of the Intelligence Commendation Medal. Over a 20-year career, she has also served as deputy chief for Arab-Israeli issues and special adviser for Iran collection issues, and as country director for Iran and Kuwait in the office of the Secretary of Defense.

North Korean Leader's Whereabouts Unknown (AP)

By Elaine Kurtenbach, Associated Press Writer

The Associated Press, January 12, 2006

The whereabouts of North Korean leader Kim Jong Il remained unclear Thursday, with a Hong Kong-based television network speculating he may be headed for the south Chinese city of Guangzhou, while other reports put him in Beijing or Russia.

Phoenix Television reported that three major hotels in Guangzhou known to be used for VIP visitors were largely empty and requiring guests to check out by tomorrow.

A sales department employee at Guangzhou's famed White Swan hotel confirmed that they were expecting a "a very important visitor" beginning on Friday. She would not give her name, since she was not authorized to speak publicly.

"From January 12th-15th, we won't accept any new bookings. Some guests may have to move," said the hotel's assistant general manager, Janet Xie, without giving a reason.

A staffer at the hotel's publicity department, meanwhile, denied that Kim was expected to visit.

Local officials said they were in the dark.

"I've never heard of this," said Shi Lishi, a spokesman for the Guangzhou city government.

The White Swan, a large, elegant hotel on a quiet island in the Pearl River, would offer relatively good security and secrecy given its location.

DOJ_NMG_0009371

Reports of a visit by Kim to China, a rare foray overseas for the reclusive leader, came amid efforts to restart stalled six-nation talks on dismantling North Korea's nuclear program.

The chief U.S. envoy to the nuclear talks, Christopher Hill, was visiting South Korea on Thursday, en route from Tokyo to Beijing. The U.S. ambassador to Seoul, meanwhile, said Washington was hoping to quickly resume the talks.

U.S. and Chinese officials said they could not confirm various reports, mostly by South Korean media, saying that Kim entered China by special train earlier in the week and traveled either to Beijing, Shanghai or Russia.

In Washington, U.S. State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said he had seen the news reports, "But I can't confirm or deny them."

Hill was not expected to meet with Kim, McCormack said.

On Wednesday, officials in Shanghai also disavowed any information about Kim's whereabouts.

"I have not received any information whatsoever about this," Jiao Yang, the city government spokeswoman, said at a regularly scheduled news conference.

In the past, visits by Kim to China have been reported only after his departure. The Chinese Foreign Ministry said Tuesday that Kim planned to visit China, but would not give the exact timing.

Kim last visited China in April 2004. According to the North's Korean Central News Agency, one of his last appearances was to attend a New Year's performance of "Blue Sky Over My Country" in Pyongyang on Jan. 6.

Despite China's modern communications networks and crowded cities, the country has an elaborate and pervasive state security network well practiced at preserving the secrecy of its Communist Party leaders.

Disclosure of the wide range of information deemed to be state secrets can result in long prison terms.

Kim Jong Il Said To Reach Shanghai By Plane (WP)

By Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

SEOUL, Jan. 11 -- North Korean leader Kim Jong Il toured Shanghai on Wednesday after reportedly arriving on a direct flight from the North Korean capital in what would mark the reclusive ruler's first overseas trip by plane, according to South Korea's semi-official Yonhap news service.

Quoting unnamed diplomatic sources, Yonhap said Kim was on a three-day trip to China's business hub, which he last visited in 2001 to see the city's vast economic expansion. Kim reportedly fears flying, and news agencies in Japan and South Korea said earlier that he had arrived in China aboard his private train and was perhaps en route to Russia.

But Yonhap said Kim had landed in Shanghai after a direct flight from Pyongyang and was likely to stop in Beijing for meetings with President Hu Jintao and other Chinese leaders before returning to North Korea.

South Korean officials could not immediately confirm Yonhap's report and North Korea's official media did not comment on the visit.

If the report is true, analysts said that Kim's visit could represent an effort to win China's support for lifting U.S. economic sanctions imposed late last year against North Korean companies believed to have ties to illicit activities, including currency counterfeiting. North Korea has said it would not return to six-nation talks aimed at dismantling its nuclear weapons program until those sanctions were lifted.

-- Anthony Faiola

US Hopes N.Korea's Kim In China For Nuclear Talk (REU)

By Jon Herskovitz

Reuters, January 12, 2006

The United States has little information about Kim Jong-il's apparent trip to China but hopes the North Korean leader is having talks that add life to stalled nuclear discussions, a senior U.S. official said on Thursday.

Various media reports -- citing witnesses, diplomatic sources and those familiar with his movements -- have said Kim is making a rare overseas trip to China. But his whereabouts, mode of travel and the purpose of his trip are all unclear.

DOJ_NMG_0009372

Some reports have said Kim took his train to China and was possibly on his way to Russia. South Korea's Yonhap news agency said he flew to Shanghai on what could be his first flight.

Media reports and diplomats say Kim -- like his late father, state founder Kim Il-sung -- has an aversion to flying.

The U.S. ambassador to South Korea, Alexander Vershbow, told a breakfast meeting of business leaders the United States was also trying to sort through the clues about Kim's possible visit to China, Pyongyang's main ally and source of aid.

"We hope that he is there and having high-level meetings," Vershbow said. "We hope they will produce a new impulse for progress in the six-party talks."

North Korea has threatened to boycott the nuclear talks among the two Koreas, China, Japan, Russia and the United States because of a U.S. crackdown on its finances. Pyongyang wants Washington to end the sanctions.

The United States has clamped down on several companies it suspects of aiding North Korea in counterfeiting, money laundering and the drugs trade, saying the illicit business has helped fund Pyongyang's nuclear weapons programmes.

A South Korean official would not speculate on whether Kim is out of the country but noted his overseas trips usually lead to better ties between the reclusive country and the outside world.

"If he is visiting China, this could have positive results," Vice Unification Minister Rhee Bong-jo told reporters.

"ILLICIT ACTIVITIES"

Vershbow said U.S. Treasury officials will head to South Korea, China and Macau in the next 10 days to discuss U.S. concerns about North Korea's suspected illicit activities.

"We do have some concerns not just about counterfeiting, but about a number of illicit activities carried out by North Korea," Vershbow said, reiterating that Washington sees the crackdown on North Korean finances as separate from the six-party talks.

He said the United States wanted to get the talks back on track as quickly as possible and had no preconditions for resuming the discussions. The last round was held in November.

The envoy said the United States was ready to honor its obligations under a deal struck in September among the six parties under which North Korea would scrap its nuclear weapons programmes in exchange for economic aid, security assurances and increased diplomatic recognition.

He added it would be important to address North Korea's suspected illegal activity, "if we are to achieve full normalisation of our relations with North Korea."

Vershbow raised the ire of North Korea -- and some concern among South Korean officials -- on December 7 by branding Pyongyang a "criminal regime," but he did not use such language in his comments on Thursday.

He also called on South Korea to help persuade North Korea to give up illegal activities and return to the bargaining table on its nuclear programmes.

(With additional reporting by Lee Jin-joo)

China Seen Unlikely To Press Nuke Issue (WT)

By Andrew Salmon

The Washington Times, January 12, 2006

SEOUL -- Pyongyang's nuclear ambitions are likely to figure in any negotiations North Korean leader Kim Jong-il holds in China this week, but Asian analysts see little chance that Beijing will use its growing economic clout to bring its neighbor to heel.

Analysts say China has become virtually the sole provider of consumer goods to North Korea, as well as a conduit for most foreign aid, giving it substantial economic leverage over the North.

But as Mr. Kim travels through China on an unannounced trip with a mysterious itinerary, those same analysts see little chance that Beijing will threaten him with an economic cut-off if his country does not return to six-nation talks on its nuclear program.

"Nothing would convince [the Chinese] to use their leverage," said Choi Jin-wook of Seoul's Institute of National Unification. "China said it does not tolerate North Korea's nuclear programs, but it does not want North Korea to collapse."

South Korea also has been reluctant to bring economic pressure on Pyongyang, partly for fear of falling further behind China in a long-term competition for trade opportunities in its northern neighbor.

DOJ_NMG_0009373

The result is a narrowing of policy options for the United States, which reportedly was rebuffed by China last April when Assistant Secretary of State Christopher R. Hill asked it to cut off fuel supplies to North Korea.

Mr. Hill arrived in South Korea yesterday, a day after Mr. Kim was reported to have arrived in China by train. He said the timing was coincidental, but expressed hope that the Chinese will have "some very fresh news" about the North Korean leader's nuclear plans.

There still has been no official announcement about Mr. Kim's trip, and Mr. Hill said it "was a surprise to all of us." China has previously announced Mr. Kim's visits only after his return to Pyongyang.

However, the North Korean has plenty to discuss with China besides the nuclear talks -- including economic and trade issues and new financial sanctions imposed by the United States in response to evidence his government is counterfeiting U.S. currency.

U.S. officials, ranging from Mr. Hill to Vice President Dick Cheney, have called in recent months for China to use its influence to press North Korea for greater cooperation in the nuclear talks.

But Peter Beck, regional director of the International Crisis Group, said that "China's top concern is stability" and that it was unlikely to do anything to undermine its neighbor's economy.

"They don't want border instability," agreed Moon Chung-in, a foreign-policy analyst at Seoul's Yonsei University and an adviser to South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun.

China already faces international criticism for forcibly sending North Korean refugees -- variously numbered at between 100,000 to 300,000 -- back to their homeland, where many face severe penalties. Heightened instability would almost certainly drive much larger numbers across the 600-mile frontier.

Chinese leaders also are reluctant to overrule the old guard in the Chinese Communist Party, which remembers the "blood alliance" forged between the two countries during the 1950-1953 Korean War.

China still maintains a 1961 treaty with North Korea which, on paper at least, places Beijing on Pyongyang's side in any military confrontation with Washington.

Nevertheless, Beijing's economic clout in North Korea is large and growing. Visitors to the North note that goods traded in markets are almost exclusively of Chinese origin.

"North Korea will, left to itself, become an economic province of China -- and can do very well," said a European businessman with close experience with the country, speaking on the condition of anonymity. "That is a route it can take, independent of aid."

He added that Chinese businessmen have experience in operating within a communist system that South Korean investors lack, as well as the advantages of lower labor costs.

Trade Surplus Tripled In '05, China Says (NYT)

By David Barboza

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

SHANGHAI, Jan. 11 - China said on Wednesday that its trade surplus with the rest of the world had tripled in 2005, to a record $102 billion, a figure that could reignite global trade frictions and step up pressure on the government to allow its currency to appreciate further.

The United States and European Union officials have been pressuring China during the last few years to allow its currency to appreciate. The hope is to restrain the flood of Chinese exports to the world and to rebalance China's economy to allow for more imports.

The report on Wednesday showed that imports into China had begun to rise and exports to the rest of the world had slowed in the latter part of 2005, easing concern among some economists.

Still, China released a set of blockbuster trade figures that were another reflection of the nation's unparalleled rise as a global economic power.

The government said that exports in 2005 were a record $762 billion, up 28 percent, while imports climbed to $660 billion, up nearly 18 percent, from 2004. The $102 billion surplus was up from about $32 billion in 2004.

DOJ_NMG_0009374

Total foreign trade in 2005 topped $1.4 trillion, making China No. 3 in the world in foreign trade after the United States and Germany and ahead of Japan.

Just a decade ago, the value of China's foreign trade was only $289 billion. But today, a giant portion of the world's toys, clothing, furniture and electronic goods carry the label "Made in China."

Indeed, the customs figures released on Wednesday showed that the bulk of China's trade surplus in 2005 came from exports to the world's wealthiest regions, particularly the United States and Europe. The surplus with the United States reached a record $114.7 billion, up from $80 billion a year earlier and $28 billion in 2001. Excluding the United States, China actually had a trade deficit with the rest of the world of about $12 billion in 2005, largely with South Korea, Japan, Malaysia, Saudi Arabia and even Angola.

And yet China's figures may not be telling the entire story. According to United States government data, China's trade surplus in 2005 could be nearly $200 billion. Just through October 2005, according to official government statistics in the United States, China already had a trade surplus with the United States of over $166 billion. The gap arises from differences in counting, like whether Hong Kong figures are integrated with those of China. The growing bilateral trade deficit could strain ties between the United States and China. In 2004, the United States had a record $617 billion trade deficit with the rest of the world, and it is on track to break that record.

In Beijing on Tuesday, Senator Max Baucus, Democrat of Montana, called on China to do its part to reduce its deficit with the United States, calling on the country to allow its currency to appreciate.

"U.S. politics will become unmanageable if China's trade deficit with the U.S. continues to grow," Senator Baucus said. He was on a trip through Asia to assess trade relations. He added: "It is in China's interest to make concrete progress in reducing the trade imbalance."

Europe fared only slightly better last year, according to the Chinese government. China reported a $70 billion trade surplus in 2005 with the European Union, with the Netherlands and Britain having notable imbalances.

The trade figures suggest a changing role for China in the global economy, indicating that it will influence things like prices at Wal-Mart and global interest rates.

When 2005 economic statistics are complete, China is likely to be home to the fourth- or fifth-largest economy in the world, surpassing France, Italy and possibly Britain.

The government last month readjusted its gross domestic product figure by $280 billion to account for previously unreported activity. That suggests that the Chinese economy probably grew as much as 10 percent annually in many of the last few years.

China may also soon have more foreign currency reserves than any other country in the world, giving it even more influence on global interest rates. As of November, China reported having about $794 billion in foreign currency reserves, just behind Japan, which had about $828 billion at the end of last year.

Last year, China revalued its currency, ending a decade-long peg to the American dollar, allowing it to appreciate by more than 2 percent. China also reached separate textile trade agreements with the United States and the European Union after Chinese textile and apparel exports flooded those markets with the end of global quotas in January.

American and European officials have argued that the weak value of the Chinese currency, the yuan, gave China an unfair advantage in world markets, making its goods extremely cheap.

As China has grown into an economic power, it has racked up trade surpluses of about $350 billion over the last decade, according to Chinese customs data. And yet, some economists say those figures may still misstate the country's real gains because a large portion of goods are funneled through Hong Kong.

Government figures from other parts of the world are at variance with Chinese government statistics.

For example, the Commerce Department said that in 2004, China had a $162 billion trade surplus with the United States. And last year, through October, the surplus was $166 billion, which suggests that China's trade surplus last year was double what the government reported in its own figures.

China's figures do, however, suggest that in the second half of the year, export growth eased some from gains of more than 30 percent earlier in the year, and imports picked up from the low double digits.

DOJ_NMG_0009375

Jonathan Anderson, an economist at UBS, calls the record trade surplus "old news," because it has already begun to fall.

"This is not a harbinger of things to come," he says. "If you look at the numbers seasonably adjusted, things peaked at the middle of the year. Exports are now slowing down and imports are picking up."

But even if trade begins to balance, some economists think that 2006 will not be much different from 2005. China could report another $100 billion surplus, though the growth rate may moderate slightly.

"If you do the math, you'll need imports to more than double the size of exports to begin to close these gaps," an economist for Goldman Sachs, Hong Liang, said. "China's trade surpluses will continue to rise."

China's Trade Surplus Tripled, Topping $100 Billion Last Year (WSJ)

By Murray Hiebert

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2006

BEIJING -- China's trade surplus more than tripled in 2005 from the previous year to break the $100 billion mark, a surge that's likely to intensify protectionist sentiment in the U.S. against one of its biggest trading partners.

The General Administration of Customs reported on its Web site yesterday that China's trade surplus hit $101.9 billion last year, with exports rising 28% from 2004 to $762 billion and imports up 18% to $660 billion. The trade surplus for 2004 was $32 billion.

Beijing's swelling trade surplus is likely to become an increasing irritant in its relations with the U.S., which is expected to report a trade deficit with China of more than $200 billion for 2005, up from $162 billion in 2004.

But some economists believe China's trade surplus could narrow this year because its imports have begun to pick up in recent months. Beijing is also seeking to reduce trade frictions by promoting domestic consumption.

"China is gradually becoming a more positive force for global growth as its policies are adjusted towards boosting domestic demand," Goldman Sachs said in a report yesterday.

At the same time, economists point out that the overall U.S. deficit with Asia has remained roughly in balance over the past decade. Many of America's trading partners in Asia have moved production lines to China in recent years to take advantage of the country's low labor costs, resulting in "Made In China" labels on goods previously made in their own countries. As a result, the U.S. trade deficit with much of the rest of Asia has dropped roughly in step with the growth of its deficit with China.

Economists attribute China's large trade surplus in 2005 in part to Beijing's efforts to cool overheated sectors of the economy, which helped spark a sharp slowdown in import growth in the first half. The cooling campaign targeted sectors including real estate, steel and aluminum production. The measures turned China into a major exporter of steel from a large net importer, economists say.

However, property development started to pick up again in the last few months of 2005, boosting imports of construction materials. Imports of electronic components and machinery also increased.

The pickup in demand was reflected in December's trade figures, with exports rising 18% from a year earlier to $75.41 billion but imports growing faster at 22%, to reach $64.4 billion, according to customs figures yesterday.

A think tank under the National Development and Reform Commission, China's top economic planning agency, yesterday suggested that the trend would continue this year. It predicted that imports would grow about 18%, while exports would expand by about 15%, according to the official Xinhua news agency.

The think tank attributed the anticipated slower export expansion to slowing growth in the global economy due to high oil prices and to rising trade frictions between China and its trading partners.

Even if this year's trade surplus were to fall, the 2005 numbers will likely fuel protectionist sentiment in the U.S. and calls for China to further revalue its currency, the yuan.

Beijing revalued the yuan by 2.1% last year, but critics say the currency remains undervalued against the dollar, making China's exports unfairly cheap.

China's two-way trade with the U.S. surged 23% to $211.63 billion last year, according to the Chinese customs service. It didn't give a breakdown for imports and exports. The European Union was China's largest trading partner, with two-way trade increasing 23% to $217.31 billion.

DOJ_NMG_0009376

In Beijing Tuesday, U.S. Sen. Max Baucus, the top Democrat on the Senate Finance Committee and an advocate of free trade with China, warned China that it risks fanning protectionist moves in Congress if it doesn't take steps soon to cut its trade deficit with the U.S. But he also pointed out that American consumers benefit greatly from low-cost Chinese goods. "Freer trade with China alone saves U.S. households $600 each year," he said.

Abuse Of Power Enables 'Economic Terrorism' In China (WP)

By Peter S. Goodman

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

SHANGHAI -- Terry Petty and his Chinese representatives thought the terms were ridiculous.

An American investor, Petty had forged a venture with the son of a local Communist Party official to open a machine shop here in the industrial outskirts of China's most cosmopolitan city. But after two years of internal disputes, the venture had disintegrated. The local man was urging Petty's people to sign a contract selling him their stake and surrendering full control. They would not go along.

But even as the negotiations proceeded on this September afternoon, the local partner was mobilizing to seize the factory: A team of 15 men under his employ -- many with shaved heads and donned in black -- arrived at the plant, according to managers. They told the workers that they were now in charge. They ordered production to cease.

Over subsequent weeks, the hired men forced their way in, brandishing guns, sparring with workers and disabling machinery, according to people at the plant and photos seen by The Washington Post. Calls to the police proved futile, factory managers said, because the police took direction from local officials connected to the Chinese partner. The factory now sits mostly empty, its 60 original workers scattered, while the local partner tries to resume production with his own people. The case has garnered the attention of both the United States and Shanghai governments.

The battle for control of a factory on the fringes of Shanghai -- a city often touted by China's leaders as a showcase for foreign investment -- highlights how some Communist Party officials abuse their influence over local governments to enrich themselves and their cronies. A quarter-century of market reforms has diminished the role of the state in China's economy, yet it has also spawned entrepreneurs whose wealth derives from their links to officials and their continued power to secure land and direct police.

"In China, the legal system and state power are completely intertwined," said Yu Nanping, an economist at East China Normal University in Shanghai. "Government officials control the process, and they tend to abuse the process when their own interests are on the line."

Petty, 49, the American who owns some 40 percent of the failed venture through a Hong Kong-based investment company, put it this way: "This is economic terrorism."

His estranged joint-venture partner, Hu Weijun, denied that he abused connections and described the conflict as a simple business deal gone awry.

"I sent a work team to the factory to inspect operations," Hu said. "As a shareholder, I have that right. But there was no bloodshed, no intimidation by so-called thugs." He said the guns his men carried were plastic toys. "They were just playing," he said.

Hired thugs have often been involved in business disputes in southern provinces such as Guangdong and Fujian. According to Petty, concern that such episodes are on the rise in the vast manufacturing zone around Shanghai prompted the interest of the U.S. government when he asked for help at the Shanghai consulate.

This battle took shape 2 1/2 years ago when Petty sought a site to produce oil-field equipment for Chinese and foreign energy companies. He had spent more than two decades doing business in China and had a similar factory in Nanjing. With direct air links to much of the world and a giant port, Shanghai beckoned.

Petty enlisted a longtime associate, Huang He. They settled on Baoshan, a district near Bao Steel Co., a major supplier of raw materials. The Baoshan government introduced them to the man who would become their new partner.

DOJ_NMG_0009377

The son of the vice chief for Yuepu, one of the counties in the district, Hu controlled a prime five-acre parcel in an industrial park, but he lacked capital to develop it. He offered to forge a joint venture, a term that provokes fear among foreign investors in China: Messy divorce is a common ending.

"We didn't want to do a joint venture," Huang said. "But the local government said this was the only available land."

In June 2003, they signed the contract. Petty invested $2.2 million, and Huang and other partners put in $3.3 million. They would split the factory in two. One bay would be owned completely by Petty and Huang and devoted to making oil field gear. The other would be a basic machine shop -- Mei Zuan Machinery and Equipment Co. -- owned 51 percent by Petty and Huang, and 49 percent by Hu.

Almost immediately, tension emerged over Hu's insistence that the building work go to a construction company he controlled. And once the factory opened in February 2004, Hu became angry that most of the orders in the machine shop were coming from the equipment company owned by his partners, who he thought were underpaying for the shop's services. "They were exploiting the joint venture for their own business," Hu said. He began bringing in his own orders.

In April 2005, with mutual suspicions growing, Hu called Huang.

"He said, 'I want to buy you out,' " Huang recalled. " 'You have to get out quick. You have to agree.' He said, 'If you don't, there will be serious consequences.' " Huang and Petty insisted that the local government mediate any sale. According to Huang, this enraged Hu, who began boycotting board meetings and ordered the joint venture's accountant to stop paying wages to workers, forcing Huang and Petty to pay them directly.

"We had no ability to make any decisions," Huang said. "He could oppose everything."

In August, Huang agreed to sell for about $1.4 million. On Sept. 13, in a meeting at the Yuepu government office, Hu offered a contract proposal, demanding full control after paying only 15 percent. Representatives for Petty refused.

As the meeting continued, Hu's team of 15 men arrived at the factory, according to a security officer and the general manager, Qiu Xuhao. The men identified themselves as working for Hu, Qiu said. The two guards at the gates put up no resistance.

"All the workers gathered around, and these thugs told them that they had to stop working immediately," said Li Jun, a manager at the factory. "When a few of the workers said, 'I'm not listening to you, you're not the boss,' the thugs started threatening them."

Someone pulled the main circuit breaker, and the factory went quiet. A few minutes later, 10 more of Hu's men walked in wearing hard hats, said Sun Sujun, one of the managers. Sun called the local police, bringing two uniformed officers from the Yuepu force. They ordered Hu's men out. Power was restored. Work resumed.

But the next day, three of Hu's men returned. The guards called the police. This time, Hu arrived. When the police pulled in, they greeted him warmly and ordered that he and his entourage be allowed in, according to Li.

Li said one of the officers later confided that Hu was dictating that the police hold back. The Baoshan Public Security Bureau declined a request for an interview.

Over the next days, Hu's men remained at the factory. When they again sought to disable the central power supply, fights broke out with the workers, Li said.

On Sept. 16, Qiu, the factory manager, went to the Public Security Bureau for Yuepu village to complain that Hu's men were harassing workers and damaging equipment. Three of Hu's men then arrived at Qiu's apartment late one night. They were turned away by Qiu's wife, but they made their point: On Sept. 20, Qiu quit, leaving the factory in the hands of a man who worked for Hu.

"The situation was crazy," Qiu said. "Every time we called the police, they would come and do nothing."

On Oct. 9, two of Hu's men brandished pistols at the workers, according to Sun and Li. The workers ceased operations. On Oct. 18, four men drove in with rifles and fired shots behind the factory, said Chen Jiafang, a security guard. He went to the Yuepu police station to report it, but no officers ever arrived, Chen said.

With the situation in crisis, Petty flew to China from his home in Houston, arriving at the factory Oct. 20. Six of Hu's men encircled him, and cars pulled in front of the gates and blocked his exit, he said. Police eventually allowed him to leave.

DOJ_NMG_0009378

Petty assembled photos of the gunmen captured by the factory's cameras and brought them to the U.S. consulate. In late October, the consulate sent letters to the Shanghai mayor's office and the city's Public Security Bureau calling for a "just resolution" of the dispute.

"This intimidation campaign has spiraled out of control and has caused both a disruption in business and destruction of factory property," said the letter, adding that "the enclosed photographs of the individuals involved in this intimidation, some of whom are carrying assault weapons, will make the severity of the situation clear to you."

Four days later, Petty was called for a five-hour interview at the Shanghai Criminal Investigations Division.

"They assured me that there would be no favoritism," Petty said. "These guys said they were independent."

But Petty later learned that the chief of the Baoshan Public Security Bureau formerly worked in the city's Criminal Investigations Division. In other words, the police he accuses of protecting Hu have close ties to the institution now investigating their conduct.

"In China," Petty said, "you can just be closed off to any legal process if powerful people are involved."

China Proposes Fewer Dams In Power Project To Aid Environment (NYT)

By Jim Yardley

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

BEIJING, Thursday, Jan. 12 - A government environmental review has recommended reducing the number of dams included in a controversial hydropower proposal on the Nu River in southwestern China in order to limit environmental damage and decrease the number of people who would be resettled, a Hong Kong newspaper has reported.

The newspaper, Wen Wei Po, which has ties to the Communist Party, reported on Wednesday that the recommendation called for 4 dams instead the 13 in the original Nu proposal. The article, citing an unnamed source close to the governmental review, said fewer dams would still meet "the needs for economic development and environmental protection."

The project has been delayed for nearly two years, and it will now be presented to the National Development and Reform Commission, a powerful government ministry, and later to the State Council, or China's cabinet.

But the article also suggested that the full 13 dams had not been completely ruled out. The source described the four dams as "a pilot proposal" and said more study would be needed to assess the larger project.

The original Nu River proposal, which would generate more electricity than the huge Three Gorges Dam, has become an international controversy. Environmental groups inside and outside China have called for more openness and public input in deciding whether to go forward on the project.

The environmental assessment report cited by the Hong Kong newspaper has itself become a point of contention. A coalition of environmentalists, lawyers, journalists and nongovernmental groups has called for the release of the report as well as public hearings on the project. They cited a 2003 environmental law that required public participation, including hearings, in deciding such major projects.

But the central government has refused to release the report and has not yet called any hearings.

The Hong Kong newspaper said the Ministry of Water Resources and the State Secrets Bureau had classified the report as a state secret.

A Stand Against China's Pollution Tide (WP)

By Edward Cody

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

XIANGTAN, China -- Tired and frustrated, Wang Guoxiang and other Xiangtan city officials were slurping a midnight snack of instant noodles last Friday when the anti-pollution chief for Hunan province walked into their crisis room. Immediately, Wang said, he stopped eating and shouted at the visitor.

At the top of his voice, he insisted that something be done to stop the discharge of poisonous metals that had begun three days earlier into the slow, meandering Xiang River, from which Xiangtan, 800 miles south of Beijing, draws its drinking water. As a people's delegate, Wang recalled complaining to the environmental official, he and his allies had been fighting for months for more controls on upstream smelters but had found little support from the provincial authorities.

DOJ_NMG_0009379

"You guys pay no attention to the safety of drinking water for our Xiangtan people. If you can't solve the problem this time, your position is in danger," Wang said he told the anti-pollution chief, Jiang Yimin. "And I wasn't kidding," he added.

The late-night confrontation in Xiangtan, a sprawling city of 500,000, was a telling episode in China's latest pollution drama: the accidental release into the Xiang River of heavy doses of cadmium, a likely carcinogen, by a state-owned smelter in an industrial park about 25 miles upstream.

The fouling of the Xiang River attracted wide attention, but it was far from unique as China struggles to reconcile breakneck economic growth with protection of the environment. After more than two decades of swift industrialization, a recent government report found that up to 70 percent of the country's rivers and lakes are seriously polluted.

In reaction, extensive national regulations have been put into place, including a government decision Sunday requiring local officials to immediately notify officials in Beijing of any toxic spills. But on the ground, business owners and Communist Party officials often cooperate closely. Enforcement of environmental rules has often been lax, and the result has been frequent contamination of the waterways that China's 1.3 billion people depend on for drinking water.

At about the same time that Xiangtan faced its pollution crisis, a frozen pipe burst in eastern Henan province, releasing six tons of diesel fuel that floated in a 40-mile-long slick down a branch of the Yellow River. Authorities said 63 water pumps had to be shut down, including some at Jinan, the capital of neighboring Shandong province.

Farther south, Guangdong provincial authorities announced Tuesday that water drawn from the Bei River was safe to drink again three weeks after an unauthorized discharge of cadmium. And the famed Pearl River, which runs through Guangdong into the South China Sea, has turned dangerously saline at its southern end because of low water levels and high tides.

Xie Shaodong, an environmental specialist at Peking University, said China is passing through a stage of economic development in which, as the history of other countries has shown, ecological damage is to be expected. To halt the degradation, he said, China's environmental protection agencies should be granted more power and the news media should be allowed to report more fully on the issue.

Although pollution has long been recognized as a major problem in China, local officials and the government-controlled press have focused particular attention on it recently because of an internationally embarrassing spill in November. In that episode, benzene contamination of the Songhua River forced a cutoff of drinking water in Harbin, a major city 650 miles north of Beijing, and sent toxic waste downstream to cities and towns in the Russian Far East.

Local officials made the Songhua calamity worse by concealing it for several days, leading to complaints from Russia and, ultimately, sanctions from China's central government and the new notification rule issued Sunday. Officials involved in the coverup were dismissed and one committed suicide. But as Wang's experience in Xiangtan showed, the instinctive reaction of many local party and government officials is still to conceal and minimize.

Only hours before Jiang walked into the Xiangtan crisis meeting Friday evening, Wang had learned that the city's Environmental Protection Administration had measured cadmium levels at 25 times the amount considered safe for drinking water. His own measurement, Wang said, showed even higher levels.

Cadmium, a soft element found in metal ores, can cause liver, kidney and bone disease if ingested in large quantities. For most of the year, Wang said, he and two colleagues in the People's Congress, an appointed city council, had been trying to persuade provincial authorities to tighten controls over the smelters upstream from Xiangtan, which he said frequently dump dangerous quantities of cadmium and other elements into the river.

Frustrated by the lack of response at the provincial level, Wang had arranged for Xiangtan's Environmental Protection Administration to test the water every 10 days. When he received Friday's report, "I just couldn't believe my eyes," he said in an interview.

Wang alerted Communist Party officials in the city, who met into the night. Jiang made his appearance about midnight and, before dawn, set in motion a large-scale cleanup operation. Later that day, he and provincial environment officials announced at a news conference that the cadmium would be neutralized with chemicals dumped into the river and diluted with water diverted from upstream reservoirs.

DOJ_NMG_0009380

The cadmium entered the Xiang River on Jan. 4 when workers mistakenly diverted river water into two basins used to separate cadmium and other smeltering by-products, Wang said. The water overwhelmed the basins and washed back into the river, which carried the accumulated poisons downstream.

Jiang, the provincial anti-pollution chief, told reporters that authorities halted the backflow and took other steps that ensured water supplies were safe. "The Hunan provincial authorities properly handled the cadmium spill in the Xiang River," People's Daily, the official party newspaper, concluded in its Monday editions.

Local newspapers and broadcast stations were ordered to limit their reports to Jiang's statement and were barred from reporting about drinking water conditions in Xiangtan and Changsha, the capital of Hunan province farther downstream, during the three days from Jan. 4 until emergency measures were put into place.

As a result, Xiangtan residents appeared unconcerned by the crisis. "If you want to know about pollution, go ask the people at the Environmental Protection Administration," said an elderly man basking in winter sunshine beside the Xiang River.

Provincial propaganda authorities also prohibited reporters from focusing on Wang's earlier efforts to get the smelters to adhere to national environmental standards, local journalists said. Jiang said in a telephone interview Wednesday, however, that his office would now carry out an investigation.

"We will punish those who pollute the Xiang River," he added, "as well as related officials from the local Environmental Protection Administration for their malpractices."

The controlled press, meanwhile, published official assurances that drinking water was safe because of the emergency chemical treatment by Xiangtan's water distribution system. Nevertheless, the news reports said, the river water still contained unhealthy amounts of cadmium.

Researcher Jin Ling contributed to this report.

Don't Drink The Water (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2006

Another week, another chemical spill in China. The recent spate of environmental mishaps on the mainland isn't new, though at least we're hearing about them now. If Beijing really wanted to tackle its environmental malaise, it would move faster to dump state enterprises and speed the development of a private economy in which managers are held accountable both for making a profit and for fouling the air and water.

One thing's for sure: The recent news has been bad PR for the PRC. Last November, a petrochemical plant explosion in Jillin, in northeastern China, released 100 tons of benzene and other nasty things into the Songhua River, creating a slick that flowed all the way to Russia. That mess forced three million people in the city of Harbin to go without running water for nearly five days. The news was too big to hide, though officials tried. Foreign journalists sniffed the story and moved in to report it.

Now, problems are popping up all over. In December, a metal factory in Shaoguan, a southern Chinese city near Hong Kong, leaked cadmium -- a potentially cancer-causing agent -- into the Bei River. And in recent days, a fertilizer-plant accident dumped 600 tons of sulfuric acid into the Qijiang River, near Chongqing; cadmium was spilled into the Xiangjiang River in Hunan Province; and in Shandong Province several tons of diesel oil were dumped accidentally into the Yellow River.

It's hard to tell exactly how widespread the problems are, but we'd go out on a limb and guess, oh, "pretty vast." China's State Environmental Protection Administration reported 1,441 environmental accidents in 2004, with most incidents related to water. We'd wager that figure is underestimated by a wide margin. The manager responsible for the Harbin slick was later found dead, by the way.

China's current environmental problems stem from its rampant misallocation of capital and resources over many decades. The country is stuck with rotting factories that the state has neglected to maintain and manage. From Mao Tse-tung's Great Leap Forward, which led to the haphazard construction of hundreds of thousands of factories and power stations in the late 1950s, to his Third Front defense industrialization campaign, China's hinterland is now dotted with rotting hulks of metal. We're reminded of the former Soviet bloc, which upon the fall of the Berlin Wall turned out to have some of the worst pollution problems on earth.

DOJ_NMG_0009381

It will take a long time to replace these Chinese hulks with industries that will be better managed by owners outside the state political system. But Beijing's bureaucrats may be forced to act sooner than they'd like. Social unrest, the sole thing that seems to make Chinese politicians tremble, is rising across the country, and environmental problems are a big trigger. As Chinese citizens accumulate wealth, they'll naturally push for potable water and clean air.

China may fall into the trap of trying to solve the problem by the same means that brought it about. Beijing puts out "five-year plans" to fix things like water pollution -- in other words, more central planning. But the cleanest countries in the world are those in which citizens can protest if pollution occurs, and where companies are forced by market competition to come up with the best industrial technology available. Such technology doesn't waste a valuable product by dumping it into a river. China today is a long way from industrial modernity -- so for now, we'd recommend you don't drink the water.

After WHO Request, China Reports Two More Bird Flu Deaths (WP)

By Edward Cody

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

BEIJING, Jan. 11 -- The World Health Organization identified China's latest bird flu victims Wednesday as a 10-year-old student and a 35-year-old street vendor who succumbed to the H5N1 strain of the virus last month in different parts of the country.

Roy Wadia, the WHO spokesman in Beijing, said the Chinese government reported the deaths during the past 48 hours in response to the agency's request for updated data on bird flu. The man died Dec. 30 in Jiangxi province in eastern China and the girl Dec. 16 in southern Guanxi province, he said.

The new deaths increased to five the number of people in China who have succumbed to the virus.

The Health Ministry's spokesman, Mao Qunan, spoke at length about bird flu at a news conference Tuesday but did not mention the additional deaths. Mao's omission and the delay in reporting the deaths to WHO fed concerns about the reliability of official information on the extent of bird flu among China's 1.3 billion residents.

International officials have complained that they fear they are not getting official data fast enough from the Chinese government. Wadia refrained from criticism of the latest delay, but suspicions are easily aroused because of China's record. The government sought to conceal the 2003 outbreak of severe acute respiratory syndrome, or SARS, and Chinese officials have long been reluctant to share information with outsiders.

Since the SARS controversy, the government has pledged to deal squarely with health information. But in addition to the complaints from international health officials, Chinese reporters have said they are frequently forced to seek information about China's bird flu situation from WHO or foreign publications because China's official sources refuse to provide it.

"News about the virus often takes a detour to reach domestic audiences," Hu Shuli wrote in the Oct. 31 issue of Caijing business magazine. "It is first covered by foreign media, and then picked up by the domestic press. Journalists sent to infected areas also say local officials have not been cooperative enough."

At his news conference, Mao said the outlook on bird flu in China is "not optimistic" because the country's rural health care system is ill-equipped to identify the H5N1 strain and guarantee swift treatment.

Mao said 66 percent of China's township-level hospitals and 90 percent of its county-level hospitals are part of the country's reporting system for infectious diseases. That leaves thousands of hospitals outside the loop, meaning ministry officials might not learn of bird flu infections until long after they break out in remote areas.

Twenty-eight outbreaks of bird flu and eight cases of human infection have been reported across the country since October. The Agriculture Ministry on Tuesday reported a new outbreak killed 16,000 quails during the first week of this month on a farm in Guizhou province in south-central China.

Turkey May Have Lasting Traces Of Flu (NYT)

By Elisabeth Rosenthal

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

ANKARA, Turkey, Jan. 11 - Although Turkish officials are now taking appropriate steps to contain the outbreaks of avian influenza that have spread across this country, their slow initial response in detecting the arrival of bird flu three weeks ago has created a health crisis that may be very hard to correct, international experts said Wednesday.

DOJ_NMG_0009382

The Turkish government has reported more than 20 outbreaks of avian influenza in birds, spread all across the country. Fifteen human cases of the virus, A(H5N1), have been confirmed, at least two children have died and more than 100 people are in hospitals under observation.

"Turkey has provided us with a double problem," said Dr. Joseph Domenech, chief of veterinary services at the United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization in Rome. "First, their detection was not early enough, so the virus was able to spread for weeks. And even with that, we do not understand why so many people have become infected.

"And when you have a big question like that, you have a big worry."

Dr. Domenech said there was now a risk that the virus had become so entrenched in Turkey that it would be impossible to eradicate it, meaning that a permanent reservoir of the dreaded virus would exist on the fringes of Europe and along bird migration routes to Africa.

Both he and United Nations health officials agreed that Turkey was now taking the problem "seriously." Current measures are "correct and proper," said Dr. Marc Danzon, World Health Organization regional director for Europe, speaking at a news conference here. He added that there was no reason to avoid travel to the country.

In the last three days, the Turkish authorities began large-scale culling of birds in affected cities to stamp out outbreaks. Hundreds of thousands of birds have been destroyed.

A senior United Nations official urged Turkey's neighbors to be ready to respond quickly and effectively to outbreaks of bird flu in their countries. The official, Dr. David Nabarro, the United Nations coordinator for avian and human influenza, urged countries to hold drills to confirm that their laboratories have all the necessary materials and competent staff.

Health workers "need to be on the ball to be comprehensive in their response," he said. "It is not easy to run around catching chickens," making sure none escape and then putting them in sacks, killing and burying them properly, Dr. Nabarro said.

Dr. Nabarro said that two of Turkey's neighbors, which he declined to name, have begun taking the recommended intensive efforts with help from the United Nations.

If there is a bright side to the outbreaks in Turkey, it is the news that several people infected with the virus have suffered only mild symptoms, and sometimes none at all, leading experts to theorize that the disease may not be as deadly as they feared.

New suspected cases in humans are being treated with antiviral drugs, and the Health Ministry has undertaken a broad public education campaign warning residents to report bird deaths and to avoid contact with sick poultry and wild birds.

"We expect there will be less and less human cases as animal reservoirs around the country diminish and education intensifies," said Dr. Guénaël Rodier, a communicable diseases expert with the World Health Organization who led a team of United Nations scientists to Turkey this week to investigate the outbreak.

He noted that all of the humans seemed to have become infected after contact with sick birds, and that there was no evidence that the virus had acquired the ability to spread between humans, a development that scientists say could herald a worldwide flu epidemic.

In many ways, the outbreak in Turkey is a cautionary tale about how rapidly avian influenza can become a widespread problem if it is not detected early and attacked aggressively. In the far eastern part of Turkey, where most of the human cases and deaths have occurred, officials waited for weeks to investigate widespread bird deaths that started in mid-December, villagers say, even after the deaths were reported to government veterinarians. In that time window, the virus spread from bird to bird and - to a lesser extent - from bird to man.

This week, government health warnings blared from loudspeakers mounted on trucks all across Turkey, and were being broadcast on all of its television stations. Still the dangers seemed to be sinking in only slowly.

Even in Dogubayazit, the city that was home to siblings who died, occasional roosters could be heard crowing on Tuesday morning, despite an official culling that was supposed to have eliminated all domesticated birds. Turkish television broadcasts showed government culling teams dressed in full biohazard gear assisted by barehanded children gleefully chasing poultry around in the snow, oblivious to the dangers of exposure.

DOJ_NMG_0009383

China announced Wednesday that two people had died of bird flu, bringing to five the country's death toll from the disease. Chinese agricultural officials also announced a new outbreak of the disease, this time among quail in rural Guizhou Province. Earlier this week, Chinese health officials warned that the number of human infections from the disease was likely to increase.

U.N. Seeks To Quell Flu Panic (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, January 12, 2006

NEW YORK -- The United Nations yesterday sought to calm fears about the deadly avian flu virus as signs of near-panic spread through Turkey and its neighbors.

At least 15 persons in Turkey have been stricken with the respiratory virus, although none of the cases appears to be the result of a human-to-human transmission.

Agriculture teams and farmers culled sick birds and infected flocks yesterday in 30 of Turkey's 81 provinces.

World Health Organization officials praised Ankara's response to the crisis, but officials insisted that the counterinfluenza measures must be maintained.

In Russia, scientists warned against taking Turkish vacations and the government advocated the shooting of migrating birds.

The U.N. Food and Agriculture Organization, which has taken an early lead in the detection and prevention of the H5N1 virus, yesterday called on Turkey's neighbors to increase their surveillance of flocks.

"The virus may be spreading despite the control measures already taken," said Juan Lubroth, the senior FAO animal health officer.

"Far more human and animal exposure to the virus will occur if strict containment does not isolate all known and unknown locations where the bird-flu virus is currently present," he said.

Dr. David Nabarro, the coordinator of the U.N. response to the avian flu, stressed that "there is no evidence of human-to-human transmission in the Turkey outbreak."

He said each case appeared to be traceable to avian contact.

Early surveillance and containment efforts would take at least $1.4 billion, a figure that is sure to soar if the flu becomes a pandemic, he said.

Epidemiologists are puzzled that the virus that has flashed through Turkey does not appear to be as deadly as the strain that killed roughly half of the 139 persons infected in China and Southeast Asia.

Of the 15 known Turkish infections, only the deaths of three siblings have been traced to the virus.

Dr. Nabarro said more people might have been infected in Asia than were reported, yielding a lower rate of fatality, or the Turkish government's rapid response and use of Tamiflu, a powerful antiviral, might have been the reason.

Another prospect, he said, is that the Turkish strain of H5N1 might be less deadly than its Asian predecessor.

Scientists have been watching for mutations as the virus jumps to humans: If it grows less virulent, it might be easier to treat with existing or adapted medications or it might be adapting for maximum transmission by not killing its host.

The Chinese government, along with the European Union and the World Bank, will sponsor a two-day pledging conference next week to raise roughly $1.4 billion to identify, contain and combat the virus.

"We view this as a beginning," Dr. Nabarro said.

Bird Flu Mutation Of Concern, Experts Say (WP)

By Daniel Williams And Alan Sipress

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

ISTANBUL, Jan. 11 -- Preliminary tests show that the strain of bird flu virus that has stricken at least 15 people in Turkey has evolved in a way that could make it somewhat more hazardous to human beings, although it still lacks the capacity to be passed easily from person to person, international health officials said Wednesday.

DOJ_NMG_0009384

The analysis, based on the sequencing of one of the virus's genes, suggests that at least some of the H5N1 bird flu virus here carries a change in one of its proteins, according to Michael L. Perdue of the World Health Organization. That protein is what lets the virus attach to cells and penetrate them.

"It's a little concerning because the virus is still trying new things in its evolution," said Perdue, who is overseeing the agency's response to the Turkish outbreak from WHO headquarters in Geneva.

Influenza experts are studying the apparent change to determine its significance, Perdue said. A spokesman for Britain's Medical Research Council, which is involved in the research, said it would take a few days to confirm the preliminary findings.

The experts say they believe the genetic change could make it easier for bird flu to pass from chickens to people. If the virus were to eventually gain the capacity to be passed easily from person to person, it could trigger a global epidemic.

Nancy J. Cox, who heads the influenza branch at the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention in Atlanta, said the change was found in one sample of H5N1 isolated from a Turkish child who recently died of the infection. The hemagglutinin protein, which the virus uses to attach to cells of the respiratory tract, had an alteration not usually seen in avian influenza viruses. Other incremental changes in the virus have been seen in China and Vietnam since outbreaks began in 2003.

Experts from the U.N. Food and Agriculture Organization warned that the virus could become permanently entrenched in Turkey, thereby increasing its risk to people and the chance it could evolve further. "The highly pathogenic avian influenza virus H5N1 could become endemic in Turkey," the organization said in a statement.

Two deaths have been attributed to bird flu in Turkey. The fatalities were the first outside China and Southeast Asia, areas where a total of 78 people have died in the past two years. More than 100 people have been hospitalized in Turkey with flu symptoms. The patients are under observation as they await test results to reveal whether they suffer from bird flu.

The virus has spread across 30 of Turkey's 81 provinces, from the far east to the Mediterranean coast, and has sparked a frantic effort to stem the disease by killing infected poultry. Even in cosmopolitan Istanbul, bird catchers for the Agriculture Ministry are rounding up fowl raised in the outskirts of the city, gassing them to death and burying them in mass graves.

Perdue noted that the Spanish influenza of 1918, which caused an estimated 40 million deaths worldwide, began as an ordinary bird virus but gradually evolved into a global human killer through a series of these incremental changes.

At a news conference in Ankara, the Turkish capital, international health officials played down fears of a pandemic.

"There is no transmission from human to human so far with a mutation of the virus," said Marc Danzon, WHO's regional director for Europe. "We are not there at the moment, but it is the responsibility for the WHO to look at this. . . . There is no reason to panic."

Bernard Vallat, director of the World Organization for Animal Health, said that the virus was probably introduced in Turkey in October. Vallat said that besides weeding out poultry in infected areas, fowl might have to be vaccinated. "The idea is that you create a protective area around an outbreak through vaccination. This could involve an entire province," he said.

Turkish health workers have killed more than 300,000 domestic birds in roundups across the country since late December. In one district of Istanbul, municipal sanitation officials went door to door in a rural hillside suburb asking residents if they raised chickens and ducks. They chased strays up and down the slippery, muddy hills and ravines, and when they caught one, they stuffed it into a plastic bag. Signs around the neighborhood read, "This District Has Chicken Plague."

Workers dressed in protective gear threw the bags into green containers that looked like large garbage cans. A sanitation worker attached a blue tube from a tank of carbon dioxide to the airtight container, opened the valve and killed the birds. "We prefer to say we are putting them to sleep," said Hikmet Karacay, an Agriculture Ministry official.

Residents, most of whom raised chickens as a sideline to collect the eggs, cooperated. "The real problem is the children," said Gilsen Kaya, who has two daughters. "They like the chickens. They are like pets. That's why it's better to do it at night, when they don't witness the whole thing."

Sipress reported from Jakarta, Indonesia. Staff writer David Brown in Washington contributed to this report.

Opec Nations 'set For Record Oil Revenues' (FT)

By Carola Hoyos

Financial Times, January 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0009385

The oil revenues of the Organisation of the Petroleum Exporting Countries, the cartel that controls 40 per cent of the world's oil supplies, will increase by 10 per cent to a record $522bn this year, the US Department of Energy forecasts.

Opec's increased wealth, driven by continuing high oil prices and an increase this year in the group's production, should help keep interest rates low if members of the group continue to spend their increasing wealth in the US bond market, economists said. The yield of the 10-year bond has remained nearly flat since mid-2004 in spite of the Federal Reserve increasing official interest rates by 3.25 percentage points during that period.

Everything from mergers and acquisitions to the energy sector and art market are expected to benefit.

Opec's 2006 revenue would be the largest in real terms in 25 years. The group's wealth, when adjusted for inflation, peaked at $572bn in 1980 when oil prices spiked after the Iranian revolution.

But the recent growth in Opec's wealth, which began in 2000, will reverse course next year, with the group's wealth falling back to $495bn as the oil price eases, the Energy Information Administration (EIA), the US Department of Energy's statistical arm, forecasts.

As the oil price boom continues into 2006 Opec countries are becoming less and less cautious about their spending. "This is reflected in the fact that some Opec countries are undertaking ambitious projects, like weapons purchases by Saudi Arabia," said Manouchehr Takin, senior analyst at the Centre for Global Energy Studies. "These kinds of projects would be impossible with lower revenues." Saudi Arabia, the world's biggest oil producer, is expected to earn $162bn in 2006.

"It's just been a phenomenal transfer of wealth from consuming to producing nations," said Francisco Blanch, analyst at Merrill Lynch.

Forecasts for the average price of New York benchmark crude oil futures in 2006 range between $45 and $75 a barrel, a similar level to that the EIA used to calculate total revenue Opec may expect in 2006. Although prices are notoriously difficult to estimate, the range is given credence by Opec's hints that it will aim to defend prices of at least $50-$55 a barrel.

The central bankers of the world's largest developed and emerging nations on Monday lent further support to the strong oil price thesis when they forecast global growth would continue at a "dynamic" pace in 2006. The optimistic prognosis has prompted analysts to expect demand for oil to increase at least 1.7m barrels a day to more than 85m b/d in 2006.

The factor that keeps many of those who forecast high oil prices for 2006 up at night, however, is that oil demand data may prove less robust than assumed.

The wildcards are factors such as hurricanes and political unrest.

Bahrain Pact Signed By Bush (NYT/REU)

By Reuters

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 11 - President Bush signed a bill on Wednesday establishing a free trade agreement with Bahrain, the first such pact with a Persian Gulf country.

The agreement requires Bahrain to eliminate its already low tariffs on American consumer and industrial goods and most agricultural products. In turn, the United States will eliminate tariffs on Bahraini goods. Annual trade between the two countries totals about $800 million.

The pact commits Bahrain to a further opening of its market to American banks and other services and to strengthen copyright and patent protections.

Bahrain, a small island country on the Saudi border, is home to the United States Fifth Fleet.

Mr. Bush has now signed trade deals with Singapore, Chile, Australia, Morocco and, most recently, six countries in Central America and the Caribbean: Costa Rica, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras, Nicaragua and the Dominican Republic. Other Arab countries that have free trade status with the United States are Morocco and Jordan.

Canada's Conservatives Boost Lead (WP)

By Doug Struck

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0009386

TORONTO, Jan. 11 -- With a militant drumbeat and an ominous tone, a campaign ad here warns that election of Conservative Party leader Stephen Harper "would bring a smile to George W. Bush's face."

Well behind in the polls two weeks before a parliamentary election, the governing Liberal Party led by Prime Minister Paul Martin this week brought what in Canadian politics is a most damning indictment: Martin's opponent is too close to the Americans, the party's ads say.

"Mr. Harper, the United States is our neighbor, not our nation," warns one.

Harper is "pro-Iraqi war, anti-Kyoto, socially conservative . . . Bush's new best friend," says another ad, quoting a commentary from the conservative Cato Institute, a Washington research group.

Yet another ad speculates that Harper may have received illegal campaign funds from American conservatives. "We know he is very popular with right-wingers in the U.S. They have money. Maybe they helped him," the announcer muses on the commercial, unveiled Tuesday.

The ads are running before an election in which Martin's party appears likely to lose its hold on the government. After Christmas, the Conservatives, the main opposition, jumped suddenly from behind and now lead the Liberals by 10 percentage points, 38 to 28 percent, according to a poll conducted for the Globe and Mail newspaper.

In Canada's system, the party with the largest number of seats after the Jan. 23 election can join with smaller parties, if needed, to form a government and select the prime minister.

The Conservatives, who have been out of power for 12 years, have traditionally favored closer ties to U.S. administrations. Martin's Liberals portrayed Harper as too pro-American in their election faceoff in June 2004, and have now boosted the stridency of that accusation.

Despite his party's ads, Martin came to office 25 months ago pledging to improve fractured relations with the Bush administration. A former finance minister, he created and heads a cabinet committee whose mission is to work closely with the United States, Canada's largest trading partner. Last year Martin hosted Bush in Ottawa.

But "in an election, you run on what will aid your cause. Canada is not unique in playing the anti-American card," said Nelson Wiseman, a political scientist at the University of Toronto.

"I understand political expediency," U.S. Ambassador David Wilkins said last month of the anti-American potshots in the campaign. "But the last time I looked, the United States was not on the ballot."

But it often has been, in one way or another. People here have long had mixed feelings about their larger, more powerful neighbor, defending their separate, Canadian identity in spite of ever-closer ties with the United States.

"It used to be a huge thing in Canadian politics to be as close as possible with the American president," said Norman O'Reilly, a marketing professor at Ryerson University in Toronto. "But after the Iraq war, that has changed. There's been a backlash to the war."

Hostility toward the Bush administration is strongest in eastern cities, traditional strongholds of the Liberal Party. With opinion polls showing the party losing some of that support, Martin's strategists are trying to tap the sentiment, Wiseman said.

"You hope to run a positive campaign. If things get bad, you pull out the negative ads," he said. "If things get really bad, you pull out the really negative ads."

In a nationally televised debate in Quebec on Tuesday, Martin hammered his point home. He suggested that Harper would shift Canada's policies to mimic Washington's and described Harper as being "in favor of the missile shield and the Iraq war. His positions are contrary to the values that Quebecers defend." Martin was referring to the Bush administration's anti-missile system, which is widely unpopular here.

"These ads are a new low in Canadian political advertising," one of Harper's party chiefs, Parliament member Jason Kenney, said in an interview. "Paul Martin will do or say anything to hold on to power. The ads speak of sophomoric anti-Americanism."

"They are factual ads. They reveal Stephen Harper's views on a number of issues," responded Amy Butcher, a spokeswoman for the Liberal Party. " We think it's important for Canadians to be aware of where Mr. Harper stands."

DOJ_NMG_0009387

The ads could backfire if seen as ham-handed or desperate, political strategists here said. Martin's party quickly withdrew one advertisement that focused on a proposal by Harper to station Canadian troops closer to cities to help with national disasters and emergencies. The ad suggested that the troops would be an ominous presence.

The ad "was never approved by the party to run," Butcher insisted. "It was inadvertently" posted with the other ads on the party Web site, she said.

Deadline Nears In Mexican Election (USAT)

By Judy Keen

USA Today, January 12, 2006

CHICAGO — Gregoria Alavez de Cortez lives here, but she'll soon become part of Mexico's history as her native country for the first time allows expatriates to vote in a presidential election.

"It's really necessary for me to do this. I want to stay aware of what's going on in the election," she said as she picked up an absentee ballot application at the Mexican Consulate west of downtown.

Sunday is the last day to mail ballot requests for the July 2 voting for a successor to Mexico's President Vicente Fox, who can't run again because of term limits.

With the deadline looming, only a fraction of eligible Mexicans in the USA have participated because of confusion about the application, lack of interest in the campaign and concern that applying for ballots could result in problems with U.S. immigration officials.

Only about 15,000 of the estimated 4 million expatriates who have Mexican voting cards, nearly all of them in the USA, have mailed in applications, said Pilar Alvarez of Mexico's Federal Election Institute.

The Chicago region has 1.3 million Mexicans, the nation's second-largest Mexican community after Los Angeles.

De Cortez, 41, who works at a fast-food restaurant, heard about the deadline on TV. The application she picked up says in Spanish, "Mexico waits for your vote. Exert your rights!" She left with the form, but was soon back with questions. She needs to submit a copy of a utility bill as proof of her address, but she moved recently and didn't have a current bill.

Miguel Herrera, 37, a maintenance worker, took an application, glanced at it and put it back. "Too much trouble, too complicated," he said.

In the Chicago region, about 600 people have applied for the absentee ballots. Cesar Romero, spokesman for Chicago's Mexican Consulate, said a last-minute push could result in 1,000 more — though he admitted that might be too optimistic. In all, 115,000 applications have been distributed here.

"We started late, but we've come far," he said. "The process is complicated, and we don't have a long tradition of political participation. We'll do much better next time."

Chicago's large immigrant population has had big turnouts for other foreign elections. Last month, more than 4,000 Iraqis from across the Midwest came to Skokie, Ill., to vote in their country's elections. In 2003, about 9,000 Poles in the area registered to vote in a referendum on Poland's entry into the European Union. Almost 4,000 Ukrainians here voted in their native country's 2004 presidential election.

Last-minute efforts are underway to boost ballot applications:

•Mexico's Federal Election Institute is running ads in Hispanic newspapers and on radio and TV in selected cities.

•In Chicago neighborhoods, volunteers are distributing ballot request forms in banks, groceries and libraries.

•In San Diego and Los Angeles, community organizations are helping people photocopy the required documents and fill out applications.

•In Houston and other Texas cities, applications are at restaurants, music stores and money-wiring agencies.

Mexico passed a law in June allowing expatriates to vote in presidential elections to acknowledge the importance of Mexicans living abroad. They send billions of dollars home each year that boost Mexico's economy.

Those wanting to vote must have Mexican voter cards, Mexico-issued identification and proof of U.S. residency. Those without voter cards — an estimated 6 million people outside Mexico — must apply in Mexico, then return to pick them up. Last month, advocacy groups in California arranged bus trips to Tijuana for people to apply for the cards.

DOJ_NMG_0009388

The application period began Oct. 1, but forms were originally available mostly at consulates, making it difficult for people outside big cities to get them. That has changed as the deadline has neared. Maria Curry, who has helped Mexicans in the San Diego area get involved, said the consulate there at first would give her only five applications at a time to distribute. For the past month, community groups have been recruited to help spread the word and can get as many forms as they need, Romero said.

Complicated forms are just one reason for lagging participation. Some people left their voting cards in Mexico so relatives could pay property taxes in their absence or conduct other business, said Salvador Pedroza Moreno, chamber of commerce president in Little Village, a Hispanic neighborhood on Chicago's South Side.

Some Mexicans who are here illegally threw away their cards to avoid having any identification, he said. And some can't spare $9 to send their applications by registered mail, as required.

Others aren't focused on the election because no campaigning is allowed in the USA. Campaigning in Mexico was banned during the holidays and won't resume until next week, Pedroza Moreno said. As a result, many Mexicans, even those who went home over Christmas, haven't been exposed to the views of the three candidates.

Curry said "all kinds of people are just afraid" that applying would cause legal problems over their immigration status.

Tony Payan, a professor of political science at the University of Texas at El Paso, said, "So many Mexicans in the USA live in the shadows, and they would rather not be seen as activists, as politically involved. They don't want to jeopardize their future in this country."

Alvarez, of Mexico's election institute, said the size of the turnout isn't as important as the chance to vote. "We do not qualify it a success or a failure, because the first time, you don't have anything to compare it to," she said.

She said many Mexicans in the USA will finally feel a part of their native country's political process, and "all candidates have to have proposals for migrants."

Despite the problems, Pedroza Moreno predicted that 20,000 Mexicans in the USA will vote. "This is historic," he said. "Twenty thousand voices that were never heard before will be heard."

Has Citgo Become A Political Tool For Hugo Chavez? (USAT)

By David J. Lynch

USA Today, January 12, 2006

HOUSTON — From the glass-walled building and manicured lawn to the security guard who greets visitors in a cheerful Texas drawl, everything at Citgo Petroleum seems perfectly ordinary.

But in fact there's nothing ordinary about Citgo. One of the USA's largest refiners, Citgo is a subsidiary of Venezuela's state-owned oil company, Petroleos de Venezuela S.A. (PDVSA). As such, it ultimately belongs to Venezuelan President Hugo Chvez, an avowedly anti-American leader who counts Fidel Castro among his closest friends and mocks President Bush as a "genocidal murderer."

The question of Chvez's influence over Citgo was highlighted by the company's recent provision of 25 million gallons of subsidized home-heating oil to poor people in the northeast USA. More than 100,000 households in four states should eventually benefit from the low-cost heating aid.

Some worry that Venezuela's ownership of more than 6% of U.S. refinery capacity gives Chvez, a former paratrooper given to wearing red berets and military fatigues, the power to cripple as well as comfort.

As Hurricanes Katrina and Rita demonstrated, any disruption to the nation's refining industry instantly increases gas prices. What if Chvez, who periodically threatens to curtail oil shipments to the USA, closed Citgo's refineries?

"He'd only have to do that for 90 days, and he'd destroy our economy," worries Matthew Simmons, a prominent energy investment banker. "He actually has our livelihood in his hands."

Others note that imported oil from elsewhere eventually could compensate for any interruption in Citgo supplies. And, because Chvez depends on the company's specialized refineries to process Venezuela's sulfur-rich crude oil, a shutdown would cost him and his country dearly.

"His capacity to make life difficult for George Bush would be at the cost of burying himself," says Claudio Loser, a former International Monetary Fund official.

DOJ_NMG_0009389

Late last year, as winter's first chill sent consumers reaching for their thermostats, a dozen U.S. senators asked 10 major oil companies to donate a portion of their record profits to help the poor. Only Citgo responded, dispatching tankers to housing projects in New York and Massachusetts in what Felix Rodriguez, the company president and chief executive, called a purely "humanitarian" gesture.

Today, the program expands to homeless shelters and Native American tribes in Maine. Friday, Rhode Island gets its initial delivery.

Many analysts, however, saw the move as a stunt by Chvez aimed at embarrassing the Bush administration. And some say Citgo's generosity — likely to cost it more than $20 million — suggests the company may be turning into a political tool for Chvez.

"It has had a turn for the worse, perhaps the much worse. … Now it's a different entity. It's not completely run like a business," says Antonio Szabo, a former PDVSA official and the president of Stone Bond Technologies, a Houston energy software firm.

Citgo executives say the company, founded in 1910 as Cities Service Co., is solidly profitable and can afford to offer the poor 40% discounts on heating oil. In an interview, Rodriguez said Chvez, 51, ordered the giveaway so poor Americans wouldn't have to choose between food and heat.

"The only difference between Citgo and other companies is that Citgo has only one shareholder," he said, referring to the Venezuelan president.

State Department spokesman Adam Ereli welcomed the heating aid, saying, "Citgo is an American company. They are helping Americans in need. That is a good thing."

Earlier, the company's Hurricane Katrina aid efforts earned a nod from Bush. "The good works of Citgo demonstrate the character and great strength of our nation," the president wrote Citgo Sept. 27.

Yet, there are echoes in Citgo's recent performance of what has transpired elsewhere in Venezuela's oil industry since Chvez was elected in 1998. After a coup in 2002 briefly ousted him from power, Chvez retaliated by purging the state-owned oil company. Thousands of veteran executives and petroleum engineers were cashiered, replaced by those politically loyal to the president's revolutionary aims.

Today, PDVSA's oil production is down to 1.5 million barrels a day from 3.3 million barrels in 1999, says Luis Giusti, who quit as national oil company president when Chvez took over. But thanks to oil prices above $60 a barrel, Chvez's control of PDVSA has allowed him to lavish billions of dollars on social projects and an anti-American foreign policy.

Citgo, which sells gasoline through more than 13,500 retail stations and is known for its iconic sign towering over Fenway Park's left-field wall, paid the Venezuelan government $697 million in dividends in 2005, up from the previous year's $400 million, Rodriguez said.

PDVSA — the acronym is pronounced Ped-a-vay-sa — first acquired 50% of Citgo in 1986. Four years later, the Venezuelans bought the remaining half of the company from Southland, better known for its ownership of the 7-Eleven convenience stores. The company's six refineries, with a capacity of 1.1 million barrels of oil a day, are ideally suited for Venezuela's sulfurous, heavy crude oil.

Throughout the 1990s, Venezuelan oil officials allowed the company's American managers enormous autonomy. "Citgo was an American company. We happened to own it," said Giusti, who headed PDVSA until Chvez took over. "We managed it at arm's length."

That changed under Chvez. In October 2000, the new president tightened control over Citgo by naming as company president a former army general, Oswaldo Contreras. He was the first Venezuelan to hold the position.

Bush was elected president the following month, but relations didn't completely sour until after Sept. 11, 2001, when Chvez likened the U.S. war in Afghanistan to the terror attacks in New York. Washington later publicly welcomed the coup that toppled him for two days in 2002. Chvez has accused the Bush administration of planning his assassination.

In November, two weeks after leading anti-American protests at a hemispheric summit in Argentina, Chvez told a business group in Caracas: "The planet's most serious danger is the government of the United States. … The people of the United States are being governed by a killer, a genocidal murderer and a madman." The comment followed congressional testimony by a State Department official that labeled Venezuela "a threat to regional stability."

DOJ_NMG_0009390

Asked how the persistent bilateral friction was affecting Citgo, Rodriguez replied, “No effect. Nothing at all.” But Chief Operating Officer Jerry Thompson, the most senior American remaining at the company, acknowledged Citgo's customers are concerned. “What it introduces is an element of anxiety, and our competition takes full advantage of that,” he says.

The uncertainty was exacerbated for much of last year by a protracted and costly relocation of corporate headquarters, management upheaval and Venezuelan officials' repeated suggestions that they might sell some or all of Citgo.

After decades in Tulsa, Citgo last year completed an $82 million shift to its new five-story headquarters in the heart of Houston's Energy Corridor. The move was designed to benefit the company by planting it squarely in the world's self-proclaimed “energy capital.”

But asked whether the move was worth the cost, Thompson says, “In my personal opinion, no.”

The relocation also cost the company managers who opted not to leave their longtime home, compounding executive turnover that saw several top American executives and the entire board replaced with Venezuelans.

Giusti, the former PDVSA president, says the current Venezuelan management team is weak. He criticized CEO Rodriguez for lacking substantial international experience and fluency in English. “Felix Rodriguez belongs to a group of engineers who never made it to the top. They only took their positions as a result of being loyal to the revolution of Chvez,” he says.

In an interview, Rodriguez, 56, noted he is a petroleum engineer with 32 years experience. Speaking in heavily accented English, with occasional help from an interpreter, he said he had held a series of planning and supervisory positions, traveled to the North Sea oil fields on “special assignment” and had been vice president of PDVSA before being named Citgo's CEO.

Even as Rodriguez moved into the top job, Venezuela's energy minister said he was discussing a sale of some or all of Citgo with “several companies.” But Rodriguez says there are no sales plans and despite political tensions between Washington and Caracas, the commercial relationship remains “win-win.”

Citgo executives also point to their financial record to rebut suggestions that politics are taking precedence over profits. For the first nine months of 2005, the company reported net income of $419.3 million on revenue of $31 billion compared with $430.3 million in profit on revenue of $23.7 billion for the same period last year.

Asked if he was satisfied, Rodriguez replied, “So far, so good.” Thompson said the company enjoyed a strong fourth quarter that will push net income above last year's figure. But at a time when industrywide profit margins are fat, some competitors have done much better. Industry leader Valero, for example, earned $2.7 billion on $56.3 billion in revenue for the same period. For every sales dollar, Valero earned 4.7 cents in profit. Citgo reaped just 1.3 cents.

Citgo's most notable recent financial deal involved refinancing its outstanding corporate debt. In October, the company secured bank financing of $1.85 billion, which it used to pay off its bond holders. Among the bonds paid off was an issue of $250 million in 6% senior notes the company had issued just one year earlier.

The move was the corporate equivalent of refinancing a home twice in 12 months. “They did what we thought was a fairly strange thing,” said John Addeo, portfolio manager for the MFS High Income fund, which owned $5.7 million of Citgo bonds.

Citgo says it refinanced to obtain greater financial flexibility. The terms of its bond offerings restricted the company's ability to take actions, such as selling assets and paying dividends, according to filings with the Securities and Exchange Commission.

Meanwhile, company executives say drivers pulling up to Citgo gas pumps aren't worried about who owns the refineries that produce the gas. “Being owned by a political entity ultimately means, from time to time, you have to do things with a political bent to them. Heating oil is an example of that,” says Thompson. But “By and large, people see us as an American company.”

New Era Of U.S-German Relations Set To Begin (KRT)

By Matthew Schofield

Knight Ridder, January 12, 2006

BERLIN - When new German Chancellor Angela Merkel sits down on Friday with President Bush in Washington, they'll be ushering in a new era of trans-Atlantic relations - that much is clear. But what those relations will be is less certain.

After three years of European division and acrimony over the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq, Bush finally has a German friend in Merkel. Yet Merkel has shown that, like much of Europe, she finds some of Bush's policies distasteful, and analysts are wondering how far she'll be willing to go in voicing disagreement.

DOJ_NMG_0009391

"She has to battle the image of being Bush's poodle," said Karl-Heinz Kamp, a security policy coordinator for the conservative Konrad Adenauer Foundation in Berlin.

Merkel's strongest criticism of Bush policy to date came last week when she told Der Spiegel, Germany's leading news magazine, that the U.S. prison camp for suspected terrorists at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, should be closed.

"An institution like Guantanamo in its present form cannot and must not exist in the long term. We must find different ways of dealing with prisoners," she said. "As far as I'm concerned, there's no question about that."

The timing of the remarks, just ahead of her trip to the United States, was seen here as hardly coincidental. In 2003, Merkel was widely criticized in Germany for speaking in favor of Bush's Iraq policy during a trip to Washington, even though German government policy opposed it. Her comments were seen as breaking a taboo against showing division in foreign affairs.

"She was seen by many after that visit as uncritically pro-Bush," Kamp said.

Merkel also has expressed concerns about the U.S. practice of rendition - sending suspected terrorists to third countries for interrogation, where some say they've been tortured. When Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice visited in December, Merkel asked specifically about the legality of the seizure of German citizen Khaled al-Masri. U.S. agents took al-Masri from Macedonia to Afghanistan, where he was held for five months before he was released. Merkel said the United States admitted that al-Masri's arrest had been a mistake.

It's unknown whether Merkel will raise the issue again when she meets with Bush, but there's little doubt in Germany that she's the only European leader with the staying power to help Bush improve his relations with Europe, where he's strongly disliked.

The influence of Bush's main European allies, British Prime Minister Tony Blair and Italian Prime Minister Silvio Berlusconi, is waning. Analysts believe Blair will leave office in the next year, and Berlusconi is dogged by allegations of corruption and inefficiency.

That leaves Merkel in a key position. The Times of London recently called her "Europe's new power broker."

"Germany is the biggest player in Europe, and she's the newest leader," said Richard Whitman, the head of the European Program for the Britain's Chatham House research center. "She's untainted by the past."

Merkel, who took office in November, already has succeeded on domestic and European fronts. The German parliament passed laws she favored that increase governmental transparency, raise sales taxes and grant tax breaks to parents. And she won continentwide praise when she chided European Union members for sacrificing progress to quibble about small amounts of money.

Whitman said he doesn't expect Merkel to offer Bush much: She won't reverse Germany's refusal to send troops to Iraq or increase the German presence in Afghanistan. But she gets along with Bush.

"She may disagree on issues, but she offers a sympathetic ear," he said.

Jan Friedrich Kallmorgen, a trans-Atlantic specialist with the German Council on Foreign Relations, said he expects Merkel won't be as critical of Bush as her predecessor, Gerhard Schroeder, who aligned Germany with Europe as a counterweight to U.S. influence, was. But she also won't return to the days when Germany saw itself as tied to the United States. Her comments about Guantanamo in Der Spiegel show that, he said.

"It does make a statement to Germans and Europeans that she's not forgetting their concerns about the war on terror," he said.

Karsten Voigt, a coordinator for German-American affairs with the German Foreign Ministry who'll accompany Merkel on her visit to the United States, said Merkel's Guantanamo comments were the result of her growing up in then-communist East Germany and believing that the United States was a symbol of freedom. He said her statements reflect her belief that a U.S. president would want to hear open and honest criticism.

"Washington will be eager to see how she defines herself as chancellor, but so will we," he said. "This is a new role for Germany, involvement in international issues when we are not the cause or the location of the crisis."

After Frosty Times, A Thaw In US-German Relations? (CSM)

By Howard Lafranchi

DOJ_NMG_0009392

The Christian Science Monitor, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON - When German Chancellor Angela Merkel visits the White House Friday, no one doubts that a closer rapport between the US and German leaderships will be on display. Like President Bush, she hails from the political right, and as a daughter of the former East Germany, she identifies with Mr. Bush's focus on freedom.

The bigger question is whether the diplomatic defrosting portends a deeper restrengthening of US-German relations and indeed of transatlantic cooperation.

Certainly the personal warmth expected between Ms. Merkel and Bush - so different from the chilly relations the president had with former Chancellor Gerhard Schröder - will be a welcome change. But with differences over Iraq and strategies for the international war on terror continuing to dog the relationship, and with some US officials expressing skepticism about the Atlantic alliance's long-term utility, many experts will be looking for signs that the warming is more than a matter of personalities.

"Both sides understand this is an opportunity to build a new dynamic, but people will be watching for whether that translates into any concrete policy initiatives," says Karen Donfried, senior policy director of the German Marshall Fund of the US. "My sense is there won't be [any], that this will be the first step down a much longer path." Iran on the agenda

Iran and its nuclear program will be on the agenda, and the two leaders can be expected to express a common insistence that Iran not develop nuclear weapons. Some observers speculate that after Iran's resumption of its nuclear research program this week, the two leaders could go further and announce an initiative to take Iran before the United Nations Security Council.

But German officials say it is probably "too early" for such a step. They add, however, that a meeting of the International Atomic Energy Agency later this month could prompt such a move. European Union foreign ministers were set to meet today on Iran, which could move the EU closer to Security Council referral.

On other fronts, Merkel could use the US meeting to demonstrate decreasing tensions over Iraq by announcing an acceleration of German training of Iraqi police. German officials are hinting such an announcement could be in the offing.

Still, the improvement in US-German atmospherics is not likely to reverse the general drifting apart in transatlantic relations, some experts say.

"The climate has dramatically improved, but below the surface the rift remains alive and well," says Charles Kupchan, who teaches 21st-century geopolitics at Georgetown University in Washington. "The trend lines continue to be those of fragmentation and disillusion."

Mr. Kupchan, who is also a transatlantic scholar at the Council on Foreign Relations, says the Iraq war is the dividing line - when Germany changed from being a country that followed Washington's leadership "as a matter of course," to instead becoming a European leader increasingly independent of Washington that seeks "to rebuild relations on new terms."

"Common values" have replaced dependence as the transatlantic relationship's chief attribute, he adds, but that change requires deeper consultation and cooperation - something Kupchan says the Bush administration is pursuing with Europe in the second term.

But it also leaves the door open to disagreement: For all the common vision on democracy's enlargement, economic development, and fighting AIDS, he says, there is also a list of issues over which the two sides part company, including Iraq, the International Criminal Court, climate change, and US policy toward detainees in the war on terror.

Examples of European countries prepared to roil relations with the United States extend beyond Germany. The Netherlands has so far not extended the mission of its forces within NATO in Afghanistan. If confirmed, such a move could threaten NATO's plans to expand into volatile parts of the country. The Dutch debate has prompted some US officials to question the long-term viability of the Atlantic alliance, if countries opt out of what are deemed crucial missions. Desire for the US to be world leader

German officials say questions about US treatment of detainees at Guantánamo and at secret foreign prisons - an issue of enough importance to European public opinion that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice focused on it during a recent European trip - are meant to help the US rebuild its leadership role.

"We want the US to be the world leader, but to do that we see that the US has to regain its moral high ground," says one European diplomat in Washington. Issues of US treatment of foreigners since the Abu Ghraib scandal have contributed to a decline in America's global image, the official says, and in turn make the US leadership role more difficult.

DOJ_NMG_0009393

Indeed, Kupchan says public opinion is one complicating factor that Merkel must face as she seeks to improve relations with the US. Another is that Merkel heads a coalition government - one in which the foreign ministry remains in hands that have a more tempered view of US relations.

Still, the leader-to-leader warmth that is anticipated for tomorrow's meeting has its roots in similar perspectives that are likely to infuse future actions.

Ms. Donfried of the German Marshall Fund notes, for example, that Merkel stressed in her inaugural address the role that gaining freedom has played in her life. "That's something that will resonate in the Bush White House," she says.

It is also likely, she adds, to cause Merkel to give "a different priority" to the perspective of Central and Eastern Europeans - a perspective, experts note, that is generally closer to Washington than that of other Europeans.

As one German official notes, there is good reason for Merkel to value America's role in the world. "Without US support for [German] reunification, a woman from the east could not be leading Germany today and meeting the American president."

Ukraine's Leader Dismisses Parliament's Vote To Fire Premier (NYT)

By Steven Lee Myers

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

KIEV, Ukraine, Jan. 11 - President Viktor A. Yushchenko of Ukraine on Wednesday criticized as illegitimate a parliamentary vote to dismiss his prime minister and government, deepening the country's political turmoil ahead of new elections in March.

"The decision was made by a Parliament that was elected four years ago by the old regime and is living its last weeks," Mr. Yushchenko said during a visit to Kazakhstan, where he attended the inauguration of President Nursultan A. Nazarbayev. "The decision only demonstrates one thing: the destabilization of the situation."

The prime minister, Yury I. Yekhanurov, defied Parliament's vote on Tuesday by presiding over a meeting of the government's ministers on Wednesday.

"We are continuing to fulfill our duties," he said at the meeting, according to news agencies, reversing his initial statement after Tuesday's vote that the ministers would serve only in an acting capacity.

The dispute - prompted by the handling of negotiations with Russia over the price of natural gas - in effect left Mr. Yushchenko's government in a sort of political limbo. It not only undermined his political position before the elections but also called into question recent constitutional changes that gave Parliament new powers, including the authority to dismiss the government.

Those changes, which went into effect on Jan. 1, were part of an agreement reached in December 2004 to hold a new presidential election after tens of thousands of Ukrainians protested a fraudulent vote that initially handed victory to Mr. Yushchenko's rival, Viktor F. Yanukovich.

Mr. Yushchenko, who has since criticized the agreement, did so sharply again on Wednesday. "In fact, we are dealing with the first consequences of inconsiderate changes to the Constitution," he said in a statement released by his office.

The Parliament that assembles after that vote will elect the country's next prime minister, a significant shift in constitutional power. Given the current impasse, it appeared unlikely that a new government would be formed before then, leaving Mr. Yekhanurov's in place for now.

It also appears unlikely that Mr. Yushchenko's bloc of deputies, Our Ukraine, will be able to control the majority needed to choose the new prime minister. Polls show Mr. Yanukovich's party leading, followed by a bloc led by Yulia V. Tymoshenko, Mr. Yushchenko's erstwhile ally whom he dismissed as his first prime minister in September.

Ms. Tymoshenko, whose supporters voted to dismiss the government, has been a vociferous critic of the agreement that ended the dispute over gas prices, vowing to challenge it in court. Others in Parliament said that while lawmakers could not directly reject the deal, they could challenge related interstate agreements with Russia, including those setting the amounts of gas supplied.

Nestor I. Shufrich, a deputy who voted against Mr. Yushchenko's government on Tuesday, questioned why Ukraine had agreed to changes in gas contracts that were valid until at least 2009. "We still have time to review this contract and return to the earlier signed and ratified contracts," he said in an interview.

DOJ_NMG_0009394

Under the complicated terms of the deal, reached last week after a brief shutdown of Russian gas, Ukraine agreed to pay nearly double the price it paid under a 2004 agreement.

While in Kazakhstan, Mr. Yushchenko met with President Vladimir V. Putin of Russia, and called the deal "a healthy compromise." Mr. Putin praised the "mutually beneficial decisions" reached after the showdown.

Blair In Plea To Bush For Rolls Contract (FT)

By Edward Alden and Peter Spiegel and James Blitz

Financial Times, January 12, 2006

Tony Blair, the British prime minister, has made a "very forceful" personal plea to President George W. Bush to save a $2.4bn (€2bn) contract for Rolls-Royce and General Electric to develop a second engine for the Joint Strike Fighter, the world's biggest military programme.

According to US and UK officials, the request was made in a video-conference call between the two leaders, which came just days after Mr Blair sent a letter to Mr Bush outlining his case.

"The prime minister was very clear and very forceful," said a British official close to the issue, referring both to the letter and the subsequent personal conversation. "This is obviously important to Rolls-Royce. But as a matter of policy, we also want to promote as much co-operation as possible between the US and our defence industry."

Mr Blair is hoping the White House will reverse a Pentagon decision to kill the engine before the proposed 2007 defence budget is sent to Congress next month. The $2.4bn contract calls for the two companies to develop a second JSF engine that would compete with the primary engine being developed by Pratt & Whitney of the US.

The second engine was originally intended to provide competition for all buyers of the JSF, but the war in Iraq has forced the Pentagon to find a series of equipment cuts in order to meet administration budget targets, and the second engine is among the cuts currently being proposed. GE controls 60 per cent of the consortium building the second engine, and Rolls of the UK has a 40 per cent stake.

People familiar with the lobbying campaign said Mr Blair has lent his full muscle to the effort and involved several senior British officials, including Jonathan Powell, Mr Blair's chief of staff. "This is at a level and degree of intensity that few outsiders appreciate," said Loren Thompson, a defence analyst with close ties to the Pentagon. Given the Pentagon's budgetary problems, securing a change of position would be a remarkable and surprising political achievement for Mr Blair.

Sir Digby Jones, director-general of the CBI, the country's largest business lobbying group, added: "This is personal for Blair. Britain is in many, many ways the only friend America has got. Blair personally takes the heat everywhere he goes because of that relationship, and we don't see very much coming back by way of America saying, 'We understand that, thank you'."

Despite Mr Blair's personal lobbying, industry and Whitehall insiders said yesterday that there is considerable debate within the British government about how forcefully to back Rolls with the Bush administration.

The UK, which is the Pentagon's lead partner on the $240bn JSF programme, is in the middle of tense, long-term negotiations with the US over whether it will get access to all the technologies it needs to operate the aircraft independently of American contractors.

In addition, the entire programme has been under threat from Pentagon budget cutters.

"The important thing is keeping the programme together," said one industry official.

Blair Program To Teach Respect (WT)

By Al Webb

The Washington Times, January 12, 2006

LONDON -- British Prime Minister Tony Blair, introducing a key plank of his third and final term in office, has started a $140 million action plan dubbed "Respect" to attack anti-social problems ranging from street hooligans to "neighbors from hell" who could be thrown out of their homes.

In an address to social workers at his office at 10 Downing St., Mr. Blair said the nation has been fighting "21st-century crime with 19th-century methods" and called for a system of speedy "summary justice" to bypass traditional courts.

The judge and jury process, he claimed, is "too cumbersome, too remote from reality to be effective" in today's world.

DOJ_NMG_0009395

Mr. Blair has already announced that he intends to step down as prime minister after completing the third term to which he was elected in May, and the ambitious, 44-page "Respect Action Plan" was seen as a shot at gaining a major political -- and popular -- success as his trouble-plagued governance nears its end.

To promote the plan, Mr. Blair traveled to Swindon, about 60 miles west of London, to hose down graffiti on a red-brick wall -- a public relations exercise that police said had among its spectators the youths suspected of spraying on the graffiti in the first place. They were not arrested.

Critics immediately attacked Mr. Blair's plan, one dismissing it as "rubbish," and another describing it as a package of "minor tweaks to existing measures and shock tactics."

The program he announced yesterday envisions evicting out-of-control families from their homes, even if privately owned, for up to three months, and rehousing them in a network of residential centers, or "sin bins," to teach them how to behave.

Mr. Blair, who admitted to the BBC on Tuesday to having disciplined his own children with an occasional "smack," said the bill targets so-called "neighbors from hell" whose anti-social activities run the gamut from loud music at all hours to fighting and brawling, including yelling, screaming children and bullying others. Problem families also could find their government housing benefits, worth hundreds of dollars a month in many cases, cut off.

The "Respect" plan outlines on-the-spot fines of up to $175 for street hooligans and vandals caught attacking passers-by, damaging vehicles and scrawling graffiti on walls, buses and trains. It says stiffer penalties are in store for thugs who attack government workers, and there are instant fines for causing trouble in hospitals.

It gives police and other authorities increased powers to close and board up "nuisance" premises, including houses, pubs and other bars -- a problem that some fear has already been worsened by the recent expansion of bar hours, in some cases to around the clock, for establishments selling alcohol.

A key element in the action plan centers on efforts to control unruly children and to help their beleaguered parents. Schools are given the go-ahead to take out parenting orders for children of any age who seriously misbehave, and a national parenting academy is to be set up to train health and social-service staff how to teach families "responsibility."

But in a television appearance, Mr. Blair insisted the public would have to help if the action plan is to work.

"I can provide the power and resources," he said, but "I cannot force everyone to implement these powers ... [although] I can ask them to do it."

The prime minister immediately came under fire.

"Respect?" One police officer gibed. "They [hooligans and vandals] can't even spell the word. What they need is to be named and shamed."

The officer targeted the government's use of "anti-social banning orders" -- "asbos" -- aiming at halting youths from causing trouble in specific areas. "Even an 'asbo' is a badge of honor to some of these kids."

The prime minister also faced accusations that some of the "initiatives" were, in fact, old policies that have been tried and found wanting. Parenting orders were introduced in 1998, during the first Blair administration, but political critic Edward Heathcoat Amory said only 1,425 have been used, "so their effect after eight years is vanishingly small."

On-the-spot fines were ordered up a few years ago, but they were ridiculed by police, and few were ever paid. Attempts to punish misbehavior in schools have already seen teachers and education officials overruled by local government councils under pressure from parents.

Kazakh Chief Extends Rule (WT)

By Christopher Pala

The Washington Times, January 12, 2006

ALMATY, Kazakhstan -- In a ceremony as rich in irony as in glitter, President Nursultan Nazarbayev, who has led Kazakhstan for 16 years, was sworn in yesterday for another seven-year term.

It unfolded on live television in the new presidential palace in Astana, which Mr. Nazarbayev, 65, made the country's capital since 1996. Located at the end of a promenade reminiscent of the Mall in Washington, the year-old palace is modeled on the White House, but is much larger.

DOJ_NMG_0009396

Mr. Nazarbayev entered a large hall wearing a business suit and a heavy medallion necklace. The rousing national anthem, which he had rewritten, was played. Then, his hand resting on the constitution -- which he largely wrote -- he swore, in a low monotone, to "serve the people honestly."

Among the guests and eight heads of state were Presidents Mikhail Saakashvili of Georgia, Viktor Yushchenko of Ukraine and Kurmanbek Bakiyev of Kyrgyzstan -- all advocates of Western-style democracy brought to power by popular uprisings sparked by stolen elections.

They helped inspire the campaign of a former prosecutor, Zharmakhan Tuyakbay, who challenged Mr. Nazarbayev in the Dec. 4 presidential election.

Mr. Tuyakbay's supporters wore yellow scarves, an echo of the orange scarves that came to symbolize the Ukrainian revolution.

Opinion polls had given Mr. Tuyakbay 20 percent of the vote and Mr. Nazarbayev between 60 percent and 70 percent. But, after reports of widespread ballot-stuffing, the election commission announced that Mr. Nazarbayev had won 91 percent while Mr. Tuyakbay -- whose party has since been decertified -- got 6 percent.

But in Kazakhstan, unlike the other three countries, not a single street demonstration erupted to protest the vote. Opposition leaders said they did not want to be blamed if the government opened fire on demonstrators.

Mr. Nazarbayev had promised an honest election as part of his drive to become the first post-Soviet country to head the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE), the region's premier pro-democracy organization.

The election had presented the West with an unusual conundrum: how to deal with a genuinely popular dictator of an oil-rich and strategic country who, despite muzzling the press, stifling the opposition and brushing aside mounting evidence of nepotism and corruption, would have won easily without cheating.

The answer could be seen in the praise that Columbia University-educated Mr. Saakashvili heaped on his host in an interview on state television, and in the letter from President Bush that the head of the six-member U.S. delegation, Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns, handed to Mr. Nazarbayev before the ceremony.

"I look forward to working with you to fulfill our nations' shared commitment to strengthen democracy and increase regional prosperity," Mr. Bush wrote, according to a text released by the Kazakh Embassy in Washington.

Britain, which has advocated denying Kazakhstan the OSCE chairmanship unless Mr. Nazarbayev reverses the increasing authoritarianism that began a decade ago, sent only its ambassador.

Student Says He Was Detained In Zimbabwe (WP)

By David A. Fahrenthold

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

CAMBRIDGE, Mass., Jan. 11 -- A Harvard University student from the District said Wednesday that he had been arrested in Zimbabwe during a trip to research his senior thesis, then held in grimy cells for five days before his parents and local lawyers managed to free him.

Amar Bakshi, 21, a Harvard senior and a 2002 graduate of St. Albans School in Northwest, said the key to his release might have been a surreptitious cell phone call he made soon after his arrest on Dec. 30. Speaking quietly in a bathroom, he told a friend that he had been pulled off an outbound airplane by plainclothes officers.

"That was the scariest thing," Bakshi said. "A lot hinged on that phone call."

Bakshi described his ordeal in an interview at a mall near the Harvard campus. It was difficult to find immediate official corroboration: A spokeswoman said the State Department was aware of the case but was unable to provide further information because of privacy concerns. A spokesman for Harvard's Faculty of Arts and Sciences said he would confirm only that Bakshi is a student.

At the Zimbabwean Embassy in Washington, spokesman Wilbert Gwashavanhu said that he could not confirm any part of Bakshi's account. He added that he thought it implausible that a Harvard student would be jailed in Zimbabwe simply for doing research.

"I'm wondering really where the truth rests," Gwashavanhu said.

DOJ_NMG_0009397

Bakshi's account of the ordeal was reported previously by the Harvard Crimson, the student newspaper, and in Zimbabwe by the Standard, an independent weekly.

Bakshi said he had gone to Zimbabwe, a southern African nation that has spiraled into poverty and repression in recent years, on Dec. 18. It was the second of two trips he made there last year for his thesis, which concerns political propaganda and the country's youths during the past five years.

During this trip, Bakshi said, he talked to officials in the information ministry for longtime President Robert Mugabe, and collected tapes of news, arts programs and jingles designed to promote government policies on Zimbabwean television.

Bakshi said he was on a plane waiting to depart the airport in Harare, the capital, when five or six men appeared in the jetway. They took him off the plane and into a small room.

"Why are you here? What are these videotapes? You're spying on us," Bakshi recalled the officers saying. They threatened him: "You don't know how horrible this will become."

Bakshi said he made up a diversion, something like "I urgently need to go to the bathroom." Although he had been told to turn his phone off, he called his friend, who then called the U.S. Embassy.

After that, "I was confident that if people knew I was there, the situation would improve," Bakshi said.

It did not at first, however. Initially, Bakshi said, he was taken to a bare holding cell, covered with graffiti left by previous inmates, phrases such as, "Please get me out of here," he said.

After one night, he was moved to a larger jail, where about 120 prisoners were squeezed in among flea-infested mattresses and overflowing toilets. By this time, however, Bakshi said his case had made it to the embassy, which he said sent officials to assure him he would eventually be released.

The news also had made it back to the District, where Bakshi's parents -- both doctors -- live near Sibley Memorial Hospital.

"The first few moments were of panic and of 'My God, what's happening to my boy!' " said his mother, Gita Chopra Bakshi, a pulmonologist. "Then it was a job to do, which was we have to go over there and get him back."

His parents flew to Harare, made connections with local lawyers and eventually had the charges dropped. Bakshi spent a few days in Washington, then returned to Harvard on Wednesday. He said he probably will not be going back to Zimbabwe "for a while."

He said, however, that he intends to write about his experience, on behalf of the many people he met who are probably still in jail. Bakshi recalled one of his fellow inmates, who told him, "in your thesis, make sure to write about all the good things that you saw here with us."

"Then there's sort of this dot-dot-dot . . . and [he] says, 'And be sure to tell them how bad the situation is, too,' " Bakshi said.

DOJ_NMG_0009398

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: THURSDAY, JANUARY 12, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Bush Calls Spying Inquiry Inevitable (LAT) ... 4
Bush Again Defends Wiretapping Program (WP) ... 4
In Shift, Bush Says He Welcomes Inquiry On Secret Wiretaps (NYT) ... 5
Investigate Surveillance, But Be Careful, Bush Says President Reverses On Hearings; Ex-CIA Counsel Questions Legality (USAT) ... 6
Bush: Hearings On Eavesdropping Program "good For Democracy" (LEXHL) ... 7
Bush Not Opposed To Hearings On Eavesdropping (REU-Y2) ... 8
Bush Reasserts 'Right' To Order Wiretaps (WT) ... 8
Residents Get Chance To Question President (LEXHL) ... 9
The Lawbreaker In The Oval Office (NYT) ... 10
Ex-official Warned Against Testifying On NSA Programs (WT) ... 11
Revealing A Viper In The Nest (WT) ... 11
Op-ed: Patriot Act Is Convenient Target (USAT) ... 12
Bush Grenade Attacker Gets Life (CNN) ... 13
Drug, Terror Rings Find New Ways To Launder Money (USAT) 14
US Vows Diligence On New Money Laundering Threats (REU). 14
Threat Assessment Calls Money Laundering A 'Massive' Challenge (ABC) ... 15
Swiss Investigate Leak To Paper On C.I.A. Prisons (NYT) ... 16
Guantanamo Prisoner Rejects US War Tribunal (REU-Y2) ... 17
Terror Suspect Upsets Plan To Resume Trials In Cuba (NYT) ... 18
Yemeni Prisoner At Gitmo To 'Boycott' Tribunal (WT/REU) ... 19
Guantanamo Detainee Boycotts U.S. Hearing (AP) ... 19
Muslim Cleric Accused In London Court Of Inciting Hatred Of Jews (NYT) ... 20
Radical Cleric Preached Hatred And Murder, Prosecution Argues (LAT) ... 21

Patriot Act:

U.S. Attorney Touts Usefulness Of Patriot Act To Law Enforcement (KATV-TV) ... 22

Homeland Response:

F.B.I. Tries To Dispel Surveillance Concerns (NYT) ... 22
Monitoring Of Muslims Addressed (WT) ... 23
US-VISIT To Step Up Fingerprinting (FEDTIMES) ... 24
Trade Group's Quick Advice: Slow Down (WP) ... 25
City Revival Plan Draws Sharp Criticism (LAT) ... 26
Anger Meets New Orleans Renewal Plan (NYT) ... 27
Hostility Greets Katrina Recovery Plan (WP) ... 28
Back To The Future (WSJ) ... 30

War News:

Bush Open To Hearings On Domestic Spying (LEXHL) ... 31
Bush Tries To Shape Iraq Debate In Election Year (REU-Y2) ... 32
General Asserts Right On Self-Incrimination In Iraq Abuse Cases (WP) ... 33
Local Insurgents Tell Of Clashes With Al Qaeda's Forces In Iraq (NYT) ... 34
Efforts Intensify To Train Iraqi Police (CSM) ... 37
Key Shiite Backs Away From Charter Accord (WP) ... 38
Shiite Leader Rejects Big Charter Changes, Frustrating Sunnis (NYT) ... 39
Sunnis Can't Change Government Structure (WT/AP) ... 39
An Incendiary Threat In Iraq (NYT) ... 40
South Korean Businessman Denied Bail In Oil-for-food Case (AP) ... 41
Mexican Agents Nabbed Oil-for-food Suspect (/REU) ... 41
Oil-for-Food Suspect, Ailing, Faces Arraignment In New York (NYT) ... 42
Oil-for-Food Suspect 'kidnapped' (TIMES) ... 43
German Spies Aided U.S. Attempt To Kill Hussein In Aerial Attack (LAT) ... 43
History Lessons (WT) ... 44
More Body Armor Is On The Way For U.S. Troops (WP) ... 45
Army Sending Added Armor To Iraq Units (NYT) ... 45
National Guard Troops Sue Government In Pay Dispute (REU-Y2) ... 46
Lanky Teen Driven To Become A Marine (WP) ... 47

DOJ:

Gonzales Will Take Part In Opening Of Center (SLPD) ... 47

Corporate Scandals:

South Floridians Plead Guilty To Hedge Fund Fraud (SFBJ) ... 47
SEC Losing Torchbearer On Corporate Behavior (WSJ) ... 48

Criminal Law:

Sources: Two Lawmakers Could Face Charges In Abramoff Probe (CNN) ... 48
An E-mail Trail Of Money And Influence (CSM) ... 49
Congressman's Ex-aide Admits Abetting Bribery (USAT) ... 51
Lawmaker Sought Cut Of Nigerian Deal: Aide (REU-Y2) ... 52

Ex-Aide Pleads Guilty To Bribing Congressman (WP)..... 53
In U.S. Bribe Probe Of Rep. Jefferson, Ex-Aide Sets Plea (WSJ)53
Congressman Implicated In Case (NYT/AP)..... 54
Former Congressional Aide Pleads Guilty In Bribery Scandal (FOX)..... 54
Kickbacks Admitted In Work For New Orleans (NOTP)..... 55
Council Member Pleads Not Guilty To Extortion (AP)..... 56
F.B.I. Said To Grill Man, 20, On Cruise Disappearance (NYT)... 56
Woodward Found Guilty (WIAT-TV)..... 57
Puerto Rico Lawyer Indicted In Scheme (AP)..... 57
U.S. Supreme Court Splits Over Fairness Of Calif. Death Sentence (LAW/AP)..... 58
Justices Question Death Row Inmate's Guilt (REU-Y2)..... 58
Justices Debate Case Of Condemned Inmate Tenn. Man Wants New Hearing, DNA Tests Examined (USAT)..... 59
A 1986 Case Could Aid Appeals Along Death Row (NYT)..... 60
U.S. State Court Overturns Death Sentence In Murder Of Governor's Secretary (FINDLAW/AP)..... 61
Gun Dealer Sentenced For Fraud (PHI)..... 61
Man Indicted In VA Hospital Shooting Of Co-worker (AP)..... 62
Trial Opens In Prison Slaying Of Ex-Priest (NYT)..... 62

Civil Law:

State Guardsmen Sue For Post-9/11 Expenses (AP)..... 64
MedcoHealth Solutions: Department Of Justice Won't Intervene In Whistleblower Lawsuit (AP)..... 64
Former Genentech Worker Sues Co. Over Marketing Practices (DOWJONES)..... 64
Mislabeled Bread A Danger, Allergists Say (MINNST)..... 65
High Court Ruling Slowly Bears Fruit For Wineries (LAW/AP).... 66
Copy Shop Scores With Print Jobs (WP)..... 67
Reformzilla (WSJ)..... 68

Civil Rights:

Justice Department Settles AMC Case (AP)..... 69
Hispanic Workers Get 2nd Chance To Challenge English-only Policy (AP)..... 70
A Fault Line For 'Intelligent Design' (LAT)..... 70

Antitrust:

Appliance Firms' Stock Recovers (AP)..... 72
Report Sees Legal Hurdles For Whirlpool, Maytag Merger (FREEP)..... 72
Northwest Drops SkyTeam Antitrust Request (AP)..... 72
Lobbying To Sell Your House (NYT)..... 73
Johnson & Johnson Won't Wave White Flag Yet For Guidant (DOWJONES)..... 75
Investors Expect Battle For P&O After Singapore Hints At A Bid (WSJ)..... 76

Environment/Indian Affairs:

U.S. Officials Confirm Miners Tried To Escape After Blast (NYT)77
Interior Department To Open Alaskan Land To Oil Drilling (WP) 78
U.S. Lifts Longtime Drilling Ban On Alaskan Wildlife Habitat (LAT)..... 78
Warming Tied To Extinction Of Frog Species (WP)..... 79
Study Finds Global Warming Is Killing Frogs (WSJ)..... 80
Frog Killer Is Linked To Global Warming (NYT)..... 81
Vanishing Of Frogs, Toads Tied To Global Warming, Study Says (USAT)..... 82
Margin Of Safety Just-in-Time Inventories Make U.S. Vulnerable In A Pandemic (WSJ)..... 83
Eminent Domain Laws Get First State High Court Test Since U.S. Supreme Court Ruling (LAW/AP)..... 85
Appeals Court Takes Up 2003 Meskwaki Election Case (AP).... 86

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Some Crack Cocaine Prison Terms Shorter Since Ruling On Sentencing Guidelines, Study Says (AP)..... 87
Judges Show More Leniency On Crack Cocaine (WSJ)..... 87
Drugs And Racial Discrimination (NYT)..... 88
News Elicits Sadness, Not Shock (WP)..... 88
Marion Barry's Decision (WP)..... 90
POLICE BLOTTER (FLJOURNAL)..... 91
U.S. Finds California-Mexico Tunnel (CNN)..... 91
Another Suspension For Skeleton Team (NYT)..... 91
Skeleton Racer Lund Suspended After Dope Test (REU)..... 92
Suspended Racer Optimistic (NYT/AP)..... 92
2 Men Schemed To Drive Black Family Out Of Home, Indictment Says (REU)..... 93
Dearborn Heights Drug Bust (WXYZ-TV)..... 94
Wilcox Sentenced To Federal Prison (CLEVEDB)..... 94

Immigration:

12 Indicted In Alien Smuggling (WT)..... 94
Ex-Embassy Driver Admits Smuggling Aliens (FINDLAW/AP)... 95

Tax:

Ex-county GOP Chairman Pleads Guilty To Tax Evasion (CHASGAZ)..... 95
Wife Of Indicted NYPD Detective Pleads Not Guilty To Tax Charge (NSDY/AP)..... 96

Congress-Administration:

Democrats Sharply Question Alito (REU-Y2)..... 96
Nerves Fray At Alito Hearing Democrats Turn Up Heat On Supreme Court Nominee (USAT)..... 97
An Intense Experience For Family Members, Too (NYT)..... 98
Democrats Target Alito's Credibility (WSJ)..... 98
Alito Turns Aside Democrats' Criticism (AP)..... 99
Alito Disavows Controversial Group (WP)..... 101
Alito's Ties To Controversial Group Probed (LAT)..... 102
The Democrats' Last Roar, By Way Of Princeton (WP)..... 103
Senators Show Claws At Hearing, Sling Zingers (WT)..... 104
Alito Accused Of Racism (WT)..... 104
Democrats Press Alito On Conservative Background (LAW).... 106
Alito Leaves Door Open To Reversing 'Roe' (WP)..... 107
Alito Demurs When Asked If Roe V. Wade Is Settled Law (KRT)109
Alito Remains Unruffled In Testy Hearings (LAT)..... 110
Democrats Take Aggressive Tack; Alito Is Unfazed (NYT)..... 112
Surprise End Unlikely As Alito Refuses To Take Bait (FT)..... 114
Alito Pressed On Precedent, Privacy (CSM)..... 114
From The Left, Calls To Press Alito Harder (NYT)..... 115
Democrats Target Alito, But Miss The Mark (CHIST)..... 116

DOJ_NMG_0009400

O'Connor Casts A Long Shadow On The Nominee (NYT) 117
Loose Lips Sink . . . (WP)..... 118
Congresswomen Deem Alito Unfit (WT)..... 119
Judge Alito, In His Own Words (NYT) 120
Senate Civility (WSJ) 121
Kate Michelman, The Public Face Of A Woman's Right To Privacy (WP)..... 121
Losing The Alitos (NYT)..... 122
The Alito Spectacle: Senators (USAT) 123
The Alito Spectacle: Nominee (USAT) 124
Bush Sets Focus On Health Care For 2006 Agenda (WSJ) 125
Bush To Aim For Tight 2007 Budget: Card (REU-Y2)..... 126
Inside The Beltway (WT)..... 126
Treasury Undersecretary Says He's Paid To Worry (USAT) 127
Into The Oversight Void Step The Inspectors General (Washington Post) 128
Lawmakers Move To Cut Lobbyists' Influence Scandal Jars Loose Stuck Legislation (USAT)..... 129
Hill Weighs Curbs On Lobbying (WP)..... 130
Lobbyists' Emergence Reflects Shift In Capital Culture (WP) ... 131
Let All The Sunshine In (WT)..... 132
Arizona Legislator May Join Race To Succeed DeLay (WSJ) .. 133
Congress Watch: Few Expect Dark Horse In House GOP Race (USNEWS)..... 134
House Republicans Outline Lobbying Reform Ideas (REU-Y2) 135
In Majority Leader Race, Lobbying Rules Are The Easy Target (NYT) 135
House Members Weigh Blunt's Reputation, Ties To DeLay (SCCD) 136
New Majority Leader Election Date Rejected (AP)..... 137
U.S. House Republicans Set Majority Leader Election On Feb. 2 (BLOOM)..... 138
Across-the-Board Votes On House GOP Leaders Sought (LAT)138
Texas Redistricting Is One More Hurdle For DeLay (NYT) 140
Houston TV Stations Withhold Ads Attacking DeLay (REU-Y2) 141
Survey Highlights Employees' Hankering For Training (WP) 142
The Reliable Source (WP) 143
Army Is Poised To Kill Spy-Plane Effort (WSJ) 143
Endless Probe, Secret Result (USAT)..... 144
Credit Where It's Due (WSJ)..... 144

Other News:

World Economy Expanding (USAT) 145
2006 Rally Keeps Chugging (WSJ) 147
The Church Of GDP (WP) 148
As Bernanke Era Begins, Former Fed Governors Expect Change (KRT)..... 149
Stem Cell Research Funding In Md. Raises Bioethics Issue (BSUN)..... 151
Ehrlich Proposes Stem-cell Funding (WT)..... 152
Stem Cell Hype And Hope (WP)..... 153
States, Flush In Election Year, Loosen Up (WSJ)..... 154
Gov.'s Top Aide To Woo Donors (LAT) 155
Outside Audit Forecast: More Pension Freezes (WSJ)..... 157
Clinton In Deal To Cut AIDS Treatment Costs (NYT)..... 158
Clinton Charity Gets Price Cuts For AIDS Drugs In Poor Countries (WSJ) 158
Beating Up On Wal-Mart (WP) 159
Russia Won't Block U.S. On Iran (WP)..... 160
Iran Defiant As Sanctions From West Likely (AP-Y2) 161
A Test Of Wills Between Iran And The West (NYT) 162
Pressure Mounts On Iran As UK Vows To Go To UN (FT)..... 163
Iran Crosses Last Red Line; UN Sanctions Ahead? (CSM)..... 164
Iran's Nuclear Challenge (WP)..... 165
Help Us, America . . . (WSJ)..... 166
A Firebrand In A House Of Cards (NYT) 166
Rice Threatens Syria With U.N. Action (AP)..... 167
U.S. Tells Syria To Cooperate, Threatens UN Action (NYT/REU)168
Rice Threatens Syria With U.N. Action (NSDY/AP) 168
U.S. Threatens To Take Syria To UN For Obstructing Hariri Probe (BLOOM)..... 169
U.S. Ratchets Up Pressure On Syria In Hariri Probe (WSJ)..... 169
Likud Cabinet Ministers To Resign (WT) 170
Sharon Physicians Fear Brain Damage (WT) 171
Israelis' Anger At Evangelist May Delay Christian Center (NYT)171
Is The Road Map's Moment Gone? (WP) 172
U.S. Wants To Resume N.Korea Nuke Talks (AP) 173
North Korea And Iran Win Special Notice At Spy Center (NYT) 174
North Korean Leader's Whereabouts Unknown (AP)..... 175
Kim Jong Il Said To Reach Shanghai By Plane (WP) 175
US Hopes N.Korea's Kim In China For Nuclear Talk (REU) 176
China Seen Unlikely To Press Nuke Issue (WT)..... 176
Trade Surplus Tripled In '05, China Says (NYT) 177
China's Trade Surplus Tripled, Topping $100 Billion Last Year (WSJ) 179
Abuse Of Power Enables 'Economic Terrorism' In China (WP) 179
China Proposes Fewer Dams In Power Project To Aid Environment (NYT)..... 181
A Stand Against China's Pollution Tide (WP) 182
Don't Drink The Water (WSJ) 183
After WHO Request, China Reports Two More Bird Flu Deaths (WP)..... 184
Turkey May Have Lasting Traces Of Flu (NYT) 184
U.N. Seeks To Quell Flu Panic (WT)..... 185
Bird Flu Mutation Of Concern, Experts Say (WP) 186
Opec Nations ‘set For Record Oil Revenues’ (FT)..... 187
Bahrain Pact Signed By Bush (NYT/REU) 188
Canada's Conservatives Boost Lead (WP) 188
Deadline Nears In Mexican Election (USAT)..... 189
Has Citgo Become A Political Tool For Hugo Chavez? (USAT) 190
New Era Of U.S-German Relations Set To Begin (KRT) 192
After Frosty Times, A Thaw In US-German Relations? (CSM) . 193
Ukraine's Leader Dismisses Parliament's Vote To Fire Premier (NYT) 194
Blair In Plea To Bush For Rolls Contract (FT) 195
Blair Program To Teach Respect (WT) 196
Kazakh Chief Extends Rule (WT) 197
Student Says He Was Detained In Zimbabwe (WP) 197

DOJ_NMG_0009401

TERRORISM NEWS:

Bush Calls Spying Inquiry Inevitable (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 12, 2006

LOUISVILLE, Ky. — President Bush acknowledged Wednesday that congressional hearings into his domestic spying program were inevitable, but he said they would be "good for democracy" as long as they did not "tell the enemy what we're doing."

Even as he delivered a lengthy defense of the program, Bush stepped back from the strong opposition he expressed last month to a public investigation of his decision to allow the National Security Agency to eavesdrop on communications between people in the United States, including U.S. citizens, and those in other countries in suspected terrorism cases.

He said Wednesday that in approving the program, he had to balance civil liberties against the need to find out, "on a limited basis," what potential terrorists were plotting.

Critics have questioned whether it was legal to order a government agency to listen in on the conversations of people in the United States and read their e-mails without court approval.

Bush's comments came in response to a question at a citizens forum in Louisville as he took his case for the Iraq war to an audience beyond Washington.

The spying program, which was revealed by the New York Times last month, came up when Bush was asked whether the Justice Department, which has begun investigating the leaks, would "follow through and, if necessary, go after the media … to shut these leaks up."

Bush did not directly answer the question, but he used it to launch one of his longest public explanations of the program.

"I did say to the … National Security Agency that they should protect America by taking the phone numbers of known Al Qaeda and/or affiliates and find out why they are making phone calls into the United States and vice versa. And I did so because the enemy still wants to hurt us," Bush said, adding that "if somebody is talking to Al Qaeda, we want to know why."

He said that when he took the oath of office, "I meant it when I said I'm going to uphold the Constitution."

But, he added, "I have the right as the commander in chief in a time of war to take action necessary to protect the American people."

Bush said that the program had been "fully scrutinized on a legal basis," that it had been reauthorized several times, with lawyers from different government branches looking into it, and that congressional leaders — Republicans and Democrats — and both parties' leaders on the intelligence committees had been briefed on it.

He did not say that some senior government lawyers, including at least one top Justice Department official, had expressed qualms about the program, and that senior Democrats said they were given limited information and were not allowed to study it more closely.

Bush said that before moving forward with the program, "I wanted to make sure I had all the legal authority necessary."

He repeated earlier assertions that the congressional resolution passed after the Sept. 11 attacks gave him the authority to use all force he thought necessary to fight terrorists, and that the spying program fell under that authority.

"There will be a lot of hearings and talk about that," Bush said, "but that's good for democracy — just so long as the hearings, as they explore whether I have the prerogative to make the decision I made, doesn't tell the enemy what we're doing. See, that's the danger."

On Wednesday, Bush addressed about 400 people chosen by civic groups, business organizations and a university. He spoke for about 20 minutes on the war in Iraq, then fielded questions for about an hour on topics such as immigration, the role of church and state in Islamic society, education and the challenges of preparing a workforce for 21st century jobs.

The Louisville trip reflected a drive by the White House to take Bush's message on Iraq and terrorism directly to audiences around the country in an effort to overcome what public opinion polls have found to be sagging support for the war.

As part of the effort, Vice President Dick Cheney spoke in two telephone interviews with Fox News hosts Tony Snow and Sean Hannity, drawing attention to what he says were ties between Saddam Hussein and Al Qaeda.

Bush Again Defends Wiretapping Program (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

LOUISVILLE, Jan. 11 -- President Bush on Wednesday defended his decision to allow government eavesdropping on the phone calls and e-mails of suspected terrorist collaborators in the United States, saying the program is legal and is essential to averting potential attacks.

"I understand people's concerns about government eavesdropping," Bush said in response to a question about the program during a citizens forum here. "I share their concerns as well." Even so, he added, the program is important to his duty to protect Americans.

Bush's comments on the eavesdropping program came in response to a question posed during a campaign-style event here aimed at shoring up support for the war in Iraq as well as the nation's broader anti-terrorism effort.

The president's forum here was different than most of the events he attends nationwide. Usually he speaks to carefully screened partisan audiences and takes no questions. White House aides described Wednesday's audience of business and community leaders as bipartisan, and Bush opened himself to unscripted questions during the town-hall-style event.

The domestic spying program has drawn fire from members of Congress, both Democrats and Republicans, who think it oversteps the president's authority and violates civil liberties that are part of the nation's fiber. The National Security Agency program began in the aftermath of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks as a way to help the nation's intelligence agencies gather information about any future attacks.

The program authorizes the NSA to screen the international e-mails and phone calls of people in the United States with suspected terrorism ties without first obtaining a court order. Bush said that congressional leaders have been briefed on it and have been given the opportunity "to express their approval or disapproval."

Some Democrats, however, have complained that the classified briefings amounted to one-way conversations in which the administration simply told them about the program but left no means to protest it.

Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) has announced plans to hold hearings on the spying program. Bush said he welcomes the inquiry, calling it "good for democracy." He added, however, that the hearings run the danger of telling "the enemy what we're doing."

In a statement released after Bush's remarks, Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean said that rather than protect the nation, Bush's program may compromise efforts to fight terrorism by resulting in hundreds of cases against suspected terrorists being thrown out of court.

"President Bush's decision to sidestep the rule of law and spy on Americans without a court order may have dealt a serious blow to our ability to fight and win the war on terror," Dean said.

The president sounded now-familiar themes about the war in Iraq. Although insurgents there continue to sow havoc and death with almost daily bombings and other attacks, Bush said steady progress is being made toward success.

Also, with the war sure to be a major issue during the upcoming midterm elections, Bush again warned Democratic critics of the war not to allow their critiques to undermine the morale of troops whose lives are on the line.

"I can understand people being abhorrent about war. War is terrible," Bush said. "But one way people can help as we're coming down the pike in the 2006 elections, is remember the effect that rhetoric can have on our troops in harm's way, and the effect that rhetoric can have in emboldening or weakening an enemy."

Earlier this week, Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) and Sen. Jack Reed (D-R.I.) charged that Bush has "used our troops as a shield against legitimate criticism of his Iraq war policy."

In Shift, Bush Says He Welcomes Inquiry On Secret Wiretaps (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

LOUISVILLE, Ky., Jan. 11 - President Bush said Wednesday that he would welcome a Congressional investigation of whether he had the authority to order the National Security Agency to monitor communications in the United States without warrants.

Until now, the White House had opposed public hearings, which are scheduled to begin next month in the Senate. But on Wednesday, answering questions from a friendly crowd in Louisville in a conference center decorated with signs that said "Winning the War on Terror," Mr. Bush appeared ready to make the best of a political necessity.

In his campaign-style meeting, he was repeatedly applauded for authorizing the wiretaps, a decision that some of his political aides said they believed would ultimately help rebuild his approval ratings by demonstrating the lengths to which he would go to prevent another terrorist attack inside the United States.

DOJ_NMG_0009403

Asked whether his administration was going to "go after the media" for revealing operations like the domestic wiretapping, Mr. Bush instead defended his decision to authorize the surveillance. "I did so because the enemy still wants to hurt us," he said. "And it seems like to me that if somebody is talking to Al Qaeda, we want to know why."

His order enabled the National Security Agency to monitor the international phone calls and e-mail messages of people in the United States suspected of links to Al Qaeda.

Singling out Americans and others in the United States for such surveillance would normally require a warrant under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, although the act also allows the attorney general to authorize a wiretap if it is reported to the court within 72 hours.

"Now, I - look, I understand people's concerns about government eavesdropping," Mr. Bush said. "And I share those concerns, as well. So obviously I had to make the difficult decision between balancing civil liberties and, on a limited basis - and I mean limited basis - try to find out the intention of the enemy."

The president never directly addressed the question of why he avoided the existing system, although his legal advisers and intelligence aides have said it was too cumbersome.

"There will be a lot of hearings to talk about that, but that's good for democracy," Mr. Bush said. "Just so long as the hearings, as they explore whether or not I had the prerogative to make the decision I made, doesn't tell the enemy what we're doing. See, that's the danger."

Mr. Bush said some key members of Congress had been briefed on the program several years ago and "we gave them a chance to express their disapproval or approval," brushing past the claims of some Democrats that their questions about the program's legality were never resolved.

The president's statement that he was willing to see public hearings go forward was a change from his stance at a news conference at the White House just before Christmas. At the time, he said, "Any public hearings on programs will say to the enemy, 'Here's what they do - adjust.' "

Senator Arlen Specter, a Pennsylvania Republican and the chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, has scheduled open hearings, and the Senate Intelligence Committee has said it plans closed hearings.

The president's legal justification for the N.S.A. program has gotten mixed reviews, ranging from enthusiastic to skeptical to scathing.

This week, Representative Jane Harman of California, the top Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee, released a 14-page legal analysis she had requested from a former C.I.A. general counsel, Jeffrey H. Smith, now a Washington lawyer.

Although recognizing the president's assertion that his power as commander in chief justifies warrantless surveillance, Mr. Smith called that case "weak" in light of the language and documented purpose of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978, which requires warrants.

Mr. Smith also wrote that the Congressional resolution authorizing military force against those who carried out the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks "does not, in my view, justify warrantless electronic surveillance of United States persons in the United States."

"The president was correct in concluding that many of our laws were not adequate to deal with this new threat," Mr. Smith wrote. "He was wrong, however, to conclude that he is therefore free to follow the laws he agrees with and ignore those with which he disagrees."

Investigate Surveillance, But Be Careful, Bush Says President Reverses On Hearings; Ex-CIA Counsel Questions Legality (USAT)

By John Diamond And David Jackson

USA Today, January 12, 2006

LOUISVILLE — President Bush on Wednesday dropped his opposition to upcoming Senate hearings into his program of conducting electronic surveillance on domestic targets without court-approved warrants. He said he welcomes such hearings.

Hearings will be “good for democracy, Bush said during a town-hall-style meeting filled with supporters and interrupted often by applause. “Just so long as the hearings, as they explore whether or not I have the prerogative to make the decision I made, doesn't tell the enemy what we're doing. See, that's the danger.”

After the program was revealed publicly last month by The New York Times, Bush said that hearings would be counterproductive and that the members of Congress who needed to know about the surveillance of people linked to terrorism suspects had been briefed on it.

“Any public hearings on programs will say to the enemy: ‘Here's what they do. Adjust.' This is a war,” Bush said at a news conference in December.

DOJ_NMG_0009404

Bush said Wednesday that administration lawyers had approved the program. “I can understand concerns about this program,” he said. “Before I went forward, I wanted to make sure I had all the legal authority necessary to make this decision.”

For the second time in a week, however, an analysis questioned the White House's claims that Congress implicitly authorized the program. Such a contention is “not credible,” according to a memo to the House Intelligence Committee by Jeffrey H. Smith, a CIA counsel during the Clinton administration.

Smith's Jan. 3 memo was requested by committee Democrats. It follows a report by the non-partisan Congressional Research Service that said the surveillance program might not be “well grounded” legally and may rest on a mistaken assumption that Congress has no power to limit domestic surveillance in wartime. The report said a firm conclusion couldn't be made because much about the surveillance program is classified.

Bush's argument, that he has the constitutional authority to authorize the surveillance program, is a weak one, Smith wrote.

The president's constitutional authority, he wrote, is limited by the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA), which requires a warrant before spy agencies can target someone in the USA and allows for only a 15-day exception following a declaration of war by Congress. The surveillance program has been in effect for more than four years; Congress has not formally declared war.

White House spokesman Fred Jones said the Justice Department has detailed the legal arguments supporting the policy. Those arguments focus on two points:

·Presidential warmaking powers under Article II of the Constitution give Bush the right to take actions to prevent further attacks. Since the 9/11 attacks showed the enemy was in the USA, surveillance, a standard part of modern warfare, was within Bush's powers.

·The 1978 law forbids surveillance without a warrant “except as authorized by statute.” The administration says a post-9/11 congressional resolution authorizing the use of force in response to the attacks is such a statute. However, Smith wrote, “It is hard to believe that Congress had any idea that it was authorizing such sweeping presidential powers” when it voted for the resolution on Sept. 14, 2001.

Smith, who was CIA general counsel in 1995 and 1996, wrote that broad assertions of presidential war powers have generally been upheld by the courts “in areas where Congress has not acted.” Where specific legal language exists, such as FISA, presidential power is limited, he wrote.

Bush: Hearings On Eavesdropping Program "good For Democracy" (LEXHL)

By deb riechmann

Lexington Herald-Leader (KY), January 12, 2006

LOUISVILLE, Ky. - President Bush said Wednesday that congressional hearings to investigate his domestic eavesdropping program will be good for democracy as long as they don't give secrets away to the enemy.

Bush was initially opposed to having the program investigated in a public format, but made it clear that he is resigned to open hearings that are scheduled to begin in coming weeks.

Bush's decision to authorize the National Security Agency to monitor - without warrants - people inside the United States has sparked a flurry of questions about the program's legal justification.

Bush defended the program during a campaign-style town hall meeting, saying he understands concerns about it but monitoring the phone calls of affiliates of the terrorist network al Qaida is necessary to protect the United States. He said he made sure he had the legal authority to allow the program before he did so.

"There will be a lot of hearings to talk about that, but that's good for democracy," he said. "Just so long as the hearings, as they explore whether or not I had the prerogative to make the decision I make, doesn't tell the enemy what we're doing. See, that's the danger."

In the days after the program's existence was revealed, Bush cautioned against hearings, arguing that the appropriate members of Congress were being consulted privately and offering assurances that he was working within the law to authorize the eavesdropping.

"Any public hearings on programs will say to the enemy, `Here's what they do - adjust.' This is a war," Bush said at a December news conference when asked about expected hearings on Capitol Hill.

The Senate Judiciary Committee has scheduled hearings on the issue for early February. The Senate Intelligence Committee also plans to hold hearings that will be closed to the public.

For the second time in a month, Bush took questions from audience members during an appearance to win support for his war on terror.

In his opening remarks, he defended the global war on terrorism and the U.S. effort in Iraq. He said insurgents in Iraq were trying to drive the United States out through violence and bloodshed but he declared, "They're not going to shake my will."

While saying he wanted to bring American troops home, he said, "I don't want them to come home without achieving the victory."

In a question and answer session, Bush was asked about Iraq, education priorities, immigration, the economy, health care and other subjects. He said the war on terrorism would not end with an enemy surrender, as was the case in World War II. "I don't envision a signing ceremony on the USS Missouri," Bush said. "The peace won't be the kind of peace we're used to."

White House press secretary Scott McClellan said questions from the audience were not prescreened, and Bush himself said that while the event was about terrorism, no questions were off limits.

Kentucky, where Iraq is taking center stage in politics, provided an appropriate backdrop for Bush's remarks.

Kentucky Rep. Anne Northup, a Republican ally of Bush who joined him at the event, describes the situation in Iraq as "painful." Yet, she stands firmly behind the his decision to invade that country, a potentially divisive issue in Northup's upcoming re-election campaign.

In contrast, Iraq war veteran Andrew Horne, a Democrat running for her seat, said the invasion was a mistake because the threat of weapons of mass destruction - a key justification for the war - never materialized.

Bush Not Opposed To Hearings On Eavesdropping (REU-Y2)

Reuters, January 12, 2006

President George W. Bush on Wednesday defended his authorization of domestic eavesdropping and said he did not oppose congressional hearings as long as they did not provide information to the enemy.

"I can understand concerns about this program, before I went forward I wanted to make sure I had all the legal authority necessary to make this decision as your president," he said. "We are a ... country of law."

Critics have questioned whether it was legal for Bush to authorize the National Security Agency to eavesdrop inside the United States on Americans with suspected terrorism ties without getting court approval.

"I have the right as the commander in chief in a time of war to take action necessary to protect the American people," Bush said in Kentucky where he gave a speech on Iraq and terrorism.

"One way to protect us is to understand the nature of the enemy. Part of being able to deal with this kind of enemy in a different kind of war is to understand why they're making decisions they're making inside our country," Bush said.

Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, a Pennsylvania Republican, has said he wants to hold hearings in early February on the domestic eavesdropping.

Bush said hearings were "good for democracy" if they did not help the enemy.

"Just so long as the hearings, as they explore whether or not I have the prerogative to make the decision I made doesn't tell the enemy what we're doing -- see that's the danger," Bush said.

Bush Reasserts 'Right' To Order Wiretaps (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, January 12, 2006

LOUISVILLE, Ky. -- President Bush said yesterday that he is doing everything "within the Constitution" to protect the American people from another terrorist attack, but added that congressional hearings into a top-secret U.S. spying program will be "good for democracy."

In an unusual, 75-minute campaign-style town hall meeting -- which included nearly a dozen questions from members of the invited audience -- Mr. Bush said he firmly believes he has the authority to order warrantless wiretaps of phone calls by people thought to be linked to al Qaeda or its affiliates.

"I have the right as the commander in chief in a time of war to take action necessary to protect the American people," he said during the event at the Kentucky International Convention Center in Louisville. "I can understand concerns about this program. Before I went forward, I wanted to make sure I had all the legal authority necessary to make this decision as your president."

Mr. Bush said that after the September 11 attacks, he vowed "that I would use everything in my power -- obviously, within the Constitution -- but everything in my power to protect the American people. ... I put that hand on the Bible, and I meant it when I said I'm going to uphold the Constitution."

Some on Capitol Hill are demanding an investigation into the wiretapping program, first revealed last month by the New York Times. The program allows the National Security Agency to eavesdrop on international phone calls without a warrant, which Democrats say is a violation of the constitutional right to privacy.

Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean criticized the Bush administration's "disregard for our courts and our laws."

DOJ_NMG_0009406

"President Bush's decision to sidestep the rule of law and spy on Americans without a court order may have dealt a serious blow to our ability to fight and win the war on terror," Mr. Dean said.

The Senate Judiciary Committee has scheduled hearings on the issue for early February, and the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence plans to hold closed-door hearings -- both of which Mr. Bush endorsed yesterday.

"There will be a lot of hearings and talk about that, but that's good for democracy," he said. He added a caveat, however: "Just so long as the hearings, as they explore whether or not I have the prerogative to make the decision I made, doesn't tell the enemy what we're doing. See, that's the danger."

Continuing an effort that began last month to convince Americans that he has a plan for Iraq, Mr. Bush was conciliatory and occasionally contrite during the lengthy question-and-answer session with some of the 400 community leaders, small-business owners and others in attendance.

On the invasion of Iraq, he said: "I can understand folks who say, 'I wish you hadn't done that.' " On the failure to find weapons of mass destruction in Iraq, he said: "I understand that the intelligence didn't turn out the way a lot of the world thought it would be. And that was disappointing, and we've done something about it" by overhauling the nation's intelligence agencies.

But he took aim at Democrats who he said might be looking to exploit the difficulties in Iraq during midterm elections in November.

Responding to a 7-year-old in the audience who asked how Americans can help in the war on terror, Mr. Bush said: "One way people can help as we're coming down the pike in the 2006 elections is remember the effect that rhetoric can have on our troops in harm's way and the effect that rhetoric can have in emboldening or weakening an enemy."

Residents Get Chance To Question President (LEXHL)

By bruce schreiner

Lexington Herald-Leader (KY), January 12, 2006

LOUISVILLE, Ky. - The global fight against terrorists was the main theme, but topics hit closer to home when Kentuckians got a crack at questioning President Bush on Wednesday.

During the town hall-style event, a business operator bemoaned health insurance costs. An educator called education crucial to the nation's security. A man asked about immigration.

But first, Bush outlined his strategy in the Iraq war.

The president said insurgents were trying to weaken America's resolve. "Whether you agree with me or not, they're not going to shake my will," he said. "We're doing the right thing."

Many tickets for the event were distributed by Greater Louisville Inc., the metro chamber of commerce. The friendly audience included Gov. Ernie Fletcher, Lt. Gov. Steve Pence, and U.S. Reps. Anne Northup and Ron Lewis, all Republicans; and Mayor Jerry Abramson, a Democrat.

Commenting on Abramson's longevity in office, Bush said his father, as president, gave the mayor a pair of cufflinks. "It looks like the mayor is going to outlast both Bushes," he said. Abramson is running for another term this year.

Across the street, about 200 people chanted and waved signs protesting the Iraq war and wiretaps ordered by the Bush administration without first obtaining warrants.

Al Mitchell of Louisville was disappointed that the tickets to Bush's speech were selectively given out and carried a sign that read, "Why aren't we inside?" Mitchell said Bush uses fear to control Americans.

"That's exactly what the Bush administration is using to subdue, to control the American people, to sell them on this war in Iraq," Mitchell said. "It's this factor of fear that we're going to be terrorized by ambiguous figures."

Speaking in the home state of Fort Campbell, which has thousands of soldiers deployed to Iraq, Bush said his goal is "nothing short of victory." He said victory would be achieved when Iraq is no longer a haven for terrorists and Iraqis can defend their fledgling democracy.

Bush said decisions on troop levels would be left to military commanders.

"I know a lot of people want our troops to come home," he said. "I do, too. But I don't want them to come home without achieving the victory. We owe that to the mothers and fathers and husbands and wives who have lost a loved one. We can't let their sacrifice go in vain."

Bush then took questions for nearly an hour. When a small business owner focused on rising health insurance costs, Bush acknowledged "it's becoming an unmanageable cost."

He touted health savings accounts and association health plans that pool employees together to try to hold down insurance costs. Bush also said something needs to be done to halt frivolous medical liability lawsuits that he said drive up health costs.

When asked about education, Bush bemoaned an "achievement gap in America," but said his "No Child Left Behind" law has brought improvements to education accountability.

DOJ_NMG_0009407

Bush hinted that his upcoming State of the Union speech would address the problem of low math and science proficiency among middle and high school students.

"We've got to have kids that are the best in science and engineering and math, otherwise jobs are going to go where the workforce does have those skills," he said.

Another questioner asked Bush about immigration. Bush said border security is vital but urged compassion for foreigners coming to the U.S. in search of work.

Bush said employers should be held accountable for hiring legal immigrants, but he said that's difficult given rampant fraud.

Many farmers and other Kentucky employers rely on immigrant workers.

"You've got folks right here in Kentucky who are hiring people to do jobs that Americans won't do, and you say, 'Show me your papers,' and they've been forged and the employer didn't know about it," Bush said.

Bush promoted his guest worker plan in which foreigners would receive tamperproof cards allowing them to work temporarily in the U.S.

One question came from 7-year-old Alex Childress. The youngster, dressed in a suit and tie, asked what people can do to help in the war against terrorists.

Bush used the question to send a message to war critics. "One way people can help is ... remember the effect that rhetoric can have on the troops in harm's way, and the effect that rhetoric can have in emboldening or weakening an enemy," he said.

Alex's mother, Martha, said her son thought of the question himself.

"He didn't like any of my questions," she said.

The Lawbreaker In The Oval Office (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

The country has set the bar so low for the performance of George W. Bush as president that it is effectively on the ground.

No one expects very much from Mr. Bush. He's currently breaking the law by spying on Americans in America without getting warrants, but for a lot of people that's just George being George. Forget the complexities of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, or even the Fourth Amendment's safeguards against unwarranted (pun intended) government intrusion into matters that we have a right to keep private.

On his frequent trips home to his ranch in Texas, the president likes to ride his bicycle. He's not studying the Constitution.

"People are changing phone numbers and phone calls, and they're moving quick," said Mr. Bush, as he defended his authorization of warrantless eavesdropping by the National Security Agency on phone calls and e-mail into and out of the U.S.

As the president put it, "If somebody from Al Qaeda is calling you, we'd like to know why."

Well, that's true, Mr. President. But Congress and the Constitution have spoken as clearly as a bright sun on a cloudless afternoon about these matters: if you're going to eavesdrop on Americans in the U.S., you'd better run out and get a warrant.

You have to act fast? O.K., do what you have to do - but you then have to apply for a warrant within 72 hours. If, after three days, you can't explain to a court - a secret court, at that - why you need to be spying on somebody, then you need to stop that spying.

It has become fashionable to say that this controversy is about the always difficult problem of balancing civil liberties and national security. But I think the issue is starker than that. The real issue is President Bush's apparent belief - stoked at every opportunity by that zealot of zealots, Dick Cheney - that he can do just about anything he wants (mistreat prisoners, lock people up forever without filing charges), and justify it in the name of fighting terror.

"There's an enemy out there," said Mr. Bush.

That's also true. But this is not China or the old Soviet Union. The United States should be the one place on the planet where even a devastating terror strike by Al Qaeda is unable to shake the foundations of the government, which is grounded in the rule of law, the separation of powers and a constitution that guarantees the fundamental rights of the citizenry.

A group of former government officials and law professors from some of the nation's most distinguished universities sent a letter to Congressional leaders on Monday expressing their deep concern about the president's domestic spying program. They said:

"Although the program's secrecy prevents us from being privy to all of its details, the Justice Department's defense of what it concedes was secret and warrantless electronic surveillance of persons within the United States fails to identify any plausible legal authority for such surveillance. Accordingly, the program appears on its face to violate existing law."

Among those who signed the letter were William Sessions, the former F.B.I. director, and Philip Heymann, a former deputy attorney general who is now a professor at Harvard Law School.

DOJ_NMG_0009408

The Congressional Research Service, a nonpartisan arm of Congress, also took issue with the administration's defense of the warrantless eavesdropping. Its analysts searched diligently but apparently in vain for a legal justification of the spying authorized by the president. Their detailed report on the constitutional and statutory issues raised by the program said, "It appears unlikely that a court would hold that Congress has expressly or impliedly authorized the N.S.A. electronic-surveillance operations here under discussion."

The administration's attempt to justify the program, the analysts said, "does not seem to be as well grounded" as the administration seems to believe.

President Bush and others in the administration have repeatedly argued that the president's wartime powers trump some of the important constitutional guarantees and civil liberties that Americans had previously taken for granted. They don't seem to see the irony of fighting on behalf of liberty in Afghanistan and Iraq while curtailing precious liberties here at home.

The administration should not be allowed to use war as an excuse. The U.S. is a very special place in large part because no one, not even the president, is above the law.

Ex-official Warned Against Testifying On NSA Programs (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, January 12, 2006

The National Security Agency has warned a former intelligence officer that he should not testify to Congress about accusations of illegal activity at NSA because of the secrecy of the programs involved.

Renee Seymour, director of NSA special access programs stated in a Jan. 9 letter to Russ Tice that he should not testify about secret electronic intelligence programs because members and staff of the House and Senate intelligence committees do not have the proper security clearances for the secret intelligence.

Miss Seymour stated that Mr. Tice has "every right" to speak to Congress and that NSA has "no intent to infringe your rights."

However, she stated that the programs Mr. Tice took part in were so secret that "neither the staff nor the members of the [House intelligence committee] or [Senate intelligence committee] are cleared to receive the information covered by the special access programs, or SAPs."

"The SAPs to which you refer are controlled by the Department of Defense (DoD) and ... neither the staffs nor the members ... are cleared to receive the intelligence covered by the SAPs," Miss Seymour stated.

Special access programs are the most sensitive U.S. intelligence and weapons programs and are exempt from many oversight mechanisms used to check other intelligence agencies.

Miss Seymour also said that Mr. Tice, who was dismissed in May, failed to notify either the Pentagon or NSA of the improper behavior that he is charging.

As a result, she stated that Mr. Tice must first give statements to the Defense Department and NSA inspectors general before he provides any classified information to Congress from the SAPs.

Miss Seymour also said Mr. Tice must first "obtain and follow direction" from Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, through the inspectors general on the proper procedures for contacting the congressional oversight committees.

Mr. Tice said he was not part of the classified NSA program disclosed by the New York Times last month that intercepted telephone, e-mail and other communications involving U.S. citizens without a warrant from a special court.

However, he told ABC News on Tuesday that he was a source for the New York Times.

"As far as I'm concerned, as long as I don't say anything that's classified, I'm not worried," he said. "We need to clean up the intelligence community. We've had abuses, and they need to be addressed."

Mr. Tice last month asked to testify to the House and Senate intelligence oversight panels regarding what he called "probable unlawful and unconstitutional acts" that occurred while he was a technical intelligence specialist with NSA and the Defense Intelligence Agency.

He provided no details of the programs.

However, Mr. Tice worked on special access programs related to electronic intelligence gathering while working for the NSA and DIA, where he took part in space systems communications, non-communications signals, electronic warfare, satellite control, telemetry, sensors, and special capability systems.

Revealing A Viper In The Nest (WT)

By Douglas Mackinnon

The Washington Times, January 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0009409

Until recently, I believed that the liberal Americans in society and the media who espouse blind hatred for the Bush administration, the unilateral responsibility to defend our nation, our intelligence operatives and even our military, would see the error of their ways should we one day tragically lose an American city and its innocent inhabitants to terrorism.

Today, I wonder if they might not only secretly rejoice at the thought of the "Great Satan" being "justifiably" punished in such a manner, but with their very actions, sow the seeds of such destruction? A stretch? Go to some of these ultra-left Web sites and see the venom they spew at our government. Explain to me why U.S. government employees with Top Secret clearances would leak highly classified information to the media. Explain to me why that media would then selectively print operational details that it knows, beyond a shadow of a doubt, will be harmful to the national security of our nation.

The latest case of government employees betraying their trust and our nation by leaking information to the media being the story that "the Bush administration was running a covert-domestic-spying program." The classified information that was leaked to New York Times reporter James Risen by "numerous" intelligence sources has harmed our nation, our foreign relations, our national security and the welfare of our troops, in real and unimagined ways.

Why do these government employees commit such a high crime as divulging national secrets to the media? Several reasons. The first being that even though it is a very serious crime, there are rarely any consequences. No real price to be paid. It's almost a game. In fact, if you play your leaks right, a left-wing editor up in New York may give you a very handsome book contract for selling out your fellow citizens. That is, of course, assuming said editor is not vaporized first by a nuclear weapon planted by a terrorist that the "covert domestic spying" was trying to capture.

Second, they may do it because they have diluted themselves into believing that such a traitorous action is really to the good of the nation. Just because they got cut from their high school football team doesn't mean that they still can't be heroes. If not heroes to America, then certainly heroes to those who mean to exterminate our nation.

Mostly, they just do it for partisan reasons. They strongly dislike this president, "his" war in Iraq, and have a tremendous inner fear. That fear being that President Bush might actually succeed in what he is trying to accomplish, and expose them as naive fools. So, rather than see that happen, they leak to the media, and sabotage that which they have sworn to serve.

Moving on, what, then, was the motive of the New York Times and reporter James Risen? For the New York Times, one could speculate that with all the left wing U.S. newspapers out there eagerly willing to splash national secrets across their front pages, the New York Times didn't want to get out "Benedict Arnolded" by the competition.

For Mr. Risen, maybe a modern day 30 pieces of silver in the form of a book advance and praise from liberals on the Upper East side, is the answer. If news reports are to be believed, Mr. Risen was very upset that the New York Times sat on the story for a year.

So, in his outrage, what did Mr. Risen do when the New York Times would not publish his potentially devastating story on how the Bush administration might be circumventing the law to protect the American people? Did he walk in front of a stand of news cameras and reveal his "story of the decade?" Did he himself leak it to a rival newspaper in the best interests of America? No.

What Mr. Risen did was take a leave of absence from the New York Times so he could write a book entitled, "State of War: The Secret History of the CIA and the Bush Administration." When his book was done and ready for release, Mr. Risen came back to the New York Times and exposed the national secret himself. In doing so he said the New York Times "has performed a great public service by printing it, because this policy is something that the nation should debate." As these leaks and betrayals continue, we need to acknowledge that the viper is in our nest and it's not al Qaeda. It's some of our fellow Americans.

Since September 11, we have all been waiting for the next shoe to drop. Ironically, that is one job we seem to have not outsourced. The shoe may well be American made.

Douglas MacKinnon served as press secretary to former Sen. Bob Dole. He is also a former White House and Pentagon official and an author.

Op-ed: Patriot Act Is Convenient Target (USAT)

By Amitai Etzioni

USA Today, January 12, 2006

A steady stream of revelations, and the ensuing news media reports, have portrayed a president hungry for power, doing whatever is necessary — legal or not — to protect this country. In the wake of such news, some lawmakers in Congress see weakness and an opportunity to gut one of President Bush's vital weapons in the war on terror: the USA Patriot Act.

Congress should not hold up extending vital sections of the Patriot Act in reaction to these recently revealed power grabs. The president's authorization of spying on Americans by the National Security Agency has nothing to do with the Patriot Act; nor do secret prisons, nor memos allowing torture. Questions over how much power the commander in chief can exercise must be sorted out by Congress and the courts, but the Patriot Act shouldn't be held for ransom.

DOJ_NMG_0009410

Despite pleas from the White House to make all of its sections permanent, the Patriot Act has been extended only until Feb. 3. Its viability is, indeed, in jeopardy as lawmakers have found it fashionable to rail against the Patriot Act. (Related: Patriot Act poll results)

In contrast to the recently revealed secret White House initiatives, many of the 161 measures included in the law aren't contested by any major figure on the right, left or center. Even a representative of the American Civil Liberties Union said the group seeks to fix the act, not to kill it. An examination of some of the contested sections demonstrates that the measures involved are hardly out of line:

·Phones. Before the Patriot Act was passed, soon after 9/11, authorities had to obtain a court's permission to tap a phone, but the warrant had to be "particularized" to a given instrument, reflecting the days when people had one phone. Cellphones made this narrow rule obsolete. The Patriot Act changed this requirement to a suspect rather than to one of his instruments. What is wrong with that?

· Libraries. Critics have been outraged by the right of the government to search the computers of public libraries. Actually, the term "library" is not mentioned in the act. The bill authorizes searches of "books, records, papers, documents and other items ... to protect against international terrorism or clandestine intelligence activities." Critics have singled out libraries because such searches evoke more public outrage than if one would refer to the actual wording of the bill.

· Homes. The "sneak and peek" clause has been particularly vilified. The act grants authorities the right to search a home without notifying the owner for a period of days. But how long is enough? Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis., favors seven days; Republicans in the House of Representatives want 180 days. But there has been little discussion of the grubby details in such a search. How long does it take to de-encrypt a PC? To translate messages? And to find any collaborators? Once these matters are examined, it should not be difficult to come up with a compromise on notification.

· Money. The clause that penalizes giving "material support" to terrorists applies only if the donor knew where the funds were headed. If clearer wording is needed to protect those who thought they were giving to a charity, so be it.

We tend to swing wildly in one direction and then in the opposite one. The Senate Church Committee, responding to the abuses such as spying on civil rights groups and public leaders by the FBI under J. Edgar Hoover, tied the agency in knots.

The initial responses to the 9/11 attacks might well have been excessive. As time has passed — without a new attack on the USA — many security measures are being questioned, as they should be. Even so, when it comes to critical components of the act, such as those listed above, minor tweaks — not massive overhauls — would make the Patriot Act work for all Americans.

The same can't be said for the other security measures that the public has recently learned about. Those fully deserve the kind of extensive hearings to which the Patriot Act is being subjected.

Amitai Etzioni is the author ofHow Patriotic is the Patriot Act?: Freedom vs. Security in the Age of Terrorismand a member of the Markel task force on national security and information.

Bush Grenade Attacker Gets Life (CNN)

CNN.com, January 12, 2006

(CNN) -- A Republic of Georgia court has sentenced a man to life in prison for attempting to assassinate U.S. President George W. Bush by lobbing a hand grenade towards a podium during a rally in the capital last year, according to Georgia's interior minister.

Vladimir Arutinian of Tbilisi was also found guilty of trying to assassinate Georgian President Mikhail Saakashvili, who was standing on the podium with Bush on May 10.

He was also convicted of killing a police officer who tried to apprehend him two months after the incident.

The would-be assassin threw a grenade into a crowd about 20 meters (65 feet) from the stage where Bush had just begun speaking, but the grenade, wrapped in a plaid cloth, failed to detonate, authorities said.

Initial reports said the grenade was not live, but authorities later said it was.

Georgia's Interior Minister Vano Meradishvili told CNN he fully expected Arutinian to appeal the ruling because he "enjoys the attention" that he has received.

At one point during the trial, which began just over a month ago, Arutinian appeared in the courtroom with his mouth sewn shut.

Arutinian would not be eligible for parole, and could only be released under a presidential pardon, which was unlikely under Saakashvili, Meradishvili said.

In September, a U.S. federal grand jury indicted Arutinian for the assassination attempt against Bush, and could request his extradition if he is released in the future.

DOJ_NMG_0009411

Meradishvili said the government could not have apprehended Arutinian, who lived a reclusive life, without the help of two citizens, who would share an $80,000 reward.

The investigation involved Georgia investigators, the Justice Department, FBI and U.S. Secret Service.

Shortly after Arutinian's capture, the Justice Department and Secret Service issued a joint statement praising the government of Georgia for its "extraordinary cooperation" in the case.

CNN Correspondent Ryan Chilcote contributed to this report

Drug, Terror Rings Find New Ways To Launder Money (USAT)

By Donna Leinwand

USA Today, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — Drug traffickers and suspected terrorists are using prepaid ATM cards and Internet-based payment systems to help launder billions of dollars each year, the Treasury Department reported Wednesday in what it called the first government-wide analysis of money laundering in the USA.

The analysis described security weaknesses throughout the U.S. financial system that enable criminals to hide illicitly obtained money, and to sneak it out of the country. The report, which included contributions from 16 federal agencies, will be used to help officials devise a national strategy to fight money laundering, Treasury Undersecretary Stuart Levey said.

Smuggling cash in bulk remains criminals' favorite method for moving money out of the USA, said Marcy Foreman, investigations director for U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement. The report also detailed a dozen other money-laundering methods used by criminals, including what it called the increasingly prevalent use of prepaid cash cards that can be purchased anonymously at retail and check-cashing stores across the nation.

Such cards are designed to make things easier for students, immigrants and others among the estimated 75 million people in the USA who do not have bank accounts, the report said. Those buying the cards can have a certain value recorded on them, and then the cardholders can use the cards to withdraw the money from automated teller machines around the world.

However, the cards also allow foreign drug traffickers to move money to their home countries without having to sneak bundles of cash past Customs agents — or use bank accounts that leave paper trails, the report said. It noted that companies that issue cash cards outside the USA do not have to comply with U.S. anti-money-laundering laws, but that such cards can be used at ATMs in this country.

“The volume of dirty money circulating through the United States is vast, and criminals are enjoying new advantages with globalization,” the report said.

Levey said it's unclear how much money in the USA is made from criminal enterprises. The White House Office of National Drug Control Policy estimates sales of illicit drugs in the USA produce $65 billion a year for traffickers. The United Nations estimates illicit drug revenue in the USA, Canada and Mexico to be $142 billion a year.

“The key to ending drug trafficking is to wipe out the money side,” Drug Enforcement Administration chief Karen Tandy said. The DEA seized $2 billion in 2005, up from $500 million in 2003, she said.

Recent arrests by U.S. agents reflect the complexity of some schemes. Last week, Mohummed Islam Uddin, 39, of Hamtramck, Mich., pleaded guilty to running an unlicensed money-services business that sent $3 million to Bangladesh with little or no documentation of the transactions.

Uddin used U.S. currency from local people who wanted money transferred to Bangladesh. He then would buy prepaid phone cards, an ICE report said. The cards then were resold in Bangladesh for local currency by a merchant who distributed the proceeds to the intended recipients of the money transfers, ICE said. The scheme allowed Uddin to avoid paying transfer fees and to convert U.S. dollars to Bangladeshi currency.

US Vows Diligence On New Money Laundering Threats (REU)

By Laura MacInnis

Reuters, January 11, 2006

WASHINGTON (Reuters) - Internet banking, online payment systems and stored value cards not requiring identification give criminals new opportunities to filter money through the United States, U.S. regulators said on Wednesday.

Representatives of the Treasury Department, Federal Reserve, Justice Department and other government enforcement agencies urged in a Money Laundering Threat Assessment report more cooperation to squeeze money launderers and narrow potential avenues for tainted funds.

"The volume of dirty money circulating through the United States is undeniably vast and criminals are enjoying new advantages with globalization and the advent of new financial services," they said in the report, a precursor to the government's annual Anti-Money Laundering Strategy.

The regulators and law enforcement officials said it was "currently not possible" to accurately estimate the total amount of money laundering in the United States, or how much is being cut off by government enforcement.

Citing a need for a common definition of what constitutes money laundering, regulators said they needed more cooperation to patch vulnerabilities from money orders, stored value cards, check cashing, electronic payments, remittances and other financial transfers.

"Moving away from face-to-face customer interaction, particularly for (bank) account openings, challenges the traditional process of customer due diligence," they said.

The report concluded stored value cards or gift cards were compact, potentially anonymous alternatives for those seeking to smuggle physical cash linked to crime. Cards and other tools to facilitate migrant remittances could also be misused, regulators added.

"These programs can also be used to launder money if effective anti-money laundering policies, procedures and controls are not in place," the report said.

Federal Reserve Governor Susan Bies said the 72-page Money Laundering Threat Assessment "begins to give banks a better idea of what types of threats are out there."

Others said it was difficult for banks to detect fraudulent or laundered funds because money increasingly enters the U.S. financial system in indirect ways.

Stuart Levey, treasury undersecretary for terrorism and financial intelligence, said agencies like the Federal Bureau of Investigation, Drug Enforcement Administration and Postal Inspection Service were working with the Treasury and Federal Reserve to respond to new vulnerabilities.

"We now have to adjust our actions on all levels ... to stay one step ahead," Levey said.

He said it was "quite difficult to predict" when the 2005 annual strategy report would be completed but stressed inter-agency cooperation would occur before the study's official release.

Threat Assessment Calls Money Laundering A 'Massive' Challenge (ABC)

By Jason Ryan

ABC News, January 11, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 11, 2006 — - Money laundering remains a "massive and evolving challenge" for investigators, according to the federal government's first-ever threat assessment of the problem.

Even getting a handle on the size of the money laundering threat and the success of efforts to stop it has been difficult, the report found.

"It is currently not possible, for example, to quantify with accuracy the total money laundering activity being apprehended by the government," it said.

Problems with data, incompatible computer systems and even differing definitions of "money laundering" have hampered some efforts to combat the crime. The assessment is intended to help law enforcement and government regulators grapple with the issue.

"Before you can effectively treat a problem, you must first have an accurate diagnosis," said Stuart Levey, the Treasury Department's undersecretary for terrorism and financial intelligence.

While law enforcement and investigators have made considerable progress in recent years, money laundering is still a vast enterprise made easier by computerized banking and global transactions. With a few clicks of a mouse a drug dealer can wash his proceeds from New York City through the Dominican Republic to an offshore account unknown to investigators. Federal Reserve Governor Susan Bies said the assessment "gives banks a better idea of what types of threats are out there."

Other recent trends and new technology allow criminals to exploit loopholes, such as store gift cards, which officials call "stored value" cards.

"The volume of dirty money circulating through the United States is undeniably vast and criminals are enjoying new advantages with globalization and the advent of new financial services such as stored value cards and online payment systems."

Although law enforcement agencies are concerned about new technologies, traditional methods of money laundering though money service business (MSBs) -- such as money orders, check cashing business and currency exchange remain most prevalent.

Most Laundering Not Linked to Terrorism

The assessment, which was prepared by 16 different government agencies, found that most suspicious transactions are flowing to criminal interests and enterprises in South and Central America, Russia and Caribbean Rim nations. While a great deal of focus has been given to terrorist financing in recent years, the report shows that only 1 percent of Suspicious Activity Reports filed by financial institutions involved potential terrorist financing. Despite this small number, law enforcement officials remain greatly concerned about the nexus of criminal organized crime groups engaged in money laundering and the possibility of financing terrorist operations.

The 9/11 plot cost the al Qaeda network approximately $400,000 of which approximately $300,000 passed through the hijackers' established bank accounts in the United States. Although they left a paper trail in the United States, Germany and the United Arab Emirates, the hijackers moved their funds in a routine way which avoided the scrutiny of law enforcement and banking officials.

Since the 9/11 attacks the Treasury Department and FBI have worked with foreign countries to strengthen global anti-money laundering laws and regulations. The Treasury Department, Justice Department and the Department of Homeland Security also work together in the Financial Action Task Force to monitor global money laundering. The controversial Patriot Act also contains several provisions requiring increased reporting for banking and financial institutions.

After the 9/11 attacks, much attention was focused on regulating informal money transfers, known as the hawala system, originally developed in India. Some challenges remain in detailing and understanding the scope of their use. "It is virtually impossible to ascertain the full extent of [Informal Value Transfer Systems] activity in the United States due to the opacity of the sector and the absence of registration."

Bulk-cash smuggling is a common money laundering technique which may be on the rise because of some anti-money laundering enforcement efforts.

The report cautioned that more data needs to be collected and that electronic and online banking and the decline in paper checks make it more difficult to track financial transactions. Also the working group has found that money remitters and money orders are too voluminous to accurately track down. The sheer scale of Western Union providers around the globe totals 196,000 agents in over 190 countries, for example, allowing money launderers to move their money virtually anywhere.

Swiss Investigate Leak To Paper On C.I.A. Prisons (NYT)

By Doreen Carvajal, International Herald Tribune

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

PARIS, Jan. 11 - Switzerland is conducting criminal investigations to track down the source of a leak to the Zurich-based newspaper SonntagsBlick of what it reported was a secret document citing clandestine C.I.A. prisons in Eastern Europe.

The Sunday weekly published what it reported was a summary of a fax in November from Egypt's Foreign Ministry to its London embassy that said the United States had held 23 Iraqi and Afghan prisoners at a base in Romania. It also referred to similar detention centers in Bulgaria, Kosovo, Macedonia and Ukraine.

"The Egyptians have sources confirming the presence of secret American prisons," said the document, dated Nov. 15 and written in French to summarize the contents of the fax.

"According to the embassy's own sources, 23 Iraqis and Afghans were interrogated at the Mikhail Kogalniceau base at Constanza, on the Black Sea."

The leaked fax, which the newspaper said was sent by satellite and intercepted by the Swiss Strategic Intelligence Service, was signed by Egypt's foreign minister, Ahmed Aboul Gheit, the report said.

Christoph Grenacher, the newspaper's editor in chief, said that before the article was published, newspaper officials met with high-ranking Swiss government officials, who urged the paper to withhold the information. "We concluded that the discussion about so-called secret prisons is much more important than the interests of the secret service in Switzerland," he said.

During those discussions, he said, no one contested the authenticity of the document. Egypt has not commented on the report, but it quickly reignited a political fury in Europe that began in the fall with news reports that said there were C.I.A. interrogation centers in Europe and that there had been secret flights through European countries transferring terrorism suspects for questioning.

After the article was published on Sunday, Romania and Ukraine issued denials, and the Swiss criminal investigations were opened. Some European lawmakers seized on the information as evidence of dissembling by European Union members. "This is a piece of real evidence to back up the gut instinct many of us have that the denials of complicity we are hearing from E.U. member and candidate states cannot be relied upon," Sarah Ludford, a Liberal Democratic member of the British Parliament, said in a statement.

The Swiss Army's chief prosecutor opened an investigation of Mr. Grenacher and two of his reporters to determine whether military secrets were exposed and to find the source of the leaks. The Swiss attorney general's office is also investigating the issue, adding another layer to its existing investigation of whether there were C.I.A. flights in Swiss airspace.

Germany and Denmark are also examining accusations that the agency used their airspace to transport terrorism suspects.

DOJ_NMG_0009414

The United States has acknowledged flights but not the existence of prisons. A C.I.A. spokeswoman declined to comment on the report in the newspaper.

Conceivably, the journalists could face five years in prison for revealing military secrets, although no one prosecuted under the law has ever served any prison time, the authorities said.

Martin Immenhauser, a spokesman for the military prosecutor, said of the document: "Nobody has told us that it's not authentic. I think you can say that it's 99 percent certain that it's authentic."

Guantanamo Prisoner Rejects US War Tribunal (REU-Y2)

By Jane Sutton

Reuters, January 12, 2006

A Yemeni accused of being a bodyguard for Osama bin Laden went before a U.S. military tribunal on Wednesday and said he would boycott his war crimes trial because he did not recognize the tribunal's authority.

Yemeni Ali Hamza al Bahlul, who has acknowledged that he is "from al Qaeda," is one of only nine Guantanamo prisoners charged with crimes.

A separate tribunal also began on Wednesday for Canadian Omar Khadr, who is accused of killing a U.S. Army medic in Afghanistan when he was still 15.

Most of the 500 or so detainees at Guantanamo have been held without charges for years. The hearings began on the fourth anniversary of the opening of Guantanamo as a prison for terrorism suspects.

Bahlul is accused of conspiring to commit war crimes by acting as a bin Laden bodyguard and making recruiting videos for al Qaeda. He was escorted by two officers into a courtroom at the remote U.S. military base in Cuba for pretrial arguments and said he did not recognize the tribunal's authority.

"There's going to be a tribunal of God on the day of judgment," Bahlul told the court. "Do what you have to do and rule however you have to rule ... God will rule based on justice." His comments were made in Arabic.

Bahlul ended his participation in the proceedings with one word in English "Boycott," and the presiding officer, Army Col. Peter Brownback, set his trial tentatively for May 15.

The tribunal for Canadian prisoner Khadr, accused of killing the medic with a grenade during a firefight at a suspected al Qaeda compound in Afghanistan, was less colorful.

Looking burly and grown up, and sporting a crew cut and full beard, the now 19-year-old quietly answered "Yes sir," when the presiding officer, Marine Col. Robert Chester, asked him if he understood his rights.

Dressed in a blue and red T-shirt and white tennis shoes, Khadr fidgeted and stroked his beard during the hearing and asked that a Canadian lawyer be added to his defense team.

Through his military lawyer, Capt. John Merriam, he also asked that a more experienced military attorney be appointed to represent him. The hearing was the first time that Merriam has represented anybody in a courtroom.

The tribunal called a recess while it considered the issue of representation.

The Pentagon is proceeding with the two cases even though courts have halted the trials of other Guantanamo prisoners pending a U.S. Supreme Court ruling on whether President George W. Bush had authority to establish the tribunals after the September 11 attacks. The high court will hear arguments in the case in March.

NO SHACKLES

Bahlul, with a short beard and mustache and wearing khaki pants and a dark blue shirt, was not shackled or handcuffed.

He read a list of nine reasons why he refused to be represented by a military lawyer or to participate further, including the treatment of Palestinians by U.S. ally Israel -- "your allies, the Jews," he said -- and because his native Yemen had been accused in the bombing of the USS Cole.

Bahlul also said Guantanamo prisoners had been tortured and that the Britons there were not subject to military tribunals. He objected to the potential use of secret evidence and to the U.S. characterization of prisoners as illegal belligerents.

"We are prisoners of war and legal combatants based on our religion and our religious law," he said. "We do not care about anything that you call us."

Brownback rejected Bahlul's request to represent himself and Bahlul refused to meet with Army Reserve Maj. Tom Fleener, the lawyer appointed by the military to defend him.

Smiling and thanking Brownback, he held up a sheet of paper scrawled with the word 'Boycott' in English and Arabic. He removed translation earphones, and refused to enter a plea or to stand when the charges were read.

Bahlul and Khadr could face life in prison if convicted.

The United States has faced criticism at home and abroad over Guantanamo since the first group arrived from Afghanistan, shackled and wearing black-out goggles and surgical masks, on January 11, 2002.

DOJ_NMG_0009415

Fleener has called the tribunals a sham and said it is an ethical violation for him to represent a prisoner who has rejected his services. Brownback ordered him to defend Bahlul anyway.

Human rights groups have criticized rules allowing the use of evidence that may have been obtained through torture.

Chief prosecutor Col. Moe Davis said the tribunals were designed to provide a fair trial while addressing an enemy whose actions had not been anticipated under existing law.

Terror Suspect Upsets Plan To Resume Trials In Cuba (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

GUANTÁNAMO BAY, Cuba, Jan. 11 - The military commissions prosecuting suspected members of Al Qaeda reconvened on Wednesday for the first time in more than a year and were quickly thrown into disarray when a defendant declared he was boycotting the proceedings.

Invited by the judge to address the court, the defendant, Ali Hamza Ahmed Sulayman al-Bahlul, delivered a 10-minute address in which he praised Allah and denounced "your allies, the Jews." Complaining that he had not been permitted to choose a lawyer from Yemen, his home country, Mr. Bahlul said he had no expectation of justice from a system created by his American enemies.

"I am telling the judge do what you have to do," he said in Arabic through a translator. "Rule what you have to rule. This life will go on and end at some point. God will rule based on justice, and those who call on other than God are not calling on anything."

Smiling, he then held up a piece of paper with the word "boycott" written in stylized Arabic script, then repeated the word three times in English. For the rest of the two-hour hearing he was silent, even when asked by the presiding officer, Col. Peter Brownback III, to enter a plea.

Prosecutors say that Mr. Bahlul, one of the first prisoners to arrive at the Guantánamo center when it was set up in 2002, attended a Qaeda training camp and was a bodyguard to Osama bin Laden in 2001. Earlier, he had produced recruitment videos for Al Qaeda, including a tape on the 1998 attack on the destroyer Cole. If convicted, he faces a life sentence.

Even as Mr. Bahlul has acknowledged his connections to Al Qaeda, he has shown a talent for courtroom theatrics that have at times flummoxed the commissioners.

Little has gone smoothly for the military commissions, which the Bush administration created to try Guantánamo prisoners and which have suffered setbacks because of legal challenges, including a review from the Supreme Court.

Mr. Bahlul and Omar Khadr, a second defendant who appeared later in the day, are among nine detainees at Guantánamo who are facing war crimes charges under the military commission system.

More than 500 detainees remain in the center, which Pentagon officials once characterized as holding the most hardened terrorists captured in Afghanistan.

Of the remaining prisoners, 50 to 75 are likely to be charged, said a spokeswoman, Maj. Jane Boomer.

Mr. Bahlul demanded more than a year ago to choose a Yemeni lawyer, a request that was refused. Afterward, he said he wanted to represent himself, an idea that led commission authorities to suspend the proceedings while they researched the question. On Wednesday, Colonel Brownback ruled against him, saying President Bush's order establishing the commissions required defendants to have military counsel.

The ruling did not settle the question. Maj. Tom Fleener, Mr. Bahlul's appointed military lawyer, immediately moved to withdraw as defense counsel, a request that Colonel Brownback rejected.

Defendants in most courts, including those of the United States, are entitled to represent themselves as long as they are deemed competent, Major Fleener argued.

Requiring him to represent a client who did not want his help was an effort "to add some air of legitimacy to an otherwise wholly illegitimate process," he said.

It also could violate bar association rules in Iowa and Wyoming where Mr. Fleener, a reservist, is licensed to practice, he said.

Mr. Khadr, who was 15 when he was captured in Afghanistan and also faces life imprisonment, is accused of throwing a grenade that fatally wounded an American soldier. He declined to enter a plea on Wednesday.

Mr. Khadr's civilian defense lawyers say they can find no other war crimes prosecutions for war crimes involving a juvenile.

Prosecutors said juveniles accused of murder in the United States could be tried as adults in many states.

On Wednesday, Mr. Khadr's defense team moved to replace his appointed military lawyer, Capt. John Merriam, of the Army captain. His civilian lawyer, Muneer I. Ahmad, who is a law professor at American University, said Captain Merriam had never defended a case at trial before.

Speaking to reporters this week, Col. Morris Davis, the commission's chief prosecutor, defended the use of military commissions to try accused terrorists, saying existing law did not provide guidance for prosecuting members of terror groups.

Yemeni Prisoner At Gitmo To 'Boycott' Tribunal (WT/REU)

By Jane Sutton

The Washington Times, January 12, 2006

U.S. NAVAL BASE GUANTANAMO BAY, Cuba -- A Yemeni accused of being a bodyguard for Osama bin Laden went before a U.S. military tribunal yesterday and said he would boycott his war-crimes trial because he did not recognize the tribunal's authority.

Ali Hamza Ahmed Sulayman al Bahlul, who has acknowledged that he is "from al Qaeda," is one of nine Guantanamo prisoners charged with crimes. Most of the 500 or so detainees have been held without charges for years in the U.S.-led war on terrorism. The hearing began on the fourth anniversary of the camp's opening.

Al Bahlul is accused of conspiring to commit war crimes by acting as a bin Laden bodyguard and making recruiting videos for al Qaeda.

"There's going to be a tribunal of God on the day of judgment," al Bahlul told the court in Arabic. "Do what you have to do and rule however you have to rule. ... God will rule based on justice."

Al Bahlul ended his participation in the proceedings with one word in English: "boycott." Presiding officer Army Col. Peter Brownback set the suspect's trial tentatively for May 15.

A separate tribunal of U.S. military officers was set to begin in the murder case against Canadian prisoner Omar Khadr, 19. He is accused of killing an Army medic with a grenade during a firefight at a suspected al Qaeda compound in Afghanistan when he was 15.

The Pentagon is proceeding with the two cases even though U.S. courts have halted the trials of other Guantanamo prisoners pending a U.S. Supreme Court ruling on whether President Bush had authority to establish the tribunals. The high court will hear arguments in the case in March.

Al Bahlul, who has a short beard and mustache and wore khaki pants and a dark blue shirt, was not shackled or handcuffed in the courtroom.

Earlier in the hearing, he read a list of nine reasons why he refused to be represented by a military lawyer or to participate further, including the treatment of Palestinians by U.S. ally Israel -- "your allies, the Jews," he said -- and because his native country had been accused in the 2000 bombing of the USS Cole.

Al Bahlul said Guantanamo prisoners had been tortured and that the Britons who had been held there were not subject to military tribunals. He objected to the potential use of secret evidence and to the U.S. characterization of the prisoners as illegal belligerents.

"We are prisoners of war and legal combatants based on our religion and our religious law," he said. "We do not care about anything that you call us."

Col. Brownback rejected al Bahlul's request to represent himself, and the prisoner refused to meet with Army Reserve Maj. Tom Fleener, the lawyer appointed by the military to defend him.

Smiling and thanking Col. Brownback, al Bahlul held up a sheet of paper scrawled with the word "boycott" in English and Arabic. He removed the earphones that had enabled him to listen to an Arabic translation of the proceedings and refused to enter a plea or to stand when the charges were read.

Al Bahlul and Khadr face life in prison if convicted by the tribunals, which were authorized by Mr. Bush to try foreign terrorism suspects after the September 11 attacks.

Maj. Fleener has called the tribunals a sham and said he thinks it is an ethical violation for him to represent a prisoner who has rejected his services. Col. Brownback ordered him to defend al Bahlul anyway.

The United States has faced criticism at home and abroad for its treatment of prisoners at Guantanamo since the first group arrived from Afghanistan, shackled and wearing black-out goggles and surgical masks, on Jan. 11, 2002.

Human rights groups have criticized rules allowing the use of evidence that may have been obtained through torture.

Chief prosecutor Col. Moe Davis said the tribunal system was designed to provide a fair trial while addressing an enemy whose actions had not been anticipated under existing law.

Guantanamo Detainee Boycotts U.S. Hearing (AP)

By Miranda Leitsinger, Associated Press Writer

The Associated Press, January 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0009417

A Yemeni man accused of being Osama bin Laden's former bodyguard told a U.S. military tribunal Wednesday he regarded Americans as enemies and announced he would boycott the hearings, which proceeded anyway.

Led into the courtroom by two U.S. soldiers, Guantanamo detention center detainee Ali Hamza Ahmad Sulayman al Bahlul announced he was boycotting the proceedings, saying he could not appoint his own lawyer, that secret evidence can be withheld from detainees and that the United States was "an enemy to the nation of Muslims."

"I am boycotting all sessions, even if I'm forced to be present," said a calm al Bahlul, who is accused of belonging to al-Qaida, before removing his translation headphones.

Al Bahlul, who wasn't handcuffed, held up a sign written in Arabic that read "boycott." He signed the paper, dated it and presented it to Brownback. He later removed his translating headphones.

Army Col. Peter E. Brownback, the presiding officer, denied al Bahlul's request to represent himself and set a May 15 trial date. Al Bahlul is charged with conspiring with al-Qaida members to commit war crimes, including attacking civilians, and faces other conspiracy charges.

Prosecutors charge that al Bahlul was ordered by bin Laden, the leader of the al-Qaida terrorist network, to create a video glorifying the group's October 2000 attack on the destroyer USS Cole in Yemen that killed 17 American sailors.

Al Bahlul worked in the al-Qaida media office from late 1999 through December 2001 and created instructional and motivational recruiting video tapes for the organization, prosecutors alleged.

On Sept. 11, bin Laden asked al Bahlul to set up a satellite connection so al-Qaida members could see news reports, but he couldn't due to the mountainous terrain, U.S prosecutors said.

In 2001, al Bahlul also allegedly served as a bodyguard to bin Laden, wearing an explosives-laden belt when traveling with the al-Qaida leader to protect him.

About 500 detainees are being held at Guantanamo, some as long as four years.

Omar Ahmed Khadr, a 19-year-old Canadian charged with murder, attempted murder, aiding the enemy and conspiracy, went before the commission later Wednesday, the fourth anniversary of the opening of the Guantanamo prison.

Khadr, who wore a red, white and blue sweat shirt, was soft-spoken, replying "yes, sir" or "no" to presiding officer Marine Col. Robert S. Chester's questions. Chester didn't set a trial date, adjourning the hearing until Thursday.

Toronto-born Khadr, the son of an alleged al-Qaida financial leader, Ahmad Said al-Khadr, was captured on July 27, 2002, near Khost, an al-Qaida hotbed in eastern Afghanistan. He was caught after being badly wounded in a firefight in which an American soldier was killed and four others were wounded.

He was charged with murder, attempted murder, aiding the enemy and conspiracy for allegedly tossing a grenade that killed a U.S. Special Forces medic while fighting with the Taliban in Afghanistan, planting mines to target U.S. convoys, and gathering surveillance.

Muslim Cleric Accused In London Court Of Inciting Hatred Of Jews (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

LONDON, Jan. 11 - In a closely watched trial, a prominent British Muslim cleric was accused Wednesday of inciting hatred against Jews, praising Hitler and voicing support for suicide bombings.

The cleric, Abu Hamza al-Masri, is accused of violating various British laws in lectures and sermons recorded on videotape and audio cassettes in which he was reported to have said he wanted to see the establishment of an Islamic caliphate in the White House.

Mr. Masri, 47, has denied all 15 charges against him, which include inciting racial hatred and possessing a 10-volume "Encyclopedia of the Afghani Jihad," which prosecutors call "a manual for terrorism."

Mr. Masri, also known as Mustafa Kamel Mustafa, is an Egyptian-born preacher who acquired British citizenship by marriage. He is the former imam of the Finsbury Park mosque in North London. He was arrested in May 2004, and is wanted in the United States on other terrorism charges.

Mr. Masri is the best-known British Islamic leader to come to trial since the attacks in the United States on Sept. 11, 2001, set off the international effort to curb terrorism.

David Perry, a prosecutor, said in court that Mr. Masri had "encouraged his listeners, whether they were an audience at a private meeting or a congregation at the mosque, to believe it was part of a religious duty to fight in the cause of Allah, God, and as part of the religious duty to fight in the cause of Allah, it was part of the religious duty to kill."

"The people they were being encouraged to kill, put shortly, were nonbelievers," Mr. Perry said.

The accusations reflected what Mr. Perry depicted as the "intolerance, bigotry and hatred" that he said Mr. Masri had sought to instill among some British Muslims.

DOJ_NMG_0009418

The hearings are unfolding under strict British legal restrictions intended to ensure that Mr. Masri's trial is fair and is not influenced by the way he was characterized in British newspapers before his arrest. If convicted, he could face life in prison.

"You would think he would be preaching tolerance, mutual coexistence and responsibility regardless of religion or creed," Mr. Perry said. "In fact he preached the opposite: intolerance, bigotry and hatred, in particular against Jews as a racial group and as a religious body.

"In the course of one lecture, he accused the Jews of being blasphemous, traitors and dirty. This, because of the treachery, because of their blasphemy and filth, was why Hitler was sent into the world."

Mr. Masri told his followers that "Hitler was sent to torture and humiliate the Jews, and every last Jew is going to be buried in Palestine," Mr. Perry added, quoting from what he said was a sermon in October 2000.

In other videotapes, Mr. Masri said it was "permitted to kill women and children if they are fighting Muslims, or if there is no way to stop them," Mr. Perry said.

Mr. Masri was also asked for his views on suicide bombings. "It is not called suicide, this is called martyrdom," Mr. Masri was quoted as saying. According to Mr. Perry's account, Mr. Masri added, "If we do not use terrorism or torture, what are we going to use?"

Mr. Masri frequently evoked the caliphate, Mr. Perry said, referring to Islamic spiritual and temporal leadership based on descendants of the Prophet Muhammad. The caliphate was abolished in 1924 by Ataturk, the founder of modern Turkey.

"He is working for a worldwide caliphate, a world dominated by a caliph sitting, he says in one of his lectures, in the White House," Mr. Perry said.

Radical Cleric Preached Hatred And Murder, Prosecution Argues (LAT)

By Janet Stobart, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 12, 2006

LONDON — A prosecutor Wednesday accused Abu Hamza al Masri, an Egyptian-born Muslim cleric, of preaching hatred, telling followers that the world should be run by a Muslim caliph "sitting in the White House" and that it was legitimate to kill foes of Islamic law.

The high-profile trial began at London's Old Bailey criminal court a day after jury selection, with Masri facing 15 counts of conspiracy to murder and using threatening, abusive and insulting language and behavior in incitement to religious hatred. He also is charged with possessing material and documents relating to terrorist activities. The trial is expected to last four weeks.

Masri, a large man who says he lost an eye and both hands fighting the Soviets in Afghanistan, became well known as the radical preacher at North London's Finsbury Park Mosque. The mosque was considered a crossroads for terrorists such as Richard Reid, the so-called shoe bomber, before and after the Sept. 11 attacks.

The galleries at the Old Bailey were packed as prosecutor David Perry told jurors that instead of preaching tolerance, Masri preached hatred, particularly against Jews. Tapes seized after Masri's arrest in 2004 reveal the defendant vilifying Jews as "blasphemous, traitors and dirty. It's because of their filth that Hitler was sent into the world to torture and humiliate Jews," Perry related to the court.

The court, presided over by Judge Anthony Hughes, heard that when Masri was arrested, police found 2,700 audiotapes and 570 videotapes at his West London home and another London address. The material amounted to a blueprint for how life should be lived according to Masri, Perry said.

The overriding theme, he said, was the "obligation to jihad," which justified, according to Masri, killing nonbelievers and enemies of Islam. Those enemies included Western nations and Arab states, such as Egypt and Saudi Arabia, that are aligned with the West, the prosecution said.

Perry said Masri also supported suicide bombers. "As far as the defendant is concerned, you don't call it suicide, you call it martyrdom," Perry said. He quoted the cleric as saying, "If we don't use terrorism and torture, what are we going to use?"

Masri, who has denied the charges, sat in the dock in the courtroom wearing a pale blue shirt over matching pants, surrounded by four guards. He seemed to follow the proceedings attentively, occasionally bowing his head or consulting with a female assistant. As a preacher, he normally wore a prosthetic hook, but he has not been allowed to have it during his incarceration.

The tapes allegedly chronicle sermons and talks Masri made from 1997 to 2000, some including references to terrorist attacks, including the suicide bombing of the U.S. Navy destroyer Cole off the coast of Yemen in October 2000, and the slaying of 58 tourists in Luxor, Egypt, in November 1997.

The prosecution also described the "Encyclopedia of Afghani Jihad," an alleged terrorist manual seized from Masri, which included chapters on the construction of weapons, intelligence gathering, combat and, in Perry's words, "all you need to know to make homemade bombs or explosives."

DOJ_NMG_0009419

The prosecutor argued that the proceeding should not be seen as a trial against Islam, "one of the great monotheistic religions," or an infringement of free speech. "Tolerance does not extend to racial hatred and encouragement of murder," Perry said.

The United States indicted Masri in 2004 on 11 terrorism-related charges, including his alleged role in a plot to set up a terrorist training camp in rural Oregon in 1999. It is seeking his extradition.

Times staff writer John Daniszewski contributed to this report.

PATRIOT ACT:

U.S. Attorney Touts Usefulness Of Patriot Act To Law Enforcement (KATV-TV)

KATV-TV, ABC 7, Little Rock, AR, January 12, 2006

Little Rock - The U.S. Attorney's office is using a conference on terrorism to tout the usefulness of the Patriot Act, set to expire on February 3. Supporters of the act say it's essential to protect the American public against the war on terror. Opponents say it's a violation of civil liberties. It's a heavily debated issue about which both sides have strong opinions.

Cummins says many of the allegations made against the act are simply not true..

(Bud Cummins, U.S. Attorney) "There's nothing ground-breaking about the provisions of the Patriot Act. It's just trying to afford the investigators in these very important terrorism investigations to have the same type of tools we use against drug dealers."

Cummins says provisions in the Patriot Act lower the wall between criminal and intelligence investigators to share information and allow intelligence investigators to use similar techniques in criminal investigations. The act also updates laws for electronic surveillance.

(Cummins) "Terrorists don't use rotary telephones. They use cell phones, pagers, e-mail, text messaging, Web sites, we need to be able to keep up with that."

(Sklar) "We have plenty of law enforcement officers and investigative tools and what they're doing is investigating crimes and potential crimes and we have a criminal justice system that does that."

The ACLU says the Patriot Act is an abuse of power for many reasons.

(Sklar) "The reason that congress has voted to hold off on the renewing the patriot act. They have concerns as all Americans do about the kind of abuse of power the Patriot Act allows."

(Sklar) "There are sneak and peak searches which means they can come in and search your home. They've gotten a warrant but they don't have to tell you they've been there.."

Sklar says provisions in the Patriot Act, particularly those allowing investigators in intelligence investigations to use techniques similar to criminal investigations, oversteps it's bounds.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

F.B.I. Tries To Dispel Surveillance Concerns (NYT)

By Lynette Clemetson

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 11 - F.B.I. officials met with Muslim and Arab-American leaders on Wednesday in an effort to dispel anger and concern over the bureau's secret monitoring of radiation levels at Muslim sites around the country.

John Pistole, deputy director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, and John Miller, the bureau's assistant director of public affairs, tried to reassure those at the session that the surveillance of mosques and Muslim businesses and homes had been based on intelligence leads.

"There was intelligence that talked about the desire to use a dirty bomb in the U.S.; there were statements from bin Laden indicating that he had those materials and that there were cells in the U.S. trained to blend into Muslim communities," Mr. Miller said after the meeting. "We explained how we work with intelligence and that we did what we did based on the patterns of Al Qaeda, not because of the patterns or activities of any mosque or Muslim neighborhood."

F.B.I. officials struck a conciliatory tone, several attendees said, and acknowledged that the bureau could have responded to their concerns more quickly. But Mr. Pistole offered few details on the monitoring, they said, and he emphasized that the program, which began after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks and lasted through 2003, remained classified.

DOJ_NMG_0009420

Leaders of Muslim and Arab-American groups requested the meeting after the program was disclosed last month by U.S. News & World Report. The nationwide surveillance program included air monitoring of more than 100 private properties in the Washington area.

The controversy over the surveillance program comes after the F.B.I. cancelled financing for a bureau-wide training initiative intended to improve outreach to Muslim and Arab Americans. Group leaders say the news about the radiation monitoring makes such a program all the more crucial.

"This current situation reinforces the notion that our community is viewed more as suspects rather than partners," said one attendee, Salam Al-Marayati, executive director of the Muslim Public Affairs Council, a national advocacy organization. "Formalizing outreach sets a standard for better educating agents on the best means of acquiring information, and it demonstrates that partnership is the best way of protecting our country from terrorist attacks."

In October, the F.B.I. rescinded a $1 million pledge toward a training program to institutionalize bridge-building between its field offices and Muslim groups around the country. The program, which would have cost $6 million over three years, was cancelled, in part, because of budget constraints, Mr. Miller said.

In cities with sizable numbers of Muslims and Arab-Americans, F.B.I. field offices have developed relationships with mosques, advocacy groups and community leaders. In Washington and Los Angeles, for instance, special agents meet regularly with groups. Partnerships in Detroit formed the basis for the training program that bureau officials first embraced, then rejected.

Agents engaged in the outreach program said it helped them gain cultural awareness as well as practical insights into sorting good leads from bad. Muslim, Arab and Sikh leaders said that, as a result of the outreach, they received better F.B.I. protection from hate crimes.

But national initiatives like special security registration of citizens of Arab and Muslim countries, sweeps by federal agents in Muslim and Arab neighborhoods and the freezing of Islamic charities' assets have generated complaints.

The radiation surveillance, conducted with the Department of Energy, is another irritant. Disclosures of such programs, attendees at Wednesday's meeting said, make it more difficult to convince people that forming ties with government agencies is productive.

"When things like this happen, people come to us and ask, 'What are you doing talking to the F.B.I.?' " said Imam Mohamed Magid, leader of the All Dulles Area Muslim Society, a mosque in Northern Virginia commonly called the Adams Center, which serves 5,000 families.

Imam Magid, who also attended the meeting on Wednesday, has forged ties with agents in the F.B.I.'s Washington field office and organized public forums between them and community members. Now, he said, some of those in the community have questioned whether those sessions were ruses for the agency to conduct secret monitoring.

Several F.B.I. agents have also supported bringing uniformity to bureau practices.

"We're consistent in how we deal with white-collar crime and every other type of crime," said Michael E. Rolince, who was in charge of counterterrorism for the Washington office before he retired in October. "When it comes to dealing with the Arab-American and Muslim community, we have no consistent program. We have 56 different approaches in our 56 different field offices."

The canceled training program, called the Partnering for Prevention and Community Safety Initiative, was developed at Northeastern University in Boston.

"It's not 'Kumbaya, let's sit and talk about how nice things are,' " said Deborah A. Ramirez, a Northeastern law professor and former racial-profiling consultant to the Justice Department, who developed the program. "It's a structured process to learn what exists, what works and what we all need to be doing."

Mr. Miller said the bureau would support the training program if outside financing was secured.

"Now that we've let some of the pressure out of this pressure cooker," he said, "we have to address how we go about building better relationships so that when the next crisis comes, we can just call people and talk about it up front."

Monitoring Of Muslims Addressed (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, January 12, 2006

Arab-American and Muslim leaders met yesterday with FBI officials to discuss concerns that Muslim religious places, homes and other buildings were monitored for abnormal radiation levels without search warrants or court orders.

The meeting with FBI Deputy Director John S. Pistole, coordinated by the Los Angeles-based Muslim Public Affairs Council (MPAC), was held in the wake of press reports that the monitoring began after the September 11, 2001, attacks and lasted through 2003. The FBI has denied that it singled out private Muslim sites for the radioactivity monitoring.

Two Muslim organizations have since filed Freedom of Information Act requests to learn which sites were monitored.

"Today's meeting, while not resolving all underlying issues of concern, offered an opportunity to improve lines of communication and to increase mutual cooperation on issues related to national security and the prevention of hate crimes," said Nihad Awad, executive director of the Washington-based Council on American-Islamic Relations (CAIR), who participated in the meeting.

Mr. Awad said any security measures that create the perception that the Muslim community in the U.S. is targeted can create difficulties between Muslims and law-enforcement authorities, adding that "such perceptions can also lead to increased Islamophobia and even anti-Muslim hate crimes."

Al Qaeda founder Osama bin Laden has threatened renewed attacks on U.S. targets, and al Qaeda suspect Jose Padilla was arrested in May 2002 by the FBI on suspicion of a scheme to detonate a radiological 'dirty bomb' in this country.

The FBI has acknowledged that it tested for nuclear radiation at more than 100 Muslim sites in the Washington area, but has denied engaging in racial profiling against Muslims. The bureau also said it did not violate the law, breach constitutional guarantees or trespass on private property. It said non-Muslim sites also were monitored for excess radiation.

In its data request, CAIR asked for all government records concerning the authority of President Bush to authorize surveillance without obtaining a court order and "comprehensive lists and addresses" of the Muslim sites -- including mosques, organizations, businesses, warehouses and homes -- that were monitored.

The monitoring activity is thought to have also taken place in Chicago, Detroit, New York, Las Vegas and Seattle.

Mr. Pistole had invited the Muslim organizations to meet with him to address reports of widespread surveillance and radiation monitoring. There were no reports that high levels of radiation were found during the monitoring, which first was reported last month by U.S. News & World Report.

US-VISIT To Step Up Fingerprinting (FEDTIMES)

By STEPHEN LOSEY

Federal Times, January 12, 2006

The director of the nation's program to screen foreign visitors entering the United States hopes to begin testing a more stringent fingerprinting system this year.

The U.S. Visitor and Immigrant Status Indicator Technology program, or US-VISIT, last July was directed by Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff to start taking all 10 fingerprints from first-time visitors to the country. US-VISIT director Jim Williams said at a press briefing Jan. 5 that the program is still putting together a plan to expand the process. He expects the plan to be finished in a few months.

Meanwhile, Homeland Security finished installing US-VISIT at all 104 land border ports in December, meeting a deadline mandated by Congress, Williams announced.

US-VISIT now takes only two fingerprints of foreign visitors. The FBI's identification system uses 10 fingerprints and a photograph to track criminals.

The Justice Department criticized the two-print system in 2004, saying it could allow terrorists or violent criminals to slip into the country undetected.

Williams stressed that he does not want US-VISIT to impede legitimate visitors and said the first tests will take place at low-volume border crossings and airports to minimize delays. The State Department also may help with testing, he said.

US-VISIT aims to register fingerprints from each of the 279 million foreigners who enter and leave the country each year and to cross-reference that data with 20 or more criminal, intelligence and immigration databases from multiple federal agencies.

Adopting a 10-print system will help improve information sharing, Williams said. US-VISIT is also trying to increase the number of fingerprints it receives each day from the FBI and is talking to agencies such as Immigration and Customs Enforcement, Customs and Border Protection and Citizenship and Immigration Services to find ways to better exchange data.

Williams also wants to work on improving the procedures used when people leave the country.

US-VISIT plans this spring to finish testing a new technology it hopes will speed up the exit process for visitors. The program is inserting radio frequency identification chips into arrival and departure forms used by visitors at three ports on the Canadian border and two ports on the Mexican border.

Visitors are now supposed to park their cars, get out and physically turn in their forms, called I-94 forms, before they leave the country.

RFID technology allows visitors to drive out of the country without stopping and still inform Homeland Security that they have left.

But the technology cannot tell whether the person in the car is carrying an I-94 that actually belongs to him or her, Williams said.

DOJ_NMG_0009422

However, most visitors today do not turn in their I-94s at all because visitors ignore the rule and CBP agents are too busy watching people entering the country to stop them, and US-VISIT wants to have a better picture of who is leaving the country.

"RFID is not perfect, but it's better than not recording people's exit at all," Williams said.

Williams said that US-VISIT has helped the Homeland Security Department catch more than 970 known criminals and visa violators since it began in January 2004. He said the system has not caught any known terrorists entering the country, but he believes it is an effective deterrent that discourages them from trying to come into the country through ports of entry.

Williams said about 0.1 percent of visitors are falsely identified by the US-VISIT system as being on a watch list of suspects, and that Homeland Security's biometric support center can usually clear up any confusion in about two minutes.

Homeland Security plans to spend $35 million on US-VISIT this fiscal year, the same amount as last year. US-VISIT processed more than 44 million visitors over the last two years.

Trade Group's Quick Advice: Slow Down (WP)

By Judy Sarasohn

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

With lawmakers rushing out new plans for cleaning up their relations with lobbyists in the wake of the Jack Abramoff scandal, there's one trade group that would like a larger role in the deliberations. Indeed, it would like members of Congress to take a collective big breath and slow down a bit.

The group? The American League of Lobbyists.

Paul Miller of Miller/Wenhold Capitol Strategies and president of ALL said the group is not particularly opposed to major changes in lobbying rules. It simply wants "transparency" in what the Congress is up to in the rush to reform.

"Congress cannot just put out a package and rush it to the floor for a vote," Miller said. If lawmakers move too fast, too far to "appease the public," he said, they could find themselves back next year trying to undo unintended consequences.

Lawmakers could change their rules rather than pass laws to restrict members from taking fancy trips paid for by lobbyists, Miller said.

He expressed concern about proposals to prevent lawmakers and staffers from going to work as lobbyists for two years after leaving the Hill. They generally are restricted from lobbying their former colleagues for a year.

The one-year cooling-off period isn't being enforced, Miller said, and he doubts there would be any real enforcement on a two-year ban.

"The finger-pointing can't be just pointed at us. Jack didn't force anyone to take anything," Miller said, adding that Abramoff was never an ALL member.

ALL, which says it has more than 700 members, provides networking and educational opportunities for lobbyists. It also developed a voluntary lobbyist code of ethics.

Miller said ALL's board will meet Jan. 23 to decide on a strategy for dealing with possible legislative action, but that he knew one thing: "We'll do what we do best: lobby."VCIC Gets Lobbying Help

Members of the emerging industry of biometric technology companies who are trying to sell the Registered Traveler security program to the nation's airports have formed a coalition to help boost their credibility and their voice in Washington.

Perhaps more important, the Voluntary Credentialing Industry Coalition (VCIC) has scored some substantial lobbying help: Wexler & Walker Public Policy Associates . Maybe even more important, the leader of the Wexler & Walker team for the client is Tom Blank .

Yes, the Tom Blank who was acting deputy administrator of the Transportation Security Administration and who created the agency's Office of Transportation Security Policy. During his time at TSA, the agency developed the Registered Traveler program, which is now a pilot project at the Orlando airport and allows airline passengers who undergo biometric screening and pay a fee to go through security faster. The industry wants to expand the program in which private companies would sign up frequent fliers and be responsible for background checks and necessary technology.

Blank joined the lobby shop in September and is prevented by federal ethics restrictions from contacting TSA officials for a year, although he could lobby members of Congress.

He said he cleared his work for the VCIC with ethics officials at TSA. Particularly "in this climate," Blank said, "I dial the agency ethics officials pretty often."

An e-mail from TSA deputy chief counsel Elizabeth Buchanan advised Blank not send a copy of the release to the agency, "because that would be a communication from you to TSA. . . . Then you leave the line in about 'Wexler & Walker Public Policy Associates, where Blank is vice chairman, will coordinate day-to-day activities and advocacy for the VCIC.' This is one fact about the organization among others and is fine as written."

Blank said he and the lobby shop are "trying very hard to comply" with the ethics rules.

DOJ_NMG_0009423

Earlier in his Washington career, Blank was an aide to then-House member Robert S. Walker (R-Pa.). Blank also was communications director to then-House Speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.).

Among the members of the Wexler & Walker team for VCIC: Timothy Hannegan , a top aviation lobbyist; Anne Wexler , a former senior aide to President Jimmy Carter; and former TSA official Chad Wolf .

Among the members of the coalition are officials of Iridian Technologies, Saflink Corp., Verified Identify Pass Inc. and Lockheed Martin.By the Numbers

His lobby and consulting shop is less than a year old, but the money doesn't appear to have been too shabby for former attorney general John D. Ashcroft . According to year-end disclosures for the Ashcroft Group 's five lobbying clients, the firm brought in $269,000 for the last six months of 2005. As the Chicago Tribune noted this week, these totals "so far represent in some cases only initial retainers or billings."

In only one case -- for Oracle Corp. -- was Ashcroft one of the registered lobbyists. But Oracle's legislative affairs director, Robert Hoffman , said Ashcroft did not end up doing any actual lobbying and only advised the company on antitrust issues.

Here's how the money shook out: The Ashcroft Group reported receiving $220,000 from Oracle; $20,000 from Israel Aircraft Industries International; $15,000 from Choicepoint; and $14,000 from the American Institute of Certified Public Accountants.

Many of Ashcroft's restrictions on lobbying his former Justice colleagues expire early next month.

City Revival Plan Draws Sharp Criticism (LAT)

By Miguel Bustillo

The Los Angeles Times, January 12, 2006

NEW ORLEANS -- Residents of the New Orleans neighborhoods most heavily damaged by Hurricane Katrina, under a controversial plan unveiled Wednesday, would have just four months to demonstrate strong support for rebuilding their areas before possibly being forced to sell their properties to the government.

The proposal is a centerpiece of Mayor C. Ray Nagin's "Bring New Orleans Back" recovery plan, which is being rolled out in phases this week. It drew immediate outrage from residents and community activists, who argued that many citizens -- especially the blacks who predominated the flood-struck areas -- could be forced out of the city for good.

It represents an attempt to seek a middle ground on the issue that has emerged as the flashpoint in the debate over how to restore the ravaged city: Should all of New Orleans be rebuilt, or should city planners shrink the city's footprint, returning low-lying neighborhoods to wetlands and green space to serve as a natural barrier against floods?

"None of us want to be in this particular place, but Katrina has forced us to take a good hard look at what we need to do to rebuild our city," Nagin said. "The realities are that we will have limited resources to redevelop our city. . . .The other reality is this report is controversial. It pushes the edge of the envelope. It probably says some things to some people they are probably misinterpreting."

Despite Nagin's effort to ease tensions, the unveiling of the proposal quickly became heated, with residents across racial and class lines angrily teeing off on what they considered a land grab engineered by the city's elite. Much of the ire was heaped on New Orleans developer Joseph C. Canizaro, a key architect of the plan, whose name elicited boos from the crowd in the standing-room-only auditorium.

"How many people from my back yard are up there?" Harvey Bender, a laid off city maintenance worker from eastern New Orleans, yelled out, disrupting the proceedings. "I'm ready to rebuild, and I'm not letting you take mine," he added. "I'm going to fight, whatever it takes, to rebuild my property. It's going to be baby Iraq for Joe Canizaro."

Under the plan, which would take effect Jan. 20, New Orleans would impose a moratorium on building permits in areas hardest hit by Hurricane Katrina's floodwaters -- a vast swath of the city that includes parts of the Gentilly, Mid-City, Lakeview and Lower 9th Ward neighborhoods. Residents would then have to demonstrate there was sufficient critical mass in their area to rebuild to warrant public investment in schools and city facilities, possibly by showing that half of the population planned to come back.

To accelerate the process, Nagin's commission is asking the Federal Emergency Management Agency to release updated floodplain maps the agency has assembled, which effectively could make the decision for many homeowners by raising home insurance rates and setting other new financial barriers to redevelopment.

Neighborhoods that failed to meet the critical mass test would be shrunk, or eliminated altogether, and a new city agency called the Crescent City Redevelopment Corp. would buy residents out or seize their properties through eminent domain. The estimated cost of the buyouts: $12 billion.

DOJ_NMG_0009424

Legislation by Rep. Richard Baker, R-La., seeks to reimburse homeowners who are bought out with 60 percent of their pre-Katrina equity. The Nagin commission plan proposes to go further, compensating displaced homeowners the remaining 40 percent as well with federal Community Development Block Grant money and FEMA funding.

But those sources of funding, like many other elements of the ambitious plan, would need the support of Congress and President Bush, who is scheduled to make a public appearance in New Orleans Thursday and meet with the co-chair of Nagin's commission, health care executive Maurice L. Lagarde III.

"We respect the rights of all citizens to return to their neighborhoods," Lagarde said, casting the four-month process, set to end May 20, as an opportunity for residents to control the future of their communities.

In addition to the litmus test for flood-prone neighborhoods, the blueprint being unfurled this week contains many lofty ideas to use the rebuilding effort as a catalyst to permanently improve New Orleans.

An education subcommittee is proposing a radical reorganization of the city's troubled school system, which has been plagued by corruption and low academic performance. The proposal would de-centralize governing authority, giving principals greater authority over their schools, and neighborhoods more political power over management of smaller clusters of schools in their area.

A cultural subcommittee is proposing creation of a new jazz district near the French Quarter at the former location of Storyville, a fabled district of musicians and houses of ill repute popular during the turn of the last century that fell into disrepair and was demolished. The idea to recreate a cleaned-up version of Storyville, which gave rise to musical legends including Jelly Roll Morton, Manuel Perez and King Oliver, was championed by committee member and Pulitzer Prize winning jazz virtuoso Wynton Marsalis, a leading member of one of New Orleans' current musical dynasties.

Meanwhile, an infrastructure subcommittee is proposing a new $3.3 billion light-rail system modeled on those now in operation in cities including Portland, Ore., and Denver.

But it was the plan to give residents four months to show their neighborhoods could come back or be bought out that claimed the majority of the overall blueprint's $17 billion cost--and generated the most passionate response.

"Over my dead body," said Lower 9th Ward resident Caroline Parker, vowing to fight government seizure of her property. "Like I said, I didn't die with Katrina."

Some critics, who had claimed all along that Nagin's commission was stacked with developers and other business leaders, said the proposal was proof that the mayor was allowing moneyed interests to draw up the reconstruction, to the detriment of the city's working poor.

"To us, that's Katrina cleansing -- the removal of blacks from the city," said Mtangulizi Sanyika, of the African American Leadership Project, a group that was organizing a summit of black community leaders Thursday to discuss alternative plans to revive all of New Orleans.

The summit was part of a larger series of events planned for the upcoming Martin Luther King Day weekend in New Orleans, which are bringing black religious and political leaders from across the country, including Minister Louis Farrakhan of the Nation of Islam, to the city to illuminate the plight of the city's displaced black citizens.

Committee members stressed Wednesday that their blueprint envisioned room for all New Orleans residents who wanted to return to the city, and would accommodate them in part by redeveloping other parts of town, including some existing public housing projects. Only about 144,000 residents have returned to New Orleans, which had a population of 462,000 before the hurricane. Officials estimate only about 250,000 people will return by the fall of 2008.

Anger Meets New Orleans Renewal Plan (NYT)

By Gary Rivlin

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, Jan. 11 - Residents of the city's most devastated neighborhoods responded with anger Wednesday after the city's rebuilding commission unveiled its most contentious proposal: giving neighborhoods in low-lying parts of the city from four months to a year to prove they should not be bulldozed.

The plan was presented at a standing-room-only meeting punctuated by catcalls and angry outbursts that often interrupted members of the panel. "Over my dead body" was uttered more than once.

"I'm going to suit up like I'm going to Iraq and fight this," said Harvey Bender, a laid-off city worker, who shouted out his comments before an audience at the Sheraton Hotel that numbered in the hundreds and spilled into the aisles and hallways.

Mr. Bender owns a home in New Orleans East, a predominantly black middle-class neighborhood of 90,000 residents largely destroyed by the flooding that followed Hurricane Katrina. Parts of the neighborhood might not survive, according to the plan, if they do not attract enough returning residents.

DOJ_NMG_0009425

Speaker after speaker, black and white, prosperous and poor, dismissed a plan that Mayor C. Ray Nagin described as "controversial." But Mr. Nagin gave them hope as he walked a middle line that neither endorsed the plan nor opposed it.

"This is only a recommendation," Mr. Nagin said in remarks that preceded the formal presentation of the rebuilding plan. "We as a community will have the ultimate say in how we move forward."

The mayor called on people to listen to the commission's presentation with an open mind. "Take the time to digest this information, to look it over very carefully," Mr. Nagin said. "The reality is we will have limited resources to redevelop our city."

Yet the audience did not seem in the mood for calm debate.

"Please let us build our own homes," said Charles Young, a homeowner in Lakeview, a largely white middle-class neighborhood. "Let us come back on our own time. Let us spend our insurance money, which we paid for on our own."

Under the proposal, residents would not be permitted to move back into the hardest-hit neighborhoods - about two-thirds of the city, including more than half its homeowners - for at least four months. During that time, leaders of each neighborhood would have to submit to a citywide planning body a recovery plan that would have to be approved before residents would be allowed back.

Neighborhoods not able to come up with an acceptable plan, or those that do not attract sufficient development within a year, could be bulldozed and returned to marshland, with the city compensating homeowners.

The plan represents a compromise between the homeowners in low-lying areas who are determined to rebuild, and the scientists and other experts who believe the city should allow large portions of its flood-prone areas to revert to marshland.

Each neighborhood would have at its disposal teams of planners and other experts to help residents do what they need to prevent the city from forcing them to live elsewhere.

"We want to give every community as best a chance to come back as we can," said Joseph C. Canizaro, a member of the commission. Much of the crowd's enmity was directed at Mr. Canizaro, the plan's main author and a prominent developer here, who was booed several times.

"Joe Canizaro, I don't know you, but I hate you," said Mr. Bender, the New Orleans East resident, when granted his turn at the microphone.

Robyn Braggs, another resident of New Orleans East, said, "I don't think four or five months is close to enough time given all we would need to do." Because former residents are scattered around the country, she said, many, especially those with school-age children, "won't be able to even return to do the work necessary until this summer."

Marc H. Morial, a former mayor of New Orleans who is now president of the National Urban League, described the commission's proposal as a "massive red-lining plan wrapped around a giant land grab." Many homeowners will not be able to settle with their insurance companies if they do not know the future of their neighborhoods, he said.

"It's cruel to bar people from rebuilding," Mr. Morial said. "Telling people they can't rebuild for four months is tantamount to saying they can't ever come back. It's telling people who have lost almost everything that we're going to take the last vestige of what they own."

Not everyone opposed the plan. One resident of Eastover, a wealthy, largely black community in the eastern part of the city devastated by the storm, told the commissioners, "I accept your challenge" to craft a workable rebuilding plan. He added, "I probably will get hit up the side of the head for my comments."

The plan also impressed Sean Reilly, a member of the Louisiana Recovery Authority, who criticized the city last week, saying it had given the impression that all neighborhoods could be restored. Wednesday, he said the plan struck the proper balance between residents' self-determination and tough choices.

The plan was developed by the rebuilding commission's Urban Planning committee, which Mr. Canizaro led. It is the first of seven committee reports to be unveiled over the next week and one component of a sweeping redevelopment plan that includes proposals for a $3 billion light-rail system and an economic development corporation, fashioned after the one New York created to oversee rebuilding in Lower Manhattan after the Sept. 11 attacks.

The commission is also proposing that New Orleans borrow a second idea from New York: asking the federal government for permission to sell tax-exempt bonds to rebuild businesses, just as New York was able to do to rebuild downtown.

But the commission will clearly have a difficult time selling its plan to residents. "This is a big, audacious plan put together by obviously brilliant people," said Fred Yoder, a resident of Lakeview. "But you missed the boat. We don't need a rail system. We need housing."

Hostility Greets Katrina Recovery Plan (WP)

By Manuel Roig-franzia

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0009426

NEW ORLEANS, Jan. 11 -- Angry homeowners screamed and City Council members seethed Wednesday as this city's recovery commission recommended imposing a four-month building moratorium on most of New Orleans and creating a powerful new authority that could use eminent domain to seize homes in neighborhoods that will not be rebuilt.

Hundreds of residents packed into a hotel ballroom interrupted the presentation of the long-awaited proposal with shouts and taunts, booed its main architect and unrolled a litany of complaints. One by one, homeowners stepped to a microphone to lampoon the plan -- which contemplates a much smaller city and relies on persuading the federal government to spend billions on new housing and a light-rail system -- as "audacious," "an academic exercise," "garbage," "a no-good, rotten scheme."

"You missed the boat," homeowner Fred Yoder, who lived in heavily flooded Lakeview, told committee members. "Give me a break: We don't need a light-rail system. We're in the mud."

The plan released Wednesday is the first stage of what is sure to be a multi-layered, multi-level effort to resuscitate New Orleans. Mayor C. Ray Nagin, who can accept or alter the proposal, will have to present the plan to a state commission that will control allocation of billions of federal dollars, as well as to Donald E. Powell, President Bush's hurricane recovery coordinator, and the White House. The commission's recommendations are heavily dependent on federal money, counting on $12 billion to buy storm-damaged homes and $4.8 billion for infrastructure improvements, including an ambitious light-rail proposal to connect downtown New Orleans with the city's airport, Baton Rouge and the Mississippi Gulf Coast.

The furious reaction to the plan is the latest agonizing episode in this city's troubled campaign to reinvigorate itself after the devastating floods caused by Hurricane Katrina last August. Nagin, already politically weakened by widespread criticism of his response to the flooding, now faces the difficult challenge of guiding decisions about whether some parts of the city will cease to exist.

Some activists have long accused the commission -- which was appointed by Nagin -- of trying to find ways to abandon predominantly black neighborhoods, such as the Lower Ninth Ward. Wednesday's unveiling did nothing to assuage their fears, even though commission members promised to give all neighborhoods an opportunity to prove that they should be rebuilt by convening planning groups in coming months. The proposed moratorium would be in the city's most damaged neighborhoods, and officials would use the four-month period to gauge whether enough residents will come back to make the areas viable.

"If this plan goes forward as it is, many people's worst fears about our African American heritage and population will come true," said Sue Sperry of the New Orleans Preservation Resource Center. "It's almost like it will be extinguished from this earth."

Within minutes of the plan's unveiling, Nagin was already showing signs that he might back away from the commission's most controversial proposal. He told WWL-AM that he had some "hesitancy" about the building moratorium. He promised to seek more public input before making a final decision.

At least two of the commission's proposals -- the creation of the Crescent City Rebuilding Authority to buy flood-damaged homes and the implementation of a master redevelopment plan -- will require changes to the city charter, a prospect sure to be contentious because of the mayor's long-standing animosities with the New Orleans City Council. The city is also waiting on the Federal Emergency Management Agency to determine base elevation levels required before flood insurance can be issued. The commission is hoping that Congress will approve a quasi-public recovery authority proposed by U.S. Rep. Richard H. Baker (R-La.) that would sell bonds to buy flood-damaged homes, then work with private developers to rebuild neighborhoods.

Despite the hurdles ahead, the commission urged fast action on a broad set of recommendations, including stronger levees and a restructured school system. John Beckham, a consultant who helped devise the plan, urged residents to "imagine the best city in the world."

Beckham -- who declined repeated requests Wednesday to identify the private foundation that hired him to draw up the plan for the commission -- told the audience that New Orleans could have "a park in every neighborhood," "a bustling downtown" and a city connected by bike paths and public transportation systems.

Beckham was introduced by the commission's urban planning chairman, Joseph C. Canizaro, a real estate developer and major fundraiser for Bush, who chuckled when he was booed by some in attendance. "This is just a beginning," Canizaro told the audience.

Mindful that Bush will have a tremendous influence on how much money finds its way to Louisiana, Beckham displayed some of the president's pledges on large screens. He reminded the crowd that Bush said Sept. 15 that "we will do what it takes" to rebuild New Orleans and of his promise in December to build levees that are better and stronger than before. On Thursday, Bush will visit the city for the first time in three months.

The commission's recovery plan anticipates a city that will be only a fraction of its pre-Katrina size of nearly half a million residents. Beckham said the city now has about 144,000 residents and is projected to grow to 181,000 by September and 247,000 by September 2008.

The shrunken city will need a restructured and more efficient local government, Beckham said, drawing smirks from City Council members seated behind the committee. The City Council, which has clashed with Nagin repeatedly -- most recently trying to use zoning laws to block sites he selected for temporary housing trailers -- has effectively been cut out of the power loop in the recovery process and does not have authority over the recovery plan. Before the commission's report had even been announced, five City Council members -- responding to leaks of the plan's main components to the city's influential newspaper, the Times-Picayune -- held a news conference to condemn the committee in the same hotel where the recovery plan was to be unveiled.

DOJ_NMG_0009427

Council member Jackie Brechtel Clarkson called the proposal "a blatant violation of property rights."

"I think it's unprecedented in America," said Clarkson, who is also a real estate agent.

The council members were flanked by leaders of the large Vietnamese community that flocked after the Vietnam War to New Orleans East, one of the areas that would be affected by the moratorium. "It just hurt us -- again," said the Rev. Luke Nguyen of Mary Queen of Vietnam Church. "We have 700, 800 families already returned, ready to gut and fix their houses."

Nguyen streamed into the reception hall, shouldering past activists and homeowners bristling with anger. On a table nearby, the commission had placed placards, declaring, "We're Home." Nguyen did not bother to pick one up.

Back To The Future (WSJ)

By James K. Glassman

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2006

NEW ORLEANS -- President Bush today makes his ninth trip here since Hurricane Katrina. He will find a tale of two cities -- one almost back to normal, the other devastated. If you drive into New Orleans from the airport the back way, down Jefferson Highway to St. Charles Avenue, everything on the river side is as gorgeous and decadent as ever. Some live oaks have toppled, and many magnolias have died, but all the way to the French Quarter, the shops and restaurants are open, and people have come home.

There are crowds taking a number for po' boy sandwiches at Domilise's on Annunciation, locals lunching on shrimp remoulade and trout amandine at Galatoire's, and browsers examining the silver ice buckets at Lucullus Antiques on Chartres Street. The Camellia Club of New Orleans is holding its 66th annual show on Saturday; schools are opening; and plans are set for the Zulu and Rex parades on Mardi Gras, just seven weeks away. With supply short and demand strong, rents have soared. Real estate records are being set.

The city's great architectural heritage -- comprising 18th- and 19th-century Greek Revival and Victorian houses, shops and warehouses -- was built on high ground, hugging the river with its natural levees. While many of these buildings sustained serious wind damage, they avoided the flood that affected areas closer to Lake Pontchartrain. But drive north on Canal Street to the lake or east toward the Ninth Ward or St. Bernard Parish, and you will see block after block of ruination -- gutted houses with water marks six feet off the ground, huge piles of soggy insulation and linoleum, and, on median strips (what Orleanians call the "neutral ground") little plastic signs advertising tree removal, stump grinding, mold mitigation, roof repair and, of course, lawyers for any suit you can think up.

There was controversy when a sightseeing firm last week launched a bus tour of destroyed neighborhoods. Profiting from ghoulish voyeurism? Actually, it's an education. Like the president, everyone should see firsthand what the worst natural disaster in American history has wrought -- the destructive power of nature and the optimism of a city that, before this, was mainly known for its grandiose inertia. There's no illusion that this will be the same place it was. It will be smaller and maybe better. The latest estimate places the current population at 135,000, compared with 462,000 before the storm. A consultant for the city forecasts 252,000 a year from now.

The big debate here today is whether the city should be smaller physically. In a blueprint made public yesterday, Mayor Ray Nagin's Bring Back New Orleans Commission gives residents of flood-damaged areas four months to devise plans to prove they can revive their neighborhoods; if not, they will be bought out. Some 108,000 houses -- about half the city -- took on more than four feet of water, and, as Joseph Canizaro, a member of the commission, said, "A lot of poor African-Americans had everything they own destroyed here."

In a time of high emotion, the commission's approach makes political sense. No family wants to be denied, by government fiat, the right to rebuild. But the truth is that the Lower Ninth Ward and other low-lying areas won't be resettled. The new New Orleans will almost surely look like New Orleans of 1878, which, as shown by the Times-Picayune in a remarkable map, had most of the city's 200,000 residents "clustered in a narrow swath along the Mississippi River." The neighborhoods flooded in 2005 were settled after the city's swampy interior was pumped dry in the early 1900s. Those areas should return to marshland.

Last week, the federal government released $3 billion to fix the levees so that they work as they were supposed to -- ample protection for people living in what, in the real estate ads, are now referred to as "high and dry" places during Katrina. There's a lot of room for sensible commercial and residential development in these areas, as well as in midcity neighborhoods that were wet but not severely inundated.

DOJ_NMG_0009428

The rebirth of New Orleans does, however, require a leap into the unknown. It can't be meticulously planned. Preserve the old buildings. Rope off the lowlands. But then let imagination takes its course. Unfortunately, Mr. Nagin's Bring Back New Orleans group is loaded with central planners prescribing a dream city built around such highlights as light-rail transport, a "jazz district" and a neuroscience center. Typical is Michael Cowan, head of the city's Human Relations Commission, who warned that "the alternative to a 'good-enough' plan for the future of our city is free-market chaos, also known . . . as every man for himself and the devil take the hindmost."

Actually, it was precisely this chaos that made New Orleans a great city in the first place. It was planning -- specifically, the horrifying housing projects, largely destroyed in Katrina; the stultifying school system; the Superdome and other wasteful public-works projects -- that held the city back.

But even as a project in free-market creativity, New Orleans needs a leader. The feds are providing the money, but the president, who promised in September that "there is no way to imagine America without New Orleans," has been reluctant to appoint a czar, a MacArthur, to oversee the resurrection. That's a mistake because the most visible alternative right now is Mr. Nagin himself, whose performance during and after the hurricane has been less than inspirational.

The only real leadership in New Orleans these past four months has been provided by the daily newspaper, the Times-Picayune, whose editor, Jim Amoss, has both crusaded for the city's interests and battled the rumor mill (favorite Ninth Ward story: The levees were blown up in an act of racial cleansing) with a flood of bright and tough news stories.

When I was 24, I came to New Orleans to start a business and a family. I stayed for eight happy years. If I were 24 again, I would be packing my bags for New Orleans to be on the ground floor of a modern renaissance. Katrina was a tragedy, but its aftermath presents the most exciting urban opportunity since San Francisco in 1906. Pioneers, please apply.

Mr. Glassman, a fellow at the American Enterprise Institute and host of TCSDaily.com1, founded and edited the New Orleans weekly Figaro during the 1970s.

WAR NEWS:

Bush Open To Hearings On Domestic Spying (LEXHL)

Lexington Herald-Leader (KY), January 12, 2006

LOUISVILLE -- President Bush told a select group of Kentucky and Indiana residents yesterday that the U.S. military's progress in Iraq is "good" and promised ultimate victory -- although he gave no timetable.

In a rare town hall-style meeting set up as a theatre-in-the-round, the president again defended invading Iraq, even though former dictator Saddam Hussein didn't possess weapons of mass destruction as Bush first claimed.

"I understand that the intelligence didn't turn out the way a lot of the world thought it would be. And that was disappointing," Bush told the crowd of about 500, who were given tickets through some of the area's business, women's and teacher groups.

Bush also addressed the controversy over the revelation that he had authorized wiretaps on American citizens without court oversight. He said he'd welcome congressional hearings on the issue -- as long as they don't reveal to "the enemy what we're doing."

"I had to make the difficult decision between balancing civil liberties and on a limited basis -- and I mean limited basis -- try to find out the intention of the enemy," he said.

The need for such measures stemmed from the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, in which war "came to us," he said.

Likewise because of 9/11, going to war in Iraq became necessary because terrorists were using it as a "safe haven," he said.

Bush reiterated that he gave the former Iraqi dictator a chance "to disarm or face serious consequences."

"He chose war. He got war. He's not in power and the world is better off for it," he said.

Bush has been more aggressively defending his administration's policies in recent weeks, as public support for the war has waned and critics have ramped up their calls for withdrawing troops from Iraq.

"Things are good. I'm confident we'll succeed," Bush said. "I know a lot of people want our troops to come home. I do, too. But I don't want them to come home without achieving victory."

He said that will be when Iraqis can adequately defend their new democratic state and when it's "no longer a safe haven for the terrorists."

Democratic opposition

In a conference call with reporters before Bush's event, Lt. Col. Andrew Horne, a Marine reservist and Democrat who plans to run against U.S. Rep. Anne Northup, R-Louisville, said there's a gap between the Bush administration's bold rhetoric on the Iraq war and its actual support for soldiers.

DOJ_NMG_0009429

He cited recent news stories describing a suppressed Pentagon report that concluded many U.S. combat deaths in Iraq could be avoided with better body armor, which is available on the market.

"It's just deplorable," Horne said. "It is of paramount concern to everyone involved that they be fully supported."

Republican Secretary of State Trey Grayson, who nabbed a front-row seat, said the "town hall" approach was a politically savvy way of taking Bush's Iraq message to the people.

"He's got a good argument, he just has to make it like this where he comes into a place that's not exactly his home base and takes questions from anyone," Grayson said.

A range of questions

After 24 minutes of remarks on Iraq, Bush opened it up for about 50 minutes for unscripted audience questions.

While giving answers on a wide range of topics, Bush alternated between plugging initiatives his administration already started and hinting at new proposals to come.

For instance, after Sandra R. Patterson-Randles asked what can be done to improve education, the president touted his No Child Left Behind plan for instituting more measurements of student progress.

He said schools need to improve science and math education and that he'd be unveiling a specific proposal in his State of the Union Address Jan. 31.

Patterson-Randles, chancellor of Indiana University Southeast, said later that she'd like to hear officials pledge to beef up all curricula, from the arts to civics to literature.

In response to a question about border security, the president steered his answer toward immigration policy. He said he doesn't favor broad amnesty -- which would mean automatic citizenship to illegal immigrants -- because it would lead to an influx of millions of people.

But he noted, "There are some jobs Americans will not do, and they're being filled by people (from abroad) who want to feed their families." They should be given "temporary worker status," he said.

A boy's question

Eventually, the discussion returned to Bush's theme: national security. The session was punctuated by a succinct question from a 7-year-old.

"How can people help in the war on terror?" asked Alex Childress of Louisville, who attended with his mom, Martha.

"Well," Bush began, "that's the hardest question I've had all day."

He said he welcomes an honest debate about Iraq but one that is "respectful."

"I expect and frankly welcome the voices of people saying 'You know, Mr. President, you shouldn't have made that decision,' or, 'You should have made it another way,' " he said. "What I don't like is when somebody says 'He lied,' or 'They're in there for oil.'"

Bush Tries To Shape Iraq Debate In Election Year (REU-Y2)

By Patricia Wilson

Reuters, January 12, 2006

President George W. Bush on Wednesday tried to shape election-year debate on the Iraq war by warning critics their rhetoric could embolden the enemy and weaken the morale of U.S. troops.

Preparing for a tough campaign against Democrats in the run-up to congressional elections in November when he will try to keep the U.S. Congress in the hands of his Republican Party, Bush acknowledged his decision to invade Iraq almost three years ago was not universally popular.

"I can understand folks who say, 'I wish you hadn't done that,'" he said, adding later, "I expect there to be an honest debate about Iraq ... people can help by making sure the tone of this debate is respectful and is mindful about what messages out of the country can do for morale of our troops."

He said he welcomed dissenting voices, but "what I don't like is when somebody said he lied or they're in there for oil or he's doing it only because of Israel."

A few Democrats have called for a quick withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq but the party remains divided over how to move ahead. Some critics on the political fringes have raised the issues of oil and Israel.

Asked by a 7-year-old in the audience at the Louisville Convention Center how people could help in the war on terrorism, Bush replied, "One way people can help as we're coming down the pike in the 2006 elections is remember the effect that rhetoric can have on our troops in harm's way and the effect that rhetoric can have in emboldening or weakening an enemy."

SEEKING TO CONVINCE SKEPTICS

Bush is trying to convince skeptical Americans his plan for Iraq will work even as the U.S. death toll mounts. His remarks came as violence surged in Iraq where more than 200 Iraqis and 16 U.S. troops have died in the past week.

DOJ_NMG_0009430

"The goal is victory, nothing short of victory," he declared in Kentucky where he unexpectedly answered questions on topics ranging from the war to education, immigration and domestic spying.

Bush said he was confident of success in Iraq but admitted it was tough going.

"Whether you agree with me or not, they're not going to shake my will. We're doing the right thing."

The 400 community leaders, small-business owners and others were invited to listen to Bush, but White House spokesman Scott McClellan said their questions were not screened in advance. Nevertheless, none of them criticized the president.

During a meeting at the White House last week with secretaries of state and defense from previous Republican and Democratic administrations, Bush was urged to talk to Americans in more detail and with more candor about his Iraq strategy in order to build support at home.

Bush appeared in the district of Republican Rep. Anne Northup (news, bio, voting record) whose likely Democratic opponent will be Andrew Horne, a lawyer and Marine reservist who served two tours in Iraq.

He questioned Bush's criticism of war opponents.

"On issues of war, on issues of the welfare of our troops, if we are not raising the questions, who will?" Horne told reporters in a conference call organized by Democrats. "We know that the nature of the military, the Marines, soldiers and sailors on the ground, they can't really raise these issues, so we need to do it for them.

In the campaign-style meeting, Bush again defended a domestic eavesdropping program he authorized after the September 11 attacks as limited in nature and constitutional. He said he did not object to congressional hearings on the matter so long as they "don't tell the enemy what we're doing."

General Asserts Right On Self-Incrimination In Iraq Abuse Cases (WP)

By Josh White

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

Maj. Gen. Geoffrey D. Miller, a central figure in the U.S. detainee-abuse scandal, this week invoked his right not to incriminate himself in court-martial proceedings against two soldiers accused of using dogs to intimidate captives at the Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq, according to lawyers involved in the case.

The move by Miller -- who once supervised the U.S. detention facility at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, and helped set up operations at Abu Ghraib -- is the first time the general has given an indication that he might have information that could implicate him in wrongdoing, according to military lawyers.

Harvey Volzer, an attorney for one of the dog handlers, has been seeking to question Miller to determine whether Miller ordered the use of military working dogs to frighten detainees during interrogations at Abu Ghraib. Volzer has argued that the dog handlers were following orders when the animals were used against detainees.

Maj. Michelle E. Crawford, a defense lawyer representing Miller, said the general decided not to answer further questions because he has "been interviewed repeatedly over the last several years" about his role at Guantanamo Bay and his visit to Iraq and he stands by his many statements to Congress, Army investigators and lawyers.

Miller's "choice to no longer answer the same questions . . . was based on the advice of counsel and includes the fact that he has already, and repeatedly, answered all inquiries fully," Crawford said.

Miller's decision came shortly after Col. Thomas M. Pappas, the commanding officer at Abu Ghraib, accepted immunity from prosecution this week and was ordered to testify at upcoming courts-martial. Pappas, a military intelligence officer, could be asked to detail high-level policies relating to the treatment of detainees at Abu Ghraib.

He also could shed light on how abusive tactics emerged, who ordered their use and their possible connection to officials in Washington, according to lawyers and human rights advocates who have closely followed the case. Pappas has never spoken publicly. Crawford said Miller was unaware of Pappas's grant of immunity. "This could be a big break if Pappas testifies as to why those dogs were used and who ordered the dogs to be used," said Michael Ratner, president of the Center for Constitutional Rights. "It's a steppingstone going up the chain of command, and that's positive. It might demonstrate that it wasn't just a few rotten apples."

Pappas's attorney, Maj. Jeffery D. Lippert, said yesterday that Pappas would not comment. But he added in an e-mail that "the Commanding General of the Military District of Washington has ordered Col. Pappas to testify if called as a witness in pending courts-martial, and granted him testimonial immunity to facilitate his appearance as a witness."

Miller invoked his military Article 31 rights through his Army lawyer on Tuesday, after a Navy judge in the Military District of Washington ruled that lawyers defending the two dog handlers could interview Miller this week. Article 31 rights are almost identical to those afforded civilians by the Fifth Amendment, and invoking them does not legally imply guilt. Miller now will not meet with the defense lawyers.

DOJ_NMG_0009431

Eugene R. Fidell, a Washington expert in military law, said that Miller's decision is "consistent with his being concerned that he may have some exposure to worry about." Fidell added: "It's very unusual for senior officers to invoke their Article 31 rights. The culture in the military tends to encourage cooperation rather than the opposite."

Miller has long been in the spotlight of the Abu Ghraib abuse investigations, largely because he was sent to the Iraq prison in August and September 2003 with the goal of streamlining its intelligence-gathering operations, using Guantanamo Bay, commonly called "Gitmo," as a model. Officers at Abu Ghraib have said that Miller wanted to "Gitmo-ize" the facility, and that harsh tactics migrated from the Cuba facility via "Tiger Teams" that Miller sent to Iraq as trainers.

Photographs documenting a wide array of abuse against dozens of detainees at Abu Ghraib in late 2003 were turned over to military investigators in January 2004. The photographs were revealed publicly in April 2004, and seven low-ranking military police soldiers have taken most of the blame for the treatment of captives, which included sexual humiliation, stress positions and beatings. All seven were convicted on various charges, the most serious of which led to a 10-year prison sentence for Pvt. Charles A. Graner.

In an interview with defense attorneys for those MPs in August 2004, Miller said he never told Pappas to use dogs in questioning detainees. Photos of the dog handlers scaring detainees at Abu Ghraib were among the most notorious to emerge from the prison. Dogs were also used at Guantanamo Bay.

"At no time did we discuss the use of dogs in interrogations," Miller said, according to a transcript.

Volzer, who represents Sgt. Santos A. Cardona, one of the military dog handlers charged with abuse, said he believes the grant of immunity to Pappas will essentially clear his client, because Pappas already has admitted in administrative hearings that he improperly ordered the use of dogs. Volzer said he believes that Pappas was taking direction from Miller, and that Miller was acting on instructions from Defense Department officials. Cardona and Sgt. Michael J. Smith are scheduled to be tried in separate courts-martial in February and March.

"I think the command is hiding something, and I think what they're hiding is material that is exculpatory that says the interrogation techniques were approved by powers above General Miller," Volzer said. "Having Pappas available to testify may have given Miller the impression that he is next to be accused of doing something inappropriate or giving inappropriate orders."

Miller, now based at the Pentagon as a senior official managing Army installations, was recommended for administrative punishment for his alleged mishandling of interrogations of a valuable detainee in Guantanamo Bay. But high-ranking military officials have declined to impose the penalty. The detainee was subjected to a number of abuses that mirrored the ones that later emerged in the Abu Ghraib photographs.

Maj. Christopher Graveline, who has prosecuted several of the Abu Ghraib abuse cases, said yesterday that Pappas might be called to testify in upcoming courts-martial, but declined to comment on "any current or future prosecutions."

Asked whether prosecutors are looking at additional charges arising out of the Abu Ghraib investigation, Graveline said: "We're taking it where the evidence leads it."

Local Insurgents Tell Of Clashes With Al Qaeda's Forces In Iraq (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise And Dexter Filkins

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, Jan. 11 - The story told by the two Iraqi guerrillas cut to the heart of the war that Iraqi and American officials now believe is raging inside the Iraqi insurgency.

In October, the two insurgents said in interviews, a group of local fighters from the Islamic Army gathered for an open-air meeting on a street corner in Taji, a city north of Baghdad.

Across from the Iraqis stood the men from Al Qaeda, mostly Arabs from outside Iraq. Some of them wore suicide belts. The men from the Islamic Army accused the Qaeda fighters of murdering their comrades.

"Al Qaeda killed two people from our group," said an Islamic Army fighter who uses the nom de guerre Abu Lil and who claimed that he attended the meeting. "They repeatedly kill our people."

The encounter ended angrily. A few days later, the insurgents said, Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia and the Islamic Army fought a bloody battle on the outskirts of town.

The battle, which the insurgents said was fought on Oct. 23, was one of several clashes between Al Qaeda and local Iraqi guerrilla groups that have broken out in recent months across the Sunni Triangle.

American and Iraqi officials believe that the conflicts present them with one of the biggest opportunities since the insurgency burst upon Iraq nearly three years ago. They have begun talking with local insurgents, hoping to enlist them to cooperate against Al Qaeda, said Western diplomats, Iraqi officials and an insurgent leader.

DOJ_NMG_0009432

It is impossible to say just how far the split extends within the insurgency, which remains a lethal force with a shared goal of driving the Americans out of Iraq. Indeed, the best the Americans can hope for may be a grudging passivity from the Iraqi insurgents when the Americans zero in on Al Qaeda's forces.

But the split within the insurgency is coinciding with Sunni Arabs' new desire to participate in Iraq's political process, and a growing resentment of the militants. Iraqis are increasingly saying that they regard Al Qaeda as a foreign-led force, whose extreme religious goals and desires for sectarian war against Iraq's Shiite majority override Iraqi tribal and nationalist traditions.

While American and Iraqi officials have talked of a split for months, detailed accounts of clashes were provided by men claiming to be local insurgents.

Abu Lil was one of four Iraqi men interviewed for this article who said they were fighters for the Islamic Army, one of the main insurgent groups. Despite its name, its members have nationalist and largely secular motivations. While their membership in the insurgency could not be independently verified, the descriptions the four men offered of themselves and their exploits were lengthy, detailed and credible.

The four men interviewed are, by all accounts, ordinary Iraqis. One worked as a trash collector. Another was a part-time mechanic in an ice factory. All of them said they had children. While they claimed to be members of the same group, different members provided lengthy accounts of operations in an array of cities in the Sunni Triangle. The men gave Iraqi nicknames and noms de guerre. Some of their assertions, including specific examples about clashes with Al Qaeda's forces, were confirmed by American and Iraqi officials.

According to an American and an Iraqi intelligence official, as well as Iraqi insurgents, clashes between Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia and Iraqi insurgent groups like the Islamic Army and Muhammad's Army have broken out in Ramadi, Husayba, Yusifiya, Dhuluiya and Karmah.

In town after town, Iraqis and Americans say, local Iraqi insurgents and tribal groups have begun trying to expel Al Qaeda's fighters, and, in some cases, kill them. It is unclear how deeply the split pervades Iraqi society. Iraqi leaders say that in some Iraqi cities, Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia and local insurgent groups continue to cooperate with one another.

American and Iraqi officials believe that Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia is largely made up of Iraqis, with its highest leader, Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, a Jordanian. Even so, among Iraqis, the group is still perceived as a largely foreign force.

Evidence of the split is still largely anecdotal, and from most available evidence, Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia remains the most virulent and well-financed group fighting in Iraq. But in most Sunni cities, Iraqis defied Al Qaeda's threats and turned out to vote in large numbers on Dec. 15.

"The tribes are fed up with Al Qaeda and they will not tolerate any more," said a senior Iraqi intelligence official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity. The intelligence official confirmed reports that a Sunni tribe in Samarra had tried and executed Qaeda members for their role in assassinating a local sheik.

"It was a beautiful mistake," the intelligence official said of the sheik's assassination by Al Qaeda. "Now the tribes will kill Al Qaeda. Now they have the courage."

An Attack's Repercussions

Samarra, north of Baghdad, had been infiltrated by Al Qaeda's fighters. In desperation, a local sheik, Hekmat Mumtaz al-Baz, traveled to Baghdad in September to meet with Iraq's defense minister and ask for help, said one of the sheik's aides, Waleed al-Samarrai. A few weeks after the visit, the sheik was shot dead by Qaeda gunmen in his yard.

The account was confirmed by a member of the tribe, and a senior Iraqi intelligence official in Baghdad. Mr. Samarrai spoke in an interview in Al Wasat Hospital in Baghdad, where his brother, Salim, the sheik's bodyguard, who was wounded in a fight with Al Qaeda, was convalescing.

The tribe was furious, and its members tracked down the three men who carried out the killing. Elders from the tribe held a trial in a local farmhouse and interrogated the men for days. They said they worked for a fighter from Saudi Arabia who bankrolled the attacks, Mr. Samarrai said.

The Samarrai brothers said Al Qaeda's appeal was based less on religion than on money. The Iraqis who killed the sheik were believed to have received $500 to $1,000 for the job, and the same amount for dozens of other similar killings, Waleed al-Samarrai said. He said local insurgents had changed allegiances, lured away by Al Qaeda's money.

Members of the tribe swept the town and arrested 17 people they suspected were associated with the sheik's killing. In one house raid, the tribe found men from Sudan, Morocco, Afghanistan and Saudi Arabia, a member of the tribe said.

Al Qaeda's fighters struck back during the tribe's offensive. A foreign Arab believed to be a Saudi wearing in a suicide belt blew himself up at the sheik's funeral, killing one guest and wounding two, said Salim al-Samarrai, who said he witnessed the attack.

As a lesson to all those associated with the sheik's death, the tribe staged a public killing. While the sheik's father watched, men with machine guns shot the three men who carried out the assassination, the Samarrai brothers said.

DOJ_NMG_0009433

"Someone from outside the tribe should not tell us what to do," said Waleed al-Samarrai, standing next to Salim's hospital bed. "It is unacceptable for us."

Tactical Disputes

Disagreements over Al Qaeda's bloody tactics between local insurgents and Al Qaeda's fighters are as old as the war. Abu Lil, who fought in Taji in October, for example, claimed to have met with Qaeda fighters in late 2003. The militant group had just claimed responsibility for a double car bombing in Baghdad, and insurgents from the 20th Revolutionary Brigade, a nationalist group that Abu Lil belonged to at that time, were angry about the high civilian death toll.

Abu Lil, an elfin man with a cotton scarf tied around his head, talked in detail about the meeting as he sat on a couch in a house in Baghdad. The meeting was held in a farmhouse in Mosul, he said. About 25 men from Al Qaeda attended. Several appeared to be from Pakistan. Some spoke Arabic so poorly that they had to speak through a translator.

The discussion dragged on for seven hours, he said, but did not go well. The local insurgents demanded that the foreigners from Al Qaeda leave Iraq.

"They said, 'Jihad needs its victims,' " Abu Lil said. " 'Iraqis should be willing to pay the price.' "

"We said, 'It's very expensive.' "

The meeting ended abruptly, and Abu Lil and his associates walked out, feeling powerless and angry.

"I wished I had a nuclear bomb to attack them," he said. "We told them, 'You are not Iraqis. Who gave you the power to do this?' "

It took two more years for Sunni Arab sentiment to turn against the militants. As the Iraqi democratic political process began, including elections and the drafting of a new constitution, there was a widespread feeling among Sunnis that they were being left behind. Last January, Sunnis boycotted an election, giving them few seats in the new Parliament, and leaving them out of the drafting of a new constitution.

In the predominantly Sunni town of Dhuluiya, north of Baghdad, local residents blamed insurgents for their isolation. In the days leading up to a vote on the constitution, they went to the resistance and demanded they let people vote.

"All of the Sunnis were angry at the resistance," said a resident of Dhuluiya. "People realized, if we do not take part it, then we will lose the government. So the resistance agreed. They said, 'We will protect you from anyone who tries to attack you.' "

Emboldened by the promise of protection by the resistance, clerics from five local mosques encouraged their congregations to vote, even sending out people to put up posters about the election.

The excitement over the vote spurred Al Qaeda into action. At night, men put up their own posters threatening, "He who votes will be beheaded." Then, two days before the Oct. 15 referendum, a group of Qaeda fighters confronted an imam in one of the local Sunni mosques and lectured him about how voting contradicted the Koran. According to the imam, who spoke on condition of anonymity out of concern for his safety, two of the men appeared from their accents to be from Algeria and Syria. They vowed to kill anyone who removed their posters.

"Why are you driving the troubles into our town?" the Sunni cleric said he asked the men. "If you want jihad, the U.S. military is there."

Imams from five Sunni mosques tore down the Qaeda posters wherever they could find them.

"I myself tore those into pieces," the Sunni cleric said.

Al Qaeda got the message. On election day, Dhuluiya's voters streamed into polling places. The streets were quiet, with only a single attack on a polling center.

"All of them voted," the resident said. "All of Dhuluiya. There was no one sitting in his house."

Invisible Boundaries

Two and a half years into the American occupation, the towns and villages south of Baghdad are divided among the insurgent groups like gang territory in big American cities. The arrangement is largely invisible to American troops who patrol the towns, the insurgents said in interviews. But guerrillas themselves say they must seek permission to travel through towns their groups do not control.

Abu Marwa, a 32-year-old guerrilla leader from Yusifiya, a city south of Baghdad, told of a blood feud with Al Qaeda in a village the group controlled called Karagol, south of Baghdad.

Bookish and soft-spoken, wearing jeans and a button-down shirt, Mr. Marwa told of life inside the insurgency during two days of interviews in Baghdad. He said he might never have clashed with Al Qaeda, but the group's sectarian war against Shiites clashed with his loyalty to a Shiite relative of his the group had kidnapped and tortured.

"It's more than crazy when you want to hit Al Qaeda," said Mr. Marwa, who said he was a fighter for a local cell called Thunder. "Even the network of the resistance couldn't think of doing such an act."

According to Mr. Marwa's story, the feud with Al Qaeda began on Oct. 13, when a car full of gunmen he said appeared to be Syrian kidnapped his relative and took him to Karagol, which is in territory he said was controlled by Al Qaeda.

DOJ_NMG_0009434

"Karagol is the place where Al Qaeda is based in the region," said an Iraqi Army lieutenant based in the area. He spoke on the condition of anonymity, because he was not authorized to talk to the press.

"There has not been a command to go into Karagol," he said. "There are no government forces there. Now it's fully under control of the terrorists."

For the next three days, Mr. Marwa searched through miles of lush farmland before he got to Karagol. When he was prevented from driving through the town by Qaeda gunmen, who shot at him on the road, he walked through orchards after dark.

He said a guide had led him to the house of a man who was known as a paid killer for Al Qaeda. The man consulted a notebook fat with names, but Mr. Marwa's relative's was not among them.

As he drew closer, a local insurgent warned him to stay away from Karagol, even if he was sure his relative was there.

" 'I advise you, if you know he's with Al Qaeda, don't go there,' " Mr. Marwa recalled the man saying.

Mr. Marwa finally found his relative in the local morgue. His legs bore drill holes revealing bone. His jaw had slid off to one side of his head, and his nose was broken. Burns marked his body. His knees were raw, as if he had been dragged.

"I was totally crazy," Mr. Marwa recalled. "A mad man was more rational than me."

Enlisting the most trusted members of his cell, Mr. Marwa set out to take revenge. They tracked down two Syrian members of Al Qaeda, and in late October laid out an intricate plan for an ambush. They killed them on a country road as they drove out of town, and took their kaffiyeh, or headdresses, to the dead relative's wife, Mr. Marwa said.

"After many meetings, we decided to terminate them," he said.

Despite such tensions, the Americans face significant challenges in trying to exploit the split. "It is against my beliefs to put my hand with the Americans," said an Iraqi member of the Islamic Army who uses the nom de guerre Abu Omar.

Still, he said in an interview in a house in Baghdad, he allowed himself a small celebration whenever a member of Al Qaeda fell to an American bullet. "I feel happy when the Americans kill them," he said.

Efforts Intensify To Train Iraqi Police (CSM)

By Charles Levinson

The Christian Science Monitor, January 12, 2006

BAGHDAD - Visiting congressmen stepped out of armored cars Tuesday into the mud of Camp Dublin, home to the Iraqi police's elite special forces unit. US Army Maj. Gen. Joseph Peterson, the ex-linebacker responsible for training 200,000 Iraqi police, greeted them and assured the lawmakers that his Iraqi under- studies will soon be in charge here.

"We'll have these forces trained by the end of 2006," dubbed the year of the police by US officials, "and I have full confidence that they will begin to assume control of security in Iraq," he says.

The police have become a new priority, as the US begins turning over more security control to Iraq. Scrutiny of the police intensified after the discovery of secret jails and the torture of Sunni Arab prisoners.

Shiite control of the police force is also complicating efforts to persuade Iraq's factions to put their divisions behind them and to form a government of national unity following the Dec. 15 parliamentary vote.

On Tuesday, President Bush addressed the issue in a speech to the Veterans of Foreign Wars. He called on Iraqi police "not to address old grievances by taking justice into their own hands.... That's unacceptable to the United States government."

Meanwhile the insurgency rages on, singling out police on an almost daily basis. Wednesday, an attack killed two. On Monday, a pair of suicide bombers killed 29 at the Interior Ministry, and last week 70 recruits were killed in Ramadi. All told, some 3,500 Iraqi police have been killed in the past 16 months. Charges of US interference

In the face of these attacks, US moves to reign in the Iraqi police are irking Ministry of Interior officials and leading Shiite politicians, who seem eager to step up the fight. They say they are ready to do so without US support.

"There is huge interference from the American forces with the work of the Ministry of Interior in a way that does not allow the security forces to deal with security," says Jalal al-Din Saghir, a leading Shiite preacher and member of parliament.

At the heavily guarded Interior Ministry, Mohammed Ali al-Khafaggy, the minister's deputy, says he could "put tens of thousands of police in Ramadi and Diala within hours," referring to two insurgent hot spots. "But we are not doing this because of political circumstances.... We can't defeat the terrorists unless the security forces are allowed to do what has to be done," he says.

Mr. Khafaggy's heavily secured ministry rises up from behind concrete walls and razor wire. It has an estimated 152,000 police on its payrolls, among them border guards, highway patrol, traffic cops, and special paramilitary units. With that number expected to reach 300,000, the Ministry of Interior is one of the country's most coveted posts.

But the Shiite-controlled ministry and its growing cadres of police are widely believed to be infiltrated by the Badr militia, the armed wing of the main Shiite party, the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq (SCIRI). Ministry officials vehemently deny this. "Where is the evidence?" Mr. Khafaggy asks.

DOJ_NMG_0009435

But for many Iraqis, seeing police in the streets of Baghdad continues to provide little comfort.

"The police are just a bunch of gangs rolling around in pickup trucks waving Kalashnikovs," says Subhi Nazem Tawfiq, an ex-Iraqi general and the author of 14 books on Arab politics, history, and militaries. After the fall of Saddam Hussein he worked with US officials to reestablish the Ministry of Defense. "These are people charged up with militant Shiism," he says of many within the police ranks. "They hate Fallujah people, they hate people from Mosul, they hate Sunni [Arabs]."

Inside her dimly lit home in a mixed Sunni Arab-Shiite neighborhood of New Baghdad, a Sunni Arab mother huddles on the floor, weeping as she tells how police dragged her 23-year-old son from his bed at 1:30 a.m. last June.

She searched for him for six months. Finally, 10 days ago she found his picture with a police report at a Baghdad morgue. The report was dated June 17, the day of the arrest. It said simply that an unidentified body had been found strangled, wrists bound, in a roadside ditch not far from her home.

"I cannot look at [the police]," she says, choking on her anger. "The hate inside these policemen, this is what made them kill my son."

As leading Shiites rattle their sabers in response to last week's death toll (it was one of the country's deadliest weeks), Sunni Arab leaders fear retaliation by police. They have already begun to take a stand against police dragnets and alleged excesses. The Sunni Arab fundamentalist Iraqi Islamic Party says they have put together armed groups to protect neighborhoods targeted by Iraqi police.

"It's a necessary response to the massacres that have occurred in a number of neighborhoods," says Amr al-Jaboori, a member of the party's human rights committee. "The police should protect citizens, not terrorize them." Recruiting more Sunnis

While the US is giving Iraqi police a greater role in putting down the insurgency, doing so may be counterproductive to American goals if the police continue to be viewed as simply a glorified Shiite militia.

The US says it's dealing with that issue by recruiting more Sunni Arabs, Turkomen, and Kurds to the police. It also plans to increase the emphasis on human rights in the 10-week police academy and partner US battalions with police special forces units.

"These recruits get 32 hours of human rights and rule-of-law training," Major General Peterson tells the concerned congressmen. "I've been serving for 34 years, and I don't have 32 hours of human rights training."

He points to one of his Iraqi protégés, Colonel Nomaan, the Iraqi commander of the police force's Emergency Response Unit. "This unit is representative of the Iraqi population."

But Nomaan admits that for now, at least, his unit is an exception. "I insisted on this unit being ethnically balanced, but other leaders aren't like me," he says. "It won't get better as long as we keep distributing ministerial posts based on sect, and not on competency."

Key Shiite Backs Away From Charter Accord (WP)

By Nelson Hernandez

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

BAGHDAD, Jan. 11 -- Iraq's most influential Shiite politician said Wednesday that he would not allow a new government to "change the essence" of the country's constitution, despite a promise made to Sunni Arabs that it would be opened to major revision.

The promise of future changes to the constitution had been a key concession to encourage Sunni Arabs to join the political process in Iraq and stop violence. Last summer, Sunnis were ready to walk away from the negotiating table as the country's ruling Shiite and Kurdish coalition wrote a constitution that allowed the creation of strong regional provinces.

In a last-minute deal negotiated under heavy pressure from U.S. diplomats, the three groups agreed that the draft constitution would be put to a national referendum in October as planned but would be open to change for four months after a new government was formed early this year.

But Abdul Aziz Hakim, the leader of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, the most powerful Shiite party in the ruling coalition, appeared to back away from the constitutional compromise Wednesday.

"The first principle is not to change the essence of the constitution," Hakim said in a speech given during the Muslim holiday of Eid al-Adha, according to the Associated Press. "It is our responsibility to form Baghdad provinces and southern Iraq provinces."

A spokesman for Hakim's party confirmed the remarks. "The major points in the constitution were agreed to by all the parties that participated in the drafting of the constitution," Haitham Husseini, the spokesman, said in an interview. "As for changes in the powers, some points or details, these are open to negotiation. However, the main principles which were agreed to by all sides, and approved by the people in a popular referendum, they cannot be touched."

DOJ_NMG_0009436

The most difficult issue is whether Iraq will have a strong central government or a federal government composed of largely autonomous regions. The Kurds and Shiites, who live in oil-rich areas, support federalism; the Sunnis, who have little oil in the areas they dominate, fear that the country will break apart and that they will be denied a share of the oil revenue.

While it would be a blow to Sunnis if they were unable to amend the constitution, which voters approved Oct. 15, a Sunni politician said he viewed Hakim's comments as a political ploy.

"I don't know why Mr. Hakim is saying this at this time," said Alaa Makki, a senior member of the Iraqi Islamic Party, the largest Sunni political party in Iraq. "It's time for reconciliation, it's time for negotiation, it's time for participation in the political process."

However, a Western diplomat who spoke on condition of anonymity, said it was important "to remember that there's a lot of jockeying for political position going on. I think you have to look at the comments people are making as part of that process. Everyone is staking out their position in advance of the announcement of final election results."

Shiite Leader Rejects Big Charter Changes, Frustrating Sunnis (NYT)

By Richard A. Oppel Jr. And Qais Mizher

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, Jan. 11 - Iraq's most powerful Shiite leader on Wednesday rejected making major changes to the new Constitution, diminishing Sunni Arab hopes of amending the charter to avoid being shut out of the nation's vast oil wealth.

Sunnis were reluctant to sign on to the Constitution last fall, fearing that provisions granting wide powers to autonomous regions would leave oil in the hands of Kurds in the north and Shiites in the south. Sunnis dominate in western and much of northwestern and northcentral Iraq, but the oil lies beneath Kurdistan and parts of southern Iraq that one day may be subsumed in a semi-independent region controlled by Shiites.

As a carrot for the Sunnis, the Constitution was amended before the October referendum so legislators elected in the national voting last month could change it with a two-thirds vote. Some Shiites also voiced a willingness to negotiate with Sunnis on amendments.

But on Wednesday Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, leader of the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq, vowed to give no ground on crucial parts of the Constitution.

"We will stop anyone who tries to change the Constitution," said Mr. Hakim, whose party has close ties to Iran. "Many of the people who voted for us were promised federalism in the south," he said, referring to the form of government allowing for semiautonomous regions. He said Kurds, who joined Shiites to form the current ruling coalition, "agree with us about this condition, and we will continue our strategic coalition with our Kurdish brothers."

The speech was Mr. Hakim's latest hard-line statement directed at Sunni Arabs, whom Shiites accuse of fomenting violence to improve bargaining leverage in the new government. While he previously signaled unwillingness to reopen major constitutional issues, Mr. Hakim's belligerent declarations are sure to anger Sunnis hopeful of carving out a meaningful role in the government.

Yet it may not be that simple. While Sunni Arabs boycotted elections a year ago, they turned out heavily last month and are thought to have won about 20 percent of the seats in Parliament. A Western diplomat in Baghdad said Shiites and Kurds probably had not won enough seats on their own to reach the two-thirds majority needed to appoint an executive branch.

So while Shiites have enough votes to block constitutional changes, they may need to draw in parties other than the Kurds to obtain a two-thirds governing majority. If Sunnis are called on to make up that difference, amending the Constitution is sure to top their bargaining list.

Desperate to deflate the Sunni-dominated insurgency, United States officials are pushing Shiites to accept constitutional changes. The American ambassador, Zalmay Khalilzad, wrote in The Wall Street Journal on Monday that the charter "will likely need to be amended in the coming year to broaden support." He cited compromises "on some substantive issues such as federalization in Arab regions of Iraq."

Sunnis Can't Change Government Structure (WT/AP)

By Bushra Juhi

The Washington Times, January 12, 2006

BAGHDAD -- The most influential politician in Iraq issued a veiled warning yesterday to Sunni Arabs that Shi'ites would not allow substantive amendments to the country's new constitution, including to the provision that keeps the central government weak in favor of strong provincial governments.

DOJ_NMG_0009437

Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, the leader of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, said in an address in honor of the Islamic holiday of Eid al-Adha that provincial governments will remain strong in the constitution, which can be amended after the next government is installed.

"The first principle is not to change the essence of the constitution. This constitution was endorsed by the Iraqi people," he said.

Sunni Arabs place great stock in their ability to change the constitution, one of the reasons Sunni politicians urged the minority to turn out in large numbers for the Dec. 15 parliamentary elections.

They want a stronger central government because the constitution now bestows most power -- including control over oil profits -- on provincial governments. The Shi'ites in the south and the Kurds in the north control most of Iraq's oil. There are few oil reserves in central Iraq, where Sunnis live.

To win their support for the new constitution, which was approved in an Oct. 15 vote, Sunni Arabs were promised they could propose amendments to it during the first four months of the new parliament's tenure. The new parliament is expected to be seated at the end of February. Amendments require two-thirds approval in parliament and a majority in a national referendum.

There was limited violence yesterday. A roadside bomb exploded next to a police patrol outside Samarra, about 60 miles north of Baghdad, killing two policemen, police said.

Iraqi police found seven bodies shot in the head, with their legs and hands bound, in a sewer in eastern Baghdad, police said.

Iraqis nationwide celebrated the opening of the three-day Eid al-Adha celebration Tuesday with visits to relatives, food and sweets. Lambs were slaughtered, and food was distributed to the poor.

Shi'ites and Sunni Arabs also called for an end to the bloodshed that has wracked Iraq since last month's elections.

"This Eid is a happy day for all Muslims, especially Iraqis. But it comes after painful events that happened in Karbala and Ramadi," said Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari, a Shi'ite.

He referred to the killings of more than 120 people in suicide bombings last week in the Shi'ite holy city of Karbala and at a police recruiting center in Ramadi.

Violence has increased since the Dec. 15 elections, with at least 498 Iraqis and 54 U.S. forces killed.

Mr. al-Jaafari said that despite the violence, Iraq had made significant advances in 2005, citing a large turnout in the elections as one of the biggest achievements.

Mr. al-Jaafari's governing United Iraqi Alliance emerged with a large lead in the elections, far ahead of a Kurdish coalition and Sunni Arab groups, but without the majority it will need in the 275-member parliament to avoid a coalition.

An Incendiary Threat In Iraq (NYT)

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

Iraq's most powerful Shiite politician has just dealt a huge blow to American-backed efforts to avoid civil war through the creation of a new, nationally inclusive constitutional order. That leader, Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, leader of the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq, has turned his back on the crucial pledge, made before last October's constitutional referendum, that the new charter would be open to substantial amendment by the newly elected Parliament. Instead, Mr. Hakim, who runs the dominant, Iranian-supported fundamentalist party, now says no broad changes should be made. In particular, he defends the current provisions allowing substantial autonomy for the oil-rich Shiite southeast.

The vote count from last month's parliamentary election is not yet complete. But it is already certain that the Shiite religious alliance, in which Mr. Hakim is the most important leader, will hold enough seats to block any constitutional changes it doesn't like. The only recourse is to persuade Mr. Hakim to respect that earlier pledge.

Mr. Hakim's latest position is a prescription for a national breakup and an endless civil war. It is also a provocative challenge to Washington, which helped broker the original promise of significant constitutional changes. On the basis of that promise, Sunni voters turned out in large numbers, both for the constitutional referendum and for last month's parliamentary vote. Drawing Sunni voters into democratic politics is vital to creating the stable, peaceful Iraq that President Bush has declared to be the precondition for an American military withdrawal. The most unacceptable defect of the new constitution for Sunnis is its provision for radically decentralizing national political and economic power, dispersing it to separate regions.

In a quirk of geology, most of Iraq's known oil deposits lie under provinces dominated by Shiites or Kurds, while the Sunni provinces of the west and north are resource-poor and landlocked. Iraq as a whole is rich enough to support all of its people relatively comfortably. But a radically decentralized Iraq would leave the Sunnis impoverished, aggrieved and desperate, driving them into the arms of radical Sunni groups in neighboring lands.

Although Sunnis are a minority in Iraq, they are an overwhelming majority in the Arab world. An irreconcilable split between Iraq's Shiites and Sunnis would leave the Shiites even more dependent than they are now on Iran and American troops.

DOJ_NMG_0009438

Constitutional changes are needed in other areas as well, especially in regard to women's rights and the overly broad prohibitions against former members of Saddam Hussein's Baath Party. But decentralization is the most dangerously explosive issue right now. Mr. Hakim seems perversely determined to inflame it.

South Korean Businessman Denied Bail In Oil-for-food Case (AP)

By Juan A. Lozano

AP, January 12, 2006

HOUSTON - A South Korean businessman accused of accepting millions of dollars from Iraq in the U.N. oil-for-food scandal was denied bail Wednesday and will be transferred to New York to face additional charges in the case.

Tongsun Park was arrested in Houston on Friday after being expelled from Mexico.

U.S. Magistrate Judge Frances Stacy said she denied Park bond since she believed he was a flight risk because of his finances, his ties to South Korea and his history of not dealing with legal problems in the United States.

Park's arrest came after new criminal charges against him were unsealed in federal court in Manhattan.

Park, a South Korean citizen, had already been charged in April with accepting millions of dollars from the Iraqi government while he operated in the United States as an unregistered agent for Iraq's effort to create the oil-for-food program.

The new charges accuse Park of agreeing in October 1992 to work on behalf of the Iraqi government with another person who is now cooperating with the U.S. government.

During a bail hearing Wednesday, Randy Schaffer, Park's attorney, argued that his client's arrest was illegal.

"The guy is picked up in Mexico against his will and brought here," Schaffer said.

Park had been traveling from Canada to Panama City, Panama, when his plane stopped in Mexico City. He was taken off the plane by Mexican immigration officials.

FBI Agent Robert Midcap testified Wednesday that a warrant for Park's arrest had been circulated by Interpol because the South Korean citizen had not answered the U.S. charges from April. The Mexican government saw the Interpol warrant and sent him back to the United States, Midcap said.

Schaffer also argued Park should not be in jail because of his health. Park, 70, is taking medication for a kidney transplant, diabetes and high blood pressure.

Federal prosecutor Melissa Annis said Park should be denied bail because he's a flight risk due to his history of trouble with the law.

In the 1970s, Park was at the center of what became known as the Koreagate scandal, in which he was accused of trying to buy influence in Congress.

"There is a history of Mr. Park not wishing to face the music in a court of law in the United States," Annis said.

Park is charged with conspiring to commit wire fraud, conspiring to act as an unregistered agent of a foreign government, and laundering the criminal proceeds derived from the crimes.

The oil-for-food program ran from 1996 to 2003. It was created to help Iraqis cope with U.N. sanctions imposed after Saddam's 1990 invasion of Kuwait. The program let the Iraqi government sell oil to buy humanitarian goods.

Mexican Agents Nabbed Oil-for-food Suspect (/REU)

By Erwin Seba and Matt Daily

Reuters, January 12, 2006

HOUSTON, Jan 11 (Reuters) - Mexican agents acting on a U.S. warrant nabbed South Korean lobbyist Tongsun Park in Mexico City, then accompanied him to Houston to face a conspiracy charge linked to corruption in the U.N. oil-for-food program for Iraq, an FBI agent said on Wednesday.

Park's lawyer, Randy Schaffer, tried to get bail for Park and complained that the detention was improper, but in a hearing U.S. Magistrate Frances Stacy refused his request, meaning the 70-year-old suspect will remain behind bars.

Park, who was arrested on Friday, will be flown to New York to face a single count of conspiracy to commit wire fraud, acting as unregistered foreign agent and money laundering, for which he could face up to five years in jail and a $250,000 fine if convicted.

"I don't think it was legal to deliver him here," Schaffer said to reporters after the hearing.

FBI agent Robert Midcap testified that the Mexican government learned of the warrant for Park through Interpol and detained him at the Mexico City airport, where he was making a stopover on a flight from Canada to Panama.

Midcap said Mexican agents then flew with Park on a Continental Airlines flight to Houston, where U.S. authorities arrested him.

DOJ_NMG_0009439

A Mexican government source confirmed the arrest was made by Mexican agents and that Park was then deported to the United States.

Schaffer said Park was flown to Houston against his will, and questioned Midcap about whether it was a U.S. or Mexican decision to deport him.

"No, sir. It was the Mexican government that expelled him," Midcap said. "That was the government's decision, the Mexican government's decision."

FLIGHT RISK

Park is accused of receiving at least $2 million in cash from the Iraqi government under Saddam Hussein to influence the scandal-tainted, now-defunct U.N operation.

The $67 billion program was set up in 1995 to let Iraq sell oil to buy civilian goods for its people living under U.N. sanctions after the Kuwait invasion in 1990.

U.S. and U.N investigations have since revealed lobbyists, U.N. and Iraqi officials enriched themselves through kickbacks to arrange the oil sales.

U.S. prosecutors on Wednesday argued that Park should not receive bail because he is a flight risk.

But Schaffer said he is old and in ill-health. Park has high blood pressure, diabetes and kidney transplant. Schaffer says he is also the only person linked to the scandal to be held behind bars.

Several other defendants, including Houston oilman Oscar Wyatt, are facing criminal charges in New York in connection with the oil-for-food program.

Park first gained notoriety in the 1970s as a lobbyist who bestowed hundreds of thousands of dollars in gifts on U.S. Congress members as part of the influence-peddling scandal dubbed "Koreagate."

The indictment of Park, released on Friday, refers to attempts to buy the influence of two officials, who were not named.

A U.N.-established investigation of the program, led by former U.S. Federal Reserve chairman Paul Volcker, accused Park and another man of trying bribe former U.N. Secretary-General Boutros Boutros-Ghali.

The report said there was no evidence Boutros-Ghali knew of the attempt or received any money.

The Volcker panel also found that Park invested $1 million in 1997 in a Canadian company linked to the son of Maurice Strong, a Canadian businessman and Secretary-General Kofi Annan's advisor on North Korea. But there was no evidence Strong was involved in any wrongdoing.

Oil-for-Food Suspect, Ailing, Faces Arraignment In New York (NYT)

By Simon Romero

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

HOUSTON, Jan. 11 - A federal judge ordered an ailing South Korean businessman, Tongsun Park, held without bail on Wednesday, arguing that he posed a flight risk after his arrest here last week on a charge of illegally operating as an agent for Iraq in the United Nations oil-for-food program.

Magistrate Judge Frances Stacy also approved Mr. Park's transfer to New York, where he faces arraignment in federal court. Agents from the F.B.I. arrested Mr. Park here last Friday after Mexican immigration officials apprehended him at Mexico City's airport on the basis of an Interpol notice, Justice Department officials said.

The Mexican officials put Mr. Park on a commercial flight to Houston, accompanied by F.B.I. agents, said Melissa Annis, an assistant United States attorney. Ms. Annis argued for Mr. Park to be detained without bail, citing his history of legal problems in the United States and his financial means. Mr. Park was carrying $45,000 in cash at the time of his apprehension in Mexico, Ms. Annis said.

Mr. Park, 70, was a central figure in a Congressional bribery scandal in the 1970's that involved payments funneled through Mr. Park to American lawmakers from South Korea's national intelligence service. Although Mr. Park cooperated with United States officials in their handling of that scandal, federal prosecutors said he had avoided arrest and several requests to testify in the oil-for-food investigation.

An indictment secured by the United States Attorney for the Southern District of New York charged Mr. Park last April with conspiracy for illegally accepting $2 million from Saddam Hussein's government to serve as the Iraqi government's liaison with United Nations officials.

Randy Schaffer, a lawyer for Mr. Park, said his client was being treated unfairly, in that other people arrested in the case had been freed on bail, including wealthy individuals like Oscar S. Wyatt, the Texas oilman accused of paying kickbacks to Mr. Hussein's government. Mr. Schaffer also said Mr. Park's apprehension in Mexico was improper, because he was expelled against his will to the United States and not to his home nation, South Korea.

DOJ_NMG_0009440

Mexican officials seized Mr. Park before he was to embark on a flight to Panama City, said Ms. Annis, the federal prosecutor, though it was not clear what he was planning to do in Panama.

The swift cooperation by Mexican authorities in delivering Mr. Park comes at a time of tense relations with the United States on immigration issues. Mr. Park is believed to have strong business ties in Central America and the Caribbean, in addition to South Korea and Taiwan.

Mr. Park communicated with Iraqi officials in the 1990's by telephone from a residence in the Dominican Republic, according to a report last September by the oil-for-food investigating committee headed by Paul A. Volcker, the former Federal Reserve chairman. Citing a business partner of Mr. Park, the same report said he went by the title "Ambassador Park" in Washington social circles, after purchasing the title of ambassador from a Nicaraguan official for about $150,000.

Mr. Park appeared in federal court on Wednesday wearing long underwear beneath the orange garb of the county jail, where he was transferred from a federal facility over the weekend to take kidney medication under the supervision of a doctor. Mr. Park said through his lawyer that he had recently undergone a kidney transplant, and was being treated for diabetes and high blood pressure.

Oil-for-Food Suspect 'kidnapped' (TIMES)

By James Bone

The Times (UK), January 12, 2006

A KEY figure in the United Nations' Oil-for-Food scandal claims that he was "kidnapped" by US authorities investigating possible pay-offs to top UN officials.

Tongsun Park, a well-connected Korean businessman who has been accused of trying to bribe the former UN Secretary-General Boutros Boutros Ghali, found himself in jail after he was arrested at Houston airport on Friday. He had spent many months as a fugitive and his arrest provided an unexpected boost for the FBI inquiry into UN corruption.

But Mr Park's lawyer, Randy Schaffer, said his client never intended to travel to the United States. At a bail hearing yesterday, he argued that the arrest was illegal. He said that Mr Park had been travelling from Canada to Panama, but was taken off the plane when his flight stopped in Mexico City. "The guy is picked up in Mexico against his will and brought here," Mr Schaffer said.

Robert Midcap, an FBI agent, testified that a warrant for Mr Park's arrest had been circulated by Interpol because he had not answered the US charges from April. The Mexican Government saw the Interpol warrant and sent him back to the United States, he said.

Mr Park, a central figure in the "Koreagate" bribery scandal in Washington in the 1970s, is charged with acting as an unregistered foreign agent in the United States for Saddam Hussein's regime in Iraq.

Prosecutors say that he was recruited to provide a back-channel to UN officials who set up and administered the Oil-for-Food programme, which allowed Iraq to sell limited quantities of oil to fund humanitarian imports. According to the criminal complaint, Mr Park received at least $2 million (£1.12 million) in cash to approach two unnamed, high-ranking UN officials.

Court papers say that the Iraqi Government signed two agreements in 1996 to make payments of $5 million to an account in London and $10 million to an account in the Channel Islands, contingent on Baghdad agreeing the terms of the Oil-for-Food programme with the UN. The allegations raise questions about whether the $64 billion UN scheme was corrupted from the start.

The two UN officials are not named in court papers. But a UN inquiry said that Mr Park's contacts were Dr Boutros Ghali, then the UN Secretary-General, and Maurice Strong, a top aide at the time to the present UN chief, Kofi Annan. The inquiry found no evidence that Dr Boutros Ghali received any money from Mr Park. Mr Strong received a $1 million investment in a failing company in 1997 while serving as Mr Annan's adviser on UN reform, but he says that this was a normal business transaction.

Mr Park's application for bail was rejected yesterday because prosecutors identified him as a "flight risk" who had been in trouble with the law before.

German Spies Aided U.S. Attempt To Kill Hussein In Aerial Attack (LAT)

By Bob Drogin, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — With the battle of Baghdad raging on April 7, 2003, an intelligence tip was rushed to a special Pentagon targeting team: Saddam Hussein and his two sons had been spotted near a chicken restaurant in the city's wealthy Mansour district.

Less than 45 minutes later, a B-1 bomber obliterated the site with four satellite-guided bombs, leaving a deep crater and at least a dozen dead. The Iraqi ruler, it soon became clear, was not among them.

An Iraqi informant provided the initial tip. But U.S. officials now say confirmation came from an unusual source: two German military intelligence operatives who stayed in a Baghdad safe house after Berlin had closed its embassy.

The Germans drove by the restaurant and saw a convoy of armored vehicles with dark windows, like those used by the Iraqi strongman, parked outside. Germany's Federal Intelligence Service, known as the BND, quickly passed the report to the Pentagon's Defense Intelligence Agency, which was part of the targeting team.

The previously undisclosed role of German intelligence in the widely reported attempt to decapitate the Iraqi regime highlights how the CIA and the Pentagon secretly relied on German and other foreign spy services for critical information on Iraq even as the intelligence agents' governments fiercely opposed the Bush administration's drive toward war.

That behind-the-scenes cooperation forms the backdrop as Germany's new chancellor, Angela Merkel, arrives here today on her first official visit. Officials said she aims to repair U.S.-German relations that were badly strained when her predecessor, Gerhard Schroeder, publicly broke with the White House over Iraq.

U.S. officials said Merkel, 51, will meet President Bush on Friday after a night in the presidential guest quarters across from the White House. The two leaders will discuss terrorism, Iran's nuclear program, Israel's leadership void and other mutual concerns, officials said.

Germany has been roiled in recent months by reports that the Bush administration has maintained secret prisons for suspected terrorists somewhere in Europe, and by public anger over the CIA's use of "extraordinary renditions," in which suspects are secretly snatched and transported to third countries, including some known to practice torture.

In a meeting with Merkel in Berlin last month, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice discussed the case of German citizen Khaled Masri, who alleges he was mistakenly abducted from Macedonia by U.S. operatives in 2003 and detained for five months, mostly in Afghanistan, on suspicion of terrorism ties. In a lawsuit filed in Virginia, Masri alleges he was tortured during his imprisonment.

Merkel, who in November became Germany's first female chancellor, clearly hasn't forgotten the issue. On Monday, she called for Washington to close its military prison for terrorism suspects at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. She told the German newsmagazine Der Spiegel that the facility "can and should not exist in the longer term. Different ways and means must be found for dealing with these prisoners."

Despite those differences, administration officials view Merkel as far more amenable to U.S. interests than Schroeder, who sharply criticized Bush and U.S. policies during his two terms in office. Merkel, who grew up behind the Iron Curtain, has vowed to restore transatlantic relations.

Since the ousting of the Taliban in 2001, Germany has sent more troops to Afghanistan than any other country except the United States, but it has refused to commit any military forces to the U.S.-led coalition in Iraq.

Though the use of U.S. military bases in Germany as critical logistical and transportation hubs for the war is an outward reminder of Germany's cooperation, the nation's role assisting U.S. intelligence and combat forces has been well hidden.

German officials acknowledged in recent interviews that they decided in December 2002 to leave a handful of operatives from the BND in Baghdad after the war began.

In some cases, the German officials said, the BND asked team members to eyeball sites in behalf of U.S. intelligence. The officials said the goal was to collect what they called "humanitarian intelligence" to help the U.S. avoid civilian targets or other potential mistakes, such as the U.S. bombing of the Chinese Embassy in Belgrade in 1999.

BND officials said their operatives reported only what they could see and did not provide bombing target coordinates or other specific target data to the Pentagon. The officials said the Germans also met with their own sources and collected other intelligence on the collapsing Iraqi regime once the U.S.-led invasion began in March 2003.

"We were running an operation in Baghdad," said a senior German intelligence official. "We were not taking orders from the Americans."

Similarly, although the French government bitterly opposed the Bush administration's policies on Iraq, French intelligence supplied detailed reports to the CIA from a member of Hussein's Cabinet who was a French spy.

"He said there were no weapons of mass destruction," said a former CIA official. "So we didn't believe him."

History Lessons (WT)

The Washington Times, January 12, 2006

From op-ed by National Security Adviser Sandy Berger published Nov. 23, 1998, in the international Al Hayat:

"[T]he entire world is fed up with Iraq's continuing deception and defiance. Iraq agreed as a condition of the Gulf War cease-fire that it would disclose its weapons of mass destruction arsenal within 15 days. Instead, it has spent the better part of a decade shirking its obligations, withholding information from the inspectors, blocking their work, destroying information in plain sight. There is no clearer example than the recent discovery that Iraq produced VX -- the most deadly chemical in the world -- and loaded it into missile warheads that could be launched at any time against its neighbors. Experts from over a dozen countries have now confirmed this finding... Certainly, when it comes to a rogue regime with weapons of mass destruction and a history of using them, the United States and its friends in the Muslim world must continue to be united -- because we are all at risk."

More Body Armor Is On The Way For U.S. Troops (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

The Army announced yesterday that it will soon start producing 230,000 sets of side armor plates and field them over the year to soldiers in Iraq and Afghanistan, after a recently disclosed Pentagon study indicated that such plates could have helped prevent scores of troop deaths since 2003.

The Marine Corps has delivered 9,000 sets of the plates to Iraq, a number that will rise to about 30,000 by April, officials said yesterday. Each set of plates, together with a carrier and soft armor, costs about $450 and weighs about seven pounds, the officials said.

Army and Marine generals in charge of developing and buying equipment defended the pace at which they were getting the new side armor to troops, after a closed-door briefing yesterday on the matter on Capitol Hill. The generals briefed the Senate Armed Services Committee after lawmakers voiced concern over a classified Pentagon forensic study disclosed last week that for the first time linked gaps in upper torso protection to troop fatalities.

The scrutiny of body armor is the latest instance in which Congress has pressured the Pentagon to accelerate the distribution of protective equipment to U.S. troops -- from "uparmored" Humvees and trucks to bulletproof vests. More than 2,200 American troops have died in Iraq since March 2003, 1,741 of them in combat, according to Pentagon figures as of yesterday.

The forensic study of 401 Marines who died in combat in Iraq from March 2003 to June 2005 showed that 21 died primarily from injuries to the side of their torsos. The study, completed in August 2005 by the Office of the Armed Forces Medical Examiner, concluded that those Marines might have benefited from improved protection, such as that offered by the side plates. The findings, if applied to all U.S. combat casualties, suggest that scores of deaths might have been prevented if the new side plates had been worn.

The Marine Corps finalized contracts for the production of the side plates in mid-September and production began six weeks later, with distribution starting in November, said Col. Shawn Reinwald, director for combat equipment at the Marine Corps Systems Command in Quantico, Va. The Marine Corps commandant decided on the need for side plates in June, he said.

The Army also identified a requirement for the side plates in the past year, when Army truck drivers running convoys in Iraq asked for them, Maj. Gen. Jeffrey A. Sorenson, the Army's acquisition chief, told reporters. The Army took a design created by a commander in Iraq, minimized the plates' weight and this week determined the optimal size, according to Maj. Gen. Stephen M. Speakes, director of force development for the Army. "It's a great success," Speakes said.

The generals said the side plates are the most recent in a series of body armor upgrades that have improved the likelihood of survival for U.S. troops. But they stressed that the added armor has drawbacks because it can limit troops' mobility and raise body temperature -- a major consideration, given the 130-degree heat in which forces are fighting.

"We don't want a medieval knight. We are not going to be hoisted onto a horse," Speakes said. "All of this is a very difficult trade-off. How much is adequate?"

As a result, the new armor will be supplied to all troops, but commanders will decide case by case whether the mission requires them to wear it, Army and Marine officials said.

Army Sending Added Armor To Iraq Units (NYT)

By Michael Moss

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 11 - Army officials said Wednesday that they had decided to send additional body armor to Iraq to protect soldiers from insurgents' attacks.

The ceramic plates now worn by most members of the military shield just some of the upper body from bullets and shrapnel, and the Army said it would buy plates that would extend this protection to the sides of soldiers. The officials spoke after a closed session of the Senate Armed Services Committee, held after The New York Times reported last week that a Pentagon study had found that extra armor could have saved up to 80 percent of the marines who died in Iraq from upper body wounds.

In at least 74 of the 93 fatal wounds that were analyzed, bullets and shrapnel struck the marines' sides, shoulders or areas of the torso where the protective plates did not reach.

DOJ_NMG_0009443

The Marine Corps, which commissioned the study in December 2004, began buying side plates in September for its 26,000 troops in Iraq. Army procurement officials said they began studying a similar move last summer after receiving requests from troops in Iraq, but were hampered by the need to supply a much larger force of 160,000 individuals.

The Army had begun supplying small quantities of side plates to soldiers much earlier in the war through its Rapid Equipping Force. Armor Works of Tempe, Ariz., which is making the plates for the marines, said it shipped 250 sets in November 2003.

Another manufacturer, the Excera Materials Group of Columbus, Ohio, said that since late 2004 it had shipped 1,000 sets of side plates to Special Forces personnel, the Air Force and individual units that used their own procurement money to buy the armor.

Citing security concerns, the Army has in recent days urged armor contractors not to disclose information about their work, even if the information is not classified, industry officials said.

"Neither you nor any of your employees are authorized to release to anyone outside your organization any unclassified information, regardless of medium, pertaining to any part of your contract," says a letter from an Army research and procurement unit that The Times obtained.

In Congress on Wednesday, Army and Marine officials defended their efforts to procure additional armor, saying they had to weigh the benefits of additional plates against adding weight and restricting mobility. Citing those concerns, Marine officials said last week that they remained reluctant to buy shoulder plates or larger plates for the chest and back.

"This is a continuous evolution," Maj. Gen. Stephen M. Speakes, the Army director of force development, said after the Senate briefing.

National Guard Troops Sue Government In Pay Dispute (REU-Y2)

By Jason Szep

Reuters, January 12, 2006

Four members of the Massachusetts National Guard filed a $73 million class-action lawsuit on Wednesday against Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and other military officials in a dispute over on-the-job expenses since the September 11 attacks.

The lawsuit, which also names Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, appears to be the first of its kind in the U.S. Army National Guard, which has faced heavy demands since September 11, 2001, lawyers involved in the case said.

The four men from Massachusetts and New Hampshire filed the suit in U.S. District Court on behalf of soldiers in about 300 jobs in the Massachusetts National Guard owed money for meals, car fuel, lodging and daily allowances, their lawyers said.

"The National Guard refused to reimburse millions of dollars to soldiers called for active duty following the 2001 terror attacks," John Shek, counsel for the plaintiffs, said at a news conference.

"We have found that the closer we look at this the worse the situation gets."

Officials at the National Guard were not immediately available to comment.

Thousands of soldiers in the Guard, a part-time force whose 440,000 members live civilian lives while doing periodic military training, were mobilized after the September 11 attacks to protect airports, borders and other possible targets. Tens of thousands also have been deployed to fight in Iraq and Afghanistan.

SYSTEM FOR EXPENSES

At the heart of the suit is the system of paying expenses to Guard troops who say they traveled hundreds of miles (km) and paid for their own food, car fuel and lodging to perform their duties.

Shek said while National Guard soldiers across the country were paid under federal orders known as "title 10" that included daily allowances, hundreds of troops in Massachusetts were given different orders known as "title 32" that excluded daily allowances but required the same work.

The controversy cuts to the core of the Guard's dual federal and state roles. For state missions, the governor can call on the Guard during emergencies such as storms, fires, earthquakes or civil disturbances. The U.S. president also can call on them for federal missions.

Capt. Louis Tortorella, 51, estimated he was owed $14,600 a year for the two years he worked before he retired in October 2003. He said there were about 1,000 to 1,500 Guard soldiers who worked in Massachusetts owed similar expenses.

After the September 11 attacks, Tortorella was called up to protect the Quabbin Reservoir, which supplies water to about 2.5 million people in metropolitan Boston and is about a five-hour drive each day from his home in New Hampshire.

In their complaint, the soldiers said their requests for compensation were repeatedly denied.

"It was always either shoved to the side or they turned their backs on us," said Sgt. Wayne Gutierrez, 39, who estimates he was owed at least $17,500 a year for his 2-1/2 years in the Army National Guard in Massachusetts.

Lanky Teen Driven To Become A Marine (WP)

By Nikita Stewart

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

As a teenager, Kyle W. Brown was always long and lanky -- a little too slight to be a Marine, despite a high school career in the Navy Junior ROTC, said his grandmother, Katheryn Brown.

"They said, 'You're too skinny to be a Marine,' " recalled Brown, 68. "He worked out hard for a year and a half and beefed up."

In July 2002, the Newport News, Va., teenager realized his ambition.

Last Saturday, Lance Cpl. Kyle W. Brown, 22, was fatally shot in the head by a sniper in Anbar province near Fallujah, according to the account his grandmother said Marine Corps officials gave the family. It was his second tour of duty in Iraq.

An official news release from the Department of Defense said Brown was killed "by enemy small arms fire" near Fallujah. Lance Cpl. Brett L. Lundstrom of Stafford was killed in a separate attack in the same area that day, according to the release. A spokesman for the 2nd Marine Division, 1st Lt. Barry Edwards, said that was all the information he had.

Brown and Lundstrom were assigned to the 2nd Battalion, 6th Marine Regiment, 2nd Marine Division, 2nd Marine Expeditionary Force, based at Camp Lejeune, N.C.

Brown was raised in Newport News and lived with his grandmother. He went to Heritage High School. He had a crooked smile and was so mild-mannered that his grandmother called him "Casper."

"You know, like the friendly ghost," she said during a phone interview.

Growing up, he loved ramen noodles, which he called "Roman noodles," and WarHeads sour candy. "They would light your head up. He used to like to slip me one and look at my face," Brown said.

"He was also silly. You know how teenagers can be silly," she said. "He'd come down and sit at the breakfast table in his underwear with those chicken legs. I'd say, 'Hey, put some pants on.' "

But Kyle Brown was serious about the Marines. "He kept his hair cut short," his grandmother said.

When he finally bulked up enough to make the cut and enlist, he said, "How do you like me now? I'm a Marine," Brown recalled.

She said her grandson was unusually patriotic, although he was hesitant about returning to Iraq after he left in September, she said. "First of all, we are Americans. Freedom is not free," she said.

The family hopes to have visitation this weekend in Poquoson, Va., and will have a funeral at 1 p.m. Tuesday at Arlington National Cemetery, Brown said.

Kyle Brown earned several commendations and medals, including the Iraqi Campaign, Global War on Terrorism Service and National Defense Service medals, Edwards said. Brown had been with the 2nd Battalion since February 2003, he said.

Lundstrom, 22, received medals for the Iraqi Campaign, Afghanistan Campaign, Global War on Terrorism Service and National Defense Service. He joined the Marines in January 2003, Edwards said.

His family could not be located for comment.

DOJ:

Gonzales Will Take Part In Opening Of Center (SLPD)

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, January 11, 2006

U.S. Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales will make his first official appearance in St. Louis, helping on Thursday morning to open the city's new Family Justice Center.

He will be joined by U.S. Sen. Jim Talent; Diane Stuart, director of the Justice Department's Office of Violence Against Women; Catherine L. Hanaway, the U.S. attorney in St. Louis; Mayor Francis Slay and other leaders.

The Family Justice Center, a 12,000 square-foot facility at 1139 Olive Street, was funded with a $1.25 million Justice Department grant. It is billed as a one-stop resource for women and their families looking to escape domestic abuse.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

South Floridians Plead Guilty To Hedge Fund Fraud (SFBJ)

By Jim Freer

South Florida Business Journal, January 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0009445

The U.S. Attorney for the Southern District of Florida, the FBI and the Florida Office of Financial Regulation said Anthony Giordano, 29, of Boca Raton, pleaded guilty to federal securities fraud and wire fraud. They said Joseph Zumwalt, 46, of Fort Lauderdale, pleaded guilty to mail fraud in connection with the former EPG Limited Partners of Fort Lauderdale.

"Investors lost more than $1.4 million in as a result of the fraud," the U.S. Attorney's office said.

The government said the defendants admitted representing to investors, including two religious organizations, that they would invest their monies in a hedge fund administered by EPG.

Instead, the government said, Giordano converted millions of dollars for other uses, including personal gain.

Giordano also admitted to manipulating the common stock of Fort Lauderdale-based Weida Communications (Pink Sheets: WDAC) to about $5 a share, in part to facilitate the sale of Weida stock in private transactions at about $3 a share, the government said.

As part of the plea agreement, Giordano transferred more than $2 million in restitution to the U.S. District Court in Miami. The government also said he has agreed to pay $3.25 million more in restitution at sentencing.

Sentencing is scheduled for March 20 before U.S. District Court Judge William Zloch.

Giordano faces a maximum of 20 years in prison and a maximum fine of $5,000 for securities fraud.

Giordano and Zumwalt each face maximum prison terms of 20 years and fines of up to $250,000 for wire fraud and for mail fraud.

SEC Losing Torchbearer On Corporate Behavior (WSJ)

By Kara Scannell

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Alan Beller, a major figure in the Securities and Exchange Commission's drive to overhaul corporate governance, will leave the agency next month, giving SEC Chairman Christopher Cox another high-level vacancy to fill.

Mr. Beller's departure comes as the SEC is unveiling the most sweeping overhaul of executive-compensation disclosure in 14 years.

A proposed rule outlining the changes is expected to be discussed at a public hearing Tuesday, and after a public comment period it could take effect for the 2007 proxy season.

The executive-compensation proposal is the capstone for Mr. Beller, 56 years old, who joined the agency in 2002 to head its corporation-finance division.

He oversaw the implementation of the Sarbanes-Oxley corporate-governance law and an update to securities-offering laws, which allow for greater communication including electronic versions of preoffering "roadshows" for investors before initial public offerings of stock.

Mr. Beller also has overseen the proposal or implementation of other rules, such as one to speed up the time companies have to file periodic reports, Internet delivery of proxies to investors, and a rule that makes it easier for foreign-based companies to deregister from U.S. reporting requirements. He also helped set up a small-business advisory committee, which is charged with providing guidance to the agency on the costs of regulations to small businesses.

He will "be recognized as one of the giants of the SEC of all time," Mr. Cox said.

Mr. Beller's departure has been rumored for months amid speculation that he was waiting until the executive-compensation proposal was completed. He said he will return to private practice, but will stay until February to help with a transition.

While Mr. Cox has said filing vacant spots is an organizational priority, he has yet to staff directors for the divisions of market regulation, investment management and chief accountant. He also needs to name the head of the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board. Agency insiders have said the delay in filling positions has created some tension as it has slowed decision-making on some issues.

The openings afford Mr. Cox an opportunity to set a tone with his selections. Earlier this month, he named former Latham & Watkins colleague Brian Cartwright as general counsel. Mr. Cartwright, a former rocket scientist, is expected to start later this month.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Sources: Two Lawmakers Could Face Charges In Abramoff Probe (CNN)

By Kelli Arena and Kevin Bohn

CNN.com, January 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0009446

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- Up to a half dozen people, including two members of Congress, could face charges after high-powered lobbyist Jack Abramoff's plea deal with the Justice Department, sources with knowledge of the investigation tell CNN.

Abramoff has been cooperating with Justice Department prosecutors and FBI agents for several months in their investigation of his dealings, including his allegations of exchanging gifts for political favors.

Authorities have focused on about 20 people who possibly committed wrongful acts, government sources have previously told CNN. The number is a moving target as new information comes in.

Sources with knowledge of the investigation say at least two members of Congress are under scrutiny as part of the ongoing investigation. One is Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio, who sources say was the person identified in Abramoff's plea agreement as the official who took action for Abramoff after receiving from him such things as a golf trip to Scotland.

Ney has steadfastly denied wrongdoing, has pledged to cooperate with the investigation and has said he is confident he will be cleared.

The sources would not identify the other member, and they told CNN that no charges appear imminent.DeLay staffers under scrutiny

Also under scrutiny, the sources say, are some current and former congressional staffers, including at least two people who used to work for then-House Majority Leader Rep. Tom DeLay. DeLay, R-Texas, and Abramoff had a long working relationship.

Investigators are also examining the activities of some officials at the Interior Department and the General Services Administration, sources tell CNN. One former GSA official, David Safavian, was indicted in October on charges of obstructing a GSA proceeding, obstructing a U.S. Senate proceeding and making false statements in connection with the investigation.

Abramoff pleaded guilty to conspiracy, fraud and tax evasion charges January 3 and agreed to cooperate with federal prosecutors. About 30 to 40 FBI agents and other staff are working full-time on this investigation, which officials have said is a high priority for the government. (Full Story)

Legal experts have said while there may be some evidence of ethical violations, it is very hard to prosecute government officials for acting on a bribe, because it is standard operating procedure for lobbyists to do favors for those in power hoping to get something in return. They say it is very hard to bring a court case to prove someone acted as a direct result of a bribe.

An E-mail Trail Of Money And Influence (CSM)

By Peter Grier

The Christian Science Monitor, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON - Lobbyist Jack Abramoff was, in his own word, "jazzed."

It was Sept. 25, 2001, and the night before he'd attended a small Georgetown dinner given by a Republican environmental group. He'd hobnobbed there with Secretary of the Interior Gale Norton and Deputy Secretary Steven Griles - two of the most important officials in the government, as far as Mr. Abramoff's Indian tribe clients were concerned.

Now it was the day after, and time for a little relationship cultivation.

"The event last night was outstanding!!" he wrote in an 11:54 a.m. e-mail to Italia Federici, president of the group, the Council of Republicans for Environmental Advocacy. "Bravo! ... I have a fantastic box at the Redskins stadium. How about you come this Sunday and see it (invite Steve to come with his family also), and we'll all discuss my doing a fund raiser there for you guys?

"Let me know as soon as you can ... I think [Attorney General John] Ashcroft and his guys will also be there. 1PM game," Abramoff concluded.

The case of Jack Abramoff, disgraced super-lobbyist, provides an unprecedented look at the way Washington really works.

That doesn't mean everyone on K Street is corrupt, as Abramoff and his former partner, public relations consultant Michael Scanlon, now have admitted they were. The pair's "Gimme Five" scheme, in which Abramoff steered business to Mr. Scanlon in return for a 50 percent kickback, was unique - and felonious.

But US investigations of Abramoff and Scanlon produced pointillistic detail about their daily political activities, much of which were perfectly legal. Hundreds of pages of e-mails and congressional testimony released by the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs trace the pair as they scrabble for access, scratch backs, beg for money, and dole out contributions in return.

It's D.C. as it is, a Vanity Fair of skyboxes, name-dropping, and $130 Sushi Taro lunches. Few lobbyists have their own restaurant, as Abramoff did. But many might relate to that twinge of panic when it's the end of the month, and the checks don't seem to be rolling in.

"Our pool is getting shallow - we need to reload my man!" Scanlon e-mailed Abramoff in September 2002.

* * *

DOJ_NMG_0009447

Let's start with what might be called The Great Circle of Influence. It's a basic procedure whereby lobbyists obtain access for their clients, and it's well illustrated by the connections that occurred at the Council of Republicans for Environmental Advocacy (CREA) dinner on Sept. 24, 2001.

There's no evidence that either the CREA group or any of its officials have done anything illegal in conjunction with Abramoff. Ms. Federici strongly defended her innocence in an appearance before the Senate Indian Affairs Committee last November, saying she had been subject to Abramoff's manipulations.

But in 2001, with the Bush administration still new, Federici held a card of value: Top GOP officials would show up if she asked. Secretary Norton had helped found the group, and Mr. Griles was a friend. So both agreed to attend when Federici invited them to a fundraising dinner.

"Just heard back from Interior and the date for the dinner is Monday, September 24th," Federici e-mailed Abramoff in late August 2001. "Steve is personally inviting everyone from Interior and talking with them about the dinner so I expect a wonderful turnout ..."

Abramoff, for his part, controlled something that the GOP environmental group needed: cash. Most of his Indian tribe clients agreed to sign on as trustees of CREA, at a cost of $50,000 each. Among the perks for trustees was an invitation to the CREA dinner. And the Interior Department is where many issues important to Indian tribes, such as land use and casino policy, are decided.

Not that the tribes paid quickly. A few days before the dinner, Federici asked Abramoff when some of that money might flow in, as she was trying to make some payments and budget for the next quarter.

"Hi Italia. Choctaw will come through with the $50K sometime next month (they are over budget for this fiscal year, which ends at the end of the month)," Abramoff replied in a Sept. 21 e-mail. "Kickapoo is going to give in two parts of $25K each, starting next month. Chitimacha has, I believe, already sent over some (was it $10K?) ...."

The dinner was a small one of 23 people, held in a private home near the Naval Observatory. Abramoff seemed happy afterward, as the invitation to his skybox shows. Federici replied a few days later - and asked again if the lobbyists could hurry along promised checks.

"Ahhh - the glamorous world of non-profit work - about one half step above beggar!" she concluded in an Oct. 4, 2001 e-mail to Abramoff.

In subsequent communications with Federici and others, Abramoff called CREA "our access to Norton" and talked about "our guy Steve." He bragged about quashing Interior Department policies that are against his client tribes' interests, and weighed in with his thoughts on who should get key Interior jobs.

But Sen. John McCain (R) of Arizona, chairman of the Indian Affairs committee, has said the panel has found no evidence that Norton was aware that Abramoff was invoking her name for gain. Griles has testified that he treated Abramoff no differently than other lobbyists.

And within the e-mail trail are hints that Abramoff didn't have quite the juice he claimed. He was taken by surprise when Norton named Aurene Martin acting head of Indian Affairs in January 2003 - just the sort of thing a well-connected lobbyist should know in advance.

And by July 2003, he appeared to be out of the loop, reduced to begging for advice.

Griles "won't discuss any of my clients with me," he complained in a July 17 e-mail to Federici. "The problem is that since he won't do so, and since you are not able to chat with him now, I am left in a real dilemma. I can't deliver anything from Interior for my clients."

* * *

Another aspect of lobby life well illustrated in the Abramoff e-mails is infrastructure maintenance. As in, how to get your clients to share the bill for those must-have trappings of success, such as stadium boxes.

In May 2001, Abramoff asked Kathryn Van Hoof, chief counsel of the Louisiana Coushattas, if the tribe wanted to join some of his other clients in his sports suites program. For $185,000, Abramoff wrote in an e-mail, tribal leaders could be official cosponsors of his existing luxury boxes for D.C.-area baseball, hockey, and football venues.

This investment would translate into approximately 400 fundraising opportunities, Abramoff promised, virtually all used by members of Congress or their organizations.

"The huge leverage in doing this is that the tribe not only gets the political credit for making available the sports suite, but gets credit with the Member for all funds raised in that evening," wrote Abramoff.

Pressed by Ms. Van Hoof for more details, Abramoff said the Coushattas would be taking the place of some withdrawing Russian clients. Personal attendance is not a requirement of the deal, said the lobbyist; the Choctaws sent a representative "very rarely", his Marianas clients "never." The tribe should instead send a couple of framed items to hang on the football stadium and MCI Center walls.

DOJ_NMG_0009448

"It helps when you attend, but if you are not there, we still make a big deal about you guys being their hosts and we spend a lot of time discussing the tribe," wrote Abramoff.

In Washington, clients of lobbyists are accustomed to being directed where to send large sums of money. Lists of lawmakers and organizations deemed important for the client to support are a staple lobbyist product; a number of these lists are included in the trove of Abramoff e-mails and documents.

Thus a request for an Indian tribe to pay $185,000 to allow other people to watch a football team named "Redskins" did not apparently strike the Coushattas as out of line. The tribe cut the check for the program on May 25, 2001.

* * *

Finally, if you're going to be a player in the lobby game, you've got to accept the concept of strange bedfellows. Your ally today can easily be the group that was at your throat last week.

Thus one of Abramoff's primary weapons for protecting the gambling interests of his Indian tribes was the antigambling Christian right. For at least three projects between 1999 and 2002, Abramoff enlisted the help of Ralph Reed, former executive director of the Christian Coalition and current candidate for Georgia lieutenant governor.

The logic went this way: Use opponents of gambling to stamp out new gambling proposals that threaten the profits of existing casinos. And Mr. Reed enthusiastically rallied antigambling troops:

"We are opening the bomb bays and holding nothing back. If victory is possible, we will achieve it," wrote Reed in a 1999 e-mail to Abramoff regarding a campaign to kill an Alabama casino proposal for the benefit of the Mississippi band of Choctaw Indians.

But Reed and his campaign firm were expensive, prompting Abramoff to finally explode.

"He is a bad version of us! No more money for him!" the now-admitted felon e-mailed his partner Michael Scanlon in 2002.

Congressman's Ex-aide Admits Abetting Bribery (USAT)

USA Today, January 12, 2006

A former aide to Rep. William Jefferson, D-La., pleaded guilty Wednesday to charges that he helped a congressman solicit bribes to arrange two telecommunications deals. A spokeswoman for Jefferson declined to comment.

Brett Pfeffer, 37, pleaded guilty to conspiracy and aiding and abetting bribery of a public official. He agreed to cooperate with prosecutors and testify if needed. He could get 20 years in prison when sentenced March 31.

Pfeffer said in court that a congressman had solicited his assistance in promoting telecom deals in Nigeria and Ghana. The congressman demanded 5% to 7% of the newly formed African companies in exchange for his help promoting the deal, according to Pfeffer.

Court documents referred to the congressman only as “Representative A," but the documents said Pfeffer was his legislative aide from 1995 through 1997. Pfeffer was Jefferson's legislative aide during that period.

Rice faults Syria in assassination probe

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Syria must cooperate with an investigation into a political assassination or face possible United Nations sanctions.

U.N. investigators have been trying to interview Syrian President Bashar Assad as part of an investigation into the assassination Feb. 14 in Beirut of former Lebanon prime minister Rafik Hariri, who was an opponent of Syrian domination of his country.

“We intend to refer this matter back to the Security Council if Syrian obstruction continues,” Rice said.

The U.N. probe has implicated Syria, but the Syrian government has denied the allegations.

Rice also said the United States “has grave and continuing concerns about Syria's destabilizing behavior and sponsorship of terrorism.”

U.S. ready to seek sanctions against Iran

Iran made a “serious miscalculation” by moving to resume uranium enrichment, and intensive talks are underway with U.S. allies about what to do now, White House spokesman Scott McClellan said.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said it was now “more likely than ever” that Iran would be referred to the U.N. Security Council for possible economic sanctions. Representatives from Britain, France and Germany, which with U.S. backing have been negotiating with Iran, are meeting today in Berlin to consider their next step.

Iran removed U.N. seals at research facilities Tuesday and said it would resume nuclear research after a two-year freeze. Iran says its program is to produce electricity, not bombs.

GOP leadership vote to go on as scheduled

DOJ_NMG_0009449

Republican leaders of the House of Representatives rejected calls to move up the election of a new majority leader to replace Rep. Tom DeLay of Texas. DeLay had to step aside after he was indicted in September on charges related to fundraising. Speaker Dennis Hastert of Illinois decided to keep the leadership election as scheduled on Feb. 2.

Supporters of Missouri Rep. Roy Blunt, the No. 3 Republican in the House as party whip, had called this week for holding the election before the House reconvenes Jan. 31. Blunt claims to have more support than his challenger, Ohio Rep. John Boehner, chairman of the House Education and Workforce Committee.

Lieberman has broad support in poll

Sen. Joe Lieberman, D-Conn., has lost some support because of his backing of the Iraq war, but 64% of voters in his state believe he should be re-elected, a Quinnipiac University poll found.

The poll found 24% opposed his re-election and the rest didn't know. Lieberman, the 2000 vice presidential nominee and running mate of Al Gore, is seeking a fourth Senate term in November.

Lawmaker Sought Cut Of Nigerian Deal: Aide (REU-Y2)

By Andy Sullivan

Reuters, January 12, 2006

Louisiana Democratic Rep. William Jefferson (news, bio, voting record) sought a cut of a Nigerian telecommunications venture in return for his help setting it up, a former aide said on Wednesday as he pleaded guilty to bribery charges.

In return for lobbying Nigerian officials and arranging a loan through the U.S. Import-Export Bank, Jefferson demanded an ownership stake in a venture by two U.S. companies to provide high-speed Internet and cable television to Nigeria, former aide Brett Pfeffer said.

"The congressman told me he would require 5 to 7 percent of ownership of the company," Pfeffer told U.S. Judge T.S. Ellis. "He was to help promote the business opportunity to Nigerian officials."

Pfeffer, 37, pleaded guilty to conspiracy to commit bribery and aiding and abetting the solicitation of bribes by a member of Congress for his role as a go-between in the deal, and agreed to cooperate in the investigation.

He faces up to 20 years in prison and a $500,000 fine.

According to a statement of facts released in the plea deal, Jefferson sought to place a relative on the company's payroll at a salary of $2,500 to $5,000 per month and steer legal work toward another relative.

Jefferson also lobbied government officials in Ghana to try to set up a similar venture there, according to the plea deal.

A Jefferson spokeswoman declined to comment.

The agreement comes as Congress faces the largest corruption scandal in decades. Lobbyist Jack Abramoff pleaded guilty to fraud last week and admitted that he provided golf trips, campaign contributions and other gifts to lawmakers in exchange for favorable treatment for his clients.

The Abramoff scandal so far has largely implicated Republicans like former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, but Pfeffer's agreement could make it difficult for Democrats to portray corruption as a strictly Republican issue as they try to win back control of Congress.

Jefferson is not named in Pfeffer's plea agreement, which only describes a "Representative A" who employed Pfeffer from 1995 to 1998.

News accounts from that period cite Pfeffer as Jefferson's legislative director.

According to court papers, Pfeffer's investment firm in 2004 agreed to invest $45 million to provide high-speed Internet and cable TV service to Nigeria over the existing copper telephone wires there.

Jefferson recruited Pfeffer's company for the deal and connected it to a Kentucky technology provider whose equipment would be used in the venture. As the agreement was signed he told Pfeffer he would require an ownership stake, according to court papers.

"Pfeffer understood that Representative A was soliciting a bribe in return for Representative A's official assistance in furthering the Nigerian Deal. Pfeffer .... later advised (his boss) that it was part of the cost of doing business with Representative A," the plea deal said.

Pfeffer's boss is not named in the plea deal but is described as a witness cooperating in the investigation.

Pfeffer's lawyer declined to comment after the hearing.

U.S. Assistant Attorney Mark Lytle also declined to comment.

Jefferson has held his seat since 1990, representing many New Orleans neighborhoods that were devastated by Hurricane Katrina. He serves on the tax-writing Ways and Means Committee.

An August 2005 FBI raid on his homes in Washington and New Orleans found thousands of dollars in cash stored in a freezer, according to news reports.

DOJ_NMG_0009450

Jefferson traveled to Nigeria in February 2004 and Ghana in July 2005, according to congressional campaign-finance records.

The $9,248 Ghana trip was paid for by Win Win Strategies Foundation, which did not return a call seeking comment.

A Kentucky technology company called iGate Inc. helped underwrite the Nigeria trip. News accounts indicate that iGate participated in the venture with Pfeffer's company. The company could not be reached for comment.

Ex-Aide Pleads Guilty To Bribing Congressman (WP)

By Allan Lengel

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

A former aide to Rep. William J. Jefferson (D-La.) pleaded guilty yesterday to bribing the congressman to promote high-tech business ventures in Africa.

Brett M. Pfeffer, 37, of Herndon, a former president of a McLean investment firm, pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court in Alexandria to conspiracy to commit bribery of a public official and aiding and abetting the bribery of a public official in 2004 and 2005.

Pfeffer, who worked as Jefferson's legislative aide from 1995 to 1998, faces up to 20 years in prison. He has agreed to cooperate in the ongoing FBI probe.

The man Pfeffer bribed is referred to only as "Representative A" in court papers. But law enforcement sources and documents make clear the politician is the defendant's former employer, Jefferson, who has not been charged in the case.

Pfeffer recounted in court how his former Capitol Hill boss, in exchange for using his congressional influence in Africa, demanded a 5 to 7 percent stake in one of two new companies Pfeffer's firm was investing in. The companies were to provide high-speed Internet and cable TV service in Ghana and Nigeria.

Pfeffer said the congressman also demanded that two relatives be put on the businesses' payrolls.

Pfeffer told his boss at the investment firm, a 41-year-old woman referred to as "CW" in court papers, that such was the cost of doing business with the congressman, a court document said.

Jefferson, a senior member of the Ways and Means Committee, is co-chairman of the congressional Africa Trade and Investment Caucus and the caucuses on Brazil and Nigeria.

At one point last year, the FBI set up a sting in which Pfeffer's investment company boss recorded conversations, according to law enforcement sources who declined to be identified because the investigation is ongoing.

FBI agents also raided several locations, including Jefferson's homes in the District and New Orleans, where they found about $90,000 in cash in a freezer, sources said.

Jefferson's press secretary, Melanie Rousell, declined to comment yesterday, saying Jefferson was in the Netherlands studying flood controls.

His attorney, Michael Fawer, said he wanted to speak to Jefferson before commenting.

According to court documents, in early 2004, Pfeffer told his former boss about his job at a McLean investment company and "his search for business opportunities."

Pfeffer said Jefferson told him about an opportunity in Nigeria involving a Louisville-based company with the rights to a technology enabling copper wires to carry high-speed Internet. Pfeffer's boss eventually agreed to invest $45 million in the Nigeria venture, and Jefferson demanded a stake as well assurances his relatives would be on the payroll, according to court documents.

"Pfeffer understood that [Jefferson] was soliciting a bribe in exchange for [his] official assistance," the court document said.

The document said a similar deal was struck in 2005 regarding a Ghana deal.

In U.S. Bribe Probe Of Rep. Jefferson, Ex-Aide Sets Plea (WSJ)

By Anne Marie Squeo

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Federal prosecutors secured a guilty plea from a former legislative aide to Rep. William Jefferson in a continuing bribery investigation of the Louisiana Democrat.

Brett Pfeffer, 37 years old, pleaded guilty to conspiracy to commit bribery as well as aiding and abetting the solicitation of bribes by a member of Congress. As part of his plea in an Alexandria, Va., federal court, Mr. Pfeffer agreed to cooperate with law enforcement in the probe. He faces up to 20 years in jail and a fine of as much as $500,000 under the terms of his agreement.

The plea agreement doesn't refer to Mr. Jefferson, but rather "Representative A." Details of Mr. Pfeffer's employment for the congressman make clear who is being discussed, however.

A spokeswoman for Mr. Jefferson said the congressmen wouldn't be commenting on Mr. Pfeffer's plea.

The investigation of Mr. Jefferson is separate from the Justice Department probe into members of Congress involved with former Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff and his business associate Michael Scanlon.

According to the filing, Mr. Pfeffer worked for Mr. Jefferson from 1995 to 1998. He stayed in touch with Mr. Jefferson after leaving his office and later become president of a Virginia investment company.

In 2004, while at this company, Mr. Pfeffer introduced the controlling partner of his firm to Mr. Jefferson. The congressman then introduced that unnamed person, who later became a cooperating witness for the government, to the founder of a Kentucky company planning to provide high-speed Internet and cable-television service to the government of Nigeria. The two agreed Mr. Pfeffer's company would invest $45 million in the Nigerian plan, according to the government's filings in the case.

Afterward, Mr. Jefferson then asked Mr. Pfeffer, as a representative of the controlling partner in his firm, to seek bribes on his behalf in exchange for the congressman using his official post to promote the Nigerian arrangement. Mr. Pfeffer, who also stood to make money if the Nigerian deal proved successful for his company, then passed along these requests by the congressman. In addition, federal prosecutors allege that Mr. Jefferson agreed to promote a similar telecommunications deal for the country of Ghana in exchange for certain payments.

Mr. Jefferson, an eight-term congressmen, is a senior member of the House Ways and Means Committee and its subcommittee on trade, and also co-chairs the Africa Trade and Investment Caucus.

Congressman Implicated In Case (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

ALEXANDRIA, Va., Jan. 11 (AP) - A Louisiana congressman demanded bribes in exchange for his help in promoting a pair of business deals in Africa, according to court documents filed Wednesday with a guilty plea by a former aide.

The aide, Brett Pfeffer, 37, a former legislative director to Representative William J. Jefferson, Democrat of Louisiana, pleaded guilty to aiding and abetting bribery of a public official and conspiracy. Mr. Pfeffer could get 20 years in prison when he is sentenced March 31.

A spokeswoman for Mr. Jefferson declined to comment.

Mr. Pfeffer said in federal court here that a congressman had demanded bribes in exchange for his assistance in brokering two African telecommunications deals.

Court documents did not identify the congressman by name, but the documents make clear that Mr. Jefferson is the congressman.

According to the documents, Mr. Pfeffer was employed as a legislative assistant by the congressman from 1995 through 1997. That is when Mr. Pfeffer served as a legislative aide to Mr. Jefferson.

Mr. Pfeffer agreed to cooperate with prosecutors and testify if needed.

The conspiracy took place in 2004 and 2005, years after Mr. Pfeffer had left Mr. Jefferson's office, according to the authorities.

Mr. Pfeffer said in court that a congressman had solicited his assistance in promoting business opportunities in Nigeria and Ghana. The congressman demanded 5 percent to 7 percent of the newly formed African companies in exchange for his help promoting the deal, Mr. Pfeffer said.

Mr. Pfeffer's lawyer, Paul Knight, declined to comment.

Court records give no indication how much money Mr. Jefferson stood to receive.

The F.B.I. raided Mr. Jefferson's home in August.

Mr. Jefferson was elected to the House in 1990, becoming the first black congressman from Louisiana since Reconstruction.

Former Congressional Aide Pleads Guilty In Bribery Scandal (FOX)

FoxNews, January 11, 2006

ALEXANDRIA, Va. — A former congressional aide pleaded guilty on Wednesday to charges of conspiracy to commit bribery and aiding and abetting the solicitation of bribes by a member of Congress.

Brett Pfeffer , a former aide to Rep. William Jefferson , D-La., entered his plea deal in U.S. District Court in Alexandria, Va. Pfeffer faces up to 20 years in prison when sentenced March 31 and a fine of up to $500,000.

"Today this defendant admitted to a crime which, at its core, is a bribery scheme involving a public official," said Assistant Attorney General Alice Fisher of the Criminal Division. "Such schemes deprive citizens of the integrity and honest services expected of our government. The Justice Department will aggressively investigate and prosecute these illegal schemes."

DOJ_NMG_0009452

Pfeffer, who worked as a legislative assistant for Jefferson from 1995 to 1998, must cooperate with officials in an ongoing investigation, according to the plea deal.

"The congressman told me of a business opportunity in Nigeria," Pfeffer told Judge T.S. Ellis. "I took that opportunity to a woman I work for. She decided to invest in this company. [Jefferson] would require 5 to 7 percent of the company for his family. In exchange, he would work with officials in Nigeria to further the business."

Prosecutor Mark Lytle said the congressman and Pfeffer traveled to Ghana in July to promote a similar deal there.

Pfeffer, 37, told officials that Jefferson accepted bribes in connection to supporting a telecommunications agreement with the Nigerian government. The court documents do not name Jefferson specifically but refer to him only as "Representative A."

The documents make obvious that Jefferson is the congressman who allegedly solicited the bribes, which was initiated by the Kentucky-based company, and received monthly payments of $2,500 to $5,000 for his family members between 2004 and August 2005.

In August, the FBI searched Jefferson's Louisiana home and Nigerian Vice President Atiku Abubakar's Maryland residence. Jefferson was first elected to Congress in 1990, becoming the first black Louisiana congressman since Reconstruction. He was criticized after Hurricane Katrina for getting the National Guard to escort him to his flooded home at a time when federal resources were sorely strained.

Pfeffer's attorney, Paul Knight, and Jefferson's spokeswoman, Melanie Rousell, declined comment.

Jefferson was unable to comment on Wednesday because he was traveling in the Netherlands with Sen. Mary Landrieu, D-La., to review levee systems. Jefferson is expected back on Thursday to attend a hearing in Louisiana.

The bribery probe is separate from the ongoing investigation of lobbyist Jack Abramoff , who pleaded guilty last week to federal charges. Abramoff's investigation could bring down some lawmakers and their aides, including a former aide to Rep. Tom DeLay, R-Texas.

The investigation has looked into Jefferson's dealings with a privately held technology company, iGate Inc. in Louisville, Ky., which was seeking telecommunications contracts in Nigeria.

FOX News' Molly Hooper and The Associated Press contributed to this report.

Kickbacks Admitted In Work For New Orleans (NOTP)

By Bruce Eggler, Staff Writer

New Orleans Times-Picayune, January 12, 2006

Federal prosecutors rang up another conviction Wednesday in their probe of a scheme to skim hundreds of thousands of dollars from a huge energy-efficiency contract awarded during former New Orleans Mayor Marc Morial's tenure at City Hall.

Under an agreement with prosecutors, Michael Garnett, a subcontractor who did work under the $81 million Johnson Controls Inc. deal, pleaded guilty to misprision of a felony for knowing about crimes related to the scheme but failing to inform authorities, U.S. Attorney Jim Letten said.

Garnett is the fifth subcontractor to enter a guilty plea related to the Johnson Controls contract, Letten said.

The 20-year contract with Johnson Controls, awarded in 2000, was the largest signed by the Morial administration. It was intended to save the city money on its energy bills, in part by replacing an array of energy-consuming fixtures with more efficient models.

Letten said Garnett admitted providing kickbacks to Kerry DeCay, director of the Department of Property Management under Morial, in connection with the subcontract given to Garnett's company, Golden Hammer Construction.

The kickbacks included a refrigerator costing $5,278.20 and an icemaker worth $1,387.57 that Garnett's company bought for DeCay's home, plus an identical icemaker for the home of Terry Songy, Johnson Controls' local project manager, according to the plea agreement.

Songy has told investigators that he and DeCay "controlled assignments given to Golden Hammer under its subcontract with Johnson Controls," the document says.

DeCay has said he's innocent. Prosecutors have said Songy is expected to plead guilty and is cooperating with the investigation.

Letten said Garnett was placed in the difficult position of having to give payments to a city official to get city business, and that he did so reluctantly. Letten urged other business owners to refuse to be corrupted and to report any approaches for kickbacks to the FBI.

Garnett, whose case was investigated by the FBI and the Internal Revenue Service, entered his plea before U.S. District Judge Martin Feldman.

DOJ_NMG_0009453

Feldman, who is set to sentence Garnett April 19, could impose a maximum of three years in prison and a $250,000 fine. But Garnett, and several other Johnson Controls subcontractors who have pleaded guilty to the same crime, could draw a much lighter sentence in return for cooperating with the government.

Subcontractors Roy Joseph Broussard of R.J. Broussard LLC and Owen Prestridge of Owen Prestridge Contractor pleaded guilty in November. Two others, Randall Moore of National Contractor Services Inc. and Michael Farris of Specialty Machines Services, filed guilty pleas in December, First Assistant U.S. Attorney Jan Mann said.

Charges were filed against the five subcontractors and Songy in August. Letten said at the time that all were expected to plead guilty and cooperate with the government.

Besides DeCay, the highest-profile defendants in the Johnson Controls case are expected to be Reginald Walker, owner of a construction company that received a large subcontract from Johnson Controls, and restaurateur Stan "Pampy" Barré, a confidant of Morial's.

According to a grand jury indictment issued in June, DeCay, Walker, Barré and Songy plotted to skim money from the contract by inflating the costs of various jobs. Subcontractors would be directed to turn in fraudulent invoices, after which they would kick back money and sometimes other items to Barré, Songy and DeCay, the indictment said.

Barré grossed more than $800,000 from the deal for little or no work, while Songy and DeCay each took in at least $100,000 in cash and gifts, according to the June 16 indictments.

The government said Barré, DeCay and Songy also agreed to change the contract's scope of work to include renovations to Barré's concession stands at the Morris F.X. Jeff Municipal Auditorium and the Mahalia Jackson Theatre of the Performing Arts. Those changes and others unrelated to energy efficiency added $1.8 million to the price of work in the two buildings, the indictment said.

Barré and Walker have said they are innocent.

. . . . . .

Bruce Eggler can be reached at beggler@timespicayune.com or (504) 826-3320.

Council Member Pleads Not Guilty To Extortion (AP)

AP, January 11, 2006

NEW ORLEANS (AP) — A member of the St. Tammany Parish Council has pleaded not guilty to federal charges of extorting at least $50,000 from a businessman in an alleged attempt to broker a contract of dispose of debris from Hurricane Katrina.

Advertisement

Joe Impastato, 33, entered the plea Tuesday to extortion, conspiracy and money laundering.

Impastato has admitted making a deal with the owner of Pontchartrain Chipping Yard LLC in Lacombe, but says he obtained an opinion from a private attorney to ensure his actions were legal.

U.S. Magistrate Louis Moore Jr. allowed Impastato to remain free on $5,000 bond he posted after his arrest in November. Each of the three counts carries up to 20 years in prison.

A grand jury accused Impastato of contacting Pontchartrain Chipping and offering to negotiate a debris-dumping deal for the company in exchange for part of the $200,000 contract. Authorities said Impastato was arrested after the company's owner contacted the FBI, which set up a sting operation.

F.B.I. Said To Grill Man, 20, On Cruise Disappearance (NYT)

By Alison Leigh Cowan

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

The lawyer for one of the men last seen with a Connecticut newlywed before he vanished on a Mediterranean cruise last summer said federal agents had pressured his client for information about the man's disappearance and threatened to charge him with the rape of a female passenger if he declined to cooperate.

In his first extensive comments on the case, the lawyer, Albert Y. Dayan, said that his client, Rustislav Kofman, denied any role in the disappearance of the Connecticut man, George Allen Smith IV, last July 5 on a Royal Caribbean cruise or in any rape.

He said that when crew members aboard the ship, Brilliance of the Seas, approached his client about a missing person, Mr. Kofman thought they were talking about Mr. Smith's wife, Jennifer. He said she was not in the Smiths' cabin when his client and three of his friends put her husband to bed after a night of heavy drinking. It was the last time anyone is known to have seen Mr. Smith.

Since his disappearance, his wife and family have demanded to know what happened to Mr. Smith, and have expressed suspicion of foul play. Federal agents have focused on a group of male passengers who helped Mr. Smith back to his cabin and who, two days later, videotaped themselves having sex with an 18-year-old female passenger. She later complained she had been raped; the men have said through their lawyers that the encounter was consensual.

Mr. Dayan said his client, a 20-year-old college student from Brighton Beach, Brooklyn, had been subjected to three lengthy interrogations by federal agents before he hired a lawyer. He said he and his co-counsel had decided to speak out because they thought their client was being scapegoated.

"Agents have barraged this young man with question after question in three different interrogations," Mr. Dayan said. "Some were five to eight hours long, and some were with no food till it was over."

He said that if his client "were any weaker psychologically, he would have confessed to anything."

In an effort to extract information from his client, Mr. Dayan said, agents showed a videotape of his client and two other men having sex with the passenger alleging rape. He said agents also sought to play the tape for Mr. Kofman's father in an effort to get him to instruct his son to cooperate but that the father refused to watch.

A spokeswoman for the F.B.I. in New Haven said yesterday that her office would not comment.

Mr. Dayan said: "We sympathize with the disappearance of Mr. Smith and the family. However, we're concerned that one tragedy - the disappearance of a man - may lead to another tragedy - the arrest of a man who had nothing to do with the disappearance."

He said that he did not believe his client "did anything wrong on the ship" and noted that unlike some of the other people under scrutiny, his client "actually spoke to the F.B.I. and gave them a complete account."

He complained that the authorities had been using a "strictly consensual" sexual encounter as leverage in an effort to force his client to provide more details on the Smith case than the account he had already given.

Last week, a family friend speaking on behalf of the 18-year-old passenger disputed that the encounter was consensual. He said she was "angry and looking forward to her day in court."

Woodward Found Guilty (WIAT-TV)

By Adam Moseley, News42 WIAT

WIAT-TV, CBS 42 , Birmingham, AL, January 12, 2006

A federal jury returned a verdict against an ex-Jefferson County sheriff and his attorney. It's a case that stretches back a few years…one that had Jim Woodward and Albert Jordon accused of illegally using the national crime computer.

The justice department filed criminal charges back in 2000, accusing Woodward and his attorney of misusing the N.C.I.C. computer.

Prosecutors contend they conducting background checks on absentee voters during the 1998 sheriff's race, a charge they denied. And a jury agreed.

Jim Woodward and Albert Jordan sat through a second day of jury deliberations, and when it was over the federal panel found them guilty of two felony counts.

Woodward was found guilty of conspiracy and illegal use of property. Jordan was also found guilty of conspiracy and misuse of public money, property or records.

Following the decision, Woodward, Jordan or their attorneys would comment on the verdict, but several family members and friends left the courthouse visibly upset.

Both Woodward and Jordan were cleared of a third felony count.

Puerto Rico Lawyer Indicted In Scheme (AP)

AP, January 12, 2006

SAN JUAN, Puerto Rico (AP) -- A federal grand jury indicted a San Juan attorney Wednesday in connection with a scheme to defraud fast-food giant Tricon Restaurants International, the Justice Department said.

Eugenio A. Guardiola Ramirez was charged with conspiracy to obstruct justice and obstruction of justice in an investigation into illegal kickback payments paid by an electrical contractor, said Justice Department spokesman Orlando Rios.

Tricon's brands include Kentucky Fried Chicken, Pizza Hut and Taco Bell. Its Puerto Rico stores are operated by Encanto Restaurants of Puerto Rico, Rios said.

Prosecutors allege Guardiola obstructed an investigation into payments made by the Gate Engineering Corporation to a Tricon employee in exchange for more than $1 million (euro823,847) worth of electrical contracts, Rios said.

He is accused of mischaracterizing the payments to a grand jury, interfering with witnesses and drafting a phony services contract, Rios said.

If convicted on all charges, Guardiola could face up to 35 years in prison and fines of up to $750,000, Rios said.

DOJ_NMG_0009455

In May 2005, the electrical contractor and its president, Albith Colon, pleaded guilty to having made illegal kickbacks and are awaiting sentencing, Rios said. The Tricon employee, Jorge Luis Matos Burgos, was convicted in August of the same charge and was sentenced to a year in prison.

U.S. Supreme Court Splits Over Fairness Of Calif. Death Sentence (LAW/AP)

By Gina Holland, The Associated Press

AP, January 12, 2006

A divided Supreme Court reinstated a California inmate's death sentence on Wednesday, the first 5-4 vote under newly installed Chief Justice John Roberts.

Justices overturned an appeals court ruling that declared Ronald Sanders' sentence unconstitutional. Sanders was put on death row for the 1982 killing of a woman during a drug-related robbery in Bakersfield, Calif.

Justice Antonin Scalia wrote the ruling, the Court's first death penalty decision since Roberts replaced Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist last fall.

The case presented a technical question for the Court involving jurors' consideration of invalid aggravating factors.

Special circumstances used by prosecutors in their case against Sanders -- that the crime was committed during a burglary and was cruel or heinous -- were later found invalid.

California argued that Sanders would have been sentenced to death even without those arguments. The Supreme Court's five conservative members agreed.

"The erroneous factor could not have 'skewed' the sentence, and no constitutional violation occurred," Scalia wrote in an opinion joined by Roberts, retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor and Justices Anthony Kennedy and Clarence Thomas.

In a dissent, Justice John Paul Stevens said "this decision is more likely to complicate than to clarify our capital sentencing jurisprudence."

Also disagreeing with the decision were Justices David H. Souter, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen Breyer, although their reasons were varied.

In a lengthy dissent, Breyer said the Court's finding could "deprive a defendant of a fair and reliable sentencing proceeding."

The case is Brown v. Sanders, 04-980.

Justices Question Death Row Inmate's Guilt (REU-Y2)

By James Vicini

Reuters, January 12, 2006

A majority of U.S. Supreme Court justices appeared prepared on Wednesday to overturn the sentence or the conviction of a Tennessee death row inmate who claims new DNA and other evidence cast doubt on his guilt for the 1985 murder of a female neighbor.

The court's four most liberal members, joined by moderate conservative Justice Anthony Kennedy, seemed supportive of arguments by the attorney for convicted murderer Paul House that a reasonable juror now would not find him guilty.

The hour-long arguments in the case were unusual in that the justices went into great detail about fact-specific issues and questioned the attorneys on both sides about evidence presented at trial and what was later uncovered.

House was convicted in 1986 of murder in the beating death of Carolyn Muncey, a neighbor and an acquaintance, in rural Union County in Tennessee. He was on parole after pleading guilty in Utah to sexual assault.

In later challenging his sentence and conviction, defense attorneys presented DNA test results showing the semen on the victim's clothes actually belonged to her husband. Such DNA testing had not yet been developed at the time of the trial.

They also presented testimony tending to show that the victim's blood may have been placed on House's blue jeans by state officials and that Muncey may have been killed by her husband.

Prosecutors have said the new evidence failed to prove House's innocence. A federal judge and then a U.S. appeals court, by an 8-7 vote, rejected House's appeal, but the Supreme Court then agreed to decide the case.

Justice Stephen Breyer said the jury heard the prosecution's theory that the murder had been part of a sexual attack by House and that there now was conflicting evidence.

"I don't know who did this crime," Breyer told Jennifer Smith, the Tennessee associate deputy attorney general who argued the case.

Justice David Souter said the prosecution case against House had been built on rape as the motive, and that a juror would have found the evidence of the semen stains coming from Muncey's husband to be "extremely significant."

DOJ_NMG_0009456

Kennedy said the semen evidence raised questions about the sentence at a minimum and the conviction as well. "The semen was used to connect it (the murder) to the defendant. We now know that was wrong," he said.

Justice Antonin Scalia was the court member most skeptical of the arguments by House's lawyer, Stephen Kissinger, an assistant federal defender.

Even with the new evidence, the defense must show that no reasonable juror could have found House guilty, Scalia said. He described it as "a very heavy burden" and made clear he did not believe the new blood evidence was sufficient.

Chief Justice John Roberts asked Kissinger what standard of review he thought should be used in deciding the case. Under existing precedent, the Supreme Court must determine that no juror could reasonably vote to convict, based on the old and new evidence, he said.

A decision in the case is expected by the end of June.

Justices Debate Case Of Condemned Inmate Tenn. Man Wants New Hearing, DNA Tests Examined (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — A majority of the Supreme Court expressed concern Wednesday about blood and semen evidence used to send a Tennessee man to death row 20 years ago, as the court for the first time heard a case in which a condemned inmate claims DNA evidence could help clear him.

Justices David Souter and Stephen Breyer were among those most vigorously questioning whether Paul Gregory House abducted, tried to rape and then murdered Carolyn Muncey in July 1985.

The jury that found House guilty heard that semen found on Muncey's clothing could have been from House and that blood on House's pants likely was from the victim. House is trying to get his case reopened on the grounds that Muncey's blood ended up on his clothing because evidence was mishandled and that new DNA tests show that the semen found on the victim's clothes belonged to her husband.

The question before the court does not turn on the validity of the DNA evidence. Rather, it tests the standards for when a prisoner who has exhausted all appeals can seek to get a hearing before a federal judge to challenge his case.

Chief Justice John Roberts repeatedly tried to bring the justices' discussion back to the relatively dry question of whether House, at this point, can assert that his case was constitutionally flawed.

The justices must examine whether, given the new evidence that House asserts, “it is more likely than not that no reasonable juror would have convicted” him. That tough standard derives from a 1995 Supreme Court case that attempts to balance an interest in ensuring the finality of verdicts with concerns about inmates' actual innocence.

House's case has drawn national attention because it brings to the forefront the DNA technology that has led dozens of wrongly convicted inmates to be freed.

The New York-based Innocence Project, which has been at the lead of the DNA litigation that it says has exonerated more than 160 defendants, submitted a “friend of the court” brief siding with House.

It told the Supreme Court that scientific evidence contradicting facts at a jury trial should warrant great weight when prisoners seek a hearing in federal court.

No convict in the USA has been exonerated through DNA testing after execution.

However, the results of DNA testing are expected soon in the case of Roger Coleman, a Virginia man who was executed in 1992 for raping and murdering his sister-in-law. Gov. Mark Warner recently ordered the testing because of lingering questions about whether Coleman was guilty.

Stephen Kissinger, an assistant federal community defender representing House, told the justices that House meets the court's requirements to have his case heard again. Kissinger stressed evidence indicating that blood from the victim found on House's jeans could have come from spilled autopsy samples. He also emphasized DNA testing after trial that showed semen found on Muncey was from her husband.

Jennifer Smith, associate deputy attorney general in Tennessee, says that argument fails to meet the threshold for a new hearing.

She said the state agrees that the DNA evidence showed that the semen was from Muncey's husband, but she linked it to testimony that the couple had sexual relations the morning before she disappeared.

Under sharp questioning from justices, Smith minimized the fact that prosecutors had used the attempted rape as a motive for Muncey's murder and as an aggravating factor for the death penalty.

DOJ_NMG_0009457

The court could rule in the case of House v. Bell by the end of June, when the justices traditionally recess for their annual term.

A 1986 Case Could Aid Appeals Along Death Row (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 11 - An argument before the Supreme Court in a 20-year-old murder case suggested on Wednesday that the court might be willing to open the door a bit wider to death row inmates seeking access to federal court to present plausible but belated claims of innocence.

It was a gritty argument with an unusually intense focus on the evidence that a Tennessee jury considered in convicting Paul G. House of the murder of a neighbor, Carolyn Muncey. Justices Antonin Scalia and Stephen G. Breyer were particularly steeped in the details and were deeply engaged on opposite sides of the case, debating it back and forth almost to the exclusion of the lawyers standing before them.

Mr. House has always maintained his innocence, and in 2004 he came within one vote of persuading a federal appeals court to reopen his case. The debate on the appeals court was over whether recently developed scientific evidence had cast enough doubt on the basis of his conviction to overcome the very high bar that the Supreme Court has set for federal courts to hear new claims that were not presented in the initial round of appeals.

The vote against Mr. House, in the United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit, in Cincinnati, was 8 to 7; all eight judges in the majority had been appointed by Republican presidents, and all seven dissenters had been named by Democrats. Six of the dissenters concluded that Mr. House had proved his innocence, while the seventh said that he was at least entitled to a new trial.

Addressing Mr. House's lawyer on Wednesday, Justice Scalia said he agreed that the case now looks "much closer" than it must have appeared to the jury in 1986. But that was not the issue, he continued. "Once the case has been tried, we have a much different task," Justice Scalia said, namely to determine "whether any reasonable jury could have found guilt."

Only if the answer was no could a federal court proceed to hear a petition for a writ of habeas corpus and consider whether constitutional errors that had not previously been identified had occurred at the trial. The Supreme Court's leading precedent on this question, a case from 1995 called Schlup v. Delo, refers to this hurdle as a "gateway" through which an inmate must pass. It is, Justice Scalia said, "a very heavy burden" for the defense to meet.

Mr. House's lawyer, Stephen M. Kissinger, replied, "It is a high burden, and we don't shrink from it."

The court's focus, Mr. Kissinger said, should now be on "the effect of the entirety of the evidence on a reasonable juror" rather than on dissecting each disputed piece of evidence.

Mr. Kissinger, an assistant federal defender from Knoxville, Tenn., challenged Justice Scalia's description of the gateway. "It comes down to the 'could' and 'would' distinction," he said. "We don't deny that there is evidence that 'could' support conviction, but that's not the test. What 'would' a reasonable juror conclude? Proof of innocence does not have to be absolute."

Underlying this argument was the question of whether the courts should adjust their rules to take account of the recent string of exonerations based on DNA evidence. Briefs filed by the Innocence Project, a legal clinic in New York, and by the American Bar Association point out that the Supreme Court decided Schlup v. Delo and other cases limiting inmates' appeal rights before DNA testing had revealed flaws in a disturbing proportion of criminal convictions. Those flaws call for new flexibility, the briefs argue.

In this case, House v. Bell, No. 04-8990, the new DNA evidence alone did not produce a clear exoneration. Rather, it substantially undermined the prosecution's theory of the case, which was that sex was the motivation for the crime and that Mr. House had killed the victim in the course of raping her.

Chemical analysis presented at the trial suggested that Mr. House's semen was found on Ms. Muncey's clothing, while DNA testing later showed it to be her husband's. The state maintains that this new evidence does not disprove that Mr. House was guilty of the murder.

The defense theory was that the husband, Hubert Muncey, was the killer. The new legal team that represented Mr. House in his habeas corpus petition produced witnesses who testified that they had heard Mr. Muncey make a drunken confession, but the federal district court discounted the evidence in rejecting the petition in 1997.

Mr. Kissinger said that if the case passed through the gateway, he would argue that Mr. House was deprived of the effective assistance of counsel at his trial and that the state withheld favorable evidence it was constitutionally obliged to produce.

DOJ_NMG_0009458

Representing Tennessee at Wednesday's argument, Jennifer L. Smith, an associate deputy state attorney general, said that all of Mr. House's new evidence "fails to raise sufficient doubt" about the original verdict to get past the gateway into federal court on those or any other claims.

Now it was Justice Breyer's turn. He challenged the state's lawyer on a long list of evidentiary issues, leading Justice Scalia to interject at one point, "We could call on these witnesses ourselves and hear them all over again."

Justice Breyer said, "My goodness, I don't know who committed this crime."

Only nominally addressing Ms. Smith, Justice Scalia said: "Justice Breyer has not heard these witnesses. The district court did."

Along with Justice Breyer, Justice David H. Souter expressed strong doubts about the state's case. Justice Anthony M. Kennedy said that "at a minimum," he had questions about the death sentence if not the conviction. Justices Ruth Bader Ginsburg and John Paul Stevens said little, but if they follow Justice Breyer's lead, as is likely, there would be five votes to reopen the case, even assuming that Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who was uncharacteristically quiet, is no longer on the court by the time a decision is issued.

Justice O'Connor's vote proved essential in a decision the court issued in another death penalty case on Wednesday, the first 5-to-4 decision since John G. Roberts Jr. became chief justice. In Brown v. Sanders, No. 04-980, the court reinstated the death sentence of a California inmate whose habeas corpus petition had been granted by the federal appeals court in San Francisco.

The appeals court had overturned the sentence because two of the four factors the jury cited in making the defendant, Ronald L. Sanders, eligible for the death penalty were later found by the California Supreme Court to be invalid. Writing for the majority on Wednesday, Justice Scalia said there was no constitutional error in the sentence because the jury was able to give proper consideration to the same facts and circumstances through the remaining, valid factors.

Chief Justice Roberts and Justices O'Connor, Kennedy and Clarence Thomas joined the majority opinion. Justices Stevens, Breyer, Souter and Ginsburg dissented.

U.S. State Court Overturns Death Sentence In Murder Of Governor's Secretary (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, January 12, 2006

(AP) - DOVER, Delaware-Delaware's highest court on Wednesday overturned the death sentence of a once well-connected attorney convicted of the 1996 murder of the governor's scheduling secretary.

The sentence was flawed because the jury vote recommending a death sentence for Thomas Capano was not unanimous, the Delaware Supreme Court ruled. The high court ordered a new penalty hearing, but did not overturn his conviction, prosecutor Steven Wood said.

Prosecutors say Capano shot Anne Marie Fahey, 30, scheduling secretary to then-Governor Tom Carper, and dumped her body in the Atlantic Ocean because she was breaking off an affair with him.

Capano, a former state prosecutor, is a member of a well-known family involved in land development.

His attorneys had argued that his death sentence, issued in 1999, should be overturned because his jury was not unanimous in determining that Fahey's slaying was premeditated. The state high court found that the Delaware Constitution demands unanimous jury verdicts in death-penalty sentencing, even if federal law does not.

Capano attorney Thomas Bernstein said that while he was relieved the sentence was vacated, he was disappointed that the court did not overturn the conviction.

He said Capano would now appeal the conviction in federal court.

Gun Dealer Sentenced For Fraud (PHI)

By John Shiffman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, January 12, 2006

A once-distinguished antique-firearms dealer who duped a Bucks County millionaire while helping him amass a $30 million gun collection was sentenced to 21/2 years in prison yesterday.

The case, which included the sale of a pair of revolvers carried into battle by famed Texas Ranger Samuel Walker, was widely followed in the unregulated antique-firearms industry, where the dealers' crimes became a major scandal.

U.S. District Judge Cynthia M. Rufe said that she hoped the prison sentence for the dealer, Michael Zomber of Franklin, Tenn., would deter others who might try to defraud antiques collectors.

"What is seriously missing here is respect for the law," Rufe said. "It's not about money or lack of money; it's about treating each other legally and fairly."

DOJ_NMG_0009459

Zomber was convicted of fraud at trial. His accomplice, Richard Ellis, of LeClaire, Iowa, pleaded guilty and cooperated with the government. Rufe sentenced Ellis to 10 months, half of which must be spent in prison; the other half may be spent in a halfway house, she said. Restitution will be calculated later.

"The entire industry was poised to find out what happened to Ellis and Zomber," said FBI agent Bob Wittman, who handled the case. "There's an element that's going to be happy that it's a new day, and there's an element that's going to be upset that their antics are going to be put under the microscope."

The Bucks County businessman who was duped, Joseph A. Murphy of New Hope, said in a related suit that the men defrauded him of $12 million. That suit was settled for $4.7 million worth of antique firearms.

Ellis, hired by Murphy as his expert consultant on a commission basis, led Murphy to believe that Zomber was a disinterested dealer.

He was not. Zomber wrote letters feigning interest in the pieces Murphy sought, artificially inflating the firearms' values. In turn, authorities said, Ellis paid Zomber more than $1 million in kickbacks.

The largest deal involved two firearms Walker designed with Samuel Colt in 1846 - the world's first Magnum revolvers, .44-caliber handguns that launched Colt from bankruptcy to fame, according to Philip Schreier, a curator at the National Firearms Museum in Fairfax, Va.

Murphy paid about $2.2 million for the so-called Walker Colts, about twice what authorities said they are worth.

Before Zomber was sentenced yesterday, he asked for leniency, saying that what happened has consumed him to the point that he has not slept for three years without the aid of pills. He also cited his extensive charitable work on behalf of children with cancer.

"I am extraordinarily sorry and remorseful that my actions have caused pain," Zomber said. "I am disgraced forever."

Murphy also addressed the court. His voice thundering at times, he said he was angry that Zomber had argued that charitable work and medical stresses were relevant at sentencing.

"I'm the laughingstock," Murphy said, explaining that the scandal is the talk of the antique-gun circuit. "I'm the one who had two heart attacks over this, stents put in... . As a victim, I'm pleading with you to sentence him in the most horrible way you can, because he did this without regret. I want punishment."

Afterward, Murphy's attorney, Gavin Lenz, said he was satisfied with both sentences.

Zomber plans to appeal, and Rufe said she is considering whether to allow him to remain free until that appeal is heard.

Rufe chastised both men for continuing to attend gun shows following their convictions. Her sentence forbids the dealers from possessing any firearms, including antiques, for three years after the jail terms.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Robert Goldman said that Ellis deserved a lighter sentence because he cooperated with the investigation and pleaded guilty. Still, Goldman said, he deserved to go to prison.

Ellis wept through much of his statement to the judge: "I'm very sorry for what I did. It was wrong and I regret it. In my business, my good name meant everything. I blew it."

Ellis then turned around to face his victim, who sat in the gallery.

"Joe, I'm truly sorry," Ellis said. "I really am."

Murphy nodded.

Man Indicted In VA Hospital Shooting Of Co-worker (AP)

AP, January 12, 2006

GREENVILLE, N.C. - A man accused of killing a co-worker and former lover at the Veteran's Administration hospital in Fayetteville was indicted on a murder charge Wednesday by a federal grand jury.

Arthur James Charland Jr., 42, was also charged with use and discharge of a firearm during an in relation to a crime of violence, according to a statement by U.S. Attorney Frank D. Whitney.

Charland is accused of fatally shooting Linda Faye Owens, with whom he had an 11-year affair.

He could be sentenced to life in prison. Prosecutors could choose to pursue the death penalty, but Whitney said that decision has not been made.

According to a criminal complaint, Charland concealed a shotgun inside Christmas wrapping paper and walked into the hospital pharmacy to shoot Owens on Dec. 13.

At a hearing last month, FBI Special Agent Chris Hedges testified that Charland told investigators he was being treated for bipolar disorder.

Trial Opens In Prison Slaying Of Ex-Priest (NYT)

By Pam Belluck

DOJ_NMG_0009460

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

WORCESTER, Mass., Jan. 11 - The murder of John J. Geoghan, a defrocked priest, in 2003 by an inmate in state prison was a shocking and almost surreal dénouement to one of the darkest chapters of the sexual abuse crisis in the Roman Catholic Church.

Mr. Geoghan's violent death in the most secure prison in Massachusetts was to some an appalling failure of the state to protect one of its most despised inmates. To others it was a horrible but justified retribution against Mr. Geoghan, one of the most reviled priests named in the abuse scandal, accused of molesting some 150 children in several parishes over three decades.

Now, the man who admits he killed Mr. Geoghan, Joseph L. Druce, is having his day in court, and for anyone watching the trial, it is hard to figure out where to put one's sympathies - with the murder victim or the man who killed him.

Mr. Druce, 40, is pleading not guilty by reason of mental illness. His lawyer, John LaChance, does not dispute the details of the case. Prosecutors say Mr. Druce followed Mr. Geoghan into his cell at the Souza-Baranowski Correctional Center on Aug. 23, 2003, and jammed the cell door shut with a nail clipper and a ripped-up copy of "The Cross and the Switchblade," a book about a minister who transformed the lives of teenage gang members by introducing them to Christianity.

Mr. Druce then tied Mr. Geoghan's hands with a T-shirt, wrapped stretched-out socks around Mr. Geoghan's neck, tightened them with a shoe, and then jumped up and down on his body.

According to testimony by corrections officers on Wednesday, Mr. Druce later told them he "did it for the children," to stop Mr. Geoghan, 68, from molesting more boys when he got out of prison.

Mr. Geoghan was serving 6 years of a 9-to-10-year sentence for groping a boy in a swimming pool, and Mr. Druce told law enforcement authorities that he had heard Mr. Geoghan talking about plans to assault more children upon his release. Mr. Druce also signed a card waiving his Miranda rights "the Reverend Joseph Druce."

Mr. LaChance suggested Wednesday that Mr. Druce's behavior was evidence of insanity, saying "he began fantasizing about being an individual who would save the kids and save the world."

The prosecutor, Lawrence Murphy, suggested the opposite, that the fact that "Mr. Druce was planning to kill John Geoghan" showed that he was not insane.

Mr. Druce is serving a life sentence without parole for beating and strangling a driver who he said made a sexual advance toward him when he was hitchhiking in 1988. He unsuccessfully tried an insanity defense in that case in 1989, and his lawyer in that case emphasized Mr. Druce's highly troubled background, including serious behavior problems, drug use, a mother who did not want him and a father who was abusive to his mother.

Mr. LaChance referred to that background Wednesday, saying that Mr. Druce was "like a little puppy you beat and beat," adding, "Eventually the puppy strikes back when it is old enough and big enough."

At the time of Mr. Geoghan's slaying, Mr. Druce's father, Dana Smiledge, said Mr. Druce also had white supremacist leanings - a hatred of gay people, Jews and blacks.

Mr. Geoghan's murder not only stunned victims of abuse by priests, but also ignited a state investigation into the prison system. Several correction officials were removed, including the correction commissioner.

The investigation found that only one guard was monitoring the 26-inmate unit at the time Mr. Druce slipped into Mr. Geoghan's cell and that the cell doors had been left open while the inmates were taking their lunch trays to a collection point.

Mr. Geoghan was jailed in early 2002 and moved from a medium-security prison in Concord to the maximum-security Souza-Baranowski prison in Shirley in early 2003 after complaining that he felt harassed by guards and afraid for his safety.

The state investigation said that Mr. Geoghan was indeed mistreated by guards in Concord and that he was inappropriately transferred to Shirley, where he was put in a wing for inmates who needed to be separated from the general prison population. But some of them were violent offenders, and many were younger than the frail Mr. Geoghan.

Mr. Druce was transferred there not long afterward because he, too, had felt unsafe in his previous prison, where he had become a jailhouse informant, his lawyer said. Mr. Druce had changed his name, from Darrin Smiledge, because he was afraid of his prison enemies.

Mr. LaChance said that Mr. Druce had been delusional in the past, pretending he was a rich person who owned yachts and million-dollar houses, and subscribing to Robb Report, the luxury magazine, at his previous prison. He said Mr. Druce fantasized that if he killed Mr. Geoghan "he would be someone like a rich person with a yacht."

Mr. Druce, who has previously held up photographs and demonstrated other showy behavior in court, was medicated Wednesday with Ritalin and possibly other drugs, Mr. LaChance said. He made a thumbs up sign to several reporters, but otherwise seemed less attention-seeking. If his defense is successful, Mr. Druce is likely to be moved to a psychiatric institution.

DOJ_NMG_0009461

CIVIL LAW:

State Guardsmen Sue For Post-9/11 Expenses (AP)

By JAY LINDSAY, ASSOCIATED PRESS WRITER

AP, January 12, 2006

BOSTON -- A group of National Guard soldiers who were ordered to protect possible targets after the Sept. 11 attacks sued the federal government Wednesday, seeking tens of millions of dollars in expenses they say were never reimbursed.

The soldiers, from Massachusetts and New Hampshire, say they traveled hundreds of miles to security postings and used their own money to pay for food and lodging with the expectation that they would be reimbursed.

But the soldiers say in their complaint that their requests for compensation were repeatedly denied and they eventually were told, "If you don't like the arrangement, we'll make sure you get taken off this mission."

In the lawsuit, the plaintiffs argue that federal law provides military personnel with a travel and transportation allowance while away from home on active duty.

The lawsuit was filed in U.S. District Court by four soldiers but seeks to include hundreds of other guardsmen as a class action. It names the U.S. Department of Defense and the Massachusetts National Guard and seeks $73 million in unpaid expenses.

A spokeswoman for the Defense Department referred calls to the Justice Department, where a spokesman declined to comment until after the agency reviews the lawsuit.

The Massachusetts National Guard was investigating the allegations and had no immediate comment, said a spokesman, Maj. Winfield Danielson.

The plaintiffs are Steven Littlefield of Plymouth, Wayne Gutierrez of New Bedford, Louis Tortorella of Brookline, N.H.; and Joseph Murphy of Derry, N.H. All but Tortorella are still in the National Guard. The areas they patrolled included Boston's primary water supply.

MedcoHealth Solutions: Department Of Justice Won't Intervene In Whistleblower Lawsuit (AP)

AP, January 12, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) -- Pharmacy benefits manager Medco Health Solutions Inc. said the Justice Department will not intervene in a whistleblower lawsuit filed against the company in a Pennsylvania court last month.

New Jersey-based Medco said in a filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission that the U.S. Department of Justice notified the company on Tuesday of its decision not to intervene.

Medco said it first learned of "qui tam" lawsuit in mid-December, when the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania lifted the seal on the case.

In an earlier filing, the company said the complaint makes allegations concerning turnaround time and performance-guarantee reporting -- the same charges drawn in a 2003 lawsuit. The complaint "does not allege any health, safety or clinical violations," Medco said.

"Qui tam" is a statute under the False Claims Act that lets an individual alleging fraud on the federal government to sue on behalf of the state. Its name is an abbreviation of a Latin phrase meaning "he who sues for the king as well as for himself."

Shares of MedcoHealth Solutions fell 22 cents to $54.66 in afternoon trading on the New York Stock Exchange.

Former Genentech Worker Sues Co. Over Marketing Practices (DOWJONES)

Dow Jones, January 12, 2006

A former Genentech Inc. (DNA) (DNA) employee has accused the biotechnology company and marketing partner Biogen Idec Inc. (BIIB) (BIIB) of illegally promoting cancer drug Rituxan as a treatment for arthritis, a use not yet approved by regulators.

Paul McDermott, who worked for Genentech (DNA) in Falmouth, Maine, until last year, filed a lawsuit in July 2005 in U.S. District Court in Maine alleging the companies' marketing practices surrounding Rituxan defrauded government health- care programs.

The suit also says Genentech (DNA) fired McDermott in retaliation for bringing the matter to the attention of Genentech (DNA) executives. The suit seeks unspecified damages on behalf of the government, and an order that Genentech (DNA) rehire McDermott and pay him back wages and other damages.

McDermott's lawsuit hasn't surface until now because it was filed under seal on behalf of the federal government. In December, however, the Justice Department declined to intervene in the case and requested that the lawsuit be unsealed.

DOJ_NMG_0009462

Genentech (DNA), of South San Francisco, Calif., was served with a copy of the suit earlier this month, a Genentech (DNA) executive disclosed Tuesday after the company reported fourth-quarter earnings.

Genentech (DNA) spokeswoman Caroline Pecquet said the company hasn't fully evaluated the lawsuit. She added that the company was committed to ethical and legal promotional practices.

Biogen (BIIB) officials couldn't immediately be reached.

McDermott's lawsuit is the latest legal challenge facing Genentech (DNA) over Rituxan's marketing. In October 2004, Genentech (DNA) received a subpoena from the U.S. Attorney's Office in Philadelphia seeking documents related to the promotion of Rituxan. Genentech (DNA) is cooperating with that investigation, which it said was both civil and criminal in nature.

The promotion of off-label uses of pharmaceuticals has gotten other drug companies in trouble. In 2004, Warner-Lambert pleaded guilty to federal charges that it promoted epilepsy drug Neurontin for off-label uses beginning in the 1990s. Pfizer Inc. (PFE) (PFE), which acquired Warner-Lambert in 2000, agreed to pay $ 430 million to resolve criminal charges and civil liabilities in the case.

The U.S. Food and Drug Administration approved Rituxan in 1997 as a treatment for a type of non-Hodgkin's lymphoma. U.S. sales of the drug grew to $1.8 billion last year. Studies have shown Rituxan also potential to treat rheumatoid arthritis. Biogen (BIIB) and Genentech (DNA) have applied for FDA approval to market Rituxan as such a treatment, and a decision is expected by late February.

It's generally legal for doctors to prescribe FDA-approved drugs in ways that haven't yet been approved by the FDA, and so-called "off-label" prescriptions are common. But drug companies are generally barred from actively promoting off- label uses of their drugs. That's where McDermott says his former employer and Biogen (BIIB) ran afoul of the law.

McDermott worked as a "professional educational liaison" for Genentech (DNA), according to the lawsuit, a job that involved recruiting doctors to promote the use of Rituxan as a treatment for rheumatoid arthritis.

He alleges Genentech (DNA) sent sales representatives to the offices of rheumatologists - doctors specializing in rheumatoid arthritis treatment - even though Genentech (DNA) had no products approved by the FDA for such treatments. Also, McDermott says Genentech (DNA) and Biogen (BIIB) used "sham" consulting agreements to pay rheumatologists whom the companies identified as being "key opinion leaders," who were expected to influence other doctors to begin prescribing Rituxan for arthritis.

McDermott says he was assigned to recruit certain doctors to work with Genentech (DNA) staffers to publish articles and case studies promoting Rituxan as an arthritis treatment.

He said Biogen (BIIB), the Cambridge, Mass., company that discovered Rituxan, had similar marketing practices for the drug.

McDermott said he was fired in April 2005 after telling his superiors about the alleged off-label promotion of Rituxan.

McDermott filed his lawsuit under a federal "whistleblower law" that would entitle him to a portion of the proceeds of any settlement or award of damages arising from the case. It wasn't immediately clear why the Justice Department declined to intervene, but it does have the right to take up the case at a later date.

Officials with the U.S. Attorney's office in Portland, Maine, which filed the document declining to intervene in the case, couldn't immediately be reached.

Neither McDermott nor his attorney could be reached.

-By Peter Loftus, Dow Jones Newswires; 215-656-8289; peter.loftus@dowjones.com

Mislabeled Bread A Danger, Allergists Say (MINNST)

By Patricia Lopez, Star Tribune

Minneapolis Star Tribune, January 12, 2006

Allergists and food allergy activists alike were shaken Wednesday upon learning that the French Meadow Bakery labeled its spelt bread "wheat-free" when the bread, in fact, contains wheat.

For the hundreds of thousands of Americans who are wheat-intolerant or who have a genuine wheat allergy, mislabeled food is no small matter, said Anne Munoz-Furlong, founder of the national Food Allergy and Anaphylaxis Network, based in Fairview, Va.

"Their health and safety depend on them being able to trust what's on a label," she said. "We can't stop eating food. We can only stop eating the wrong food, and for that we need to know what's in it."

Wheat allergy reactions, she said, can range from hives and digestive problems to -- at the most extreme end -- death from the inability to breathe.

DOJ_NMG_0009463

French Meadow, revered by health enthusiasts for its varieties of organic bread, had 30,000 loaves made from spelt and Kamut grain seized Tuesday afternoon by U.S. marshals and agents from the U.S. Food and Drug Administration. The agency had spent nearly a year attempting to get the bakery to relabel its bread, noting that both spelt and Kamut are varieties of wheat.

U.S. Attorney Tom Heffelfinger, whose office is handling the case, said the agents locked most of the loaves in freezers, where they will remain until the case is decided or a court order issued. "The FDA takes the accuracy of food labeling very seriously," Heffelfinger said.

French Meadow has 20 days to respond to the FDA's complaint, he said. He did not know whether any consumer complaints were involved.

The company could face administrative penalties and sanctions for the government's costs in prosecuting the case, he said, "but that hasn't been determined yet. This is primarily about resolving the labeling issue."

Steve Shapiro, a partner with Lynn Gordon in the Minneapolis bakery that distributes its products nationwide, did not return calls Wednesday. But he said Tuesday that although he and Gordon disagree with the classification of spelt and Kamut as part of the wheat family, they are putting the final touches on new labels and hope to get their bread back "as soon as we can."

By Wednesday afternoon, the bakery website had pulled the term "wheat-free" from the spelt and kamut varieties of bread, although it retained its claim that they are alternatives for the wheat-intolerant.

At the Mississippi Market Co-op in St. Paul, loaves of the bakery's breads still lined the shelves Wednesday, including several loaves of the "Health Seed" spelt bread that bore a colorful label touting it as wheat-free.

Steve Conroy, a manager at the co-op, said that while he will continue to stock French Meadow breads, he approves of the FDA action. "I've been in the health food business for 10 years," Conroy said. "Spelt is a type of wheat, no question. To say that bread is wheat-free just isn't true."

Intimidatingly heavy for its small size, Health Seed spelt bread is a compact loaf, with slices that are barely palm-sized. Its price is daunting, too: $4.99 for the 9-inch loaf.

Reading labels

Dr. James Lakin, a Burnsville allergist with Minnesota Allergy and Asthma Consultants, said he was "deeply concerned" by the mislabeling.

"We train our patients to read labels carefully," he said. "That wouldn't have helped here. What are they supposed to do when the label says wheat-free?"

Lakin said spelt is a primitive forerunner to modern wheat, first cultivated about 7,000 years ago. But "it is a type of wheat," he said. "It shares many of the same properties as wheat and people who are allergic to wheat can have reactions to spelt."

Kamut, he said, is of even greater concern because it is much more closely related to modern wheat. "Folks who are sensitive to wheat will definitely react to Kamut," he said.

And because both varieties are somewhat obscure, he said, consumers are almost entirely dependent on labels.

About 11 million Americans suffer from some type of food allergy and wheat is among the "big eight" categories, Munoz-Furlong said.

Lakin put wheat allergy sufferers at about 1 percent, with most of those being wheat-intolerant. Those with true wheat allergies, who risk severe reactions or death, "are probably 1 in 500,000," he said.

Packed on polar trips

Behind the counter at the French Meadow Bakery & Cafe on Wednesday, loaves of organic cranberry corn bread, organic multigrain, country rye and organic ciabatta were for sale, but no spelt.

Sarah Narnang, the cafe's day manager, said the breads in dispute are delivered only to outside customers. Cafe customers, however, can request that it be used as a wheat-free substitute on sandwiches, she added.

Arriving shortly before noon was Will Steger, the polar explorer, who said that he's a longtime fan of the breads and that he stops by the cafe once or twice a week when he's in town from his home near Ely, Minn.

On a 1989 expedition to Antarctica, Steger said, he packed along the bakery's spelt bread. Toasted on a tent stove and slathered with peanut butter and butter, it often would serve as breakfast, he said.

"Nothing but good results," Steger said.

For those with allergies, however, Munoz-Furlong said, the results are anything but good.

"It could be anything from hives to a life-threatening response, she said, "and the worst part is, no one knows at the beginning of the reaction how severe it will be. We know this is something that affects children and adults.

"It is serious."

Patricia Lopez · 651-222-1288 Staff Writer Anthony Lonetree contributed to this report

High Court Ruling Slowly Bears Fruit For Wineries (LAW/AP)

By Michelle Locke, The Associated Press

AP, January 12, 2006

Napa vintner Dennis Cakebread is finally sending out cases of wine to thirsty New York state customers, seven long months after a Supreme Court ruling paved the way for the shipments.

"What we've learned about this is patience and persistence," said Cakebread. "These lawsuits aren't like an episode of 'L.A. Law' -- after one hour you win your case and you're off and running."

A lot has happened since the U.S. Supreme Court opened the door to shipping wine across state lines. But change hasn't been swift in an industry that sometimes seems as rich in red tape as it is red grapes.

"We're in a highly regulated industry. This isn't like selling sweaters," said Jeremy Benson, executive director of Free The Grapes, a Napa, Calif.-based group that has been working to loosen shipping restrictions. "The regulations are there and we have to work through them."

The Supreme Court struck down laws last spring in New York and Michigan that allowed wineries to ship directly to in-state consumers but forbade out-of-state businesses from doing the same thing.

The court said either all wineries should be allowed to ship directly to consumers or none, a blow to the old distribution system that required a wholesaler to sell to restaurants and retailers. States have been acting to adjust their shipping laws ever since.

The ruling was particularly important to smaller wineries that don't have the volume for wide distribution in liquor stores and supermarkets and rely on direct sales to consumers, many of whom have developed a taste for their products on winery visits.

"It makes a huge difference," says Cakebread, part-owner and senior vice president of sales and marketing at Cakebread Cellars, which began with a 156-case vintage in 1973 and now makes about 95,000 cases a year.

For a small winery like Elan, which makes about 1,000 cases a year, being able to ship is crucial, said owner Linda Elliott-Smith, who has had 15 cases of cabernet sauvignon paid for and ready to go to New York for a while.

They were delayed from shipping even further in January, when floods knocked power out. Customers who are big fans of Elan's elegant reds have been willing to wait. "It's nice that we have customers who are true followers," she said.

Since the Supreme Court ruling, New York, Michigan and Ohio have loosened shipping restrictions. Texas also made shipping easier just prior to the high court ruling.

In December, shipping to New York became practical when the New York State Liquor Authority approved using UPS for wine shipments. FedEx also is working to get approval.

The New York law only allows shipments from states that extend similar privileges to New York vintners, which some experts say may not be constitutional. Michigan's new law says wineries can't ship more than 1,500 cases per year in direct-to-consumer shipments and also prohibits out-of-state wineries from selling direct to restaurants and retailers.

Still, the overall shipping picture is brighter for wineries, who have seen their potential shipping audience increase considerably.

At Joseph Phelps Vineyards, president and CEO Tom Shelton celebrated the California-New York connection when he hosted a dinner last year for New York Gov. George Pataki, who was visiting wine country.

"We got the flow going both ways," he said. In a bit of bottle diplomacy, they served wines from New York state.

Copy Shop Scores With Print Jobs (WP)

By Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

The guy holding up the line at your neighborhood FedEx Kinko's copy shop may be putting your tax dollars to work.

The Government Printing Office, which already contracts out the bulk of the government's printing to the private sector, is taking things a step further by hiring Kinko's to handle small printing jobs for federal agencies.

The contract, worth about $100 million annually and renewable for up to four years, will allow federal employees to get discounted copying, binding and printing services (including posters, signs, business cards and brochures) at 1,300 locations across the country. The GPO will pick up the tab through a new GPOExpress Card that federal employees will use.

"We pay for it," said Bruce R. James, who holds the title of public printer of the United States. "One of the real tricks here was trying to figure out a way to allow government agencies to more efficiently buy their printing and still comply with the law. The law says that all government printing has to come through GPO; it doesn't necessarily say we have to handle every single job."

The arrangement will enable an agency manager here, for instance, to send handouts electronically to a copy shop in Sacramento, where an official can pick them up before a meeting in the agency's regional office. Kinko's also will provide electronic copies of documents for possible inclusion in libraries that archive federal government documents.

DOJ_NMG_0009465

Most of the printing going to the company had been done by other GPO contractors or by agency print shops, James said. And, yes, an undetermined number of federal jobs will be lost, but he said the losses will be through attrition.

The effort began in December as a pilot program involving five agencies and will expand government-wide in February.

Reformzilla (WSJ)

By James Bopp, Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2006

Like a virus, the campaign finance "reform" passed by Congress in McCain-Feingold and approved by the Supreme Court in McConnell v. FEC is mutating and spreading in the states. The law raised contribution limits to federal candidates but imposed substantial restrictions on political parties and citizens' groups. State politicians are taking McCain-Feingold and McConnell as a license to enact much broader restrictions on core political speech. This term the court has a chance to decide whether these restrictions are justified, and what remains of the First Amendment in regard to democratic elections.

This sorry tale began with post-Watergate amendments to the Federal Election Campaign Act. Congress passed limits on large contributions and mandatory expenditure limits on all political actors, prohibiting citizens' groups, including corporations and labor unions, from speaking out about public officials and candidates, if what they said would "influence a federal election."

In 1976, in Buckley v. Valeo, the Supreme Court recognized that speech about public issues is at the core of the amendment's protections; it struck down mandatory expenditure limits on candidates and strictly limited the scope of regulation of the political speech of citizens' groups. So long as groups eschewed express advocacy of the election or defeat of a candidate, they were free to speak out about issues, the actions of public officials and the positions of candidates. Alas, Buckley did uphold limits on contributions to candidates -- but only on "large" contributions that pose a threat of corruption.

The contribution-limit virus has spread to the states and mutated. While Buckley approved a large federal contribution limit of $1,000 per election, some states thought much lower limits were constitutional. And when the 2000 Supreme Court approved Missouri's $1,075-per-election limit for statewide officers in Nixon v. Shrink Missouri PAC, using very permissive language, the states and federal courts deemed that all constitutional restraints were off. Furthermore, since very low contribution limits help incumbents against challengers, the interests of campaign finance "reformers" and incumbent politicians coincided. So some states have enacted draconian contribution limits: $500 per year in Alaska and Massachusetts; $700 to $270 per year in Arizona, $500 per election in Florida; $500 to $250 per election in Maine; and $400 to $100 for the general election in Montana. Vermont's is the lowest at $400 to $200 per election cycle.

In McConnell in 2003, the Supreme Court upheld the key provisions of McCain-Feingold -- in particular, the "electioneering communication" provision that prohibits the running of broadcast ads, within 30 days of a primary and 60 days of a general election, that mention the name of a federal candidate in his district or state. The provision was enacted because of complaints by members of Congress that groups run negative attack ads that candidates themselves disapproved of -- ads that "do little to further beneficial debate and healthy political dialogue" (to quote Sen. John McCain). In effect, the court in McConnell abandoned free speech in favor of the interests of incumbent politicians.

But if it's a good idea to ban broadcast ads before elections, then state legislators seem to think it is an even better idea to expand the ban's reach to all communications for longer periods of time. Laws now in Alaska, Arizona, California, Colorado, Connecticut, Florida, Hawaii, Illinois, North Carolina, South Carolina, Vermont and West Virginia restrict any communication that refers to a candidate. Arizona's is the longest period: 16 weeks before a general election. More remarkable is a Second Circuit decision, Randall v. Sorrell, that read McConnell and Shrink to mean that even Vermont's mandatory expenditure limits on candidates could now be upheld.

Incumbents are displeased when the press criticizes them, too, and have used the law to stifle the print media. Alabama prohibited editorials endorsing candidates on election day and Florida required newspapers to run a response when the paper attacked a public official. The Supreme Court, mercifully, struck down these efforts. Now, however, broad campaign finance laws are being used to the same effect. In Washington, a judge used the state campaign finance law against two radio talk-show hosts whose speech -- championing an anti-gas tax initiative -- was viewed as an "in-kind" contribution to the political committee supporting the initiative. The initiative committee was required to report the talk show hosts' speech as a "contribution."

Two cases before the Supreme Court will test whether the court will stop the spread of the campaign finance "reform" virus before it becomes a pandemic. Next Tuesday, in Wisconsin Right to Life (WRTL) v. FEC, I will argue on behalf of the WRTL that the Constitution requires recognition of a grassroots lobbying exception to the federal prohibition on electioneering communications. Remarkably, the FEC argues that federal courts are prohibited after McConnell from even considering whether a law can be applied unconstitutionally to non-election-related ads -- and that only the FEC has the authority to grant exemptions.

DOJ_NMG_0009466

WRTL's ads look nothing like the "sham issue ads" that McConnell said were "the functional equivalent of express advocacy" and, therefore, could be banned. The ads were broadcast in the summer of 2004 and exhorted Wisconsin citizens to ask their senators to oppose the ongoing filibustering of President Bush's judicial appointees. The ads didn't identify any election, candidacy, party affiliation or position of the two incumbent senators on the issue, and said nothing that could be construed to support or oppose either senator. But because Sen. Russ Feingold (of McCain-Feingold) was a candidate for re-election, the ads were banned starting Aug. 15 through the general election. WRTL couldn't mention his name.

Of course, the First Amendment protects the right of the people "to petition" governmental officials, just as it protects our right to praise or criticize them. While McConnell has seriously limited the right during the blackout periods, it would be something else again to say that people can't lobby their representatives about upcoming votes in Congress. Yet the "reform" community, in league with incumbent politicians, is supporting the gag effort here, too.

The second case, Randall v. Sorrell, is about Vermont's decision to impose mandatory expenditure limits on candidates, to cut candidate contribution limits to the lowest in the U.S., and to apply a broad "related expenditure" provision to the activities of those who help candidates. Vermont caps expenditure limits for governor to $300,000 per election cycle; recent statewide candidates in Vermont have spent up to 10 times that amount. Further, the contribution limit of $400 per cycle is less than 20% that approved by the court in Buckley and Shrink and captures more political activity because of the broad "related expenditure" provision.

All of these state provisions share an unappealing element: They benefit incumbents. The guise of "reform" offers incumbents semi-respectable cover for their assault on free elections. Unless stopped, this virus will kill the First Amendment and democratic self-government.

Mr. Bopp, general counsel for the James Madison Center for Free Speech, is counsel in the Wisconsin and Vermont Supreme Court cases.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Justice Department Settles AMC Case (AP)

By David Twiddy

AP, January 12, 2006

KANSAS CITY, Mo. -- AMC Entertainment Inc., the nation's second-largest movie theater chain, was ordered to upgrade seating for patrons in wheelchairs at 1,200 of its stadium-style movie auditoriums and pay $300,000 in penalties and civil damages to settle a U.S. lawsuit.

Justice Department officials said Wednesday the order settles its 1999 lawsuit against the company claiming AMC violated the Americans with Disabilities Act because it doesn't provide comparable seating for people in wheelchairs.

The Kansas City-based company also must ensure that all theaters built over the next five years comply with requirements set out Tuesday by U.S. District Judge Florence-Marie Cooper in Los Angeles.

The stadium-style seating now dominating movie theaters gives everyone unobstructed views of the screen. But critics say most wheelchair spaces are at the base of the stadium tiers, forcing those patrons to crane their necks to see the movie.

As part of the order, privately held AMC, which operates more than 3,300 screens, must build ramps in more than 360 theaters, providing wheelchair spaces on higher seating tiers. The company also must pay $200,000 to theatergoers who originally complained to the Justice Department about the seating arrangements and $100,000 in fines.

"Providing the same moviegoing experience for individuals in wheelchairs that other patrons enjoy delivers on the promise of the ADA," Assistant Attorney General Wan J. Kim said in a release. "These improvements will make the goals of the ADA a reality for thousands of Americans who want to enjoy this popular form of entertainment."

A spokeswoman for AMC said the company couldn't comment on the case because it was still active litigation.

As part of her decision Tuesday, Cooper dismissed arguments from AMC that the proposed solution was more extensive than what the government required from AMC's competitors.

The Justice Department last summer settled similar lawsuits against industry leader Regal Entertainment Group, with that company agreeing to upgrade 1,000 of its 6,000 auditoriums, expected to cost $15 million over the next five years. Cinemark USA and National Amusements Inc. also resolved lawsuits against them recently, also agreeing to renovate stadium-style auditoriums.

The National Association of Theater Owners has criticized the Justice Department, saying it never gave theater companies guidelines for building stadium-style auditoriums other than to say wheelchair-bound patrons should have unobstructed views.

DOJ_NMG_0009467

Hispanic Workers Get 2nd Chance To Challenge English-only Policy (AP)

AP, January 12, 2006

DENVER — A federal appeals court ruling Wednesday resurrects claims Hispanic workers made in a lawsuit challenging an English-only policy for city workers in Altus, Okla.

Twelve bilingual Hispanic workers filed complaints with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission after the city adopted the policy in 2002. They argued that the city failed to show there was a need to prevent them from speaking Spanish. They said the policy singled out a nationality.

"I speak more English than I do Spanish, but the idea that I couldn't use it when I wanted to bothered me," said Danny Alcorta, 39, who worked for the city as an electric lineman. "It just wasn't right."

Although he no longer works for the city, Alcorta said he's glad the case remains alive to challenge the policy that he says is discriminatory.

"There's still a lot of my friends that I've worked with for a number of years that have to put up with it.

City officials had argued the policy was necessary because some workers and supervisors couldn't understand what was being said on city radios, some workers felt uncomfortable because they could not understand Spanish, and there were safety concerns about workers understanding each other around heavy equipment.

The Justice Department declined to take action, prompting employees to file a lawsuit in federal court in Oklahoma City. U.S. District Judge David Russell dismissed the complaint, saying the city had the authority to adopt the policy in managing its employees.

On Wednesday a three-judge panel of the 10th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals remanded the case back to district court with respect to the plaintiffs' claims of disparate treatment, discrimination and violation of equal protection laws.

In a 2-1 ruling, the panel upheld Russell's dismissal of other claims, including a claim that the policy violated the Hispanic workers' First Amendment rights to free speech. The workers' attorney had argued that speaking Spanish at work was an expression of ethnic pride.

In a dissenting opinion, Judge Stephanie K. Seymour wrote that she would have also remanded the First Amendment claim to district court.

"The city's ban on Spanish from the work place creates a public space where Spanish speakers arguably do not feel welcome," she wrote. "In such a context, it is not hard to imagine the power of a simple `buenos dias' to convey resistance to that effort and hope for the future."

A Fault Line For 'Intelligent Design' (LAT)

By Louis Sahagun And Eric Bailey

The Los Angeles Times, January 12, 2006

LEBEC, Calif. — Tucked in the raw folds of the Tehachapi Mountains, 63 miles north of Los Angeles and a time warp away in ambience, this town is not used to being the center of attention.

But this far-flung place, one of half a dozen close-knit communities in these mountains, has become the latest focal point in the national debate over teaching "intelligent design" in public schools.

Usually, big news in the region is heavy snow shutting down Interstate 5. There are 15 houses of worship, all Christian, and many folks wear their religion on their bumper stickers. But plenty of big-city newcomers, who commute to jobs in Bakersfield and Los Angeles, prefer a solid gap between religion and the classroom.

The San Andreas fault literally cuts through town, and right here "red state is slamming up against blue state like tectonic plates," said Patric Hedlund, managing editor of the Mountain Enterprise, a local weekly.

"The people here are grappling with fundamental issues of free speech and separation of church and state," she said. "It's one of those divine moments where everybody is right, and we have to find out what the rules are."

Outsiders know this region as the Grapevine. Lebec, the place with the post office, was named after a 19th century pioneer killed by a grizzly bear. The local chamber of commerce refers to Lebec, Gorman, Frazier Park and other north Tehachapi hamlets as the "Mountain Communities." Locals call it "the hill."

As they ruminate and wrangle among themselves, residents feel swamped.

The TV news crews and their satellite trucks began prowling the rugged hills not long after word spread of a lawsuit filed Tuesday by 11 parents against El Tejon Unified School District, the first legal challenge to the teaching of intelligent design in California.

At the district office, secretaries say at least three dozen interview requests have poured in for Supt. John Wight, who was at a conference and unavailable for comment.

DOJ_NMG_0009468

The hullabaloo erupted after disgruntled parents joined with Americans United for Separation of Church and State to challenge a course at Frazier Mountain High School that they consider a minimally disguised endorsement of intelligent design.

School trustees approved the new course, "Philosophy of Design," at a special meeting on New Year's Day. Attorneys for the district suggested the course could survive a legal challenge if it was called "philosophy," the lawsuit said, and the board approved it on a 3-2 vote.

Hedlund's newspaper opened up five full pages to letters on both sides of the issue.

In one letter, Nicole Francus of Frazier Park called the course "an academic and legal disaster" that threatens to "take us all down a slippery slope."

"I'm not a biologist," countered Bob Anderson, another letter writer, "but the last time I looked, evolution was and is still an unproven scientific theory."

Intelligent design holds that some biological systems are so complex they could not have evolved through random mutations, as Darwin theorized, but must have sprung from the work of a larger master plan.

The course, which began Jan. 3, is scheduled to run for one month. The teacher is Sharon Lemburg, a special education instructor and the wife of a minister for the local Assembly of God Church, which supports fundamentalist Christian tenets about creationism.

An initial course description, which was distributed to students and their families last month, said "the class will take a close look at evolution as a theory and will discuss the scientific, biological and biblical aspects that suggest why Darwin's philosophy is not rock solid."

"Did God guide me to do this?" Lemburg asked, during an interview on the porch of her log house. "I would hope so."

Most of the reaction she's received has come from supporters or the media, with their e-mails and phone calls falling into three categories: "We support you, we're praying for you and … can we have you on our show?"

"It's scary," Lemburg said. "I just want to teach. I'm not out for big publicity."

Supporters of intelligent design lost a court challenge in Dover, Pa., last month that both sides considered a test case. Now the spotlight has shifted to the Tehachapis.

It's a region that is at once isolated and at the crossroads of the world, perched off bustling I-5 between Los Angeles and the San Joaquin Valley. Towns such as Lebec and Gorman — awash with fast-food joints, gas stations and tow truck operators — serve as pit stops. But Frazier Park and Pinion Pines and Lake of the Woods rarely get a visit.

In addition to a bumper crop of churches, the region has a high number of home-schooled children, according to Hedlund.

About 12,000 people live in the area, and Frazier Mountain High School's cluster of squat, concrete-gray buildings are home to fewer than 500 students.

Jeremy Hurst, a 15-year-old sophomore, is caught in the crossfire in town and at home.

His father, Kenneth Hurst, is a scientist at the Jet Propulsion Laboratory in La Cañada Flintridge and one of the parents behind the lawsuit. His mother is a practicing Christian and is not involved in the lawsuit.

"My mom takes me to Baptist Church every Sunday; my dad gives me all the science books he can," said the slender youth. "Personally, I don't know what to think."

He said his father, who stated in the lawsuit that the class is an inappropriate attempt to evangelize students, seems "really uptight about this whole thing." The son suggested a different tack: "I think kids should choose whether to take the class or not."

Whether all the attention is a good thing is — like intelligent design — a matter of debate.

"Attention is good," declared Pastor Scott Irwin of the 50-member Lebec Community Church. Inside his white, wood-frame church in the shadow of enormous oaks, Irwin said he hoped the fight would motivate people to question evolution. "I think Lebec is taking a big step for what is true."

Bonnie Kane, director of the Ridge Route Communities Museum, agreed.

"They teach Buddha, Muhammad and everybody else," she said. "I believe they should teach Christianity too."

But head up the two-lane road a bit, and Abbe Gore stands on the opposite side of the rift.

Gore, who works at the community's Internet service provider, believes the intentions might have been good, but the outcome has been a disaster.

"What surprises me is that the local school board decided to go ahead with this class knowing full well it would be controversial," Gore said. "It's an unfortunate way to put Frazier Park on the map."

Well, perhaps for some.

Steven Stark, owner of the Dream Castle restaurant in Frazier Park, was shaking his head over the hubbub. Reporters had been popping in and out all day.

"It's usually a quiet little town," Stark said. But he predicted that the invasion from the outside world would be "good for the area — and it's good for my business."

DOJ_NMG_0009469

ANTITRUST:

Appliance Firms' Stock Recovers (AP)

AP, January 12, 2006

DES MOINES (AP) - Shares of Maytag Corp. and Whirlpool Corp. stock recovered slightly Wednesday after taking a hit the day before amid speculation that federal regulators may challenge the firms' merger.

Whirlpool closed Tuesday at $83.10 after dropping $1.89, or 2.2 percent, for the day while Maytag fell 4.7 percent, or 88 cents, to close at $17.89.

Wednesday, Whirlpool shares closed at $83.05 and Maytag finished at $17.98.

Whirlpool, based in Benton Harbor, Mich., agreed in August to buy Maytag for $1.7 billion in cash and stock. Both companies have said they expect the deal to close as early as the first quarter of this year.

Shareholders of Newton, Iowa-based Maytag voted Dec. 22 to approve the merger, pending regulatory approval. The U.S. Justice Department is investigating whether the merger of Whirlpool, the leading appliance seller, and Maytag, the third largest, violates antitrust laws.

Industry analyst David MacGregor, of Ohio-based Longbow Research, said the stock fluctuation was based on nothing more than market scuttlebutt.

He said the market reacted to the buzz that regulators were concerned that the merger would place too much of the middle-priced laundry machines in one company's control. Mid-priced washing machines, for example, sell for $350 to $600, MacGregor said.

"When we start talking about potential concentration in the middle-price points in the laundry category, that is very micro, and it is very unlikely that the transaction is going to be disallowed as a result," MacGregor said.

Other industry observers were more skeptical.

Stephen Calkins, a law professor at Wayne State University in Detroit and a former Federal Trade Commission attorney, has said that regulators probably would have "grave concerns" about concentrating so much of the laundry market in one company.

Industry analyst Laura Champine, of Morgan Keegan & Co. in Memphis, Tenn., gives the deal a 50-50 chance of gaining regulatory approval.

Prudential Equity Group's Nicholas P. Heymann has written that "2006 is likely to be the year Maytag ceases to exist as an independent company."

Report Sees Legal Hurdles For Whirlpool, Maytag Merger (FREEP)

By ALEJANDRO BODIPO-MEMBA, FREE PRESS BUSINESS WRITER

Detroit Free Press, January 12, 2006

Shares of Whirlpool Corp. and Maytag Corp. changed little Wednesday one day after stock for both appliance makers dropped as much as 2% and 5%, respectively, following rumors that federal regulators may try to block a proposed merger between the two companies.

An article that appeared on the financial news website TheDeal.com, citing people it didn't name, said antitrust concerns might lead to the U.S. Department of Justice seeking an injunction blocking the merger. In August, Benton Harbor-based Whirlpool agreed to purchase Maytag of Newton, Iowa for $1.7 billion in cash and stock, following a flurry of offers and counter offers by several suitors.

The proposed deal, which is expected to be completed in the first quarter of this year, would combine the nation's No. 1 and No. 3 makers of household appliances under one roof. But, antitrust concerns about merging two of that nation's biggest makers of refrigerators, dishwashers and dryers surrounded the deal for months.

News of possible regulatory concerns sent Whirlpool stock tumbling $1.89 a share to $83.10 on the New York Stock Exchange Tuesday. Maytag shares dropped 88 cents to close at $17.89 a share on the same day.

Officials at Whirlpool had no comment. Calls to Maytag weren't immediately returned.

On Wednesday, shares of Whirlpool fell 4 cents to $83.06 at 2:50 p.m. in trading on the New York Stock Exchange. Maytag stock rose 10 cents.

Northwest Drops SkyTeam Antitrust Request (AP)

By Joshua Freed

AP, January 12, 2006

MINNEAPOLIS - Northwest Airlines Corp. is withdrawing a request for antitrust immunity for its SkyTeam airline alliance, saying the Transportation Department had signaled it would reject the request anyway.

Separately Wednesday, the parent of Northwest regional feeder Mesaba Aviation Inc. said its fleet may be halved to just 49 turboprop aircraft because of Northwest's reorganization.

Northwest entered SkyTeam last year after its partner, KLM Royal Dutch Airlines, merged with SkyTeam member Air France. Northwest has antitrust immunity to coordinate routes and pricing with KLM, but not with other SkyTeam members, which also includes Delta Air Lines Inc., Alitalia, Continental Airlines Inc. and CSA Czech Airlines. The request was submitted by all the carriers, and Northwest said its withdrawal request would apply to the full alliance.

Northwest and Skyteam members can still codeshare, which makes it easier for passengers to book trips on a single ticket with multiple airlines. But the Transportation Department had said the Skyteam routes overlap so much that little new service was likely to result from an antitrust waiver.

In a statement, Northwest called the initial Transportation Department finding "arbitrary, capricious and inconsistent with established DOT precedent and U.S. international aviation policy.

"Northwest is at a loss to understand this decision by the same DOT officials claiming to strongly support deregulation and an Administration which espouses a free market philosophy," Northwest said. "The U.S. airline industry is in a state of crisis. Four major air carriers, including Northwest and Delta, are operating under Chapter 11, as are several national carriers."

Regional feeder Mesaba is also in Chapter 11, having filed just one month after Northwest, which provides all of Mesaba's planes, revenues, and passengers.

Earlier this year Mesaba operated a fleet of 100 planes for Northwest, including 35 Avro regional jets that seat 69 passengers. But on Wednesday, parent MAIR Holdings Inc. said Northwest told Mesaba that all of Mesaba's Avro jets will be removed by December 2006. Mesaba also said Northwest is removing three of its Saab turboprops, leaving it to built its bankruptcy plan on a fleet of 49 Saabs.

"The four-engine Avros are very expensive to operate, especially in the current high fuel cost environment," Northwest said in a recent employee newsletter.

Northwest has asked regional carriers including Mesaba to bid on flying 76-seat jets, such Mesaba's handful of Canadair Regional Jets. The MAIR statement said Northwest will remove those jets, too, if Mesaba doesn't win that bid. Mesaba spokeswoman Elizabeth Costello said the bid was being submitted this week.

Lobbying To Sell Your House (NYT)

By Glen Justice

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 11 - When the nation's largest banks decided at the start of the decade that they wanted to get into the real estate brokerage business, one major obstacle stood in their way: the National Association of Realtors.

Lobbyists for the huge trade group stonewalled the banks by tying up new rules at the Treasury Department and the Federal Reserve. Then the big score came in 2002 when the Realtors persuaded Congress to adopt a one-year moratorium to stop the banks altogether. It was a card the Realtors would play again and again. Four years later, bankers still have not cracked the real estate market.

"They are known as very aggressive," said Edward L. Yingling, president of the American Bankers Association. "Not many trade associations are willing to be that tough on an issue."

But the ability of the National Association of Realtors to beat back competitors is being tested now as few times before. A broad range of critics say the organization and its state and local affiliates have worked to smother competition and protect the decades-old system that provides traditional brokers 5 percent to 6 percent commissions on most home sales.

The Justice Department sued the association last year, asserting that the group's rules for online property listings discriminate against Internet-based brokers. Battles have also raged in the states as Realtor organizations pursued policies that opponents say would hurt discount brokers. The Consumer Federation of America is revving up to fight any such industry-sponsored legislation state by state in coming months.

"Because the industry functions as a cartel, it is able to overcharge consumers tens of billions of dollars a year," said Stephen Brobeck, the federation's executive director. "Consumers are increasingly wondering why they are often charged more to sell a home than to purchase a new car."

At the same time, traditional brokers are under assault from Web-based companies and discount brokerage firms, many offering rebates and "à la carte" services that can drastically reduce costs. Many of these companies criticize the association as hostile to new business models.

DOJ_NMG_0009471

"The industry is not as competitive as it could or should be," said Representative Michael G. Oxley, the chairman of the House Committee on Financial Services and one of several lawmakers who opposed the organization's stand against the banks.

Even some industry allies say the association may be too aggressive in protecting its interests. "They might have small victories, but they are losing the battle," said Representative Pat Tiberi, an Ohio Republican who worked in real estate before joining Congress. "I think they should be relooking some of their tactics."

Officials at the National Association of Realtors are quick to defend the organization. Stephen Cook, the group's spokesman, said the organization and the industry were not under siege. Rather, Mr. Cook said, the current climate is the byproduct of a hot housing market that has focused much national attention on the industry. "The system can always be improved, but we don't think it is broken," Mr. Cook said.

The association's power has swelled during the heady days of the real estate boom. Its ranks have grown by more than 500,000 in the last five years. With almost 1.3 million members, it is the largest trade association in the country. One out of every 203 adults is a dues-paying member, according to August statistics from the association and the United States Census.

The boom has enriched many brokers. With the average cost of a home reaching historic highs, consumers paid roughly $61 billion in brokerage fees for residential real estate in 2004 as some 6.8 million homes changed hands. Last year, the industry was on track to sell almost 7.1 million homes, according to estimates in December.

The Realtors association is also one of the most powerful lobbies in Washington, spending nearly $94 million annually. It dates back almost 100 years. And it has an iron grip on its members. For access to property listings, individual agents and the brokers who employ them must belong to the national association and their state and local affiliates. Even the term "Realtor" is trademarked for use by members only.

The association spent some $13.5 million in 2004 to lobby Congress and the administration on issues like housing, lending, insurance, small-business legislation and anything that might affect agents, according to lobbying disclosures.

Those who have opposed the Realtors speak of another asset as well: chutzpah. Over the years, the organization has gained a reputation as a fierce fighter in the nation's capital, often willing to go further than many other Washington groups to win its battles.

One prime combatant in the antitrust case is Laurie Janik, the association's general counsel. Ms. Janik said her organization, rather than fighting, tried for months to accommodate Justice Department requests to change its rules for online property listings. Ultimately, she said, the requests went too far and would have eroded the control that Realtors have over the listings, which they consider proprietary.

Ms. Janik said the department also wanted the association to sign a consent decree, raising the possibility of legal consequences if it violated the agreement. It was a step the Realtors were not willing to take. Her group held its ground, and the government filed suit in September.

"I think this is a big gamble for them," she said. "They are very likely going to lose this case."

When the suit was filed, J. Bruce McDonald, a deputy assistant attorney general, said, "Our job is to ensure that one group of competitors doesn't tell some of its members they can't compete in a certain way and undercut the level playing field."

At the heart of the case are the roughly 850 multiple listing services through which brokers cooperate to list properties for sale. The system dates back decades. Once kept in large, heavy books, the lists are now maintained electronically and the data is used to market properties on the Internet.

Almost all agents and brokers - even competitors - use the lists to showcase sellers' properties and obtain prospects for buyers. But the Realtors' control over these lists is a controversial subject in the industry. David Barry, a California lawyer and longtime critic of Realtor associations, is seeking to put an initiative on the California ballot that would open the state's multiple listing services to the public.

The association's rules allow brokers to withhold their property listings from competing Internet sites, though that also means forfeiting the ability to show on their own sites houses listed by competitors.

The Justice Department lawsuit contends that these rules give an unfair advantage to large, traditional brokers that supply the majority of listings. The suit points to internal industry documents that identify online brokers as a threat.

Some discount brokers are elated. "We celebrate the Department of Justice involvement," said Eric A. Danziger, chief executive of ZipRealty, a full-service brokerage firm that offers discounts and makes heavy use of the Internet. "What's happening now is many years overdue, a focus on the consumer. There's still huge resistance from the real estate industry."

Steve Murray, editor of Real Trends, an industry newsletter, said that even if Realtors won the Justice Department case, industry efforts to slow market forces and technology might yield few gains. "Businesses that erect barriers and moats around their industry for protection end up getting slaughtered," he said, adding that "a rational person could say these guys are a cartel."

DOJ_NMG_0009472

The Justice Department case is still in its early stages before a federal judge in Chicago, where the Realtors have asked for a dismissal and prosecutors will respond in coming weeks.

Ms. Janik warns that major changes to the multiple listing services could cause large nationwide brokerages to pull out of the system and establish their own private listings. That, she said, would be a far greater threat to small firms.

"I'm scratching my head, saying 'what is the Justice Department thinking?' " Ms. Janik said.

With the housing market showing signs of cooling, market forces could change the landscape a lot sooner than any legal battle might. If home sales decline, either because owners are reluctant to sell at lower prices or rising interest rates keep buyers on the sidelines, Realtors could be in for major changes.

Even industry heavyweights agree that change is imminent. Dave Liniger, chairman and co-founder of Re/Max, said he expected commissions to continue to drop and à la carte models, in which customers choose the services they want and pay accordingly, to continue to rise. But he said both would happen slowly over a period of years.

"It's the evolution of the industry, but not the end of the industry," he said.

At Cendant, which operates Century 21 and Coldwell Banker, Richard A. Smith, the chief executive of the real estate unit, said he expected traditional brokers to gain ground in a softer market. When the market tightens, he said, homeowners are often more interested in selling quickly than they are in saving money.

Still, Mr. Smith said his company, which operates its own discount brokerage, was closely watching the pressure on prices and any action by regulators. And he said that while his organization did not always support the association's political positions, it agreed with the group in the Justice Department case.

"People shouldn't be forced to market their homes the way the government wants them to market their homes," Mr. Smith said. "What's next?"

Realtors have also collided with the Justice Department in several state capitals, where the industry has pushed legal changes that some say will harm nontraditional brokers. Some of the new rules ban rebates to home buyers or sellers. Others, known as minimum-service bills, which require brokers to offer a broad range of services to obtain a real estate license, can hurt discounters who offer fewer services for lower fees.

In Missouri, for example, the legislature unanimously passed a minimum-services bill that sent lobbyists on both sides scrambling to sway Gov. Matt Blunt. As they had done in other states, the Justice Department and the Federal Trade Commission urged Mr. Blunt to veto the measure.

Ms. Janik had weighed in with a letter to state associations months earlier, saying the Justice Department was merely lobbying and could not apply federal antitrust laws to cases in which states have regulatory authority.

"Realtor associations have the right to lobby for legislative and regulatory action that they support - even if the effect of such action would be anticompetitive," she wrote in a strongly worded memo.

The Missouri Association of Realtors hired Gregg L. Hartley, chief operating officer of Cassidy & Associates, one of the largest lobbying firms in Washington. Mr. Hartley is a former chief of staff to Representative Roy Blunt, the governor's father and one of the most powerful Republicans in Congress. When Representative Tom DeLay was indicted earlier this year, Mr. Blunt took over his duties as majority leader.

The Missouri association paid Mr. Hartley $50,000 for a single month of lobbying, according to state records, which listed his only task as working to enact the bill. Mr. Hartley did not return calls for comment.

Ultimately, Governor Blunt signed the bill.

Johnson & Johnson Won't Wave White Flag Yet For Guidant (DOWJONES)

Dow Jones, January 12, 2006

Johnson & Johnson (JNJ) (JNJ) appears unwilling to let its planned Guidant Corp. (GDT) (GDT) purchase slip away without a fight, a shift given J&J's prior unwillingness to budge from its offer for the medical device maker, but a move that reflects the new reality of intense competition.

J&J's current purchase price for Guidant (GDT), about $64 a share, is the much- reduced product of an acrimonious spat between the companies following troubles with Guidant's (GDT) heart rhythm devices last year. Given the dispute, many thought J&J was locked into that price, even as a surprise $72 a share offer from rival Boston Scientific Corp. (BSX) (BSX) dramatically changed the landscape.

The offer, officially made Sunday at $25 billion, vaulted Boston Scientific (BSX) to apparent frontrunner status, but several reports this week suggest J&J is willing to change its tune. The Wall Street Journal reported that Guidant's (GDT)board plans to meet at 3:00 p.m. EST Wednesday to decide between the Boston Scientific (BSX) offer and a new, potentially much more competitive J&J offer.

The New York Times reported earlier Wednesday that J&J approached Guidant's (GDT)board at the last minute late Tuesday, heading off a vote in favor of Boston Scientific (BSX), to negotiate a new deal. CNBC also reported Wednesday that J&J plans to raise its offer.

Boston Scientific (BSX), meanwhile, may be willing to answer a any J&J move. "Don't count us out," Boston Scientific (BSX) spokesman Paul Donovan said Wednesday, declining to elaborate further.

If health-care giant J&J still really wants Guidant (GDT), "there's a bidding war on now," said Tao Levy, analyst with Deutsche Bank.

Boston Scientific (BSX) shares recently traded at $25.49 a share, down $99, or 3.7%. J&J shares recently traded at $62.15 a share, down 95 cents, or 1.5%. Guidant (GDT)recently traded at $70.38, up 99 cents, or 1.4%.

According to Peter Goldman, a portfolio manager at Chicago Asset Management, which owns 150,000 J&J shares, the company's shift isn't a shock. He'd like to see J&J end up with Guidant (GDT), but can't imagine J&J overpaying or getting into an outright bidding war.

"I think they're very disciplined," Goldman said.

A Guidant (GDT) spokesman declined comment on the matter Wednesday, and J&J also remained quiet. J&J spokesman Jeff Leebaw said the company won't comment beyond a statement made Sunday, when J&J said it expects to consummate the Guidant (GDT)purchase immediately after a vote by Guidant (GDT) shareholders Jan. 31, and that the agreed-upon deal between the two companies remained the best offer.

Ever since Boston Scientific (BSX) sparked a debate, J&J has generally stuck to its guns, claiming its offer represented fair value for Guidant (GDT). J&J has also pointed to its ability to close the deal quickly: Boston Scientific (BSX) has an aggressive target to close a Guidant (GDT) purchase in the first quarter, but unlike J&J, it doesn't have antitrust clearance.

Given those statements, and its intense effort to drive Guidant's (GDT) buying price lower, many analysts speculated that J&J couldn't change its tune or considerably increase its offer, and was willing to walk away with a $625 million breakup fee.

Wednesday's reports suggest J&J wants to remain in the game, and that it recognizes it has to at least close the offer gap to remain competitive. Elliott Associates LP and Elliott International LP, which collectively own about 3 million Guidant (GDT) shares, wrote Guidant's (GDT) board Tuesday to encourage them to take Boston Scientific's (BSX) offer, and said J&J would have to up its offer to no less than $71 a share to compete.

Boston Scientific's (BSX) Donovan addressed the price issue in a brief statement Wednesday. "Our $72 offer is higher than Johnson & Johnson's (JNJ), and there's strong upside potential over time," he said.

J&J may have to eat some crow and its earlier statements to get back into the game. It makes sense if the company is willing to do so, analyst Levy said.

"At the end of the day they need a big acquisition," he said of J&J. "They wanted to get cute with the price and they got too cute."

If Guidant's (GDT) board officially deems Boston Scientific's (BSX) offer to be superior, and notifies J&J of such in a letter, J&J will have five business days to respond.

Levy does not own shares in the three companies. Deutsche Bank has a financial stake and banking relationship with all three companies.

-By Jon Kamp, Dow Jones Newswires; 312-750-4129; jon.kamp@dowjones.com

Investors Expect Battle For P&O After Singapore Hints At A Bid (WSJ)

By Bruce Stanley, Cris Prystay And Jason Singer

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2006

Smelling a battle between a pair of rich bidders amid a boom in cargo volume, investors pushed shares of port operator Peninsular & Oriental Steam Navigation Co. of Britain up 6.3% yesterday after PSA International Pte. Ltd. of Singapore said it might make a bid for it at as much as £3.54 billion ($6.25 billion).

PSA, a unit of Singapore's state-owned investment company Temasek Holdings Pte. Ltd., said after the London market closed Tuesday that it could pay as much as 470 pence a share for P&O, as the company is known. That would trump a bid of 443 pence a share, or £3.3 billion, that Dubai Ports World, of the United Arab Emirates, made in November and that P&O's board then recommended to its shareholders.

P&O shares rose 29.5 pence to 498.5 pence each yesterday in London.

Still, it isn't certain PSA will make a bid for P&O, one of Britain's oldest companies, founded in 1840. Singapore port operator PSA, which has been granted access to the same nonpublic financial information that was given to Dubai Ports, has a little more than two weeks to review the data and decide. Dubai Ports, meanwhile, has said it is reviewing the situation carefully.

Expansion Dreams

DOJ_NMG_0009474

Like Dubai Ports, PSA -- the world's second-biggest operator by number of containers handled, according to the London maritime advisory service Drewry Shipping Consultants Ltd. -- is eager to expand beyond its small home base and grab a share of bigger cargo markets in Asia, Europe and North America. The container-ports industry has received a jolt of energy during recent years, thanks to a surge in manufactured exports from China and other Asian nations.

Analysts see any showdown for P&O as a further sign that container-port companies are starting to gobble each other up just as some of their shipping-line customers have done. "If you want to make it into the super-big league, then this is the last opportunity to get in," says an investment-bank analyst whose bank is advising one of P&O's potential buyers.

By containers handled, P&O is the world's fourth-biggest operator, behind No. 3 APM Terminals, the port-operating arm of A.P. Moeller-Maersk of Denmark; No. 2 PSA; and No. 1 Hutchison Port Holdings, part of the Hong Kong-listed conglomerate Hutchison Whampoa Ltd. Dubai Ports ranks seventh world-wide.

P&O operates at 29 ports around the world, including Baltimore, Miami, New Orleans and Newark, N.J., where it has a 50% stake in the Port Newark Container Terminal. Neither PSA nor Dubai Ports has a presence in the U.S.

People close to the matter expect Dubai Ports to try to stop PSA should it make a formal bid. If it does bid, PSA has said, it would match the terms of Dubai Ports' offer. That would include pumping money into the London company's pension plan, a move that would require approval from the pension trustees, which Dubai Ports has received.

Prize Catch

Since both PSA and Dubai Ports are already among the world's top port operators, P&O's board would likely accept the higher bid.

With container operations world-wide, P&O would be a rare prize for either buyer, in an industry with few remaining opportunities for substantial growth through a single acquisition. The pair have tangled once already, in 2004, when Dubai Ports outbid PSA for the global port assets of CSX Corp., of Jacksonville, Fla. "The U.S. assets under P&O are a great attraction to any potential bidders, given the difficulties to get into this market," says Cusson Leung of Merrill Lynch in Hong Kong.

If PSA bids for and acquires P&O, it would overtake industry leader Hutchison. If Dubai Ports prevails, it would rise to No. 2, ahead of PSA by container count, according to 2004 figures compiled by Drewry. Dubai Ports, based in the United Arab Emirates' sheikhdom of Dubai, is the overseas arm of the state-run ports operator.

A Hutchison spokesman declined to comment on Hutchison's likely response to any battle.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

U.S. Officials Confirm Miners Tried To Escape After Blast (NYT)

By Felicity Barringer

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 11 - As questions persisted about violations of safety requirements at the Sago Mine in West Virginia, federal regulators on Wednesday confirmed reports that the 12 miners trapped after the Jan. 2 explosion started to walk toward the exit, only to turn back and take shelter in the farthest recesses of the mine.

But the regulators said they had heard nothing to confirm an account by relatives of the only survivor that the men had tried to force their way out in a rail car but that their escape route had been blocked by debris. Rescuers found no such blockage, the regulators said.

All but one of those 12 trapped miners died of carbon monoxide poisoning, as did one other who was close to the blast site. Only Randal McCloy Jr., 27, was found alive. He remains in a coma, in critical but stable condition at the West Virginia University Hospitals, the medical center said.

Asked why the miners changed course, Robert Friend, the acting deputy assistant secretary at the federal Mine Safety and Health Administration, said, "We're waiting for Mr. McCloy to tell us."

On Wednesday, hospital spokesmen and the F.B.I. also warned that an Internet-based campaign soliciting money on Mr. McCloy's behalf was a hoax.

Mr. Friend and Ray McKinney, administrator for coal mine safety and health, told reporters on Capitol Hill on Wednesday that two mine rescue teams arrived at the mine five and a half hours after the 6:30 a.m. explosion on Jan. 2, but that it was not until 4 p.m. that carbon monoxide levels began to drop enough that the safety team managers felt rescuers could enter the mine.

Mr. McKinney said the first rescue team entered the mine at 5:25 p.m., and slowly made its way down the main tunnel. With three teams working in shifts, they found the miners' tracks at 8 p.m. on Jan. 3.

Three hours later, they found Mr. McCloy, unconscious and groaning, and the 12 other miners dead. A PowerPoint version of the timeline that Mr. McKinney gave reporters is uat the Web site for the agency, www.msha.gov.

DOJ_NMG_0009475

Mr. McKinney's account did not resolve some disputes.

For one point, the mining company has always maintained, and Mr. McKinney repeated, that a second crew in the mine that day, which emerged safely, had six men. But four miners in that group say it numbered 13, and one miner provided the names and job titles for all 13.

For another point, 12 significant violations of fire-safety regulations that federal officials listed on Tuesday did not, Mr. McKinney said, constitute a pattern of misconduct that would have warranted closing the mine. Industry critics say the violations gave the agency ample cause to close the mine until new practices were instituted.

In a news conference on Wednesday, Ben Hatfield, the chief executive of the International Coal Group, which owns the mine, defended its safety efforts, according to The Associated Press. Mr. Hatfield said the company had reconstructed two miles of the primary escape path, upgraded the mine rail system and instituted employee safety training that exceeded legal requirements.

"In my opinion," he said, "the Sago Mine was a safe operation."

Interior Department To Open Alaskan Land To Oil Drilling (WP)

By Justin Blum

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

The Interior Department yesterday agreed to open about 400,000 acres on Alaska's North Slope for exploratory oil drilling, an area that previously had been off limits because of concerns about the impact on wildlife.

Officials said they would lease acreage in the northeastern corner of the National Petroleum Reserve-Alaska to oil companies to provide access to domestic oil supplies.

"We recognize . . . the energy needs of this nation," said Susan Childs, an official with the Bureau of Land Management. "So, hopefully, this will alleviate some of the pressure."

Government officials said that the area of the preserve opened yesterday has significant potential for oil development. They estimate it contains about 2 billion barrels of oil that is economically recoverable, along with 3.5 trillion cubic feet of natural gas. The United States consumes more than 20 million barrels of oil per day.

Much of the 23.5 million-acre petroleum reserve already is open to oil development. The reserve, created in 1923, is located west of the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge, long a flashpoint in the debate over allowing oil drilling versus protecting the environment.

Childs said the land opened yesterday could be drilled with "minimal" impact on wildlife, a conclusion that environmentalists dispute.

The area -- particularly near Teshekpuk Lake -- has been a focal point of concern among environmentalists. They say oil operations would disrupt an area where thousands of brant geese and white-fronted geese molt. They also predicted harm to caribou and tundra swans.

"This is the single most important goose molting area in the arctic," said Stanley Senner, executive director of Audubon Alaska. "It will mean fewer birds."

The Bureau of Land Management proposed opening the area a year ago. But it was not until yesterday that an Interior Department official, Deputy Assistant Secretary Chad Calvert, approved a modified version of that plan.

The area near Teshekpuk Lake was put off limits to drilling during the Reagan administration. The Clinton administration expanded the restricted area.

But the Bureau of Land Management says technological advances in oil drilling allow drilling to occur without the impact previously feared. Drilling will be allowed about a quarter-mile from the lake.

Bureau officials said they would conduct further study on the impact to molting geese before allowing permanent drilling.

U.S. Lifts Longtime Drilling Ban On Alaskan Wildlife Habitat (LAT)

By Janet Wilson

The Los Angeles Times, January 12, 2006

The Department of Interior on Wednesday approved oil and gas drilling on Alaska land considered such sensitive wildlife habitat that it was first protected by former Interior Secretary James G. Watt under President Reagan, and by four Interior secretaries since.

The decision — decried by Native American, hunting and environmental groups — comes just weeks after the U.S. Senate rejected drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge, about 200 miles to the east.

Bureau of Land Management staff said the decision was made after three years of study and in response to requests by Vice President Dick Cheney's energy task force.

DOJ_NMG_0009476

The plan, signed by Deputy Assistant Interior Secretary Chad Calvert, will open up more than 500,000 acres in and around Teshekpuk Lake on Alaska's oil-rich North Slope. BLM officials estimate the northeast National Petroleum Reserve, including the lake area, may contain as much as 2 billion barrels of "economically recoverable" oil.

The area is a critical stop for molting geese on the Pacific flyway, with as many as 90,000 birds resting in flat wetlands in the summer. Up to 46,000 caribou also use areas near the lake for calving and migration paths.

Although many Alaskans welcome drilling as an economic boon, some native leaders in the state blasted the decision.

"There are a lot of frustrated people in our community right now," said Dora Nukapigak, who lives in the small Inupiat Eskimo village of Nuiqsut, at the eastern edge of the reserve, where many people depend on caribou as a food source. "It's a very sensitive area. It seems like regardless of what we say or do with BLM, they'll do what they're going to do anyways, and that's drill."

Former Interior Secretary Watt, often derided by environmentalists for other actions, protected more than 200,000 acres of the goose-molting area north of the lake from oil and gas drilling in the early 1980s. His successors under Reagan and President George H.W. Bush maintained those protections. Under President Clinton, Bruce Babbitt expanded bans against drilling around and on the lake to more than half a million acres.

BLM officials acknowledged that the area is important for wildlife and subsistence hunting, and said their plan was "very, very rigorous" in requiring environmental protection and mitigation.

No surface drilling will be allowed on 242,000 acres considered vital for molting geese, or on another 244,000 acres used by caribou. Slant drilling will be allowed under those surfaces from adjoining land. Pipelines must be seven feet high, at least initially, to allow caribou and hunters to pass beneath.

A maximum of 2,100 acres total in seven different zones can be permanently disturbed on the surface, and a three-year study will be conducted of molting geese, BLM staff said.

Leasing of the lands could begin by September, after reviews by a state coastal agency and a regional planning agency, although drilling on the lake will be deferred for 10 years.

"We have done a very good job balancing the subsistence resources while allowing some areas to be opened to oil and gas drilling," said Susan Childs, energy and mineral planning coordinator for BLM's Alaska office, which oversees the plan.

"Our mission is to provide for multiple uses. A part of our mission is to protect wildlife, but also part of our mission is to allow for the development of resources. Our job is to find that balance in oil and gas mining," said BLM Alaska spokeswoman Jody Weil.

But conservation groups blasted the plan and said there were no guarantees the restrictions would remain in place.

"They're notorious for granting waivers to their own rules," said Stanley E. Senner, a biologist who is executive director of Audubon Alaska.

"This plan is utterly unbalanced. Even the Reagan administration protected the waterfowl habitat around Teshekpuk Lake because of its world-class ecological and cultural value," Senner said. "No one should be fooled by the window dressing … this plan makes every last acre available for oil development."

Chuck Clusen, director of the Natural Resource Defense Council's Alaska Project, said the BLM "is supposed to balance all values of our public lands. Giving 100% to the oil industry is not what anyone would call balanced."

Times Staff Writer Sam Howe Verhovek in Seattle contributed to this report.

Warming Tied To Extinction Of Frog Species (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

Rising temperatures are responsible for pushing dozens of frog species over the brink of extinction in the past three decades, according to findings being reported today by a team of Latin American and U.S. scientists.

The study, published in the journal Nature, provides compelling evidence that climate change has already helped wipe out a slew of species and could spur more extinctions and the spread of diseases worldwide. It also helps solve the international mystery of why amphibians around the globe have been vanishing from their usual habitats over the past quarter-century -- as many as 112 species have disappeared since 1980.

Scientists have speculated that rising temperatures and changing weather patterns could endanger the survival of many species, but the new study documents for the first time a direct correlation between global warming and the disappearance of around 65 amphibian species in Central and South America.

The fate of amphibians -- whose permeable skin makes them sensitive to environmental changes -- is seen by scientists as a possible harbinger of global warming's effects. Rising temperatures are threatening the survival of flora and fauna worldwide, including coral reefs in the Caribbean, which serve as critical fish nurseries, and South African rhododendrons, which cannot move to a cooler climate.

DOJ_NMG_0009477

J. Alan Pounds -- the resident scientist at the Tropical Science Center's Monteverde Cloud Forest Preserve in Costa Rica and the study's lead author -- worked with 13 other researchers to pin down the link between rising tropical temperatures and the spread of the deadly chytrid fungus that has wiped out dozens of species of harlequin frogs in recent years.

"Disease is the bullet killing frogs, but climate change is pulling the trigger," Pounds said. "Global warming is wreaking havoc on amphibians and will cause staggering losses of biodiversity if we don't do something first."

The paper helps explain how global warming has allowed the chytrid fungus -- which kills frogs by growing on their skin and attacking their epidermis and teeth, as well as by releasing a toxin -- to thrive in Costa Rica and neighboring countries. The higher temperatures result in more water vapor in the air, which in turn forms a cloud cover that leads to cooler days and warmer nights. These conditions favor the fungus, which grows and reproduces best at temperatures between 63 and 77 degrees Fahrenheit.

At least 110 species of the vibrantly colored amphibians once lived near streams in the Central and South American tropics, but about two-thirds disappeared in the 1980s and 1990s, including the golden toad. While researchers had previously identified the fungus as a major reason for the frogs' demise, they have been trying determine why the disease has taken such a major toll in recent years.

Looking at more than 65 harlequin frog species that had vanished, researchers found that 80 percent of the time there was a correlation between higher temperatures and the species' disappearance. After a warm peak in 1987, for example, five species died off.

"There's a coherent pattern of disappearances, all the way from Costa Rica to Peru," Pounds said in an interview. "Here's a case where we can show that global warming is affecting outbreaks of this disease."

Amphibians are experiencing a precipitous decline in Africa, Asia and North America, according to a comprehensive 2004 survey, which cited climate change as well as deforestation, pollution and habitat loss as key factors.

"We have a biodiversity crisis," said Andrew Blaustein, director of Oregon State University's graduate programs in environmental science. "Amphibians seem to be harder hit than other groups."

Michael Totten, senior director for climate and water initiatives at the environmental group Conservation International, said humans have made it more difficult for animal and plant species to adapt to the shifting climate by fragmenting natural habitat. "Traditionally species have been resilient and capable of going through dramatic climate change, but with humans changing the face of the landscape, we've created lots of prisons for species, and that's the major problem they face," he said.

Stanford University climatologist Stephen Schneider said the new research represents "a creative step in the right direction, but it's still early in the game to sound the 'solved' bell." He added that the study is "just further evidence" that global warming is linked to accelerating extinctions worldwide.

While Pounds and his colleagues are still researching the harlequin frogs' disappearance, their findings are prompting even some scientists who had been skeptical about climate change's impact on amphibians to reassess their position.

James Collins, who studies harlequin frogs at Arizona State University, called the paper "an intriguing contribution" to understanding what is happening to amphibians worldwide. He said the study shows that when it comes to climate change, "these forces don't all move in one direction," since some habitats are becoming drier while others are becoming wetter.

Collins and a team of researchers are trying to determine if the chytrid fungus is surfacing in areas where it had never thrived before.

Study Finds Global Warming Is Killing Frogs (WSJ)

By Gautam Naik

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2006

Conservationists have been puzzled for more than a decade by the mysterious disappearance of harlequin frogs from the pristine, high-altitude tropical forests of Costa Rica. Now a group of scientists believe they have pinpointed the likely cause: global warming that promotes a fungus that is fatal to the frogs.

The finding, published today in the journal Nature1, is likely to stoke the debate about whether climate change is affecting the dynamics of disease, and why amphibians are dying out in such massive numbers world-wide. Recent data indicates that, since 1980, as many as 122 amphibian species are likely to have become extinct and one-third of known amphibian species are threatened.

In Costa Rica, researchers found that the region's brightly-colored harlequin frogs were succumbing to a disease caused by the chytrid (KIT-rid) fungus, which also has been implicated in a wave of amphibian deaths elsewhere in the world. Using records of sea and air temperatures, the scientists discovered that the frogs were disappearing at a rate in near-lockstep with the changing climate.

DOJ_NMG_0009478

"About 80% of the disappearances of frogs correspond to unusually warm years" when the fungus thrives, said J. Alan Pounds, the study's lead author and resident scientist at the Monteverde Cloud Forest Preserve in Costa Rica. The fungus grows on amphibians' skin, creating a dermatological condition for the creatures that is often fatal. About two-thirds of the harlequin species, which once thrived in the tropics of Central and South America, vanished in the 1980s and 1990s.

But establishing a causal link between large-scale, long-term global warming and the elimination of specific species in a particular region isn't easy. The fungus-related frog deaths in Costa Rica "could be a roll of the dice one time, or it could be several interconnected factors contributing to the problem," said Ben Orlove, a professor of environment science and policy at the University of California, Davis. Habitat destruction, pesticides and other factors have all been blamed for amphibian declines.

Still, the demise of amphibians is part of a far-larger pattern. The earth has witnessed five known extinction waves affecting many species. What makes the current one different, scientists have concluded, is that it is likely to have been triggered mainly by human activity.

Bird, mammal and amphibian species are disappearing in recent decades at a rate estimated at 100 to 1,000 times as high as the expected, natural extinction rate. In the past 500 years, human activity has forced 844 species to extinction, according to the World Conservation Union, a Switzerland-based agency whose members include some 82 states, 111 government agencies and other groups involved in ecology and conservation.

Amphibians are in the deepest trouble. They may be particularly vulnerable because they go through several life-cycle stages, making them prey to more predators and environmental shifts. And while they perform the nifty trick of absorbing oxygen through their skin, that probably makes them more susceptible to toxins and infection.

According to the Global Amphibian Assessment, a large, world-wide study that reported its findings in 2004, about 43% of amphibian species are declining, 27% are stable and less than 1% are increasing. The status of the rest isn't known.

Almost certainly, factors such as loss of habitat, pesticides and change in land-use patterns contribute to the decline in amphibian species across the globe. "The assumption, then, was that [amphibians] would do just fine in protected areas" such as Costa Rican cloud forests, said James P. Collins, a professor at Arizona State University in Tempe and chairman of the Declining Amphibian Populations Task Force. But since Costa Rica's harlequin-frog population is diminishing anyhow, "the climate-change explanation attracts attention," he said.

Last fall, scientists and conservationists met in Washington and drew up a global action plan to save the world's frogs, toads and salamanders from oblivion. The estimated cost over five years: more than $400 million to move their populations from threatened areas, breed them in captivity or conduct studies.

In Costa Rica, Mr. Pounds and his colleagues studied air and sea surface temperatures from 1973 to 2000 and found that rising temperatures enhanced cloud cover over tropical mountains, leading to warmer nights and cooler days. The change appears to have favored the chytrid fungus, which grows and reproduces best at temperatures from 63 to 77 degrees Fahrenheit. One solution for the harlequin frogs might be to move their populations to altitudes where the fungus doesn't thrive as well, Mr. Pounds says.

But key questions remain unanswered. "Climate change may be helping the fungus spread, but we don't know where the fungus came from" or whether it can survive without amphibians, Mr. Pounds says. "These are the parts of the story that aren't entirely clear."

Frog Killer Is Linked To Global Warming (NYT)

By Andrew C. Revkin

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

Scientists studying a fast-dwindling genus of colorful harlequin frogs on misty mountainsides in Central and South America are reporting today that global warming is combining with a spreading fungus to kill off many species.

The researchers implicate global warming, as opposed to local variations in temperature or other conditions. Their conclusion is based on their finding that patterns of fungus outbreaks and extinctions in widely dispersed patches of habitat were synchronized in a way that could not be explained by chance.

If the analysis holds up, it will be the first to link recent climate changes to the spread of a fungus lethal to frogs and salamanders and their kin. The chytrid fungus, Batrachochytrium dendrobatidis, has devastated amphibian communities in many parts of the world over the last several decades.

But experts on amphibian disease and ecology are divided over the finding, which is being published today in the journal Nature. Several scientists criticized the paper yesterday, saying it glossed over significant sources of uncertainty; others said it was important evidence that warming caused by humans was already harming wildlife. Climate scientists have linked most of the recent rise in the earth's average temperature to the buildup of greenhouse emissions from smokestacks and tailpipes.

DOJ_NMG_0009479

The new study was led by J. Alan Pounds, the resident biologist at the Monteverde Cloud Forest Preserve in Costa Rica. In an accompanying commentary, two scientists not involved in the research say it provides "compelling evidence" that warming caused by human activity was already disrupting ecology.

"The frogs are sending an alarm call to all concerned about the future of biodiversity and the need to protect the greatest of all open-access resources - the atmosphere," write the scientists, Andy Dobson, a Princeton University ecologist, and Andrew R. Blaustein, a zoologist at Oregon State University.

More than 110 species of brightly colored harlequin frogs, in the genus Atelopus, once lived near streams in the tropics of the Western Hemisphere, but about two-thirds of them have vanished since the 1980's.

A leading suspect is the chytrid fungus, which in recent decades has killed amphibians from deserts to lowland tropical forests to mountainsides. It is not clear whether the fungus has been spread around the world by human trade in amphibians or whether it has laid largely undetected and has only recently erupted.

Paradoxically, the fungus thrives best in cooler conditions, challenging the theory that global warming is at fault. But Dr. Pounds and his team, in studying trends in temperature and disease around the American tropics, found patterns that they say explain the situation.

Because warming increases evaporation, it can create clouds that tend to make days cooler by blocking sunlight, and make nights warmer by trapping heat. In an interview, Dr. Pounds said those conditions could have created favorable conditions for the spread of the chytrid fungus.

He said that because the seeming extinctions had occurred in lockstep over dispersed field sites, they were hard to attribute to anything other than the broad warming trend that scientists have linked to rising concentrations of greenhouse gases.

But some experts who have read the paper said they were troubled by definitive statements like "Our study sheds light on the amphibian-decline mystery by showing that large-scale warming is a key factor."

Cynthia Carey, an amphibian disease expert at the University of Colorado, said that while both climate and amphibian die-offs were serious problems, this particular paper failed to offer anything beyond circumstantial evidence.

"It is difficult to prove cause and effect on the ground where multiple factors interact in complex ways," she said.

Stephen H. Schneider, a climate expert at Stanford, who has worked with Dr. Pounds on other studies and consulted on this one, acknowledged that uncertainties remained but said the work was significant.

"It's like anything else that's complex," he said. "When you're in the early phases of learning you look for multiple lines of argument, and when they converge with basic theory, you increase your confidence in a connection."

Vanishing Of Frogs, Toads Tied To Global Warming, Study Says (USAT)

By Traci Watson

USA Today, January 12, 2006

A team of biologists and climate scientists says in a new study that it has linked the extinction of a widespread group of animals to global warming.

Writing in today's issue of the journal Nature, the scientists say that more than 60 closely related frog and toad species have vanished from the tropical forests of Latin America during the last few decades, partly because of warming temperatures. The team says this is the first time such a connection has been made.

The research team found a “near lock-step (link) between the timing of losses and changes in climate,” said lead scientist Alan Pounds of the Monteverde Cloud Forest Preserve and Tropical Science Center in Costa Rica. “It's a very striking pattern, and it's hard to find another explanation for it.”

The group did not identify the other contributing causes. Pounds and his team say the warmer temperatures of the late 20th century led to better growing conditions for a fungus that kills frogs and toads.

Other scientists expressed skepticism about the findings. Stephen Corn of the U.S. Geological Survey said the dates recorded for extinctions may not be entirely reliable. The University of Colorado's Cynthia Carey questioned why the new work ignores extinctions of related species after 1998.

The Earth's average temperature rose roughly 1 degree in the 20th century and could rise 10 more degrees by 2100, according to an international group of scientists convened by the United Nations.

That group and other researchers attribute the warming trend to the use of coal, oil and other fossil fuels, which emit carbon dioxide when burned. Buildup of the gas in the atmosphere can trap heat.

Scientists already have evidence linking higher temperatures to changes in the behavior or range of hundreds of species, such as flowers that bloom earlier in the year.

DOJ_NMG_0009480

Scientists in the U.N. group predicted in 2001 that global warming would produce a wave of extinctions. They did not predict they'd see evidence so quickly.

"None of us expected that we'd be seeing massive extinctions in five years," said Camille Parmesan of the University of Texas. She was not on the Pounds team but found the link between extinction and global warming "very convincing."

Pounds and his colleagues compared when a species was last seen with climate data. They found that roughly 80% of the extinct species were spotted for the last time just after a particularly hot year. For example, the Monteverde harlequin frog hasn't been seen since 1988, one year after a warm year.

Pounds and his team theorize that the changes in the region's climate are encouraging the growth of a parasite that spread around the world in the 1960s and is a known killer of frogs and toads. Pounds said more work needs to be done to nail down this possibility.

Margin Of Safety Just-in-Time Inventories Make U.S. Vulnerable In A Pandemic (WSJ)

By Bernard Wysocki Jr. And Sarah Lueck

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2006

Like many big hospitals, the University of Utah Hospital carries a 30-day supply of drugs, in part because it would be too costly or wasteful to stockpile more. Some of its hepatitis vaccine supply has been diverted to the hurricane-ravaged Gulf, leaving it vulnerable should an outbreak occur closer to home. About 77 other drugs are in short supply because of manufacturing and other glitches, such as a drug maker shutting down a factory.

"The supply chain is horribly thin," says Erin Fox, a drug-information specialist at the Salt Lake City hospital.

In the event of a pandemic flu outbreak, that chain is almost certain to break. Thousands of drug-company workers in the U.S. and elsewhere could be sickened, prompting factories to close. Truck routes could be blocked and borders may be closed, particularly perilous at a time when 80% of raw materials for U.S. drugs come from abroad. The likely result: shortages of important medicines -- such as insulin, blood products or the anesthetics used in surgery -- quite apart from any shortages of medicine to treat the flu itself.

The very rules of capitalism that make the U.S. an ultra-efficient marketplace also make it exceptionally vulnerable in a pandemic. Near-empty warehouses are a sign of strong inventory management. Production of drugs takes place offshore because that's cheaper. The federal government doesn't intervene as a guaranteed buyer of flu drugs, as it does with weapons. Investors and tax rules conspire to eliminate redundancy and reserves. Antitrust rules prevent private companies from collaborating to speed development of new drugs.

Most fundamentally, the widely embraced "just-in-time" business practice -- which attempts to cut costs and improve quality by reducing inventory stockpiles and delivering products as needed -- is at odds with the logic of "just in case" that promotes stockpiling drugs, government intervention and overall preparedness.

A report issued last month by the Trust for America's Health, a public-health advocacy group in Washington, concluded that 40% of the states lack enough backup medical supplies to cope with a pandemic flu or other major disease outbreak.

"Most if not all of the medical products or protective-device companies in this country are operating almost at full capacity," says Michael Osterholm, director of the Center for Infectious Disease Research and Policy at the University of Minnesota. "That's the reality of today's economy: just-in-time delivery with no surge capacity."

The U.S. government says it is trying to address the problem, elevating the possibility of a flu outbreak to a national security concern. Rajeev Venkayya, a special assistant to President Bush for biodefense, says the pandemic flu threat calls for a national response similar to a "moonshot," alluding to the successful 1960s Apollo program.

President Bush has vowed to spend $2.8 billion to help jump-start development of a next-generation cell-culture flu vaccine. Currently flu vaccine production relies on a decades-old process of growing viruses in individual fertilized chicken eggs. The viruses are inactivated to make a vaccine.

Cell-culture technology means the viruses are grown in living cells -- often mammalian kidney cells -- that multiply on their own. The technology is already used in producing vaccines against hepatitis, chickenpox and shingles. In theory, cell-culture technology should allow manufacturers to produce enough flu vaccine for every American within six months of the start of a pandemic.

The Securities and Exchange Commission recently said it will allow companies to book revenue on sales of vaccines or bioterrorism remedies to the government, even if the companies hold onto the stockpile -- as the U.S. government often prefers. Under current accounting rules, companies must ship the product to record the revenue, a major disincentive for vaccine manufacturers.

DOJ_NMG_0009481

Yet those steps largely fail to address weaknesses in the supply chain. The severe acute respiratory syndrome outbreak in 2003 in Canada offers a case in point. When SARS hit, the country's largest nurses' union complained about a shortage of N95 masks after much of the existing supply was shipped to Asia, where the disease hit hardest.

These masks protect against contracting flu by filtering out at least 95% of certain airborne materials during normal breathing. Some nurses in Canada had to use less-protective masks when caring for SARS patients. Others were rationing the supply. In some cases, they were told to save their masks in plastic bags and reuse them from one shift to the next, Barbara Wahl, former president of the Ontario Nurses' Association, told a Canadian commission investigating SARS in 2003.

The main companies that manufacture the masks -- 3M Co. and Kimberly-Clark Corp. -- had to scramble to meet the sudden demand because, like many companies, they didn't have an existing stockpile.

The outbreak was relatively brief and limited in location -- a minor blip compared with what would likely happen with pandemic flu.

'Albertson's Syndrome'

Supply-chain breakdowns are one reason the economy could go into a tailspin should there be a pandemic flu outbreak. A Congressional Budget Office study of the economic impact of a severe pandemic, released late last year, estimated a nearly $700 billion hit to the U.S. economy, or about a 5% decline in economic output during a one-year span, about equal to a medium-sized recession.

One significant concern is what Michael Leavitt, the secretary of health and human services, described in an interview as the "Albertson's syndrome," referring to the grocery-store chain. At the first sign of panic, all supplies disappear from shelves, something that routinely happens when there is the threat of even a modest storm.

The Grocery Manufacturers Association, which represents food retailers and distributors, estimates that the time it takes for manufacturers and wholesalers to deliver on a retailer's order has shortened to fewer than four days from nearly eight days in 1999. Respondents to an association survey "are targeting even shorter cycle times of three days," the survey said. Rick Blasgen, a former ConAgra Inc. executive and chief executive of the Council of Supply Chain Management Professionals, says food retailers and producers "can't afford just-in-case inventory."

The issue of stockpiling extends beyond food to vaccines. The U.S. government has generally been reluctant to pay companies to produce extra vaccines and create a reserve capacity. It's one reason so many companies have dropped out of vaccine manufacturing. In the case of flu vaccines, there is too much wasted medicine in "good" years, when the flu season isn't severe and people choose not to get vaccinated. Vaccines are tossed away at a loss for the corporations.

"Investors punish companies for having excess capacity they don't use," says Dr. Osterholm.

Today's worrisome flu strain, known as H5N1, has infected and killed millions of poultry, and killed about 70 humans in Asia. Recently it has spread to Turkey and infected at least 15 people there. Nobody knows if the H5N1 virus will mutate in ways that promote human-to-human transmission, which is what health officials fear would trigger a pandemic. A vaccine produced by Sanofi-Aventis SA has proved effective against H5N1 in early trials in humans, but the company hasn't scaled up manufacturing of it. Food and Drug Administration-approved antiviral medications, which could treat exposed individuals, are in short supply.

To some former Pentagon officials working on biodefense on Capitol Hill, the only way for the country to prepare for a possible pandemic is to think of health-care preparedness in military terms. This means moving away from a just-in-time system to planning for a just-in-case scenario in the manner of national-security policy makers.

The Pentagon, for instance, goes through intense planning and pays for reserves of everything from bullets to jet fuel. It even forces rivals to collaborate on Pentagon projects and wields its clout as a buyer of weapons.

Some steps are in motion to take pages out of the Pentagon playbook. A bill introduced last fall by North Carolina Republican Sen. Richard Burr would provide some relaxation of the antitrust laws. It would allow the government to convene meetings with drug makers to discuss manufacturing and distributing biodefense products including those related to pandemic flu.

Current Law

Industry executives say they feel that under current law, companies can't share basic knowledge that would be helpful in planning for an outbreak. "What we're suggesting to the administration is something discretionary and only under declaration of an emergency," says Billy Tauzin, a former congressman from Louisiana who now heads the pharmaceutical industry's leading trade organization.

Mr. Tauzin, though, also hinted at going a tad further, saying it would be helpful if "the administration determines to allow two of our companies to collaborate on a product -- an antiviral or vaccine or similar product." Such proposals might raise worries about collusion in an industry that already enjoys considerable pricing power and patent protection on its products.

Some experts suggest the U.S. government should promise to purchase a fixed amount of flu vaccine -- despite the cost and the likelihood that some of the money would end up being wasted. Canada, for instance, has contracts with vaccine makers to cover most of its population. The largest contract is with ID Biomedical Corp. (recently acquired by GlaxoSmithKline PLC) for about eight million flu vaccine doses per year. That takes much of the risk out of the company's business, but still lets it manufacture additional doses for the private market or for other needy buyers.

DOJ_NMG_0009482

Dr. Osterholm has called for a program of "critical product continuity" to see the U.S. through the worst of pandemic disruption. He proposes identifying items that are essential to people's health and safety and then finding a way, possibly through government funding or tax incentives, to create emergency stocks or extra production capacity for them. High on his list of "critical products" are tools for fighting flu itself, such as face masks, ventilators to help the sickest patients survive and syringes to administer a vaccine if one becomes available.

In a pandemic, Dr. Osterholm says, "if we don't sell automobiles or jewelry...that wouldn't be the same as running out of critical medicines." He likens his idea to the well-equipped fire departments at international airports, which don't respond to many crises but are ready if a plane crashes.

Dr. Osterholm, who also is associate director of the Department of Homeland Security's National Center for Food Protection and Defense, says the country also needs reliable supplies of food and water, the ability to keep heat working in northern climates and medical products for non-flu-related illnesses. The U.S. has 105,000 ventilators, most of which at any given time are in use. The federal stockpile of medical products has about 4,500 more. In a pandemic, tens of thousands more would be needed.

The federal government has allocated grants worth $5 billion over three years to states and hospitals to increase medical preparedness, including surge capacity at hospitals. But the money was used for other priorities as well, such as improving medical labs and disease surveillance. Not all of it has been spent.

"You can't plan for a surge capacity in an emergency room of 500 or 1,000 patients from the 20 you see in a day," says Michael Bishop, a Bloomington, Ind., emergency physician who used to be on the board of directors for the national trade association for emergency physicians. "Nobody could afford to do that. You can't have 10 doctors and 100 nurses sitting around waiting for something to happen."

Eminent Domain Laws Get First State High Court Test Since U.S. Supreme Court Ruling (LAW/AP)

By Andrew Welsh-huggins, The Associated Press

AP, January 12, 2006

Ohio Supreme Court heard arguments Wednesday pitting a suburban Cincinnati city against a couple trying to save their home in a long-anticipated hearing that included a rare outburst of applause by spectators.

The city of Norwood is trying to use eminent domain to seize remaining properties for a developer who wants to build a $125 million project of offices, shops and restaurants. The city says the tax revenue will boost its economic fortunes.

Homeowners Carl and Joy Gamble say the city abused its authority to seize property by declaring the neighborhood deteriorating, a less severe condition than blighted.

The case is the first challenge of property rights laws to reach a state high court since the U.S. Supreme Court last summer allowed municipalities to seize homes for use by a private developer.

Property rights' advocates, business groups and backers of city planning are watching the Ohio case because of the precedent it could set as more than a dozen states consider bans against governments taking homes to boost economic development.

A decision is expected by summer.

At issue was this line from the Ohio Constitution: "Private property ought and shall ever be held inviolate, but always subservient to the public welfare."

Visiting Judge James Brogan challenged the Gambles' attorney to explain what the court should do given last summer's U.S. Supreme Court decision.

"What's the principled way for this court to decide under the Ohio Constitution that it guarantees more protection to the property owner -- property rights -- than the U.S. Supreme Court was prepared to do?" said Brogan, sitting in for Justice Alice Robie Resnick, who excused herself from the case without giving a reason.

Attorney Dana Berliner said the state leaders who wrote Ohio's constitution recognized there were times when property would have to be subservient to public needs.

"But they were also saying those were important rights. That's something that's not in the U.S. Constitution," she said.

Timothy Burke, a lawyer representing Norwood, said deterioration is a common measure when applied to redevelopment projects in cities.

"Deteriorating is a legitimate standard to be used in determining whether or not an urban renewal project and use of eminent domain is appropriate," he told the court.

DOJ_NMG_0009483

Lawrence Elleman, an attorney for the Norwood developers, said the city's law was very specific in its definition of a rundown neighborhood, including things like "faulty street arrangements," or dead-end streets.

That caught the interest of Chief Justice Thomas Moyer.

Many older neighborhoods have streets that could be called "faulty in their design," said Moyer, who himself lives in Bexley, an older Columbus suburb. "But people like living on those streets."

Berliner said the city's standard was far too vague and could apply to almost any neighborhood in Ohio.

"As the members of this court drive home today, I ask you to think about which of the dozens of neighborhoods you pass would not be deteriorating under Norwood's definition," Berliner said.

At one point, Brogan asked Burke why the court should pay so much deference to a city council that stands to make $2 million a year in revenue from the project.

Burke responded that the responsibility for determining land use is up to local elected officials.

"They've lived there all their lives, they've walked those neighborhoods, they've seen how it has changed," he said.

That prompted Justice Maureen O'Connor to ask, "Couldn't the same argument be made for the homeowners?"

Several people attending the hearing in support of the Gambles laughed and applauded, leading to a gentle rebuke from Moyer: "Please, do your applauding outside."

Justice Judith Ann Lanzinger said she was concerned about the origin of the developer's plan.

"Does it make any difference that it appears that the private developer was the one that started this ball rolling?" she said. "Should it be of concern when we're talking about whether this is truly public use or if it's private use with public incidental benefit?"

Burke said the question is moot because the development ultimately was the product of lengthy deliberations between the city and Rookwood Partners.

"In the end, I don't think it makes any difference who initiates it," he said.

Appeals Court Takes Up 2003 Meskwaki Election Case (AP)

AP, January 12, 2006

IOWA CITY, Iowa -- A federal appeals court in St. Louis was scheduled to hear arguments Thursday on whether a lower court judge erred by dismissing a lawsuit challenging the Meskwaki tribal elections in 2003.

The lawsuit stems from an internal power struggle that began nearly three years ago when the Meskwaki tribal council and its chairman, Alex Walker Jr., were overthrown by a new set of leaders. The new council, led by Homer Bear Jr., was picked by the tribe's hereditary chief after Walker's council ignored recall petitions.

The ensuing political dispute played out in state and federal courts and led to a costly, seven-month shutdown of the Meskwaki casino, located on the tribal settlement west of Tama. The tribe, with 1,200 members, officially is known as the Sac and Fox of the Mississippi in Iowa.

The dispute ultimately was settled after tribal members participated in a series of elections overseen by the federal Bureau of Indian Affairs.

As a result, four Walker council members were removed and the Bear council was put in power. The casino reopened in December 2003.

The lawsuit before the 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals originally was filed in 2004 by the election officials appointed by Walker.

In their lawsuit, Walker supporters argue that the BIA mishandled oversight of the election and illegally interfered in the process. They also claim that Aurene Martin, assistant secretary of the BIA, violated agency policy when she rejected an appeal of the election results.

In March, U.S. District Judge Linda Reade, in Cedar Rapids, threw out the lawsuit, saying it was a matter for tribal courts to decide. Walker supporters are appealing that decision.

In briefs filed with the court, the Walker supporters suggest BIA officials may have been influenced by lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who was hired by the Bear council after the elections. Abramoff made headlines last week when he pleaded guilty to charges of influence peddling.

"Was improper pressure applied and influence wielded at the agency level?" wrote attorney Fred Dorr, who is representing Walker supporters.

Justice Department attorney Elizabeth Peterson argued that Reade was correct in dismissing the case, citing repeated appeals court rulings protecting tribal sovereignty.

DOJ_NMG_0009484

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Some Crack Cocaine Prison Terms Shorter Since Ruling On Sentencing Guidelines, Study Says (AP)

By Mark Sherman, ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, January 11, 2006

WASHINGTON – Some federal judges are handing out shorter prison terms for crack cocaine crimes since last year's Supreme Court decision giving judges more discretion in sentencing, a report said Wednesday.

Defendants in the study received prison terms averaging 11 years, but those terms were less than what is called for in 20-year-old sentencing guidelines, according to the Sentencing Project, a nonpartisan group that backs alternatives to lengthy prison sentences.

The Supreme Court ruled a year ago that judges do not have to follow the sentencing guidelines.

The analysis focused on crack because the congressionally established guidelines punish some crack cocaine offenses more severely than powder cocaine offenses. A person must possess 100 times more powder cocaine than crack cocaine to receive a comparable sentence, under the guidelines.

The report looked at a very small sample of 24 cases in which judges wrote opinions explaining the prison sentence and cited the Supreme Court ruling. There were more than 5,400 people sentenced for crack offenses in 2003, the latest year for which statistics are available.

"When judges are given flexibility to consider the full merits of each case, they are likely to impose stiff penalties for serious offenses, but will distinguish these from cases in which the defendant is less culpable or less of a threat to public safety," co-authors Ryan King and Marc Mauer wrote.

Still, a federal appeals court last week overturned the sentences in two Rhode Island cases included in the study, ruling that U.S. District Judge Ernest Torres impermissibly substituted a 20-to-1 ratio for Congress' 100-to-1 ratio. The defendants received five years, four months and 15 1/2 years, respectively, when the guidelines called for at least seven years, three months and 19 1/2 years, respectively.

Prosecutors also have appealed other cases, including one in West Virginia in which Brian Moreland was given a 10-year sentence for selling crack worth $450 when the guidelines set a range of 30 years to life in prison. U.S. District Judge Joseph R. Goodwin said the harsher sentence for Moreland "would not only be unreasonable, but also unconscionable."

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has warned of growing disparity in jail terms and "a drift toward lesser sentences" since the court ruling.

Congress created the guidelines in the 1980s mainly to reduce disparities between judges. But the high court said making the guidelines mandatory violated a defendant's Sixth Amendment right to a jury trial because they call for judges to make factual decisions that could add to prison time, such as the amount of drugs involved in a crime.

Under the Supreme Court ruling, the guidelines now are only advisory. As a result, federal judges are free to sentence convicted criminals as they see fit, but they may be subject to reversal if appeals courts find them "unreasonable."

Judges Show More Leniency On Crack Cocaine (WSJ)

By Gary Fields

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON -- In the wake of the Supreme Court's decision a year ago making sentencing guidelines advisory rather than requirements to be followed, some federal judges appear to be giving more lenient sentences in cases involving crack cocaine, according to an analysis released yesterday.

The study by the Sentencing Project, a Washington research and advocacy group for criminal-justice policy, may reinvigorate the debate about the racial disparity in sentences for crack-cocaine defendants, who are primarily minorities, and powder-cocaine defendants, who are more likely to be white and more affluent.

The study examined 24 crack-cocaine cases in which judges explicitly discussed the reasoning behind their sentencing decisions in the context of the 2005 Supreme Court ruling that allowed them to use the sentencing guidelines as advisory rather than as requirements.

In 21 of the 24 cases, the judges sentenced defendants to less time than they likely could have received under the sentencing guidelines. Under the guidelines, for instance, a person who possesses five grams of crack cocaine will get the same sentence as someone who sells 500 grams of powder cocaine -- although there is little physiological difference in the two.

DOJ_NMG_0009485

Sen. Jeff Sessions, an Alabama Republican, said he intended to introduce a bill this year that will propose changing the law to reduce the disparity between the amounts of crack cocaine and powder cocaine necessary to give a defendant the same sentence. He and Utah Republican Sen. Orrin Hatch co-authored a bill in 2003 that would have reduced the disparity to 20-to-1 -- from 100-to-1 -- but it got little support.

"I still believe the guidelines are not appropriate on crack and powder cocaine," said Sen. Sessions. "I think we need to make some improvements there based on the reality of what's going on in the courts of America. This study does seem to indicate that judges would tend more to the 20-to-one ratio rather than 100-to-one."

The Sentencing Commission, which declined to comment on the study, has long supported altering its guidelines on crack-cocaine crimes to bring the penalties and amounts more in line with powder cocaine. In 1995, the Sentencing Commission sent Congress an amendment which would have equalized the penalties on the two forms of cocaine, but Congress rejected the amendment. Similar recommendations from the commission in 1997 and 2002 were ignored by Congress.

At least two of the cases highlighted in the study have been overturned by appeals courts in the past week. In one case, Rhode Island Chief District Court Judge Ernest Torres sentenced a crack-cocaine defendant to just over five years in prison, although the sentencing guidelines called for him to be sentenced to between seven and 12 years.

In handing down the sentence, the judge wrote that the 100-to-1 ratio was "excessive" and "not reasonable." However, a three-judge panel on the First Circuit Court of Appeals in Boston ruled last week that Mr. Torres had erred in handing down the sentence.

"Laboring in uncharted waters, the lower court jettisoned the guidelines and constructed a new sentencing range," the appeals court wrote.

Drugs And Racial Discrimination (NYT)

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

The mandatory sentencing laws that have swept this country since the 70's have clearly done more harm than good. The inmate population has skyrocketed, driving prison costs to bankrupting levels, while having no impact at all on the drug problem. By taking away judicial discretion, the laws have led the country to write off first-time offenders who might have deserved second chances and to imprison addicts who could otherwise have been effectively and less expensively handled through treatment programs.

The laws have also discriminated against members of minority groups, who are disproportionately singled out for harsher mandatory sentences, often because of where they live. That issue has come into sharp focus in New Jersey, where a panel of criminal justice officials has recommended that the state revise a law that mandates more severe sentences for people convicted of certain drug crimes committed within 1,000 feet of school property.

The law appears to have had no impact at all on the actual pattern of drug dealing. But it has created a profoundly discriminatory sentencing pattern, which treats minority defendants unfairly while undermining confidence in the criminal justice system.

Offenders who live in cities, where populations are dense and the schools numerous, tend to fall under the drug-free-zone laws, not because they peddle drugs to minors, but because they live near schools. Offenders who live in suburban and rural areas, where drug abuse is just as common but where schools are more spread out, tend to fall outside the law, so they receive lighter sentences.

As a consequence, the report found, just about every offender incarcerated for a drug-free-zone offense in New Jersey is either black or Hispanic, even though those two groups make up only about a quarter of the population. Not a single one of the offenders had sold drugs to a minor, and fewer than 2 percent had actually committed offenses on school property.

The so-called urban effect of these laws is hardly unique to New Jersey. More than 30 states have passed such laws since the 1980's, thus turning whole swaths of largely black and Hispanic urban areas into extra-penalty zones. Though widely emulated around the nation, the 1,000-foot rule appears arbitrary and without basis in law. The New Jersey panel's study wisely recommends reducing the size of the zones and changing the law so it actually targets the few people who sell drugs at or near schools - without discriminating against minorities.

The broader message of this study is that the country can't just imprison its way out of the drug problem. Coping with this issue - while reducing prison costs - will require a complex set of strategies, including drug abuse treatment and prevention services and increased judicial discretion in sentencing.

News Elicits Sadness, Not Shock (WP)

By Eric M. Weiss And Robert E. Pierre

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0009486

The news that D.C. Council member Marion Barry failed a court-ordered drug test in the fall drew sighs, prayers and a call for him to take a leave from his council seat. But at his old haunts and among his constituents, what was missing yesterday was a sense of surprise.

For many, this is the fourth decade of the sometimes rocky, sometimes inspiring marriage between Barry, the former four-term mayor who now represents Ward 8 on the council, and the residents of his adopted city. If there was one feeling, it was an amalgam of sadness, empathy and deja vu.

"I just think it's a damn shame," said Addie Cook, who had been among the Union Temple Baptist Church members who welcomed him back after he served six months for cocaine possession following his 1990 arrest at the Vista Hotel, where he was videotaped smoking crack.

Sources said Barry tested positive for cocaine during routine screening in connection with his guilty plea to two misdemeanor tax charges in October.

Yesterday, Barry held a news conference as he was being discharged from Howard University Hospital but would not discuss the drug test. During his two-day hospital stay, he was treated for diabetes and hypertension, said his doctor, Robert H. Williams, who appeared at Barry's side. The 69-year-old former mayor and civil rights leader is also a cancer survivor.

When asked whether Barry's condition was affected by the presence of any illegal drugs, Williams said: "I know nothing about that. I've told you what we treated him for, and that is a fact. We treated him for those two conditions and those conditions only."

Barry, wearing a black overcoat and a fedora, looked vibrant. He said he was in good spirits. "My lawyer has instructed me or anybody else not to have any comments on anything outside my medical situation," Barry said.

Regarding his medical treatment, he said: "I didn't wish these things on me. I find it very disturbing that a person can't have simple medical procedures without you all sensationalizing it. People suffer every day. I empathize with them."

The drug test that Barry failed was required as a part of a pre-sentencing investigation, said two sources familiar with the case. Now he is undergoing voluntary drug testing as part of his private treatment to help establish that he is making an effort to stay drug free, said the sources, who asked not to be named because the case is pending.

For many in the city yesterday, their first reaction was to wish Barry luck in his continuing struggles with drugs.

"If the reports are true, my heart goes out to Marion," Mayor Anthony A. Williams (D) said in a statement. "I hope he is able to get the help he needs and to take care of his health."

One Ward 8 leader said that should be a higher priority than his council work.

"He cannot help people in Ward 8 until he helps himself. That should be his number one priority," said longtime activist Phillip Pannell, who suggested Barry take a leave of absence from the D.C. Council. "He needs to be away from politics, away from the phone and staff, and deal with his health situation."

Others, however, said Barry has been productive in the last year, advocating for the city's poorest ward.

"He's in the mix," said Arrington Dixon, a former member of the D.C. Council who lives and works in Ward 8. "That's what we want him to be."

But regulars at Players Lounge, one of Barry's favorite haunts, said the former mayor often drinks there, even though he has admitted to abusing alcohol in the past.

Barry's tax case involved his failure to pay most of his federal and D.C. income taxes for six years after his fourth term as mayor ended in January 1999. Prosecutors said he received more than $530,000 in income over the six years but did not document most of it.

Richard A. Houck Jr., chief of the U.S. probation office in the District, said yesterday that he could not discuss specifics of Barry's case. He said it's clear, however, because of Barry's guilty plea to tax charges Oct. 28, that the probation office would -- and did -- conduct a routine pre-sentencing investigation of his situation.

In such investigations, defendants awaiting sentencing are automatically screened for seven drugs, including marijuana and cocaine, according to the office's protocol, and defendants generally are asked to submit to the testing immediately or shortly after their first court appearance.

"Mr. Barry was not singled out," Houck said. "This is our routine . . . . The whole pre-sentence process is about us determining the circumstances of an individual -- their past, their present."

Cocaine typically remains in a person's urine and can be detected in standard drug tests for 48 to 72 hours after use, according to screening experts. If a defendant fails a drug test, the probation office's pre-sentencing report will include that information. The report is confidentially shared with the judge and lawyers several weeks before the sentencing hearing. But the probation office does not typically request additional tests.

"In this kind of case, we are not supervising an individual," he said. "We are investigating him."

DOJ_NMG_0009487

In Barry's case, prosecutors could choose to scrap a plea agreement on the tax charges because a failed drug test could be viewed as a breach of the agreement. But unless there's a pattern of continuing drug use, it is unusual in such cases for prosecutors to do so.

U.S. Magistrate Judge Deborah A. Robinson has discretion in deciding whether Barry's infraction merits jail time or other sanctions at sentencing. Houck said some defendants who have failed a drug test were ordered to undergo drug treatment and prove their progress through subsequent testing. If the drug use continued, some have faced additional jail time or more restrictions.

Many of Barry's Ward 8 constituents said the latest revelation about drug use sent the wrong message to young people whom he has long championed.

Hannah Hawkins, who runs the Children of Mine after-school program, said she addressed some teenagers in her program who suggested that the former mayor might have been set up.

"He knew what he was doing was wrong," she said she told them. "He let the youth down. Very few people, especially in Ward 8, have been loved and respected by our youth as much as he has."

The few council colleagues who agreed to talk about Barry's situation used the vocabulary of addiction and recovery.

"If it's true, I look at it as a message for those who are struggling with their own demons and have spouses or loved ones in the same situation," said council member Jim Graham (D-Ward 1), who has had his own struggles with drinking. He said that Jan. 30 will mark his 29th year of being sober.

"Even after many, many relapses, the fact that he is in treatment is a good thing," Graham said. "I'm not making excuses for him. He will be judged by others."

If Barry is incarcerated, he would not have to give up his council seat and could even introduce legislation from his jail cell, but he could not cast council votes, according to D.C. Council rules.

Barry would have to relinquish his council seat only if convicted of a felony, said Charlotte Brookins-Hudson, the council's general counsel. Barry pleaded guilty to a misdemeanor tax charge.

Marion Barry's Decision (WP)

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

IF CITIZEN JOHN DOE failed a drug test ordered by a court after he pleaded guilty to misdemeanor tax charges, there is little likelihood that the matter would be up for discussion on this page. But when the case involves a public official who has sworn to uphold the law, the issue becomes a matter of public concern. The case takes on even greater significance when the official has a history of run-ins with the law, including a record of illegal drug use. Such is the case with D.C. Council member and former mayor Marion Barry (D), who, as The Post reported yesterday, tested positive for cocaine use in a court-ordered drug test after his tax case plea in the fall.

It's likely that news of Mr. Barry's failed drug test has provoked a collective groan throughout a city that over the years has been forced to live through episode after episode of the four-term mayor's personal troubles. The District, however, has managed to survive Mr. Barry's behavior in the past, and the city can be expected to do so again. The more important question has to do with Mr. Barry himself. Already scheduled to be sentenced for failing to file tax returns, Mr. Barry is now looking at the possibility of going to jail for the maximum 18 months because he failed the terms of his release on the tax charges. Regardless of whether he serves time or receives some other court-ordered sanction, two larger questions are on the table: Can Marion Barry overcome the demons within that drive his self-destructive behavior? Is he up to the job of representing the residents of Ward 8 on the D.C. Council?

If, as has been reported, Mr. Barry has started treatment for drug use, that is an important step -- though one he has taken before, with much fanfare. If the council member successfully completes treatment and remains drug-free, he, and the city, will be better for it. In the meantime, the Ward 8 constituents who sent him to the D.C. Council are without the effective representation they deserve. That, of course, has been the problem that has plagued the nation's capital during Marion Barry's 30-year political career: His scrapes and infractions with the law have drawn him -- as they continue to draw him -- away from the demands of his public office.

Mr. Barry regards himself as a survivor and a person who, at 69, is still up to the rigors of public service. But this latest bout with the law and drugs -- and the unresolved questions of his future -- ought to lead Mr. Barry to consider the interests of Ward 8 and the city and to ask himself if the time has come to finish his course as a public servant. We know that personal considerations probably weigh heavily in the balance. However, Marion Barry, in our view, needs less time in the public limelight so he can devote more attention to the problems of Marion Barry. He has the opportunity to step aside so that others may step up to the task of public service. He should take it.

DOJ_NMG_0009488

POLICE BLOTTER (FLJOURNAL)

By Marjory Raymer

The Flint Journal, January 12, 2006

FLINT - Ten people were arrested in drug raids on three homes Sunday as part of a special initiative paid for through a federal grant.

Police searched east-side homes at 1277 Broadway Ave., 1610 Bennett Ave. and 3009 Dakota Ave. with warrants after drug buys at the homes, according to a news release from Flint Police Chief Gary Hagler.

Police seized $1,866 in cash, $1,000 worth of cocaine, $150 worth of marijuana, $100 worth of heroin and $100 worth of ecstasy in the raids.

The 10 arrested face a total of 13 felony and 19 misdemeanor charges.

The sweep by the force's Crime Area Target Team and Community Policing was part of the federally funded Weed and Seed Program, which targets blighted areas to reduce crime and promote economic revitalization.

The U.S. Justice Department awarded $225,000 to the United Way for the program on the east side of Flint earlier this year. It was the third such grant.

U.S. Finds California-Mexico Tunnel (CNN)

CNN.com, January 11, 2006

(CNN) -- U.S. border patrol agents investigating a caved-in road discovered a tunnel linking the United States and Mexico, the third such passage found in three years near the San Ysidro, California, crossing, authorities said Wednesday.

Lauren Mack, a spokeswoman for U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement agency, said agents found the 35-foot long, 3-foot-by-3-foot tunnel on Monday.

"It's unclear what it was used for, but inside we found trash and other evidence indicating people had been inside recently," Mack said.

That evidence has given investigators good leads, she added.

The tunnel -- which Mack described as "primitive" -- surfaced in U.S. territory in a strip of land between the border fence and a public parking lot. It's just west of the San Ysidro port of entry into the United States, one of the busiest land border posts in the world, she said.

A longer, more sophisticated tunnel was discovered in the same area in 2003, when a man was spotted lifting bales of marijuana from it and loading them into a pickup, Mack said. A tunnel found in 2004 was a link to the sophisticated underground passage, she added.

Tightened border security since the September 11, 2001, attacks is the likely cause for an increase in U.S. to Mexico tunneling, Mack said. At least 15 tunnels have been found in California and Arizona since 9/11, she said.

"We've now got a dedicated tunnel task force, which works with the [Drug Enforcement Administration] and border patrol to proactively look for tunnels," Mack explained.

Another Suspension For Skeleton Team (NYT)

By Lynn Zinser And Bill Pennington

The New York Times, January 11, 2006

The top competitor on the United States men's skeleton team, Zach Lund, was suspended yesterday after testing positive for a masking agent at a World Cup event last month in Europe.

Also yesterday, a New York Supreme Court judge declined to overturn the suspension of the United States skeleton coach, Tim Nardiello.

The international skeleton federation suspended Lund pending the outcome of an investigation by the United States Anti-Doping Agency.

Jim Shea Sr., president of the United States Bobsled and Skeleton Federation, confirmed that Lund, who holds the No. 1 ranking in the world, tested positive for using Propecia, an anti-baldness drug.

"It's on the banned list; no question, he screwed up," Shea said in a telephone interview. "He lost his spot on the World Cup team, and it's possible he won't be able to go to the Games. On a personal level, it's so sad. He's worked so hard to get here. I know Zach Lund, and I know Zach Lund is not a cheat."

Lund, 27, was preparing for a World Cup competition in Germany yesterday and could not be reached for comment. His father, Mac Lund, said in a telephone interview from his home in Salt Lake City that his son had been using an anti-baldness product for several years.

DOJ_NMG_0009489

"Zach began taking a hair restorer product, pro something, I don't remember the exact name, about six years ago," Mac Lund said. "I don't know whether he still takes it or if he stopped."

Propecia has been listed as a prohibited substance by both the United States and international anti-doping agencies for more than a year because it can act as a masking agent for steroids. Propecia contains finasteride, which is also banned as a masking agent. In some studies, finasteride has been found to prevent the detection of certain steroids like nandrolone and testosterone.

Last October, the Canadian bobsledder Giulio Zardo was suspended for two years for refusing to submit to a drug test. Zardo had quit the Canadian team despite being an Olympic gold-medal contender after a drug sample he gave in March 2005 tested positive for finasteride, according to a report in The Toronto Star. Zardo said he had been taking Propecia since 2000 for hair loss.

It is not yet clear whether Lund's positive test, which was administered by the international federation after a competition in December, has been forwarded to the United States Anti-Doping Agency, which generally adjudicates positive tests by American athletes.

Lund had previously disclosed taking Propecia on his drug-testing profile, but it is unclear whether Lund's previously declared use of the anti-balding drug sufficiently explains the positive test, or how harsh his penalty would be if he was found guilty of its use. Any lengthy suspension would rule Lund out of the Olympics, which begin Feb. 10 in Turin, Italy. U.S.A.D.A. officials declined to comment on the case yesterday.

The United States Olympic team for Turin has been hit by a string of incidents that could leave it depleted. The figure skater Michelle Kwan has pulled out of the national championships and would need to petition for a place on that team, and Bode Miller, the country's top skier, is in trouble with his federation for comments he made about alcohol use.

Lund has been a vocal supporter of Nardiello since his suspension was announced Dec. 31. Yesterday, New York Supreme Court Judge James Dawson upheld that suspension, which came in the wake of sexual harassment accusations by several athletes. Nardiello had hoped for an injunction that would allow him to rejoin the skeleton team for this weekend's World Cup event in Königssee, Germany, but Dawson ruled that Nardiello must instead follow the procedures set forth in the bobsled and skeleton federation's handbook, which call for an internal hearing or binding arbitration.

Dan Goodwin, vice president and counsel for the federation, said Nardiello's lawyer, James Brooks, and federation representatives had tentatively scheduled the arbitration hearing for Monday and Tuesday. The sides must first agree on an independent arbiter.

"We're on a fast track, expediency is important," Goodwin said. "Still, we must be sensitive to make sure it's fair for everybody, not just the coach but for those making the complaints. Arbitration is the right forum. We will be putting out all the facts and evidence."

Alan Howard, a lawyer for the federation, said yesterday that there were multiple complaints against Nardiello and that those who had made accusations were being invited to attend the hearing.

Brooks ruled out an appeal of Dawson's decision.

Skeleton Racer Lund Suspended After Dope Test (REU)

Reuters, January 12, 2006

LONDON (Reuters) - America's skeleton world number one Zach Lund has been suspended by the International Bobsleigh and Tobogganing Federation (FIBT) pending an investigation into a positive drugs test at a World Cup event last month.

"He has been suspended pending the completion of an investigation by the appropriate agencies in the U.S., namely the U.S. Anti-Doping Agency (USADA) which is a sanctioned entity of WADA (World Anti-Doping Agency)," FIBT media officer Donald Krone said on Wednesday.

Lund, 26, tested positive for anti-baldness drug Propecia, which is on the banned list because it can act as a masking agent. He could now miss the Winter Olympics in Turin, starting on February 10.

"It's on the banned list -- no question he screwed up," U.S. Bobsled and Skeleton Federation President Jim Shea Sr., told the New York Times.

"He has lost his spot on the World Cup team and it's possible he won't be able to go to the Games.

"On a personal level, it's so sad. He's worked so hard to get here. I know Zach Lund, and I know Zach Lund is not a cheat."

Lund's father Mac told the newspaper his son had started using an anti-baldness product about six years ago.

Suspended Racer Optimistic (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0009490

One day after he was suspended for testing positive for a masking agent at a World Cup event, Zach Lund, the top slider on the United States skeleton team, expressed optimism about his chances of being reinstated for the Olympics.

"I have all the hope in the world," Lund said yesterday. "Until they tell me I'm not going, I'm going to believe I'm going to the Olympics. I know I'm an Olympian."

The Winter Olympics begin Feb. 10 in Turin, Italy.

The United States Bobsled and Skeleton Federation confirmed that Lund, who is ranked No. 1 in the world, tested positive for using Propecia, an anti-baldness drug. Propecia contains finasteride, which is also banned as a masking agent.

Lund said he had taken hair-restoration products since 1999 and had always declared them on his medical forms. The United States federation granted him a Therapeutic Use Exemption, which provides a way for athletes to use some banned medications.

"For anyone to think he's using this to mask anything is ridiculous," the skeleton coach, Tim Nardiello, said. "Zach is the best skeleton slider in the world right now, and it would be a crime for anyone to think this of him."

Nardiello has run into problems himself after several female athletes accused him of sexual harassment. He has been placed on paid administrative leave, and on Tuesday a New York State Supreme Court judge refused to reinstate him.

Lund received a letter from the International Bobsleigh and Skeleton Federation provisionally suspending him until a hearing Jan. 20 or Jan. 23.

Yesterday, Lund said his lawyer, Howard Jacobs, was encouraged after meeting with officials from the United States Anti-Doping Agency.

2 Men Schemed To Drive Black Family Out Of Home, Indictment Says (REU)

By Niraj Warikoo

Reuters, January 12, 2006

DETROIT - Two Taylor, Mich., men - angry that an African-American family moved onto their block - hatched a plot to drive them out by burning down their house, said federal officials in an indictment released Wednesday.

In detail reminiscent of the Jim Crow era, the federal filing describes how at least two white men conspired to terrorize a Downriver family simply because of their race.

One night in July 2002, the two men, Wayland Mullins and Michael Richardson, gathered at the home of Mullins' mother in Taylor. Across from that home, the Doster family had recently purchased a house.

The two white men plotted that night to burn down the Doster's house "in order to frighten them and prevent them from moving into their new home," the indictment reads.

The men are charged with violating the Doster's civil and housing rights because of their race. They also are charged with conspiring to lie to investigators about their role in the hate crime, and the use of a fire in committing a felony. Each of the four counts carries a maximum sentence of 10 years in prison and a $250,000 fine.

The men "were seeking to keep minorities out of their neighborhood by the most violent means available," said U.S. Attorney Stephen Murphy, the top law enforcement officials in southeastern Michigan. "We have poured as many resources as we can in this particular case to try to rectify that."

After an upswing in hate crimes over the past year, Murphy has said he wants to crack down on bias crimes in metro Detroit.

The Doster family put up with years of racial harassment in their home, including racially charged graffiti, the arson and insults. Fed up with the abuse, Reginald Doster, a computer administrator, moved out in August 2005 along with his wife and daughter.

After the two suspects held their meeting on July 28, 2002, they, along with some other unidentified men, walked over to the Doster home. Then, "they broke a window at the back of the house, poured gasoline into the home, and ignited the gasoline, causing fire and smoke damage to the house," says the indictment.

In ensuing months, the two men lied to Taylor police and the FBI, say federal prosecutors. At one point, Richardson tried to finger an innocent man in the arson. Richardson is currently serving a four-year sentence in prison for misleading investigators in the arson. His attorney, James Gerometta, a federal public defender, could not be reached for comment Wednesday.

In the spring and summer of 2004, Richardson told agents he would try to secretly record conversations between himself and Mullins that would make Mullins guilty. But Richardson then told Mullins he was wearing a transmitter so that he wouldn't say anything that would get him charged, the indictment says.

Mullins could not be reached Wednesday. It is unclear whether Mullins has an attorney, Murphy said. He is scheduled to appear in court Friday.

More men may be involved in the arson, Murphy said, so federal agents are still investigating the case.

DOJ_NMG_0009491

Dearborn Heights Drug Bust (WXYZ-TV)

By Glenda Lewis

WXYZ-TV, ABC 7, Detroit, January 11, 2006

Wednesday, 5 men were arrested after the ATF and local law enforcement officials set up a sting to catch them robbing a pharmacy.

Michigan Pharmacy was previously robbed of $15,000 worth on controlled substances.

ATF agent Vera Fedorak, who participated in the sting, said "Obviously it's a concern for the community, ATF and the local law enforcement."

The robber came into the Dearborn Heights pharmacy with what he said was a bomb. ATF agents and local law enforcement were on the premise, with one posing as the store owner. They were able to apprehend one man at the pharmacy and also 4 others.

Michigan Pharmacy owner Khalid Saad said he was glad to help ATF agents catch the men who had been robbing his store.

The drug sting may result in federal charges.

Wilcox Sentenced To Federal Prison (CLEVEDB)

By GREG KAYLOR, Banner Staff Writer

Cleveland (TN) Daily Banner, January 11, 2006

A Polk County man who plead guilty last October to possessing an explosive device has been sentenced to 5 1/2 years in a federal prison by a federal judge.

U.S. District Court Judge Curtis L. Collier sentenced Danny M. Wilcox, 39, of Reliance, late last week, according to Carl Maskew, Bradley County Sheriff's Office liaison with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms.

Wilcox is one of three people arrested and charged with the crime.

Wilcox and his alleged accomplice, Glenda Cross, 41, took part in assembling the device that investigators learned was to be used in a murder plot against the ex-husband of Cross.

"BCSO's Criminal Investigations Unit received a tip on Nov. 5, 2004 of a possible explosive device at a residence in the Dalton Pike Trailer Park," said Bob Gault, media relations officer for BCSO.

When deputies checked the residence, an "improvised explosive device" was found, Gault added. Officials set up a perimeter around the trailer park and evacuated more than a dozen residences within close proximity of the device.

Two bomb squad officers from the Cleveland Police Department and ATF agents removed the device and detonated it in a nearby field.

"Investigation revealed a plot to use the device against Cross' former husband, leading to her arrest and that of Jerry L Adams, 38, for attempted first-degree murder, conspiracy to commit first-degree murder, and possession of a prohibited weapon," said Gault.

Adams plead guilty in state court to conspiracy to commit second-degree murder and possession of an explosive. He is serving an eight-year sentence at the Tennessee Department of Corrections, noted Gault.

Cross is due back in Bradley County Criminal Court for a March 6 hearing.

n CPD TeleServe Officer Tom Castello filed a report for the owner of a local car wash concerning the theft of change.

According to the report filed Monday, Barry Massengill stated someone had removed money from several computerized cash machines at his North Lee Highway business.

The incident was believed to have been occurring during late December, until Sunday.

No sign of forced entry was noted, according to the report.

The Criminal Investigations Division is in charge of the investigation.

IMMIGRATION:

12 Indicted In Alien Smuggling (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, January 12, 2006

Three suspected ringleaders of two major alien-smuggling organizations and nine accomplices have been indicted by a Texas federal grand jury on charges of trucking more than 600 illegals from the El Paso area to Dallas and beyond during the past two years.

DOJ_NMG_0009492

All but three of the gang members were taken into custody this week by U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) agents, assisted by the U.S. Border Patrol. Two of the gang members were identified in indictments unsealed Friday, and another is in La Tuna Federal Correctional Institution on a previous alien-smuggling conviction.

"These unscrupulous smugglers operate ruthlessly and with no regard for the human beings whose lives they endanger," said ICE special agent in charge Kyle Hutchins, who heads the agency's El Paso field office. "During this investigation, our special agents encountered various groups with 35 to 79 people crammed in trailers for the nonstop nine-hour trip to Dallas from El Paso with no food and limited water.

"The only way to enter or exit the trailers was through trailer doors, which were sometimes padlocked," Mr. Hutchins said.

The gang members were identified as residents of El Paso County and Dallas. The arrests culminated a two-year undercover investigation.

ICE spokesman Dean Boyd said Mike Price, 53, his wife, Fabiola del Carmen Moguel de Price, 39, and Sam Jarvis, 52, headed two separate organizations that generated more than $1.6 million in smuggling fees between March 2003 and October 2005.

He said Mr. Jarvis and the Prices, all of Socorro, Texas, originally worked together, but the Prices left the Jarvis organization in 2003 to establish their own alien-smuggling enterprise.

Mr. Boyd said one of the smuggling loads intercepted included 28 illegal aliens that Ronald Dean Anglin, 54, a co-leader of the Price organization, attempted to sneak past a Border Patrol checkpoint near Sierra Blanca, Texas. The aliens were concealed in a large plywood box covered with a blue tarp on top of a flatbed trailer, he said.

Mr. Jarvis purportedly offered drivers of 18-wheel rigs $300 for each illegal alien they concealed and hauled to the Dallas area in their trailers.

Mr. Boyd said the two gangs smuggled Brazilians, Colombians, Hondurans, Salvadorans, Guatemalans, Nicaraguans, Ecuadoreans and Mexicans. Depending on the nationality, he said, the gangs charged each alien between $1,500 and $6,000 to be smuggled into the United States and later brought to Arizona, Colorado, Oklahoma, Illinois, Florida and New York.

Both organizations housed the aliens in "drop houses" throughout El Paso County after smuggling them into the United States from Ciudad Juarez, Mexico, Mr. Boyd said.

He said Mr. Price, his wife and Mr. Jarvis were charged with conspiracy to smuggle aliens.

Ex-Embassy Driver Admits Smuggling Aliens (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, January 12, 2006

(AP) - ALEXANDRIA, Va.-A former driver for the Saudi Embassy in Washington pleaded guilty Tuesday to smuggling aliens into the United States.

Mohamed Abdel Wahab Yakoub, 61, admitted he used Saudi Embassy letterhead to obtain diplomatic visas from U.S. embassies for several Egyptians and Filipinos.

Yakoub, an Egyptian, faces up to 10 years in prison when he is sentenced in April on a single count of smuggling aliens. He will be subject to deportation after the sentencing.

Yakoub sold visas for $5,000 to $7,000. Court documents indicate he helped at least six illegal aliens gain entry to the U.S. in 2000 and 2001. He was fired by the Saudi embassy in 2002.

The Joint Terrorism Task Force, which helped investigate, said it had no indication the scheme had any connection to terrorism.

TAX:

Ex-county GOP Chairman Pleads Guilty To Tax Evasion (CHASGAZ)

By Tom Searls, Staff writer

Charleston Gazette, January 12, 2006

A former Kanawha County Republican chairman has agreed to plead guilty to tax evasion by using some of his employees' withholdings to pay for his wife's Mercedes-Benz.

Steven L. Miller admitted in an information filed by Assistant U.S. Attorney Hunter P. Smith Jr. that he "evaded and defeated approximately $38,000 of the federal personal income taxes, trust fund taxes and Trust Fund Recovery Penalties due and owing by him" to the federal government.

Miller had apparently withheld federal taxes and trust fund money from employees' pay, placing it in a separate bank account at the Putnam County Bank, but never passed it on to the federal government.

DOJ_NMG_0009493

- advertisement -

Internal Revenue Service agents led the investigation of Miller from 1999 through 2000. The IRS has been aggressive in investigating such cases because employees may not qualify for Social Security, Medicare or unemployment benefits if taxes that have been withheld from their pay are never remitted to the federal government.

Miller also owed unpaid personal income taxes.

A federal information usually indicates a defendant is cooperating with investigating authorities. The information against Miller was filed Wednesday.

IRS agents found that Miller tried to hide his personal income, as well as not paying the employees' payments prior to paying other creditors. In November 1999, he received a payment from a client and deposited it in a Colorado bank under the name of his wife.

Later that month, four checks totaling $3,500 were written to Miller from that account, while later that month a check for $10,500 from the Colorado account was deposited in Miller's personal account at the Putnam County Bank.

In December 1999, Miller wrote a check for $7,000 from the Putnam County account to his son. In 2000 he wrote a check from the Putnam trust account for $1,300 to make a payment on his wife's 1994 Mercedes. Then in October 2000, the information shows, he used some of the funds to pay a loan secured by his wife's car at another bank.

Miller was a candidate for U.S. attorney for the Southern District of West Virginia in the early 1980s. His ex-wife, Peggy Miller, was Kanawha County clerk.

It was uncertain when Miller, who was a resident of South Charleston, will be sentenced or if he is continuing to practice law.

Another accused tax evader, Charleston resident Carl Kennedy, is scheduled to be sentenced today in federal court for similar charges.

Wife Of Indicted NYPD Detective Pleads Not Guilty To Tax Charge (NSDY/AP)

By Ken Ritter, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, January 12, 2006

LAS VEGAS -- The wife of a former New York police detective accused of working as a mob hit man pleaded not guilty Wednesday to three charges of filing a false income tax return.

Frances Eppolito was ordered released without bond and was appointed a federal public defender pending a trial set for March 13. She told U.S. Magistrate Judge Lawrence R. Leavitt she had been arrested earlier in the day in Las Vegas.

Family members who attended the brief arraignment at the U.S. District Courthouse in Las Vegas declined to comment.

Eppolito and her husband, Louis Eppolito, were named in a three-count felony indictment handed up Tuesday. Each is accused of filing false federal income tax returns for $127,386 in income in 2000, $8,654 in income in 2001 and a net loss of $1,297 in 2002.

The defendants had substantial income "from screenplay writing business activity," the indictment said.

Each could face up to three years in federal prison and a $100,000 fine if convicted on each count, Internal Revenue Service spokeswoman Mercedes Manzur said.

A spokeswoman for U.S. Attorney Daniel Bogden said she had no immediate information about whether Louis Eppolito had been arrested or ordered to surrender on the charges.

He was free on bond living in the New York area, where he is awaiting trial next month on charges that he and his former detective partner, Stephen Caracappa, accepted thousands of dollars to work for the mob while they were still in the New York Police Department.

Both men have pleaded not guilty.

The former partners were arrested last March in Las Vegas, where they lived across the street from each other since retiring in the early 1990s. Authorities have accused the detectives of using their access to police information to give mob associates the names of confidential informants. Each faces up to life in prison if convicted.

Eppolito is the author of a 1992 autobiography, "Mafia Cop: The Story of an Honest Cop Whose Family Was the Mob." The son, grandson and nephew of Mafia members described his family background, a decorated police career and what he called false charges of Mafia involvement.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Democrats Sharply Question Alito (REU-Y2)

DOJ_NMG_0009494

By Thomas Ferraro And Joanne Kenen

Reuters, January 12, 2006

Senators critical of the Bush administration aggressively questioned Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito on Wednesday. His wife briefly left the confirmation hearing in tears.

In the third day of hearings, Democratic senators accused Alito of being evasive on issues ranging from abortion to presidential powers to past membership in a conservative alumni group at prestigious Princeton University.

South Carolina Republican Sen. Lindsey Graham (news, bio, voting record) told Alito: "I am sorry that you've had to go through this. I am sorry that your family has had to sit here and listen to this."

While Alito appears headed for confirmation by the full Republican-led Senate later this month, several Democrats made clear that after a relatively gentle start of proceedings on Monday and Tuesday, they were waging an election-year fight.

Alito, pressed repeatedly about his membership two decades ago in the alumni group that opposed efforts to admit more women and minorities to the university, said, "I'm not any kind of a bigot."

"I believe you," Graham said.

At one point, Alito's wife, Martha-Ann, was crying in the crowded hearing room and then left. She returned about an hour later and sat behind her husband.

President George W. Bush has nominated Alito, 55, a federal appeals judge the past 15 years, to replace retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, often the swing vote on abortion and other social issues on the nine-member court.

Sen. Richard Durbin (news, bio, voting record), an Illinois Democrat, began the day's Senate Judiciary Committee hearing, saying he was troubled Alito had not disavowed a 1985 memo in which he wrote that "the Constitution does not protect a right to an abortion."

"I'm concerned that many people will leave this hearing with a question as to whether or not you could be the deciding vote that would eliminate the legality of abortion," he said.

OPEN MIND

Alito, who wrote the memo as a Reagan administration attorney two decades ago, has not said how he would rule if abortion came before him on the high court. But the nominee reaffirmed his vow to keep an open mind and respect legal precedent and noted the landmark 1973 decision that legalized abortion had been upheld repeatedly.

Sen. Charles Schumer (news, bio, voting record), a New York Democrat, said, "Judge Alito has responded, but he has not answered."

Sen. Patrick Leahy (news, bio, voting record) of Vermont, the committee's top Democrat, said Democrats were also troubled by what they saw as inconsistencies in many of Alito's answers.

Alito listed membership in the since-disbanded alumni group, Concerned Alumni of Princeton, or CAP, in a 1985 application for a job in the Reagan administration. He told the panel he had no recollection of any involvement with the group.

Sen. Edward Kennedy (news, bio, voting record), a Massachusetts Democrat, quoted a 1983 essay, "In Defense of Elitism," from the alumni group's magazine that read, in part: "People nowadays just don't seem to know their place. Everywhere one turns, blacks and Hispanics are demanding jobs simply because they're black and Hispanic."

Alito, a member since 199O of the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, denounced the essay as offensive and said he did not know the group had promoted such positions.

Kennedy told reporters later, "It's extraordinary to me that this nominee can remember all 67 of his dissents in great detail -- in great, great, detail and he still is mystified about his association about a CAP organization that he used as a job reference."

Nerves Fray At Alito Hearing Democrats Turn Up Heat On Supreme Court Nominee (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — The third day of Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito's confirmation hearings took a contentious turn Wednesday as Democrats grilled him about his ethics and membership in a controversial Princeton alumni group.

Alito's wife, Martha-Ann, walked out of the hearing room in tears as Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., apologized to an unflappable Alito for the Democratic challenges.

“Judge Alito, I am sorry that you've had to go through this,” Graham said. “I am sorry that your family has had to sit here and listen to this.”

Martha-Ann Alito returned to the room later.

Several Republicans predicted confirmation for Alito, a judge on the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. “You're going to serve as an outstanding justice,” said Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kan.

DOJ_NMG_0009495

The incident with Alito's wife followed hours of questions from Sens. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., and Russ Feingold, D-Wis., about a decision by Alito not to recuse himself from a 2002 case involving Vanguard, which held his investments.

Alito called the suggestion that the case would have affected his mutual funds "preposterous."

Another recurring theme was Alito's involvement in Concerned Alumni of Princeton, a group whose membership he touted on a 1985 job application that asked him to demonstrate his "philosophical commitment" to Reagan administration policies. Some members of the group, formed in 1972 just after Princeton went coed, suggested that the university had lowered academic standards to admit women and minorities. Alito graduated in 1972.

Kennedy expressed incredulity at Alito's repeated assertions that he does not remember belonging to the group. Alito said he doesn't share some members' views on women and minorities. "I disavow them; I deplore them," he said.

For the third day, abortion was a prime topic. Alito has been tapped to succeed retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, a swing vote on abortion and other issues.

Alito called the high court's 1973 decision in Roe v. Wade, which made abortion legal nationwide, "a precedent that's entitled to respect," but he wouldn't say whether he still believes "the Constitution does not protect a right to an abortion," as he wrote in 1985.

The Republican Majority for Choice, a group that supports abortion rights, announced its opposition to Alito.

Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., a member of that group, has not said how he'll vote on Alito.

An Intense Experience For Family Members, Too (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 11 - While the nominee at a confirmation hearing at least gets to respond to criticisms, his family members and supporters are obliged to sit stiffly and stoically behind him as a backdrop for the cameras.

Many nominees and their family members have described the experience as excruciating, and Martha-Ann Alito is not likely to disagree.

On Wednesday, more than eight hours after the hearing was called to order, Mrs. Alito began to weep when a supportive senator, Lindsey Graham, a South Carolina Republican, was questioning her husband, who was seated a few feet in front of her.

Mr. Graham was making the point that criticisms of Judge Alito's integrity were unfair, and he chose to do so by posing mock-accusatory questions intended to demonstrate how implausible the claims were.

Judge Alito had explained his failure to recuse himself from a case involving a mutual fund in which he had an interest because of an oversight and said that the issue was of no consequence to his holdings.

"I am baffled as to why you would make a conscious decision in this situation not to recuse yourself," Mr. Graham demanded. "Do you have an explanation?"

"There's no reason why I would make such a conscious decision," Judge Alito replied. "I had nothing whatsoever to gain by participating in this case, and nobody has suggested that I did."

When Mr. Graham asked him in the same fashion, "Are you really a closet bigot?" - because of his membership in a Princeton alumni group that opposed the university's affirmative action program - Judge Alito said he was "not any kind of bigot," to which Mr. Graham agreed.

At that point, Mrs. Alito began to sniffle audibly. She hurried to a corner of the hearing room, then went into an anteroom, where she sobbed for a few minutes. She later returned to the hearing room.

Democrats Target Alito's Credibility (WSJ)

By Jeanne Cummings

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Democratic strategy to derail Judge Samuel Alito's Supreme Court appointment is centered on raising doubts about the nominee's credibility and persuading senators he would curb or end abortion rights.

In three days before the Senate Judiciary Committee, Judge Alito's straightforward testimony has served as a strong counter to their campaign. But the Third U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals judge has declined to amend his 1985 assertion that the Constitution doesn't protect the right to an abortion, helping Democrats make some headway on the issue.

Democrats may have lost points, however, when Judge Alito's wife, Martha, left the hearing room in tears after Republican Sen. Lindsey Graham of South Carolina apologized for the treatment of her husband. She later returned. Alito supporters sent emails about the incident, blaming Democrats for going too far.

DOJ_NMG_0009496

During his testimony, Judge Alito declined to endorse Chief Justice John Roberts's testimony that Roe v. Wade, the 1973 abortion-rights case, is a settled precedent of the Supreme Court. Judge Alito told senators that he wasn't sure what Chief Justice Roberts meant by the word "settled."

Yesterday, the Republican Majority for Choice, an organization of Republicans who support abortion rights, said it "regrettably" will oppose the nomination. "Judge Alito seems by all measures to be an experienced and capable jurist, but one who is out of step with mainstream Americans on the issue of abortion and maintaining the legal right to choose," the group said in a statement.

Four Republican senators, including Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, serve on the group's advisory board, but won't necessarily take its position when deciding how to vote on the nomination. The others are Rhode Island's Lincoln Chafee and Maine's Olympia Snowe and Susan Collins, who have all expressed reservations about Judge Alito's nomination.

Democrats, who hold 44 Senate seats and often count Vermont Independent James Jeffords among their ranks, aren't talking about a filibuster, for now. That decision will be made after the hearings, aides said. Even without a filibuster, Judge Alito may face a tight floor vote if three or four Republicans oppose him because of his stance on abortion.

Democrats fear that Judge Alito would move the court to the right because he would succeed departing Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, a conservative on many issues who sometimes tilted left as the swing vote on discrimination, abortion and civil-rights cases.

To make their case, Democrats must poke holes in Judge Alito's testimony and argue that senators shouldn't trust his assurances that if confirmed, he wouldn't pursue a conservative agenda. On civil and disability rights, Democrats have highlighted cases in which Judge Alito ruled on the side of government or business -- claiming that is his pattern. But Judge Alito's 15-year tenure on the appeals court allows him to call attention to cases where he instead sided with the complainant.

The Democrats' two-phase strategy during the hearings involves first asking questions to establish Judge Alito's position and then pursuing a line of questions challenging it. Yesterday Sen. Edward Kennedy (D., Mass.) followed this template when probing Judge Alito's membership in the Concerned Alumni of Princeton, a group opposed to integration of the campus. Citing a timeline that showed Princeton alumni were sent two letters highlighting the group's work, Sen. Kennedy challenged Judge Alito's testimony that he joined the organization one year later, unaware of one of its missions: opposing enrollment of women, blacks and homosexuals.

Judge Alito said he doesn't remember why he joined in 1985, but he thinks it was because he was troubled by opposition to a Reserve Officers Training Corps office on the Princeton campus. Sen. Kennedy produced a 1985 issue of Concerned Alumni's publication that declared ROTC is "popular" once again. Judge Alito said he recalled the ROTC struggle was continuing. Sen. Kennedy said the nominee's answers don't "add up."

Write to Jeanne Cummings at jeanne.cummings@wsj.com18

Alito Turns Aside Democrats' Criticism (AP)

By David Espo

The Associated Press, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito turned aside Democratic attacks on his judicial record and credibility at contentious confirmation hearings Wednesday that left his wife in tears.

"If I'm confirmed I'll be myself," said Alito, a 15-year veteran of a federal appeals court, named to succeed Justice Sandra Day O'Connor for a swing seat on the high court.

Challenged by Democrats, Alito repeatedly said he had no memory of involvement with the conservative Concerned Alumni of Princeton, though he highlighted his membership in a 1985 job application for the Reagan administration.

He repudiated the opinions expressed in articles in the organization's magazine. "They're not my views ... I deplore them," he said of writing that contained material that was racist, sexist and homophobic.

Under persistent questioning, Alito also declined for a second straight day to say whether he believes, as he did in 1985, that the Constitution contains no right to an abortion. "I don't think it's appropriate for me to speak about issues that could realistically come up" before the courts, he said.

Alito, 55, was unflappable for hours on end in marathon questioning before the Senate Judiciary Committee. But his wife, Martha-Ann Bomgardner, grew emotional near the end of the day and left the hearing room weeping.

"Judge Alito, I'm sorry that you've had to go through this. I am sorry that your family has had to sit here and listen to this," said Sen. Lindsey Graham. A moment earlier, the South Carolina Republican had offered Alito a chance to defend his integrity, asking whether he was a "closet bigot."

"I'm not any kind of bigot, I'm not," said Alito.

DOJ_NMG_0009497

"No sir, you're not," Graham agreed.

Alito's wife returned with him following a brief recess.

The nominee commands the support of all 10 Republicans on the Senate Judiciary Committee, and while the Democrats could delay his approval by the panel they cannot block it. His prospects for confirmation by the full Senate are also strong, although Democrats have not ruled out the possibility of a filibuster that could require supporters to post 60 votes in the 100-member chamber.

Still, unlike Chief Justice John Roberts last fall, Alito may draw the opposition of all eight Democrats on the Judiciary panel, and partisan maneuvering was evident Wednesday.

Abortion triggered one incident. Sen. Richard Durbin, who supports abortion rights, told Alito that his 1985 written view on abortion "does not evidence an open mind. It evidences a mind that sadly is closed in some areas."

Sen. Tom Coburn of Oklahoma, saying he wanted to "razz" Durbin, soon noted that the Illinois Democrat had himself changed his mind on abortion. "For 45 years, Senator Durbin was adamantly pro-life, and he wrote multiple, multiple letters expressing that up until 1989," said Republican Coburn.

Later, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy pressed the committee's chairman, Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., to subpoena records at the Library of Congress that might shed light on Alito's membership in the conservative Princeton group.

"If I'm going to be denied that, I'd want to give notice to the chair that you're going to hear it again and again and again and we're going to have votes of this committee again and again and again until we have a resolution," said the Massachusetts Democrat.

Specter, bristling, said, "I'm not concerned about your threats to have votes again, again and again. And I'm the chairman of this committee. ... And I'm not going to have you run this committee."

The tempest proved short-lived. Specter later announced the committee would have access to the records.

Kennedy questioned Alito sharply about the organization, which drew notice for opposing admission practices that resulted in rising numbers of women and minority students at the Ivy League school.

"If I had received any information at any point regarding any of the matters you referred to ... I would never have had anything to do with it," said Alito, who listed his membership in the group on a 1985 job application for the Reagan administration but now says he does not recall anything about it.

Outside the committee room, Kennedy was scathing.

"He can remember all 67 dissents ... in great details," he said of Alito and his judicial record. "But he can't remember anything about this organization."

Those judicial dissents drew the attention of several Democrats, as did other rulings over the course of Alito's 15-year tenure on the appeals court.

Durbin cited rulings in cases involving a black man accused of murder, a retarded man who had been sexually molested and an injury at a coal work site.

He said that in each case, Alito had made rulings that favored the powerful at the expense of the powerless. "I find this as a recurring pattern, and it raises the question in my mind whether the average person, the dispossessed person, the poor person who finally has their day in court ... are going to be subject to the crushing hand of fate when it comes to your decisions."

Alito defended his rulings one by one, then was offered a chance for a general reply.

He cited a case in which a "high school student had been bullied unmercifully by other students in his school because of their perception of his sexual orientation, been bullied to the point of attempting to commit suicide."

The school board refused a request from the parents to move their child to a different school, but Alito said, "I wrote an opinion upholding their right to have him placed in a safe school in an adjacent municipality."

Underscoring the political significance of the nomination, Durbin had scarcely completed his 20 minutes of questioning when the nominee's supporters circulated written material titled, "A sampling of cases where Alito rules for the `Little Guy.'"

Democrats countered with a document of their own. It accused Republicans of distorting Alito's record by "citing uncontroversial cases with obvious outcomes or by distorting the facts or outcomes of the cases they cite."

Alito's views on abortion were a recurring theme for Democrats.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., picking up where Durbin had left off, asked Alito why he felt comfortable renouncing 20-year-old statements he had made questioning the principle of one person, one vote, when he wouldn't do the same on Roe v. Wade.

Alito said once again there are cases making their way through the courts on abortion.

Feinstein noted four voting rights cases currently pending that raise questions of whether the principle of one person, one vote has been violated.

DOJ_NMG_0009498

"If you're willing to say that you believe one man, one vote is well settled and you agree with it, I have a hard time understanding how you separate out Roe," she said.

Alito Disavows Controversial Group (WP)

By Dale Russakoff

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

As a Princeton alumnus and professional basketball player, Bill Bradley in 1973 renounced his membership in Concerned Alumni of Princeton, calling it a "right wing" organization that opposed the admission of women and minorities to the school.

Two years later, another distinguished alumnus and future U.S. senator, Bill Frist, co-wrote a report denouncing the group for "grossly inaccurate" attacks on the school's policies and a "narrow ideological perspective" that had done "a disservice to the university."

Supreme Court nominee Samuel A. Alito Jr.'s membership in this group, which he touted among his conservative credentials in a 1985 application for a political appointment in the Reagan Justice Department, touched off a bruising political battle yesterday during the third day of confirmation hearings.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (Mass.) and other Democrats demanded to know why the son of an Italian immigrant would take credit for membership in a "radical" group that opposed increased enrollment of women and minorities, while Republicans and a White House spokesman branded that line of questioning as "pathetic," "scurrilous" and an effort to assign "guilt by association."

The group was founded in 1972 by Princeton alumni who were troubled that the university had recently begun admitting women and who said Princeton had lowered its standards to admit more minorities.

Alito, a 1972 Princeton graduate, testified yesterday that he has no recollection of joining the group, and that he would not have done so if he had known of its writings about women and minorities. "I deplore those statements," he said. "I would never be a member of an organization that took those positions."

He said he assumes he joined only because he supported the return of ROTC to the Princeton campus. As an undergraduate, Alito was a member of Princeton's Army ROTC unit when it was expelled from the campus -- a move that he said "rankled" him because "the attitude seemed to be that the military was a bad institution and that Princeton was too good for the military."

The Army ROTC unit was back on campus by the time Alito wrote his 1985 job application, but he said the Navy and Air Force units were not.

Throughout its existence, the now-defunct group was widely reported in major newspapers and magazines to be against increased admission of minorities and women -- positions advanced in its magazine, fliers and letters to alumni. Republicans released a 1985 newspaper article that said the group also was defending the Army ROTC unit then.

Democrats declared themselves "incredulous" that Alito was unaware of the group's attitudes toward women and minority students, and that his explanations for why he joined the group and mentioned it on an application did not add up. Kennedy read aloud a number of passages from the group's magazine, Prospect, that attacked women, minorities and gays.

One 1983 article, titled "In Defense of Elitism," began: "People nowadays just don't seem to know their place. Everywhere one turns, blacks and Hispanics are demanding jobs simply because they're black and Hispanic. The physically handicapped are trying to gain equal representation in professional sports. And homosexuals are demanding the government vouchsafe them the right to bear children."

Alito said he had never seen the article and called the view in it "antithetical" to his beliefs. Republicans released disclaimers from Prospect saying that all articles reflected the opinions of the authors and were not official positions of Concerned Alumni of Princeton.

White House spokesman Steve Schmitt said Kennedy was "attributing to the judge words he never said or wrote and explicitly repudiates" because the Democrats were "unable to challenge Judge Alito's mastery of the law and his stellar 15-year record on the appellate court."

Sen. Richard J. Durbin (D-Ill.) read aloud the comments of 1975 Princeton graduate Diane Weeks who had worked for Alito when he was U.S. attorney in New Jersey.

"When I saw Concerned Alumni of Princeton on that 1985 job application, I was flabbergasted," Durbin quoted Weeks as saying in the Nation magazine. "I was totally stunned. I couldn't believe it. CAP made it clear to women like me we were not wanted on campus. And he is touting his membership in this group in 1985, 13 years after he graduated? He's not a young man at this point. . . . I'm very troubled by this and if I were in the Senate, I would want some answers."

Alito responded that Weeks was "one of many women whom I hired when I was U.S. attorney. And I think that illustrates my attitude toward equality for women."

DOJ_NMG_0009499

In an interview yesterday, Weeks said: "The reason I'm flabbergasted is that from my personal experience with Sam, he does not discriminate against women, minorities or anyone else. He is a merit-based thinker. That's who he is. I cannot understand for the life of me why he would have even associated himself with Concerned Alumni of Princeton."

At Kennedy's request, and with Alito's blessing, Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) said the panel will examine the group's records to get "all the facts." The records are in the Library of Congress in the private papers of William Rusher, a former publisher of the National Review magazine. Rusher allowed the New York Times to review the records last year, and the newspaper found no evidence that Alito was active in the organization or was a major donor to it.

Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.) called the attacks on Alito "guilt by association," adding, "I am sorry that your family has had to sit here and listen to this." Alito's wife, Martha, left the room in tears, returning after a break.

Alito's Ties To Controversial Group Probed (LAT)

By Johanna Neuman

The Los Angeles Times, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON -- In 1972, at the height of one of the most tumultuous times in higher education, a group of Princeton University graduates staged their own form of protest against the changes they saw around them.

As college campuses roiled with demonstrations over the Vietnam War, feminism and free speech, the Concerned Alumni of Princeton -- co-chaired by wealthy alumni from the classes of 1921 and 1930 -- had its own narrower agenda: fighting the admissions policy that opened classroom doors to women and minorities.

Defunct for almost 20 years and largely forgotten, the organization on Wednesday became a central issue in the Supreme Court confirmation hearings of Samuel A. Alito Jr., who graduated from Princeton in 1972.

"I did not join this group . . . because of any attitude toward women or minorities," Alito told the Senate Judiciary Committee. "What bothered me about the Princeton administration . . . was the treatment of ROTC" -- which Alito joined as an undergraduate and which lost its contract with the university during the Vietnam protests.

With senators clamoring for papers that might shed light on Alito's involvement in the group, and reporters rushing to the university to review documents in the school's Seeley G. Mudd Library, the spotlight intensified on the organization whose purpose was to preserve a Princeton of men -- mostly white, mostly wealthy and many conservative.

Last November, the college paper, the Daily Princetonian, noted that in the first issue of Prospect -- the Concerned Alumni of Princeton magazine -- founder Shelby Cullom Davis, then one of the university's largest donors, had written of his Princeton ideal. It was embodied, he wrote, in the alumni he saw at his father's 50th reunion -- "a body of men, relatively homogenous in interests and backgrounds, who had known and liked each other over the years during which they had contributed much in spirit and substance to the greatness of Princeton."

Princeton began admitting women as undergraduates in 1969, when Alito was a sophomore. In a fundraising letter a few years later, according to research by the liberal group People for the American Way, Concerned Alumni of Princeton urged "a more traditional undergraduate population" and a quota that would keep number of female students at 1,000 out of 4,400.

"A student population of approximately 40 percent women and minorities will largely vitiate the alumni body of the future," said the letter.

Defenders of the organization argue that it has been misrepresented in the mainstream media and on liberal blogs, part of a smear campaign against Alito.

"It's a huge diversion and a bit of a desperation tactic," said Dinesh D'Souza, who edited Prospect in 1984 and is now a conservative scholar at Stanford University's Hoover Institution. "It was a conservative organization well within mainstream conservative thought. There was nothing extreme or racist. It attacked racial preferences. It never did take a position against cohabitation."

Still, the organization left a string of sound bites that liberal critics seized on Wednesday to portray the group -- and, by extension, Alito -- as insensitive to a generation of gains by women and minorities.

"Coeducation has ruined the mystique and camaraderies that used to exist," T. Harding Jones, a classmate of Alito's and the first editor of Prospect, told The New York Times in 1974.

William A. Rusher, one of the group's original board members and a former editor of the conservative magazine National Review, talked about Concerned Alumni of Princeton on Wednesday in a question-and-answer session on the magazine's Web site.

The organization, he said, was "concerned over various liberal tendencies that had developed in the Princeton administration." He added, "I will always remember fondly the Princeton I knew, and regret what has happened to it."

He quoted a colleague approvingly as saying that Princeton, known to its graduates as Old Nassau, had become "just another liberal joint."

DOJ_NMG_0009500

The Democrats' Last Roar, By Way Of Princeton (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

It looked to be a second dreary day in the confirmation hearings of Supreme Court pick Samuel Alito, as the senators droned and the nominee dodged. Then, just before lunch, the old lion roared.

Actually, it started as a growl. The gray-maned Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) read quotations published by a conservative Princeton group to which Alito belonged, protesting that blacks, Hispanics and women "don't know their place" and suggesting medical experiments for gay Princeton students.

Paying no heed to Alito's anxious insistence that he was not active in the group, Kennedy then pounced on Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.). "Mr. Chairman, if I could have your attention, I think we ought to vote on issuing a subpoena" for the group's records, Kennedy said, his voice rising and his face flushing.

Specter, awakened from a reverie by Kennedy's sudden outburst, protested that this was the first he was hearing of the issue and banged his gavel to indicate that it was time to move on. But this only inflamed Kennedy more. "If I'm going to be denied that, I'd want to give notice to the chair that you're going to hear it again and again and again and we're going to have votes of this committee again and again and again until we have a resolution."

Specter, now fully appreciating the ambush, hollered back. "Well, Senator Kennedy, I'm not concerned about your threats to have votes again, again and again," he admonished. "And I'm not going to have you run this committee." He banged the gavel again.

The hearing room was transformed. The nominee's wife, Martha Ann Alito, sighed. Alito's White House handler, Dan Coats, started working his BlackBerry. The reporters began tapping on their keyboards. Kennedy took a sip of water, flashed a tight smile at Alito, then a broader smile in the direction of the photographers in the pit.

Thus did Democrats take their last stand against Alito. It had become clear that the committee, with unified GOP support, would clear the judge. Surveying the various lines of attack against Alito -- his opposition to abortion, his support for a powerful president, his conflict-of-interest issues -- Democrats concluded that their best hope was in Alito's membership in a group opposed to gains by women and minorities. Clarence Thomas had Anita Hill. Alito would have the Concerned Alumni of Princeton.

Whatever the charge's merits, it drew blood.

As several more Democrats joined Kennedy's assault -- Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (Del.) donned a Princeton baseball cap for the occasion -- Alito's replies grew more frantic. "I disavow them. I deplore them. They represent things that I have always stood against and I can't express too strongly," he told Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.).

"If you don't mind the suspicious nature that I have, it's that you may be saying that because you want to get on the Supreme Court, that you're disavowing this now because it doesn't look too good," said Graham, trying to help Alito. "I'm going to be very honest with you," Graham continued. "Are you really a closet bigot?"

Alito's ears turned scarlet. "I'm not any kind of bigot," he said, emotionally. "I'm not." Behind him, Martha Alito had had enough. She stood up, tissue in hand, and rushed to the back of the room, where Capitol Police whisked away the tearful woman. She didn't return for an hour.

The day started well enough for Alito. Sen. Orrin G. Hatch (Utah) continued to lob such softballs -- "Did you go out of your way to rule against workers?" -- that even his GOP colleagues had to smile. The nominee earned chuckles for joking that if court sessions were televised, "our Nielsen numbers would be in the negative."

But Kennedy ended the grins. "I've testified to everything that I can recall," the now-testy nominee said.

Kennedy, participating in his 23rd Supreme Court confirmation, started a schoolyard brawl with the committee chairman, demanding a subpoena of the Princeton documents.

"You and I see each other all the time and you have never mentioned it to me," Specter protested.

Kennedy said he had sent a letter making the request.

"We actually didn't get a letter," the chairman said.

"You did get a letter."

"Now, wait a minute: You don't know what I got."

"Yes, I do, Senator, since I sent it."

The longtime legislators continued to bicker until Specter erupted: "I take umbrage at your telling me what I received. I don't mind your telling me what you mailed. But there's a big difference between what's mailed and what's received. And you know that."

DOJ_NMG_0009501

The great postal debate proved moot after lunch, when Specter announced that the custodian of the Princeton papers would turn them over without a subpoena. He scolded Kennedy for starting a "tussle." "Senator Kennedy and I frequent the gym at the same time and talk all the time, and he never mentioned it to me," he said.

Kennedy was no longer the lion: "I regret I haven't been down in the gym since before Christmas," he explained. "So I missed you."

Senators Show Claws At Hearing, Sling Zingers (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, January 12, 2006

The Alito confirmation hearings had been a largely placid affair, but things got downright personal yesterday between members of the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Sen. Tom Coburn, Oklahoma Republican, accused Democrat Whip Richard J. Durbin of Illinois of hypocrisy while panel chairman Arlen Specter and Sen. Edward M. Kennedy fell out over mail delivery.

With senators coming and going, Mr. Specter, Pennsylvania Republican, instituted a rule that no more comments could be made about another member unless that member was there to defend himself. At one point, a visibly distraught Martha Alito, who had sat behind her husband through the entire hearings excused herself from the room to regain her composure.

The brouhaha came after many observers had decided that Democrats had been neutered during the first two days, mastering the art of softball pitches. The Washington Post had called the sessions "a most tender roast of Alito."

Not yesterday.

The sharpest exchange came after Mr. Kennedy accused Mr. Specter of lying about whether he had gotten a letter requesting more information from the Library of Congress that Mr. Kennedy said would shed light on Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr.'s membership in Concerned Alumni of Princeton.

"We actually didn't get a letter," Mr. Specter said.

"You did get a letter," interrupted the Massachusetts Democrat.

Then Mr. Kennedy tried invoking a parliamentary challenge to Mr. Specter, the chairman nearly snapped his little wooden gavel as he called the meeting back to order.

"If I'm going to be denied that, I'd want to give notice to the chair that you're going to hear it again and again and again and we're going to have votes of this committee again and again and again until we have a resolution," Mr. Kennedy said.

A testy Mr. Specter snapped back: "I'm not concerned about your threats to have votes again, again and again. And I'm the chairman of this committee. ... And I'm not going to have you run this committee."

But Mr. Specter's staff was later able to get the records Mr. Kennedy wanted without issuing a subpoena.

The most personal exchange came after Mr. Durbin took up the matter of abortion with the nominee.

He told Judge Alito that he could not support a nominee who would not uphold the Supreme Court precedents that guarantee the federal right to abortion. He then quizzed the nominee about the 1985 job application essay he wrote in which he said there was no basis for abortion rights in the Constitution.

When it was Mr. Coburn's turn to question the nominee, he turned the spotlight to Mr. Durbin.

"For 45 years, Senator Durbin was adamantly pro-life and he wrote multiple, multiple letters expressing that up until 1989," he said. Today, "he is a very strong advocate for the abortion stance and a free right to choose."

All the while, a Coburn staffer held aloft a large blue placard of a blown-up letter by Mr. Durbin when he was in the House.

"Thank you very much for taking the time to express your opposition to abortion," Mr. Durbin wrote in 1989. "I believe we should end abortion on demand, and at every opportunity I have translated this belief into votes in the House of Representatives."

Mr. Durbin, who had left the hearing room by the time Mr. Coburn's turn to speak had come, issued a statement explaining his change of position on the matter.

"Senator Durbin reconsidered his position on abortion after meeting with victims of rape and incest and weighing the implications of making all abortions illegal," spokesman Joe Shoemaker said. "Senator Durbin has always been forthright about his thinking on the subject and has made his position clear to the voters over the course of more than 12 elections. In contrast, Judge Alito has not made clear whether or not he still stands by his 1985 job applications to the Reagan Justice Department."

Alito Accused Of Racism (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, January 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0009502

Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee yesterday raised the volume of their objections to the Supreme Court nomination of Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr. by grilling him over his ties to a Princeton alumni group that they called racist and misogynist.

They also accused Judge Alito of always ruling against "the little guy" and of evading their questions on abortion and such other hot-button issues as his membership in Concerned Alumni of Princeton, which opposed the admission of women to the all-male school.

"Explanations about the membership in this sort of radical group and why you listed it on your job application are extremely troubling," said Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat. "And, in fact, I don't think that they add up."

Mr. Kennedy demanded during yesterday's hearing that records about the group be subpoenaed, and panel chairman Arlen Specter secured access to the documents during yesterday's lunch break. By yesterday afternoon, staffers for Democrats and Republicans were going through the records at the Library of Congress, a task expected to be finished by this morning.

Republicans dismissed the dust-up -- the most dramatic exchange in three days of hearings -- as a desperate, last-ditch effort by Democrats to stop certain confirmation of Judge Alito.

"Your critics are, I think, grasping at any straw to tarnish your record," said Sen. Charles E. Grassley, Iowa Republican.

"It's kind of like we're in the fourth quarter of a football game, and you're the quarterback," he said. "Your team is way ahead here in the fourth quarter, and opponents are very desperate, keep trying to sack you and aren't doing a very good job of it."

But it did get to Judge Alito's wife, Martha, who sat directly behind him.

Sen. Lindsey Graham, South Carolina Republican, questioned the nominee about his association with the alumni group in an effort to portray Democratic accusations as ridiculous.

"Are you really a closet bigot?" he asked.

"I am not any kind of bigot. I'm not," Judge Alito replied.

"No, sir, you're not," agreed Mr. Graham. "You seem to be a decent, honorable man."

During the exchange, Mrs. Alito left the hearing room in tears. She later returned to her seat and resumed her constant smile for the rest of the day.

"Graham's statement brought out some long-held emotions about how he was being characterized," former Indiana Sen. Dan Coats, who is assisting the Bush administration on the nomination, told reporters later. "Her emotions just caught up with her after 21/2 days of hearing her husband's record mischaracterized."

Several Democrats made it clear yesterday that after a placid first two days, they were waging an election-year fight.

Sen. Charles E. Schumer, New York Democrat, expressed frustration with Judge Alito's answers on abortion, in which the nominee said he could not commit to voting one way or another and had to keep an "open mind" on issues that might appear before the court.

"Judge Alito has responded, but he has not answered," Mr. Schumer complained.

Democrats also said they didn't believe Judge Alito's "open mind" reassurance on abortion, which he gave Tuesday.

Sen. Richard J. Durbin, Illinois Democrat, said the judge's past statements, including a 1985 job application letter in the Reagan administration, reveal "a mind that sadly is closed in some instances."

Much of the Democratic questioning yesterday suggested that Judge Alito was unwilling to give the "little guy" a fair shake in the courtroom.

"I find this as a recurring pattern," Mr. Durbin said. "It raises the question in my mind whether the average person, the dispossessed person, the poor person who finally has their day in court ... are going to be subject to the crushing hand of fate when it comes to your decisions."

Judge Alito, who was an earnest student throughout school, disagreed and discussed one case in which he ruled against schoolyard bullies.

"This was a case in which a high school student had been bullied unmercifully by other students in his school because of their perception of his sexual orientation," the judge told senators. "He'd been bullied to the point of attempting to commit suicide."

After the school board tried blocking the parents' attempts to move him to a different public school, Judge Alito sided with the family.

But Mr. Kennedy led the inquisition on the Concerned Alumni of Princeton.

In a 1985 job application for a position in the Reagan administration, Judge Alito noted his membership in the group, which published a magazine, and was founded by alumni upset that the previously all-male university had admitted women.

DOJ_NMG_0009503

Judge Alito's "affiliation with an organization that fought the admission of women into Princeton calls into question his appreciation for the need for full equality in this country," Mr. Kennedy said in a statement he distributed with copies of articles from the group's publication.

"People nowadays just don't seem to know their place," author H.W. Crocker III wrote in a 1983 issue of the magazine. "Everywhere one turns blacks and hispanics are demanding jobs simply because they're black and hispanic, the physically handicapped are trying to gain equal representation in professional sports, and homosexuals are demanding that government vouchsafe them the right to bear children."

Judge Alito rebuked the sentiments and said he had no recollection of the group. He said that he must have joined because he was in the Reserve Officer Training Corps, and the group also opposed the expulsion of Princeton's ROTC program from campus during the anti-war years of the 1960s and 1970s.

Conservative activists, meanwhile, were eager to point out that Mr. Kennedy was on shaky ground accusing the nominee of associating with people opposed to the inclusion of women in private institutions.

The eight-term senator belonged to an all-male social club -- the Owl -- at Harvard University. The Owl refused to admit women until it was forced to do so during the 1980s, according to records kept by the Harvard Crimson, the student newspaper.

A Kennedy spokeswoman said it was an entirely different matter.

"No one can question Senator Kennedy's commitment to equality, justice and civil rights," said Laura Capps. "What he was part of was a social club, not a radical group pushing a radical agenda."

Anyway, she said, even though women were admitted to the university during Mr. Kennedy's tenure, they weren't fully integrated to the campus until much later.

Democrats Press Alito On Conservative Background (LAW)

By T.r. Goldman, Legal Times

Legal Times, January 12, 2006

Democrats pushed and prodded Samuel Alito Jr. on Wednesday, the second full day of questioning the Supreme Court nominee, trying to find holes in his explanation for his membership in a conservative Princeton alumni group and to pin down his views on the constitutionality of abortion.

For the most part, Alito stood them down and, in his cautious monotone, provided the same answers he did the day before to the 18 members of the Senate Judiciary Committee.

The panel's eight Democrats tried their hardest to elicit more comprehensive answers from Alito, who has spent the past 15 years as a judge on the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

From their perspective, Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., scored a victory of sorts in the controversy over Alito's disputed membership in the Concerned Alumni of Princeton University, a body Alito described as a "conservative alumni group" in his now-infamous 1985 application to the Justice Department's Office of Legal Counsel.

The group, founded in the early 1970s, had publicly bemoaned the fact that Princeton University was admitting too many minorities and women. The group's magazine had also published several inflammatory articles.

"Everywhere one turns, blacks and Hispanics are demanding jobs simply because they're black and Hispanic," read an excerpt from one article that Massachusetts Democrat Sen. Edward Kennedy had blown up into an exhibit for the hearings.

"Did you read this article?" Kennedy asked Alito.

"I disagree with all of that," responded Alito, raising his modulated tone for perhaps the first time. "I would never endorse that. I never have endorsed that. If I thought that's what the organization stood for, I never would have joined."

Alito repeated the claim he had made the day before, that he had "racked his brain" and could not remember why he had joined the group. The best explanation he could offer, he said, was his displeasure at the university's attitude toward ROTC, which had been banned at one point but had returned to the campus before Alito graduated in 1972. Alito had been a member of an ROTC unit.

Toward the end of the day Wednesday, however, Schumer was able to elicit a bit more satisfying explanation for Democrats.

Said Schumer: "You somehow plucked this group, which you now say you somehow have no recollection. Why that group? Why was it plucked out and put on the application?"

Answered Alito: "You have to look at the question I was responding to. What I was trying to outline were things relevant to obtaining a political position."

It was the first time Alito had conceded to what many considered obvious: his need to show the Department of Justice, then under the highly conservative influence of Attorney General Edwin Meese, that his conservative bona fides were in order.

DOJ_NMG_0009504

"That was the answer he should have started with," said Illinois Democrat Sen. Richard Durbin, after the hearing had ended for the day. "It helps some. I just wish he hadn't gone through this tortuous process to get us there."

Indeed, the pressure evidently got to Alito's wife, Martha-Ann Bomgardner, who at one point late in the day left the hearing room in tears after Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., publicly apologized to the family because they had to endure what he termed the often baseless allegations that accompany a Supreme Court nomination process. "The emotions caught up with her after two-and-a-half tense days," said former Sen. Daniel Coates, R-Ind., who has been charged with shepherding Alito through the nomination process. She later returned to the room.

Earlier in the day, Durbin, the first Democrat to question Alito on Wednesday, asked him why he could assert the constitutionality of Brown v. Board of Education, which struck down racially enforced school segregation, and Griswold v. Connecticut, which established the right to marital privacy, but not the right to an abortion.

The Brown decision, said Alito, was based on the 14th Amendment, while Griswold was based on that amendment's due process clause, and, he added, that particular holding "is not likely to come before the 3rd Circuit [and] not likely to come before the Supreme Court."

Abortion issues, he said, are involved in litigation "at all levels."

As he did on Tuesday, Alito acknowledged that a comment on the same 1985 job application -- that he was "particularly proud" of his contributions to cases in the solicitor general's office which argued that the "constitution does not protect a right to an abortion" -- was an accurate statement 20 years ago.

"The things that I said in the 1985 memo were a true expression of my views at the time from my vantage point as an attorney in the solicitor general's office. But that was 20 years ago, and a great deal has happened in the case law since then," Alito said.

Alito once again refused to say what his opinion on the matter is today, although he repeated his promise to follow the pattern he laid out in Tuesday's testimony: Once he'd viewed the case through the lens of stare decisis, he would approach the case "the way I approach every legal issue ... and that is to approach it with an open mind and to go through the whole judicial process."

Kennedy's questioning of Alito on his membership in the Princeton alumni group led to a brief but heated argument between Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., and Kennedy, who said he'd sent Specter a letter asking the committee to subpoena the group's records from William Rusher, a former leader of the Princeton alumni association.

"We're entitled to this information," said Kennedy, who said he had mailed Specter the request some weeks earlier and could not understand why Specter had not responded to it. "I take umbrage at your telling me what I received," said Specter, somewhat sharply. "There's a big difference in what's mailed and what's received... . We're in the middle of a round of hearings. This is the first time you have personally called it to my attention, and I will consider it in due course," Specter added, before slamming the gavel down and continuing the proceedings.

It was later determined that Rusher's papers had been donated to the Library of Congress but that no member of the Judiciary Committee had yet asked to look at them. By early afternoon committee staffers were already at the library reviewing the documents. A report in The New York Times last November concluded that Alito, as he had testified earlier, had played no major role in the group.

Alito Leaves Door Open To Reversing 'Roe' (WP)

By Amy Goldstein And Charles Babington

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

The once-sluggish confirmation hearings for Supreme Court nominee Samuel A. Alito Jr. turned confrontational yesterday, as the nominee signaled he might be willing to revisit the ruling that legalized abortion nationwide and Democrats pummeled him over his membership in an alumni group that wanted to restrict enrollment of women and minorities.

Tempers flared openly between the Senate Judiciary Committee's Republican chairman and eldest Democrat, and the nominee's wife fled the marbled hearing room in tears before the day ended with Republicans predicting that Alito will win confirmation, although by a slim margin.

Throughout the day's more than seven hours of questioning, Democratic senators regularly accused Alito of giving incomplete, inconsistent answers. Republicans accused Democrats of being unfair. At one point, Sen. Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.) complained after Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) read aloud magazine excerpts published in the 1980s by Concerned Alumni of Princeton and espousing views Kyl branded as "very scurrilous."

The drama of the hearings' third day nearly overshadowed the significance of the position Alito staked out on the landmark abortion case, Roe v. Wade . Senators also branched into new territory: Alito's record from 15 years on the Court of Appeals for the 3rd Circuit on cases involving religion, immigrants seeking to prevent deportation, and criminals' rights.

DOJ_NMG_0009505

Alito edged closer to suggesting that he might be willing to reconsider Roe if he is confirmed to the high court, refusing, under persistent questioning by Democrats, to say that he regards the 1973 decision as "settled law" that "can't be reexamined." In this way, his answers departed notably from those that Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. gave when asked similar questions during his confirmation hearings four months ago.

Yesterday, Alito said that Roe must be treated with respect because it has been reaffirmed by the high court several times in the past three decades.

But when Sen. Richard J. Durbin (D-Ill.) peppered Alito with questions about whether the ruling is "the settled law of the land," the nominee responded: "If 'settled' means that it can't be reexamined, then that's one thing. If 'settled' means that it is a precedent that is entitled to respect . . . then it is a precedent that is protected, entitled to respect under the doctrine of stare decisis." Stare decisis is a legal principle that, in Latin, means "to stand by that which is decided."

During Roberts's confirmation hearings, he, too, was reluctant to disclose how he would vote if asked to overturn Roe . But during the 2003 hearing on his nomination to the Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit, he had said he viewed the ruling as settled law.

And during Roberts's hearings to become the nation's chief justice, Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) had asked, "Do you mean settled for you, settled only for your capacity as a circuit judge or settled beyond that?" Roberts replied: "Well, beyond that, it's settled as a precedent of the court."

After his exchange with Alito yesterday, Durbin told reporters: "Sam Alito would not use those same words. It really, I'm afraid, leaves open the possibility that we are considering the nomination of a justice who will change 30 years of law in this country, a dramatic change to the American society."

Sen. Tom Coburn (R-Okla.) suggested that Durbin is ill-suited to challenge Alito's views on abortion because Durbin once opposed abortion rights and changed his mind.

Alito told several senators that he felt constrained from saying whether he regards Roe as settled because abortion remains a live issue in the courts. Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.) reminded Alito that he has willingly said other areas of the law were settled even though they remain in play and that, in a 1985 application for a promotion in the Reagan administration's Justice Department, he had written he did not believe the Constitution protects the right to an abortion.

"It was one sentence," Alito replied. "And it certainly is not an attempt to set out a comprehensive view on the subject."

The day's most sizzling exchanges involved Alito's assertion, in the same job application, that he had belonged to Concerned Alumni of Princeton, a group that at that time had rallied conservatives and drawn considerable public notice.

Alito told the committee he does not remember joining the now-defunct group -- founded in 1972, the year he graduated from Princeton University -- and does not know anything about it. Democrats challenged him sharply, wondering aloud if he used the club to impress Reagan conservatives but now wants to distance himself from its outspoken opposition to efforts that brought more women and minorities to Princeton.

The committee's ranking Democrat, Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (Vt.), said Alito's forgetfulness seemed too convenient. "If he didn't know what they stood for, he had to be about the only person in America who didn't know what they stood for," Leahy said.

At midday, Kennedy employed large blue charts showing quotes from articles published in the group's magazine, Prospect. "People nowadays just don't seem to know their place," a November 1983 article said. "Everywhere one turns, blacks and Hispanics are demanding jobs simply because they're black and Hispanic. . . . Homosexuals are demanding the government vouchsafe them the right to bear children. . . . And now come women."

Alito said he had read none of the articles, adding, "I would not have anything to do with statements of that nature."

Kennedy then called on Specter to subpoena records on the alumni group held in the Library of Congress. Noting that the group had received significant press coverage, Kennedy said the records might show Alito was more involved than he has acknowledged.

Kennedy said Specter had ignored his letter to him last month seeking the documents. The chairman retorted that he had never seen it. "I take umbrage at your telling me what I received," he said. When Kennedy persisted, Specter snapped, "I'm not going to have you run this committee."

Their quarrel cooled after Democratic and Republican staff members went to the Library of Congress to review the documents. But emotions rose again in the late afternoon when Alito's wife, Martha, clutching a tissue, raced to the back of the hearing room in tears, then was ushered by security guards through a side door, after debate over the alumni group resumed.

She left during an exchange in which Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.), an Alito supporter, played devil's advocate by summarizing the Democrats' attacks. He asked Alito, "Are you really a closet bigot?"

"I'm not any kind of bigot. I'm not," Alito said.

DOJ_NMG_0009506

Graham told Alito he believed him because of "the way you have lived your life and the way you and your wife are raising your children" and, referring to the Democrats' criticisms, said, "I am sorry that your family has had to sit here and listen to this." At that point, Martha Alito rose and left her front-row chair immediately behind her husband, returning about an hour later.

On other issues, Alito told Sen. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.) that some judges have gone too far in trying to remove religious activities from public life. He cited public school teachers who refused to let children read a short Bible story or display a hand-drawn picture of Jesus. "You have to treat religious speech equally with secular speech," Alito said.

Later, Sen. Herb Kohl (D-Wis.) said that, as an appeals court judge, Alito had seldom sided with immigrants who were trying to win asylum or block deportation. Alito replied that he was following Congress's clear-cut laws on immigration policy.

"My role is not to substitute my judgment for that of the immigration judge," he said. "My job is to say, 'Could a reasonable person have reached the conclusion that the immigration judge did?' "

As Democrats tried to pry loose Alito's views on abortion, a group supporting abortion rights, Republican Majority for Choice, announced it is opposing his nomination. Five GOP senators are on its advisory committee, including Specter.

Asked about the group's stance, Specter, who has said he will not decide how he will vote until after the hearings, said: "I did not participate in their decision."

Alito Demurs When Asked If Roe V. Wade Is Settled Law (KRT)

By Stephen Henderson And James Kuhnhenn

Knight Ridder, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON - In tense exchanges with Democratic senators Wednesday, Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito refused to declare that Roe v. Wade is settled law and stopped short of statements that Chief Justice John G. Roberts made before becoming a judge and that he reaffirmed during his confirmation hearings last September.

Alito's reluctance makes it easier for critics to brand him as a justice who could help overturn the 33-year-old ruling, which extended constitutional protection to abortion rights. It could also cost him Democratic support in the Senate, already lower than what Roberts enjoyed.

Roberts won 22 Democratic votes when the Senate confirmed him last September. Alito will almost certainly get fewer, though his Republican support appears solid enough to ensure his confirmation, barring any future stumbles.

Democrats turned more aggressive in questioning Alito on Wednesday, his third day of testimony, zeroing in not only on abortion but also on his membership in the Concerned Alumni of Princeton. Alito listed the conservative group in a 1985 application for promotion while a lawyer in the Reagan administration.

At the insistence of Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., committee chairman Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., agreed to review Library of Congress papers belonging to William Rusher, a founder of the Concerned Alumni of Princeton and publisher of the National Review, a conservative magazine.

The group formed in 1972 partly in opposition to Princeton's decision to admit women. CAP members have also opposed expanded minority admissions.

Alito testified that he didn't recall when or why he joined the group. He said he rejected the group's views on women and minorities. But he said he shared its support for keeping Reserve Officer Training Corps programs on campus. The New York Times reported in November that a review of Rusher's papers revealed no evidence that Alito played a major role in the organization.

Alito fended off hostile questions with a low-key, unflappable manner, and most Democrats appeared reluctant to force much of a confrontation with him. The most pointed exchanges came when they tried to nail him down on abortion law.

Alito strongly endorsed the idea that judicial precedent merits respect by later courts, and he said several times that Roe v. Wade deserved the "respect" that other precedents get. He also agreed that Casey v. Planned Parenthood, the 1992 Supreme Court ruling that reaffirmed Roe v. Wade, was a precedent entitled to "respect" and that it strengthened Roe's authority.

But when Sen. Richard Durbin, D-Ill., pressed him to go further, Alito demurred, effectively refusing to state that the Supreme Court shouldn't consider overturning Roe.

"Do you believe (Roe v. Wade) is the settled law of the land?" Durbin asked.

"If `settled' means that it can't be re-examined, that's one thing," Alito said. "If `settled' means that it is a precedent that is entitled to respect as stare decisis and all of the factors that I've mentioned come into play, including the reaffirmation and all of that, then it is a precedent that is protected."

Alito repeated that he was unable to go further because abortion litigation is constantly coming before the court, and it would be inappropriate to commit himself on a question he may have to rule on, should he be confirmed.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., seized on that line.

DOJ_NMG_0009507

"You were willing to give your view on one man, one vote," Feinstein said. "And yet there are four cases pending in the court right now on one man, one vote. I have a hard time understanding how you separate out Roe."

Alito said he didn't think it was appropriate to talk about issues that could come up before the court, explaining that he had no problem talking about cases such as Brown v. Board of Education, the 1954 ruling that outlawed racial segregation in public schools, because a legitimate challenge to desegregated schools was very unlikely to come before the court.

Feinstein said Alito's response troubled her, but she wouldn't say how she would vote on his confirmation.

Ed Gillespie, a former Republican National committee chairman who has been escorting Alito through the Capitol, drew a distinction between a judge accepting Roe as "settled law," which is what Democrats asked Alito to embrace, and "settled precedent," the term Roberts used in his confirmation hearing.

Settled law would be the standard for appellate court judges because they have to apply Supreme Court precedent to lower-court decisions, Gillespie said. He argued that settled precedent would not have the strength of settled law because the Supreme Court justices could still overturn it.

Specter said that while Democrats argued that Alito stopped short of Roberts' characterization of Roe, "I think they're probably pretty close on that."

In what could be a complication for Alito, the Republican Majority for Choice, an organization representing pro-abortion rights Republicans, announced its opposition to Alito on Wednesday.

"The reality is that Judge Alito would not have to vote to overrule Roe in order to be the architect of the denial of a woman's right to choose," the group said. "He could give lip service to respecting Roe while upholding the numerous legislative efforts to chip away at reproductive freedom."

The group's advisory committee includes moderate Republicans Sens. Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island, Susan Collins and Olympia Snowe of Maine, and Specter.

Specter, chairman of the Judiciary Committee, questioned Alito on abortion and later praised him for his extensive answers. After Wednesday's hearing he said he wasn't party to the group's statement and would reserve judgment on his vote.

The other three senators aren't members of the committee, but are members of a bipartisan "Gang of 14" that could determine whether a Democratic-led filibuster against Alito succeeds.

Snowe, in a statement, said she would fully review Alito's record before deciding whether to support him. Snowe spokeswoman Antonia Ferrier said the Republican Majority for Choice notified Snowe of its stand on Alito.

"Their views don't necessarily reflect hers," Ferrier said. "But she will take them into account."

Graham said he saw no reason why Alito's views would be the kind of "extraordinary circumstance" that the "Gang of 14" has said would be necessary to mount a successful filibuster. Graham is one of the 14.

Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kan., a panel member who's a staunch abortion opponent, said he was "pretty certain" he would vote for Alito. But, he added, "I'm not happy. I would love for him to be there and say, `Look, I don't think Roe is in the Constitution. And he's obviously not saying that. He's leaving the issue open."

Still, Brownback conceded that any court nominee who opposed Roe outright would be filibustered. "So you're left like this, if he answers Roe either way, he's caught."

Alito Remains Unruffled In Testy Hearings (LAT)

By Maura Reynolds And Richard Simon

The Los Angeles Times, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — Senate Democrats turned up the heat on Supreme Court nominee Samuel A. Alito Jr. on Wednesday, prompting testy exchanges during his confirmation hearing and ardent defenses from Republicans — one of which moved Alito's wife to tears.

As Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) defended the nominee against what he said were unfair insinuations about his membership in a conservative alumni organization, Martha Alito began quietly to weep behind him.

As Graham continued with an apology to the family, she left the hearing room to compose herself.

"Judge Alito, I am sorry that you've had to go through this. I am sorry that your family has had to sit here and listen to this," Graham said.

The moment — captured on television although unnoticed by many in the hearing room — capped a day of mounting tension as Democrats grilled Alito on what have become the hearing's two focal issues: his views on abortion and his membership in the now-defunct Concerned Alumni of Princeton.

Alito, 55, sat placidly through it all, repeating — with little apparent irritation — responses that did not placate his critics. But the attacks by Democrats did no apparent damage to Alito among Senate Republicans, most of whom have expressed support for him.

DOJ_NMG_0009508

The federal appellate judge seems headed for confirmation by the GOP-controlled Senate unless Democrats mount a filibuster against him — which appears unlikely at the moment.

On his second day of questioning, Alito continued to resist answering whether the Supreme Court's 1973 Roe vs. Wade decision, which legalized abortion nationwide, should be considered "settled law."

On the alumni group, Alito repeatedly insisted that he could not remember joining it and could not explain why he put it on a job application when applying for a promotion within the Justice Department in 1985, when Ronald Reagan was president.

"As I've said, I don't have a recollection of having anything to do" with the group, Alito said. "So all I can say is that I put it down in the '85 form, and therefore I must have been a member at around that time."

Alito, a graduate of Princeton University, listed his membership in the group when asked to provide information about his "philosophical commitment to the policies of [the Reagan] administration."

The group, founded in 1972, was controversial because some of its members publicly opposed Princeton's efforts to increase its numbers of female and minority students. They argued that such efforts could result in the admission of some students who did not meet the school's standards.

Questions about Alito's link to the group moved front and center during Wednesday's hearing in part because it appeared to crystallize for Democrats why they say they can't trust assurances by Alito that, as a high court justice, he would keep an open mind on politically controversial legal disputes.

Giving his take on Alito's mention of the group on his job application, Sen. Richard J. Durbin (D-Ill.) told reporters: "In this situation, Alito was trying to establish his credentials with the Reagan administration. He was providing red meat for the right wing."

Other Democrats on the Judiciary Committee said they were unconvinced that someone of Alito's acumen could have forgotten details about the group.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) complained that in his view, Alito's answers on the issue "don't add up."

Kennedy displayed a series of placards featuring quotes from articles in the group's magazine, Prospect, that disparaged minorities, gays and disabled people. The senator asked Alito whether he endorsed such views.

"I've testified to everything that I can recall relating to this, and I do not recall knowing any of these things" about the organization, Alito said. "And many of the things that you've mentioned are things that I have always stood against."

Alito said he could not recall whether he joined the group when he graduated from the university in 1972 or if he did so later, in the 1980s. He said he believed he could only have become a member for one reason: to fight against any effort to disband the school's ROTC program, in which he had participated as an undergraduate.

The emotional moment involving Martha Alito occurred in the late afternoon, after Graham charged that Democrats were pursuing a strategy of "guilt by association."

"How have you lived your life? Are you a closet bigot?" Graham asked.

"I'm not any kind of a bigot; I'm not," Alito replied calmly.

Graham began to list people who had praised Alito, including other judges and former colleagues. As he spoke, Martha Alito slowly began to cry. By the time Graham apologized for the strain of the hearings on Alito's family, she was gathering her things to leave the room.

After a few minutes in a back room, Martha Alito returned to the hearing for the rest of the session.

"The pressure of all this, and the insult added to injury, just got to be too much," Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas) said.

Earlier, the Democratic focus on Concerned Alumni of Princeton prompted one of the day's dust-ups between committee members.

Kennedy asked Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), the panel's chairman, to subpoena the personal papers of one of the group's founders, which are at the Library of Congress.

"I'd move that the committee go into executive session for the … sole purpose for issuing the subpoena of those records," Kennedy said.

Specter expressed surprise, saying that despite Kennedy's assertion that he had sent him a letter about the documents, this was the first time he was aware of the issue.

"I take umbrage at your telling me what I received," Specter said. "I don't mind your telling me what you mailed. But there's a big difference between what's mailed and what's received."

Kennedy did not back down, telling Specter that if his subpoena request was denied, "You're going to hear it again and again and again, and we're going to have votes of this committee again and again and again until we have a resolution."

Specter snapped back: "I'm not going to have you run this committee and decide when we're going to go into executive session."

DOJ_NMG_0009509

In the end, the confrontation over the documents fizzled. During lunch, Senate staff members contacted the group's founder, William A. Rusher, who granted them permission to review the documents. The aides were poring through them late into the evening, searching for mentions of Alito.

As the tone of Democrats' questions grew more caustic Wednesday, Republicans suggested they were acting in desperation.

Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa) told Alito: "You're the quarterback and your team is way ahead here. And opponents are very desperate, trying to sack you, and aren't doing a very good job of it. And they haven't hit you all day now — for two days."

He added: "You're going to keep getting these last-minute Hail Marys thrown at you. So just bear with us."

Alito's 1985 job application also figured into the sparring about abortion. In seeking his promotion, which he received, Alito wrote that he disagreed with the Roe vs. Wade decision that abortion rights were protected by the Constitution.

On Tuesday, Alito had said that as a high court justice, he would keep an open mind on the issue. But he resisted efforts by Democrats to get him to agree that the Roe vs. Wade decision was "settled law."

The parrying over that continued Wednesday, with Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) asking: "You do not agree that it is well-settled in court?"

"I think that depends on what one means by the term 'well-settled,' " Alito responded. He then went on to discuss the importance of a judge reviewing all sides in a case.

Feinstein interrupted to note that he had provided more expansive answers on other subjects, including some currently before the Supreme Court.

"I have a hard time understanding why you separate out Roe," she said, and then backtracked.

"I understand why. If you say one thing, you upset my friends and colleagues on [the Republican] side. If you say the other, you upset those of us on this side. But the people are entitled to know."

Alito replied: "I don't think it's appropriate for me to speak about issues that could realistically come up" before the Supreme Court.

"OK, I'll let you off the hook on that one," Feinstein said.

Committee questioning is to continue today, followed by testimony from outside witnesses, including friends and associates of the nominee.

Democrats Take Aggressive Tack; Alito Is Unfazed (NYT)

By Richard W. Stevenson And Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 11 - Democrats tried with increasing frustration on Wednesday to elicit more specific views from Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr. about abortion and other topics and sought to build a case against his nomination to the Supreme Court by raising questions about his character and consistency.

From the opening moments of the third day of hearings by the Senate Judiciary Committee, Democrats, aware that Judge Alito had made it through the first two days without significant damage to his prospects of confirmation, struck an aggressive tone. [Excerpts, Page A26.]

They challenged him on elements of his record and statements during questioning on Tuesday. And they successfully pressed the panel chairman, Senator Arlen Specter, Republican of Pennsylvania, to obtain records that they said might shed light on the judge's membership in a Princeton alumni group that has been characterized as opposing co-education and affirmative action.

Senator Patrick J. Leahy of Vermont, the ranking Democrat on the committee, started the proceedings by stating that members of his party "have been troubled by what we see as inconsistencies in some of the answers" on subjects including voting rights, presidential power, Judge Alito's failure to recuse himself from a case involving a potential conflict of interest and his involvement with the Princeton alumni group.

Rebutting Judge Alito's statement on Tuesday that he would take to the court an "open mind" on abortion rights, Senator Richard J. Durbin, Democrat of Illinois, said the memorandum that Judge Alito wrote in 1985 stating that he did not believe that there was a constitutional right to abortion "evidences a mind that, sadly, is closed in some areas."

The partisan volleys seemed to sail over or past Judge Alito, who politely but resolutely declined to be drawn out on abortion, executive authority and other issues. He often sat impassively as the committee members debated his qualifications and forthrightness.

"Your critics are, I think, grasping at any straw to tarnish your record, and that's unfortunate," Senator Charles E. Grassley, Republican of Iowa, said.

DOJ_NMG_0009510

The Democrats' questions and implications about her husband's record appeared to get to Judge Alito's wife, Martha-Ann. She began crying as Senator Lindsey Graham, Republican of South Carolina, defended her husband's character and rejected any suggestion that his membership in the alumni group made him a bigot, Mrs. Alito retreated to an anteroom, sobbing for some minutes.

"Let me tell you, this guilt by association is going to drive good men and women away from wanting to sit where you're sitting," Mr. Graham said.

Democrats and their aides on the committee said they were resigned to the fact that Judge Alito would win approval on the committee with its 10-member Republican majority. All eight Democrats appear likely to vote against the nomination.

The Democrats' strategy appeared to be aimed at raising questions about the credibility of Judge Alito's explanations about the alumni group and recusal that could be used in the confirmation floor debate.

The most intensive substantive exchanges were again over abortion. Judge Alito repeatedly turned aside efforts by Mr. Durbin and other Democrats to have him to agree that Roe v. Wade, the 1973 Supreme Court decision that established that there is a constitutional right to abortion, was "settled law," a phrase that Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. assented to last year in his confirmation hearings.

Judge Alito agreed only with the proposition that Roe was an important precedent that should be given deference like any other precedent relevant to a constitutional dispute.

"It is a precedent that has now been on the books for several decades," Judge Alito said. "It has been challenged. It has been reaffirmed. But it is an issue that is involved in litigation now at all levels."

Mr. Durbin responded that he was "concerned that many people will leave this hearing with a question as to whether or not you could be the deciding vote that would eliminate the legality of abortion, that would make it illegal in this country, would criminalize the conduct of women who are seeking to terminate pregnancies for fear of their lives and the doctors who help them."

Overturning Roe would not make abortion illegal but would leave the question in the hands of states.

In a colloquy with Senator Dianne Feinstein, Democrat of California, Judge Alito sought to explain why he agreed to comment on other landmark cases like those that outlawed segregation and guaranteed one-person, one-vote, but would not engage in a discussion of Roe.

Ms. Feinstein asked whether Judge Alito did not agree that Roe "was well settled in court."

He said, "It depends on what one means by the term 'well settled.' "

Ms. Feinstein said that she understood that it was difficult to answer such a sensitive question, "but the people are entitled to know."

Judge Alito said it was reasonable to presume that school desegregation and one-person, one vote were beyond judicial debate, while aspects of the abortion issue continued to come before the courts.

"I don't think it's appropriate for me to speak about issues that could realistically come up." he said. "And my view of Brown v. Board of Education, for example, which was one of the cases that was cited in connection with this issue about where someone in my position should draw the line, seems to me to embody a principle that is now not subject to challenge, not realistically subject to being challenged."

Democrats made another attempt to link Judge Alito to the views of some members of the Concerned Alumni of Princeton, a group that Judge Alito listed being a member of when he applied for a job in the Reagan administration.

Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts, read from an essay published in 1983 in a magazine put out by the group.

"Everywhere one turns, blacks and Hispanics are demanding jobs simply because they're black and Hispanic, the physically handicapped are trying to gain equal representation in professional sports, and homosexuals are demanding that government vouchsafe them the right to bear children," the essay said, according to Mr. Kennedy.

Mr. Kennedy asked whether Judge Alito had read the essay. Judge Alito responded that he had not, that he had not known at the time that members of the group espoused such views and that the sentiments expressed in the passage read by Mr. Kennedy were antithetical to his.

Mr. Kennedy suggested that Judge Alito had not provided an adequate explanation of why he had joined the group and included it in an application for work in a conservative administration. The senator said that he had questions about "this sort of radical group and why you listed it on your job application" and that Judge Alito's explanations did not "add up."

Mr. Kennedy, seemingly trying to inject some vigor into a lagging effort to defeat the nomination, provoked a confrontation with Mr. Specter by demanding that the chairman take the committee into executive session to subpoena documents about the group in the Library of Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0009511

Mr. Specter, annoyed, said he would consider the issue, suggesting that Mr. Kennedy delayed his request to present it at the hearing for dramatic effect. After lunch, Mr. Specter announced an agreement to review the documents and said Democratic and Republican lawyers had gone to the library to study them.

The New York Times previously reviewed the documents, which are in the papers of William A. Rusher, an early leader of the group and a former publisher of National Review. The Times reported in November that the documents and others at Princeton gave no indication that Judge Alito was among the major donors to the group and was not active in it. In an online interview on Wednesday with National Review, Mr. Rusher said he did not remember Judge Alito.

"He certainly was not very heavily involved in CAP, if at all," he said.

Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr., Democrat of Delaware, raised the possibility that Judge Alito had noted his membership as a way to signify his conservative leanings and enhance his chances of being hired.

In later comments to Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, Judge Alito appeared to accept that explanation.

"I was applying for a position in the Reagan administration, and my answers were truthful statements." he said when Mr. Schumer asked why he listed the Princeton group as one of just two groups to which he belonged. "But what I was trying to outline were the things that were relevant to obtaining a political position. I mentioned some very minor political contributions. I didn't mention contributions to charitable organizations."

Surprise End Unlikely As Alito Refuses To Take Bait (FT)

By Patti Waldmeir In Washington

Financial Times, January 12, 2006

Some of the most dramatic moments in US Senate history have involved battles over the confirmation of Supreme Court justices – think Robert Bork and Clarence Thomas. But those who were looking for a good, nationally televised political fistfight this week at the confirmation hearings of Judge Samuel Alito have so far been disappointed.

Mr Alito has proved a monochrome, dispassionate and unflappable witness, ignoring insult, slight and political controversy, never taking the bait of those allied against him.

This has made for crushingly tedious political theatre. Even some of the senators seem to be losing interest: when the hearings resumed on Wednesday after lunch, only six out of 18 members of the Senate judiciary committee were present – and one immediately left. It was a heavy blow for the massive press corps: even the political lobbyists in the audience, who had worked so hard to ignite a national culture war over his nomination, were hunched over their Blackberries reading e-mails, or gazing into space.

Mr Alito's performance – which involves answering every question unemotionally and legalistically, no matter how aggressive or passionate the questioner – may not make for high television ratings. But all the signs suggest that the sheer weight of his worthy if tedious performance will eventually crush the opposition.

Wednesday's long grilling by the judiciary committee focused largely on a couple of issues that seem unlikely to derail the nomination: Mr Alito's fleeting membership in a college alumni group that opposed the admission of women and minorities to Princeton University in the 1970s; and his participation in a legal case tangentially involving Vanguard mutual funds, at a time when he held such funds in his investment portfolio.

Ethics experts say Mr Alito was not required to recuse himself from the Vanguard case – although he promised to do so when nominated as a federal judge. Republican lobbyists see Democratic senators' focus on the case as a sign of desperation.

The issue of Mr Alito's membership in Concerned Alumni of Princeton – which he listed on a 1985 job application to the Reagan Justice Department – is more problematic. Mr Alito says he cannot remember joining the group, but that if he did, it would have been because of the group's views on military service, not minorities. And while this explanation did not seem to satisfy many senators, it does not seem the sort of thing to sink a nomination.

Alito Pressed On Precedent, Privacy (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON - Midway through Senate confirmation hearings, Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito has deftly parried questions on hot-button issues ranging from abortion to the limits of presidential power.

No memorable phrases. No conspicuous stumbles. And - most important - no searing images of what life in "Judge Alito's America" might be like.

To the frustration of anti-Alito groups staking out front seats in the hearing room, Democrats have been slow to get traction on issues critical to their base.

DOJ_NMG_0009512

"Too many senators allowed him to be evasive," says Nan Aron, founder of the Alliance for Justice and a leading activist in the 1987 defeat of the nomination of Judge Robert Bork. The anti-Bork campaign turned on a grim depiction of life for women, minorities, and the poor in "Judge Bork's America."

Many Republicans used their rounds of questioning to directly rebut issues raised by Democrats. Senate aides often distribute talking points to challenge a line of argument in real time, as it is being made in the Senate hearing room.

"He is saying as little as he needs to be confirmed and hasn't made many mistakes that trouble a majority of senators whose votes he needs," says Carl Tobias, a professor at the University of Richmond Law School.

But unlike Chief Justice John Roberts, Mr. Alito did not default to refusing to answer a question because "the issue is likely to come before the Court," he adds. "He has tried to wade in and engage the questions. The answers aren't always as specific as the senators would like, but he can't go too far, either. He'd have to recuse himself."

While many court watchers are predicting a party-line vote in the Senate Judiciary Committee, the 10 Republicans and eight Democrats say they are keeping an open mind.

The most divisive issue - on both sides of the aisle - is the constitutional status of abortion rights. Most Democrats and moderate Republicans, including Senate Judiciary Committee chairman Arlen Specter, support the principles of the 1973 Roe v. Wade decision. As he did in last year's Roberts hearings, Mr. Specter led off with questions on whether Roe v. Wade constituted a "super precedent," because it has been reaffirmed 38 times.

While agreeing that the Constitution protects a right to privacy - a point made by every nominee since Judge Bork - Alito did not agree that it was such settled law that its principles should not be reexamined. "I personally would not get into categorizing precedents as super precedents or 'super-duper' precedents (Specter's signature phrase)," he said.

In a deliberately balanced response, Alito said he agreed "with the underlying thought when a precedent is reaffirmed, that strengthens the precedent," but added that he didn't "want to leave the impressions that stare decisis [following precedent] is an inexorable command because the Supreme Court has said that it is not." He said he would approach the issue with an open mind.

In a signal of divisions within GOP ranks, Sen. Brownback (R) of Kansas, a prospective presidential candidate in 2008, cited all the precedents for the 1896 Plessy v. Ferguson case that legalized racial segregation, later reversed by the historic 1954 Brown v. Board of Education case outlawing segregated schools. But, aware that the issue could provoke a Democratic filibuster, he backed off pressing Alito for further response.

Senators also pressed Alito on the limits of executive powers, especially related to recent controversies over President Bush's authorization of domestic spying by the National Security Administration. He said that no president was above the law, but declined to say whether he thought that the White House exceeded its authority.

He also declined to say whether Bush abused executive powers by using presidential signing statements to override the intent of Congress. He said he would need to know the specifics of the case and go through the judicial process. In February 1986, Alito drafted a memo arguing that presidential signing statements should "assume their rightful place in the interpretation of legislation."

Democrats are also pressing Alito on issues of personal values and ethics.

In the closing rounds of questions, one of the most frequently cited documents is a 1985 job application to the Reagan Justice Department, in which Alito wrote: "I am particularly proud of my contribution in recent cases in which the government has argued in the Supreme Court that racial and ethnic quotas should not be allowed and that the Constitution does not protect a right to an abortion."

From The Left, Calls To Press Alito Harder (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 11 - Opponents of Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr.'s nomination to the Supreme Court expressed growing frustration Wednesday at the course of his confirmation hearings, saying that Democratic senators were struggling in their effort to build a strong case against him and that his confirmation appeared increasingly inevitable.

Several said they had been particularly distressed after the first day of questioning of Judge Alito by the Senate Judiciary Committee, and had expressed that concern in calls and e-mail messages to Democratic aides on Tuesday. One Democratic aide said the results of that could be seen on Wednesday in the tougher challenges and follow-up questions to Judge Alito, though by day's end, Judge Alito's opponents said he had again largely escaped efforts to force him to answer questions about his views and record.

DOJ_NMG_0009513

"Every answer he gives he gives himself a little out," said Kim Gandy, president of the National Organization for Women. "It's frustrating to me as a lawyer to not be able to say, 'Your Honor, instruct the witness to answer the question.' I've thought several times there is a follow-up question I would ask if I were up there."

Ms. Gandy said Republicans had, to some extent, hamstrung Democrats by creating a public expectation that they would antagonize Judge Alito.

"So I think the Democrats are leaning over backwards to be extremely, very, very nice," she said. "I don't think it's an un-nice thing to ask follow-up questions and really expect the nominee to answer the question."

Nan Aron, president of the Alliance for Justice, a liberal group and a member of the coalition, argued that Americans would turn against Judge Alito if they learned more about his views from the hearings.

"It would be helpful to expose this record more, and to discuss it in terms that are meaningful to most Americans throughout the country," Ms. Aron said. "Our polling shows that once individuals learn about his record, they move into the opposition column. And it seems to me there are certainly some points to score - his record should be sufficient in and of itself to doom his chances."

Opponents of Judge Alito's nomination were decidedly restrained in criticizing their political allies in the Senate, saying they understood the difficulties the Democratic senators faced and that Judge Alito was turning out to be a more adept nominee than they had expected.

Several singled out two senators for posing strong challenges to Judge Alito - Richard J. Durbin of Illinois and Charles E. Schumer of New York - and said Democrats had been particularly effective in putting Judge Alito on the defensive on his assertion that he had no memory of his membership in a Princeton alumni organization that had opposed the recruitment of minorities and women.

But with the clock on the hearings running down, several said the Democrats had not made major progress in trying to tarnish Judge Alito, and that hopes of a filibuster - much less an actual defeat of Judge Alito's nomination - were dimming. By contrast, they said Republicans had been effective in trying to put Democrats on the defensive for being harsh, particularly after television shots showed Judge Alito's wife, Martha-Ann, crying and leaving the hearing room.

Mr. Durbin declined to comment directly Wednesday when asked about criticism by liberal groups of the way Democrats were handling the meeting. But, he said, "I think today was a better day in terms of important questions that were asked and answered. Yesterday laid the groundwork, but today we got down to the critical issues."

There was some debate among activists about whether the problem was a reflection of Judge Alito's skill in deflecting questions or a weakness in the way Democratic senators questioned him. Whichever the case, there was a consensus that so far, at least, Americans did not know as much about Judge Alito as his opponents had hoped they would by this late point.

"There are many more questions and issues that they still need to pursue with him," said Hilary O. Shelton, director of the Washington office of the N.A.A.C.P.

Some opponents of the nomination said that, notwithstanding Judge Alito's skills as a witness, they were pleased by the course of the hearing.

"I honestly think we're at a good stage at this point in the hearings," said Ralph G. Neas, president of the People for the American Way, a liberal advocacy group.

Other Democrats were doubtful.

Even Mr. Durbin, the Democratic whip, held out little hope that Judge Alito would be defeated. Asked if the confirmation was inevitable, he responded, "I don't want to jump to that conclusion at this moment."

Democrats Target Alito, But Miss The Mark (CHIST)

By Robert Novak

Chicago Sun-Times, January 12, 2006

Edward M. Kennedy, the 73-year-old liberal lion of the Senate, did not so much roar as huff and puff Tuesday, as he faced Judge Samuel Alito. He and other Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee who had spent weeks preparing for Alito's Supreme Court confirmation hearing seemed to be shooting blanks at President Bush's nominee.

Kennedy appeared to have lost his fastball in the 19 years since he eviscerated nominee Robert Bork. But Alito is a deceptively more difficult target. While Bork appeared a flamboyant scholar eager to expound his worldview, Alito came over as a cautious lawyer dealing in fine print and footnotes. Republican senators had feared the nominee's uninspiring style would undo him, but they now feel it actually carried the day.

Failure to make a direct hit on Alito suggests a transcendent defeat for the Democratic judicial confirmation strategy crafted by Kennedy. It did not block all conservatives for appellate courts and failed to dissuade Bush from naming conservatives to the Supreme Court. To stop Alito required an auto wreck at this week's hearings, which always was unlikely considering his style.

It was not that Kennedy did not try his best on Tuesday. His legal aide, James Flug (an expert on judicial assassination), had stocked the senator with multiple scripts. But Kennedy seemed bogged down with his material, flitting from one subject to another, without focus. That seemed a generic problem for most Democratic senators. Sen. Joseph Biden spent 11 minutes in the preamble before he got around to his opening question.

Republicans were amused at Democrats stressing Alito's membership in the Concerned Alumni of Princeton because of the organization's alleged fight against admission to the university of women and African Americans. Alito testified he could barely remember his connection with CAP, but said he joined to protest Princeton's expulsion of the ROTC from campus.

What had worried Alito's strategists in advance was a concerted attack on his civil rights decisions that might erode support among moderate Republicans. But Alito's bland, lawyerly style prevailed when Biden raised the 1995 decision on a lawsuit by Barbara Sheridan against the DuPont Co. charging sex discrimination. Alito was outvoted 11-1 when the court ruled in Sheridan's favor. "After listening to Alito," said Republican Sen. Lindsey Graham, "you think the other 11 judges missed the boat."

Alito's dry style encouraged the pretense that the Judiciary Committee Democrats were engaged in a serious inquiry into the nominee's judicial philosophy. Actually, liberal special interest groups demanded a response to this nominee that was more vigorous than the passive opposition to John Roberts as chief justice. As a result, the only Democratic senator who now can be counted on to vote for Alito is Sen. Ben Nelson, running for re-election this year in the very red state of Nebraska.

In this week's hearing, Biden typically did not disguise the political stakes involved in this confirmation process: the conservative Alito replacing Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, a swing voter who usually has swung left. Biden asserted that O'Connor was "the fulcrum on an evenly divided court," so that filling this seat is more important than Roberts replacing Chief Justice William Rehnquist.

Senators Charles Schumer and Dick Durbin, two of the Senate's most partisan Democrats, have tried this week to escalate the intensity level of the hearings by asserting that the burden of proof was on Alito to show that he deserves to be on the Supreme Court. Just how he was supposed to do that was not spelled out. But that extraordinary heightening of the standards of confirmation would relieve the senatorial inquisitors from responsibility for measuring a nominee's fitness.

Schumer, at the end of the committee table in seniority, had to spend the entire day Tuesday watching his colleagues shooting blanks before he got his chance to fire the real thing. Schumer was well prepared, with a senatorial third degree of Alito demanding repeatedly to know whether he believed in a constitutional protection of abortion. That question led off a harsh, carefully scripted interrogation of the nominee. It made Chuck Schumer look mean and nasty, but that hardly derailed Sam Alito.

O'Connor Casts A Long Shadow On The Nominee (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 11 - The Constitution does not say what criteria the Senate should use in deciding whether to confirm a Supreme Court nominee.

But at least one clear test has emerged over the first three days of Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr.'s confirmation hearings. This nominee must, it seems, continually refer to and, if at all possible, endorse the views of the woman he aims to replace, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor.

Senators from both parties have frequently used Justice O'Connor's opinions as a basis for questioning Judge Alito. The heavy emphasis on her work is a testament to her disproportionate influence on the court in her 25 years of service, and a reminder of the important role Judge Alito will assume if he is confirmed.

As two senators noted in their opening statements, Justice O'Connor has cast the decisive vote in almost 150 cases, many of them of great moment.

Whenever the opportunity arose, Judge Alito and his supporters highlighted instances in which he had ruled as she had. He invoked her name on 9 occasions, and he had good things to say about her decisions 10 times. On Tuesday, Senator John Cornyn, Republican of Texas, ticked off areas in which the two judges had agreed.

"Justice O'Connor and Judge Sam Alito both set limits on Congress's commerce power," Mr. Cornyn said. "Sandra Day O'Connor and Sam Alito both struck down affirmative action policies that had strict numerical quotas. And both - this ought to be a shocker to some based on what we've heard here today - is that both Justice Sandra Day O'Connor and Judge Sam Alito have criticized Roe v. Wade."

Democratic senators, on the other hand, worked hard to show that Judge Alito and Justice O'Connor were at odds, particularly in an important abortion case.

DOJ_NMG_0009515

In his opening statement, striking a theme that has run through the hearings, Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, asked rhetorically, "Are you in Justice O'Connor's mold or, as the president has vowed, are you in the mold of Justices Scalia and Thomas?"

President Bush has said he would try to appoint justices like Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas, the court's two most conservative members.

By Wednesday morning, Senator Tom Coburn, Republican of Oklahoma, had grown frustrated with all the O'Connor talk. "The fact that you have to fit the Sandra Day O'Connor mold is really a misapplication," he said. "There is no precedent that would say that."

Judge Alito said he would be his own person, but not before offering one more tribute. "No nominee can ever be a duplicate of someone who retires," he said, "and particularly when someone retires after such a distinguished career and such a historic career as Justice O'Connor. Nobody can be expected, as a nominee, to fit that mold."

Judge Alito gave no indication, beyond saying he respected precedent and would proceed with an open mind, about whether he would follow the joint opinion Justice O'Connor signed in Planned Parenthood v. Casey, a 1992 decision affirming the constitutional right to abortion found by Roe v. Wade in 1973. Casey was, however, a 6-to-3 decision, and Judge Alito will not be in a position to move the court away from its support of the core right to abortion.

But Justice O'Connor did provide the crucial fifth vote in the court's last major abortion ruling, in 2000, striking down Nebraska's ban on what were called "partial birth" abortions. The court will soon decide whether to hear a challenge to a similar federal law, and in that case Judge Alito could alter the course of the court's abortion jurisprudence.

Judge Alito participated in the Casey decision in 1991 as an appeals court judge, and he seemed a little defensive in explaining his dissenting vote to uphold a Pennsylvania law that required women to notify their husbands before having abortions. The Supreme Court took the opposite view the next year.

All he had been trying to do in his dissent, Judge Alito explained, was to understand what Judge O'Connor had meant in some earlier decisions.

"There were just a few hints in those opinions about what she meant," Judge Alito said. "Based on the information that I had from Justice O'Connor's opinions, it seemed to me that this was not what she had in mind. Now, that turned out not to be a correct prediction."

In another exchange, asked whether he agreed with Justice O'Connor's statement in a 2004 decision that "a state of war is not a blank check for the president when it comes to the rights of the nation's citizens," Judge Alito did not hesitate.

"Absolutely," he said. "That's a very important principle."

In defending his dissent in a 10-to-1 decision of his court in an employment discrimination case, Judge Alito also invoked Justice O'Connor.

"When the issue went to the Supreme Court" in another case, he said, "Justice O'Connor wrote the opinion for the Supreme Court, and she agreed with my analysis."

In 1996, Judge Alito voted in dissent to strike down a law regulating the possession of machine guns, citing United States v. Lopez, a 1995 Supreme Court case that struck down a law banning the possession of handguns near schools.

Senator Jon Kyl, Republican of Arizona, was quick to note the lineup in the Lopez case. "By the way," Mr. Kyl said, "it was one of those decisions that Justice O'Connor was in the majority, a 5-4 decision in which her position could be characterized as the swing vote."

On Wednesday, Judge Alito said he would follow Justice O'Connor's approach in religion cases.

"Justice O'Connor pointed out something that's very critical in this area," he said. "She said there is a big difference between government speech endorsing religion and private religious speech. And private religious speech can't be discriminated against. It has to be treated equally with secular speech."

From the moment he was nominated in October, Judge Alito has made clear his fondness and admiration for Justice O'Connor. That was based in part, he said in remarks accepting the nomination, on something she had done at his first argument before the Supreme Court in 1982, an occasion that filled him with "a sense of awe."

"I also remember," he said, "the relief that I felt when Justice O'Connor, sensing, I think, that I was a rookie, made sure that the first question that I was asked was a kind one. I was grateful to her on that happy occasion, and I am particularly honored to be nominated for her seat."

Loose Lips Sink . . . (WP)

By Richard Cohen

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0009516

The only thing standing between Joe Biden and the presidency is his mouth. That, though, is no small matter. It is a Himalayan barrier, a Sahara of a handicap, a summer's day in Death Valley, a winter's night at the pole (either one) -- an endless list of metaphors intended to show you both the immensity of the problem and to illustrate it with the op-ed version of excess. This, alas, is Joe Biden.

The reviews for Biden's first crack at Samuel Alito, the humorless Supreme Court nominee, were murderous. The New York Times had Biden out on Page One -- normally a position to kill for -- only this time it was not a paean to his considerable merits, but an account of how it took him nearly three minutes of throat-clearing to ask his first question and then took the rest of his allocated 30 minutes just to get in four more. He concluded with about half a minute still left to him -- something of a personal best that even he had to acknowledge.

"I want to note that for maybe the first time in history, Biden is 40 seconds under his time," he told Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, no clipped speaker himself.

The Post had a similar account of Biden running off at the mouth. In that piece, Dana Milbank wrote that during Biden's round of questioning, he "spoke about his own Irish American roots, his 'Grandfather Finnegan,' his son's application to Princeton (he attended the University of Pennsylvania instead, Biden said), a speech the senator gave on the Princeton campus, the fact that Biden is 'not a Princeton fan,' and his views on the eyeglasses of Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.)."

The tragedy is that Biden, who is running for president, is a much better man and senator than these accounts would suggest. But his tendency, his compulsion, his manic-obsessive running of the mouth has become the functional equivalent of womanizing or some other character weakness that disqualifies a man for the presidency. It is his version of corruption, of alcoholism, of a fierce temper or vile views -- all the sorts of things that have crippled candidates in the past. It is, though, an innocent thing, as good-humored as the man and of no real policy consequence. It will merely stunt him politically.

'Tis a pity. Biden occupies the sensible center of the Democratic Party. He supported Bill Clinton's crime bill (more cops, fewer assault rifles) which helped the Democrats fight the talk-show calumny that they were pro-crime and anti-cop. In his maturity, he has emerged, along with some appropriate gray hair, as one of his party's most important -- and knowledgeable -- voices on foreign policy. Even on Iraq, an area where too many Democrats forgot that there was any reason for war, Biden took a decidedly centrist -- and defensible -- position. He voted to authorize the president to go to war but has since characterized that vote as "a mistake."

"It was a mistake to assume the president would use the authority we gave him properly," Biden said in November on "Meet the Press" -- adding that if he were allotted a do-over, he'd vote no. Since this approximately reflects my own position, I am inclined to appreciate its wisdom. But even before that vote, Biden was urging President Bush to seek international support for the Iraq effort, not to move precipitously, and to have a postwar plan. Bush, listening to you-know-who, did what the voices told him.

The seniority that makes Biden so knowledgeable on foreign policy -- a conversation with him is always instructive -- is also what cripples. He has been in the Senate since 1973 and suffers, as nearly all senators do sooner or later, from the conviction that he and his colleagues are the center of the world. After all, no one -- with the possible exception of family members -- ever tells a senator to shut up. They are surrounded by fawning staff and generally treated as minor deities. They lose perspective, which is why, now that you've asked, they talk and talk at these hearings. They are convinced the world is watching. Actually, it's only a half a dozen shut-ins on C-SPAN -- and, of course, the nearly catatonic press corps. Everyone else is playing computer solitaire.

Biden ran for president once before -- and then, too, his mouth went off on its own. (In 1988, his stump speech was perilously similar to the one used by Neil Kinnock, Britain's Labor Party leader.) This time seems no different, except the loss is greater. Foreign policy, Biden's specialty, is the number one issue. He has much to say -- and then too much to add. He is an anatomical disaster. His Achilles' heel is his mouth.

Congresswomen Deem Alito Unfit (WT)

By Amy Fagan And Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, January 12, 2006

Democratic congresswomen yesterday said Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr.'s failure to define abortion as a guaranteed right makes him unfit to sit on the Supreme Court, but senators said they are taking a wait-and-see approach.

"We believe that Judge Alito poses a direct threat to the rights of women in America," 20 House Democrats wrote in a letter urging senators to block President Bush's nominee. House members have no formal role in confirming presidential nominees.

At issue is Judge Alito's position on Roe v. Wade, the 1973 Supreme Court decision that found a constitutional right to an abortion. The nominee wrote in 1985, while serving in the Reagan administration Justice Department prior to becoming a judge, that he did not believe the Constitution guarantees the right to an abortion and advocated that it be overturned.

DOJ_NMG_0009517

Senators sought to have Judge Alito explain that position in this week's Senate Judiciary Committee hearings. Unlike Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr., who during his hearings last year called Roe "settled law," Judge Alito would only say it was precedent and all precedents should be given weight.

Republican senators on the Judiciary Committee were satisfied with that answer, but many committee Democrats and outside interest groups, who consider abortion rights sacrosanct, were not.

Vicki Saporta, president and CEO of the National Abortion Federation, said his answers show Judge Alito would seek to overturn Roe if given the chance.

"I think he's being evasive on purpose. I think he's done nothing to distance himself from his prior writings and decisions," she said.

Many senators who are not on the Judiciary Committee are traveling overseas or busy with home-state constituent work, but their aides said they will review hearing transcripts before they vote.

"I don't know who the real Samuel Alito is or what his true views are," said Sen. Barbara A. Mikulski, Maryland Democrat, who has been watching the televised proceedings. "Is he just telling us what we want to hear? What is his judicial philosophy? What does he believe in -- privacy, the right to executive power?"

Alex Glass, a spokeswoman for Sen. Patty Murray, Washington Democrat, said Judge Alito's comments on Roe were "clearly concerning, particularly in light of the stance John Roberts took" that Roe was settled law.

Still, Ms. Glass said it's too early to decide how her boss will vote or whether the issue merits a filibuster.

Steve Hourihan, spokesman for Sen. Lincoln Chafee, Rhode Island Republican and a member of the "Gang of 14" senators who have agreed not to filibuster any judicial nominee without extraordinary reasons, said that from their vantage point, Judge Alito is not that far off from what Chief Justice Roberts said.

"Right now, he thinks there's basically a lot more to come, and a finer point to put on it," Mr. Hourihan said.

Sen. Ben Nelson, Nebraska Democrat and another of the 14 senators involved in the no-filibuster deal, hasn't had time to review the specific hearing questions, according to spokesman David DiMartino, but "he hasn't seen anything that's come up that would be problematic to the nominee."

Judge Alito, In His Own Words (NYT)

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

Some commentators are complaining that Judge Samuel Alito Jr.'s confirmation hearings have not been exciting, but they must not have been paying attention. We learned that Judge Alito had once declared that Judge Robert Bork - whose Supreme Court nomination was defeated because of his legal extremism - "was one of the most outstanding nominees" of the 20th century. We heard Judge Alito refuse to call Roe v. Wade "settled law," as Chief Justice John Roberts did at his confirmation hearings. And we learned that Judge Alito subscribes to troubling views about presidential power.

Those are just a few of the quiet bombshells that have dropped. In his deadpan bureaucrat's voice, Judge Alito has said some truly disturbing things about his view of the law. In three days of testimony, he has given the American people reasons to be worried - and senators reasons to oppose his nomination. Among those reasons are the following:

EVIDENCE OF EXTREMISM Judge Alito's extraordinary praise of Judge Bork is unsettling, given that Judge Bork's radical legal views included rejecting the Supreme Court's entire line of privacy cases, even its 1965 ruling striking down a state law banning sales of contraceptives. Judge Alito's membership in Concerned Alumni of Princeton - a group whose offensive views about women, minorities and AIDS victims were discussed in greater detail at yesterday's hearing - is also deeply troubling, as is his unconvincing claim not to remember joining it.

OPPOSITION TO ROE V. WADE In 1985, Judge Alito made it clear that he believed the Constitution does not protect abortion rights. He had many chances this week to say he had changed his mind, but he refused. When offered the chance to say that Roe is a "super-precedent," entitled to special deference because it has been upheld so often, he refused that, too. As Charles Schumer, Democrat of New York, noted in particularly pointed questioning, since Judge Alito was willing to say that other doctrines, like one person one vote, are settled law, his unwillingness to say the same about Roe strongly suggests that he still believes what he believed in 1985.

SUPPORT FOR AN IMPERIAL PRESIDENCY Judge Alito has backed a controversial theory known as the "unitary executive," and argued that the attorney general should be immune from lawsuits when he installs illegal wiretaps. Judge Alito backed away from one of his most extreme statements in this area - his assertion, in a 1985 job application, that he believed "very strongly" in "the supremacy of the elected branches of government." But he left a disturbing impression that as a justice, he would undermine the Supreme Court's critical role in putting a check on presidential excesses.

INSENSITIVITY TO ORDINARY AMERICANS' RIGHTS Time and again, as a lawyer and a judge, the nominee has taken the side of big corporations against the "little guy," supported employers against employees, and routinely rejected the claims of women, racial minorities and the disabled. The hearing shed new light on his especially troubling dissent from a ruling by two Reagan-appointed judges, who said that workers at a coal-processing site were covered by Mine Safety and Health Act protections.

DOJ_NMG_0009518

DOUBTS ABOUT THE NOMINEE'S HONESTY Judge Alito's explanation of his involvement with Concerned Alumni of Princeton is hard to believe. In a 1985 job application, he proudly pointed to his membership in the organization. Now he says he remembers nothing of it - except why he joined, which he insists had nothing to do with the group's core concerns. His explanation for why he broke his promise to Congress to recuse himself in any case involving Vanguard companies is also unpersuasive. As for his repeated claims that his past statements on subjects like abortion and Judge Bork never represented his personal views or were intended to impress prospective employers - all that did was make us wonder why we should give any credence to what he says now. ·

The debate over Judge Alito is generally presented as one between Republicans and Democrats. But his testimony should trouble moderate Republicans, especially those who favor abortion rights or are concerned about presidential excesses. The hearings may be short on fireworks, but they have produced, through Judge Alito's words, an array of reasons to be concerned about this nomination.

Senate Civility (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2006

It's a sign of how little Democrats have on Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito that on Day Three of his confirmation hearings they were still pounding away on his membership in an obscure Princeton alumni group that flowered briefly at the judge's alma mater. They can't touch him on credentials or his mastery of jurisprudence, so they're trying to get him on guilt by ancient association.

Senators Ted Kennedy and Chuck Schumer did their best yesterday to imply that Judge Alito was racist and sexist by linking the nominee with the views of some members of Concerned Alumni of Princeton, which back in the 1970s and 1980s took issue with university policies on coeducation and affirmative action. The questioning was mean enough that Judge Alito's wife left the hearing room after GOP Senator Lindsey Graham apologized for the comments of his fellow Senators. "Are you really a closet bigot?" Mr. Graham asked the nominee. "No, sir, you're not."

Judge Alito doesn't recall being a member of CAP, but says that if he was it must have been because he shared CAP's concern about keeping ROTC on campus. For the sin of not recalling, he was then tarred as dishonest. Senator Kennedy demanded to know whether Judge Alito had read various articles on CAP that had appeared more than two decades ago, including an editorial that ran in these columns on January 17, 1985.

Much as we like our own work, even we confess to having forgotten about that editorial. We'd like to think Senator Kennedy reads us so assiduously that he knew just where to look, but something tells us his staff dug it up from our computer archives. But we appreciate the unlikely plug. Our readers can find the editorial on OpinionJournal.com1. As for Judge Alito's prospects, if this irrelevant arcana is the most his opponents have, he can start measuring his new judicial robes.

Kate Michelman, The Public Face Of A Woman's Right To Privacy (WP)

By Linton Weeks

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

Kate Michelman is the face of reproductive rights. It's a thin face with high cheekbones, dark eyes that can light up and a mouth with a corner that upturns at comic moments.

For a generation, Michelman, 63, has been at the forefront of one of this country's thorniest debates. She was president of NARAL Pro-Choice America from 1985 to 2004. She is scheduled to testify this week in opposition to the nomination of Samuel Alito to the Supreme Court. And she has written a new book, "With Liberty and Justice for All: A Life Spent Protecting the Right to Choose."

Last night several hundred friends and well-wishers showed up at the Woman's National Democratic Club near Dupont Circle for cheese, wine and a celebration Michelman's book and her mission. Guests included former secretary of state Madeleine Albright, Del. Eleanor Holmes Norton and Rep. Jim Moran (D-Va.).

"One reason I wrote this book," Michelman told the crowd, "was to hopefully inspire young women and men."

Michelman's interest in abortion rights is personal. In the late 1960s she was a Pennsylvania homemaker, married to a college professor. She had put her career in early childhood development on hold to start a family.

"I had married my childhood sweetheart at age twenty," she writes. "I was a practicing Catholic who accepted the Church's teaching that birth control was a sin. Like many other Catholic wives, I practiced the 'natural' means of contraception -- the rhythm method -- and believed the claim that breast-feeding prevented pregnancy. I exploded every myth. We had three daughters in three years."

DOJ_NMG_0009519

In 1969 her husband walked out on her. Several weeks later, she learned she was pregnant. She was desperate. She felt she could not have a fourth child while trying to raise the other three single-handedly. She attempted suicide. Then she decided to get an abortion. She needed her husband's permission and the approval of the hospital's all-male review board. She received both.

The abandonment and the circumstances surrounding her abortion were the low points of her life, she said. Eventually she went to work, remarried and became the political force that now wants to take her zealousness for privacy rights beyond the women's movement.

Before the soiree she drank a little celebratory champagne with her youngest daughter, Anya, and talked about the single issue that has driven her.

The Alito hearing, she said, triggers memories of the Robert Bork confirmation hearings in 1987. Michelman was scheduled to testify then, too. But she and leaders of other advocacy groups decided that Bork was going to cook his own goose, so she decided not to speak.

She is also reminded of the Clarence Thomas hearings in 1991. She did testify then. Like Alito, Michelman said, "Thomas also said he was open-minded" on the landmark abortion-rights case, Roe v. Wade .

But he has tried at every opportunity to overturn that decision, she said.

When she talked of hard things, her soft voice hardened.

Now at a life juncture, Michelman is plotting her next steps. She wants to be a spokeswoman for personal rights who "is not constrained by organizational restraints or party politics."

She hopes to "expand people's understanding of what it means to be pro-choice. And it doesn't mean to be pro-abortion."

She said the right to privacy is a fundamental American value whether it involves a woman's body or governmental wiretapping.

She said she has always been a serious person. As a teenager in Ohio, she listened to news and Senate hearings on a shortwave radio. Her idea of fun, she said, was organizing a Christmas tree sale to benefit Mexican farmworkers in her community.

Asked how she relaxes, she sat forward on the edge of her seat. "I don't!"

But she likes to make food from scratch. "I love cooking, love doing things very authentically."

Ideally, she would like to live in medieval fashion, without many modern conveniences. "I love washing dishes."

And she:

Reads a lot. She has been enjoying a novel by Ian McEwan and a book about the Constitution. "I read every word in every paragraph," she said.

Sleeps little. "If I get two or three hours a night I am lucky," she said.

Exercises every day. "I am disciplined."

She is not that attuned to popular culture, daughter Anya says. But Michelman is hooked on "24," the warp-speed, torture-laden thriller Fox series. And she has seen "The Lord of the Rings" several times.

Personality tests, she said, always told her what she already knew. She is an introvert. Her personal story, she said, pushed her into prominence. Still, it was only after she had been president of NARAL for a few years that she went public with her own abortion story.

Introducing Michelman, Frances Kissling, president of Catholics for a Free Choice, encouraged everyone to buy lots of copies. "We want her book on the bestseller list."

She and others testified to Michelman's energy and focus.

Albright told everyone that Michelman had provided "a voice for those who didn't have a voice and a brain for those who didn't have a brain."

She said Michelman kept the women's movement motivated and that the timing of her book with the Alito hearings was fortunate.

Fred Michelman said living with Kate was "like riding a tiger."

As for the face of the abortion rights movement, her husband of almost 34 years smiled and said, "It's a face I know so well."

Losing The Alitos (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0009520

If he'd been born a little earlier, Sam Alito would probably have been a Democrat. In the 1950's, the middle-class and lower-middle-class whites in places like Trenton, where Alito grew up, were the heart and soul of the Democratic Party.

But by the late 1960's, cultural politics replaced New Deal politics, and liberal Democrats did their best to repel Northern white ethnic voters. Big-city liberals launched crusades against police brutality, portraying working-class cops as thuggish storm troopers for the establishment. In the media, educated liberals portrayed urban ethnics as uncultured, uneducated Archie Bunkers.

The liberals were doves; the ethnics were hawks. The liberals had "Question Authority" bumper stickers; the ethnics had been taught in school to respect authority. The liberals thought an unjust society caused poverty; the ethnics believed in working their way out of poverty.

Sam Alito emerged from his middle-class neighborhood about that time, made it to Princeton and found "very privileged people behaving irresponsibly."

Alito wanted to learn; the richer liberals wanted to strike. He wanted to join R.O.T.C.; the liberal Princetonians expelled it from campus. He was orderly and respectful; they were disorderly and disrespectful. The experience was so searing that he mentioned it in the opening of his confirmation hearing 37 years later.

In 1971, Fred Dutton, an important Democratic strategist, acknowledged the rift between educated liberals and the white working class. In a short book, "Changing Sources of Power," Dutton argued that white workers had "tended, in fact, to become a major redoubt of traditional Americanism and of the antinegro, antiyouth vote."

The New Deal coalition, including Catholics and white ethnics, was dying, he argued, and should be replaced by a "loose peace coalition" of young people, educated suburbanites, feminists and blacks.

That plan wasn't stupid, but it didn't work. The party has been in a downward spiral ever since. John Kerry lost the white working class by 23 percentage points. He lost among his fellow Catholics. He lost the election.

After every defeat, Democrats vow to reconnect with middle-class whites. But if there is one lesson of the Alito hearings, it is that the Democratic Party continues to repel those voters just as vigorously as ever. The Democrats have amply shown why they remain the party of gown, but not town.

First, there was the old subject of police brutality. If you listened to the questions of Jeff Sessions, a Republican, you heard a man exercised by the terror drug dealers can inflict on a neighborhood. If you listened to Ted Kennedy, you heard a man exercised by the terror law enforcement officials can inflict on a neighborhood. Kennedy railed against "Gestapo-like" tactics. Patrick Leahy accused Alito of rendering decisions in a "light most favorable to law enforcement."

If forced to choose, most Americans side with the party that errs on the side of the cops, not the criminals.

Then there was the old hawk-dove divide. If you listened to Lindsey Graham, a Republican, you heard a man alarmed by the threats posed by anti-American terrorists. If you listened to Leahy or Russ Feingold, you heard men alarmed by the threats posed by American counterterrorists. The Democratic questions implied that American counterterrorists are guilty until proved innocent, that a police state is being born.

If forced to choose, most Americans want a party that will fight aggressively against the terrorists, not the N.S.A.

Then there were the old accusations of bigotry. Kennedy misleadingly and maliciously asserted that Alito had never written a decision on behalf of an African-American. But those wild accusations don't carry weight any more. Rich liberals have been calling white ethnics bigots for 40 years.

Finally, and most important, there is the question of demeanor. Alito is a paragon of the old-fashioned working-class ethic. In a culture of self-aggrandizement, Alito is modest. In a culture of self-exposure, Alito is reticent. In a culture of made-for-TV sentimentalism, Alito refuses to emote. In a culture that celebrates the rebel, or the fashionable pseudorebel, Alito respects tradition, order and authority.

What sort of party doesn't admire these virtues in a judge?

The big story of American politics, which was underlined by every hour of the Alito hearings, is that sometime between 1932 and 1968, the DNA of the Democratic Party fundamentally changed. In 1932, the Democrats had working-class DNA. Today, the Democrats have different DNA, the DNA of a minority party.

The Alito Spectacle: Senators (USAT)

USA Today, January 12, 2006

"I'll try to make this painless," Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., said as he began questioning Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito during confirmation hearings Tuesday. No such luck.

For the next 30 minutes, Biden engaged in a rambling, self-indulgent soliloquy on his views on the Constitution, his dislike for Princeton University (Alito's alma mater), his grandfather's philosophy and even on another senator's eyeglasses. Questions for the nominee, whose decisions on the Supreme Court would affect every life in America? There were just five. They ate up triple the time Alito was allowed for answers.

DOJ_NMG_0009521

During two days of hearings, it has seemed that for every senator who questioned Alito thoughtfully — and there were several — three others were more interested in hearing themselves talk. Enough senatorial hot air was expelled to fill blimps from sea to shining sea.

On the Republican side, Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., even acknowledged that he was using Alito as a political prop. "This is really not about you, so you don't have to listen. I'm talking to other people right now," Graham told Alito during one "question." He was lecturing colleagues who had criticized President Bush for using wartime presidential powers in ways that put him above the law.

Others wasted time with phony questions. "Are you against women and minorities attending college?" asked Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah. The only input Alito was allowed was an "Absolutely not, Senator. No." Then the speech continued.

The Judiciary Committee might learn something from the pointed questioning by its leaders, both former prosecutors. Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., led off with tough queries about Alito's views on abortion, the right to privacy and executive power. He pressed him with pertinent follow-ups.

Ranking Democrat Patrick Leahy of Vermont grilled the nominee about treatment of enemy combatants, wiretap surveillance of Americans without a court warrant, and Alito's ruling in a case involving the strip-search of a child during a drug raid. Like Specter, he seemed genuinely interested in Alito's answers and didn't interrupt.

Bloviating is nothing new to politics, of course, or to the Senate. Nor is the partisanship that has raised it to gale force. But when senator after senator focuses more on scoring snappy sound bites than on learning a nominee's views, the public is ill-served and the Senate's credibility is undermined. More important, so is confidence in the independence of the court.

Given the stakes, it's too bad so many senators seem so disinterested in gathering facts to make an informed, independent choice.

Painless? Only for the bloviators.

The Alito Spectacle: Nominee (USAT)

USA Today, January 12, 2006

If the Judiciary Committee is inept at questioning Supreme Court nominees, the damage is doubled by the fact that Samuel Alito, like other recent nominees, is very good at the game of saying as little as possible.

Hour after hour, he has geared his responses to avoid anything attention-grabbing — or even very informative. As a result, his views on most issues remain mostly guesswork.

The silence, though, tends to reinforce doubts raised by Alito's record — more so than Chief Justice John Roberts' did at his confirmation hearings four months ago. For example, Roberts described the court's 1973 abortion ruling, Roe v. Wade, as settled law in 2003 and "settled as precedent" last fall. Yet Alito, who once aggressively disputed that decision, wouldn't go that far. He said Tuesday that it's an "important precedent."

Similarly, Alito only backhandedly recognized as a precedent the 1965 decision that established the underlying doctrine of privacy, overturning a state's ban on use of birth control. On a second case extending that principle, he acknowledged agreement with "the result." But in legal terms, that leaves open whether he accepts the decision itself as another precedent for keeping Big Brother out of the nation's bedrooms.

Among the most vexing issues heading for the court are disputes over extraordinary powers claimed by the Bush administration in the war on terrorism. Alito said he agrees with the principle enunciated by retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor that "a state of war is not a blank check for the president." Unknown is where he thinks the limits lie. Alito shouldn't prejudge prospective cases, but he gave little to help senators assess whether he would protect citizens from government excess. President Bush claims the power to imprison Americans without trial and to eavesdrop on them without court review.

Almost every Supreme Court nominee since Robert Bork has employed this strategy of earnest vagueness out of reasoned fear that forthrightness would bring defeat.

When Bork was nominated in 1987, he readily expanded on his long history of provocative views, attacking court decisions that legalized abortion, prohibited poll taxes and required equal representation in legislative districts. He was rejected, 58-42.

Just a year earlier, Antonin Scalia, a renowned legal conservative, refused even to say what he thought of the 1803 case that established the court's authority to interpret the Constitution. He was confirmed, 98-0.

With today's court so narrowly divided on so many critical issues, the strategy of silence amounts to low short-term politics at high long-term risk. There is an alternative, of course: Choose nominees whose views don't need to be hidden to gain bipartisan support. But that appears to be an ambition too grand for such partisan times.

DOJ_NMG_0009522

Bush Sets Focus On Health Care For 2006 Agenda (WSJ)

By John D. Mckinnon And Sarah Lueck, Staff Reporters Of The Wall Street Journal

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON -- President Bush, searching for a way to ease Americans' anxiety about the economy and to respond to business and consumer alarm over health costs, is gearing up to focus on health care as a centerpiece of his 2006 domestic agenda.

The White House is unlikely to propose major new federal spending. Instead, it is considering expansions of several earlier proposals aimed at using market forces to improve the quality and restrain the rapidly rising cost of health care.

The White House has been frustrated that the president isn't getting more credit for an economy marked by steady growth, low inflation and falling unemployment. Talking more about health care is part of its response. "Health care is obviously a big challenge, and ... creates angst on the part of the American people," Mr. Bush's economic adviser, Allan Hubbard, said in an interview this week. "Employers are spending more money on health care, and that's robbing people of wage increases," he said.

The president is likely to sound similar themes in the State of the Union address later this month. In Louisville, Ky., yesterday, Mr. Bush called health care "an unmanageable cost" for businesses. Rejecting government-directed care as a solution, he said the ideal health system "is one in which there is a direct connect between provider and customer, [and] where there's transparency in the pricing system." In a likely signal of what is to come, the president urged Congress to expand health savings accounts, or HSAs. Created in 2003, HSAs allow Americans to set aside money tax-free to pay health costs if they choose high-deductible health insurance.

Among the proposals Mr. Bush is considering are:

· Providing bigger tax breaks for Americans who buy their own health insurance to balance tax breaks available to workers who get health insurance through employers.

· Encouraging broader use of HSAs in the hope that giving consumers more control over their health-care spending will make them more cost-conscious.

· Helping consumers get more information about health-care providers' prices and performance to make them better shoppers.

Building on past Bush proposals, the new White House focus on health -- beyond the government's Medicare program -- is intended to give Republicans an election-year answer to many of the worries that voters have about the fast-changing economy. In many voters' minds, those worries appear to be overshadowing the good economic news about the pace of growth and falling unemployment.

Opinion polls show health care near the top of Americans' concerns. Last month's Wall Street Journal/NBC News survey, for example, showed health care ranking behind only the war in Iraq on the list of issues the public wants the federal government to address. While 41% identified the war as a top priority for Washington, 33% identified health care, exceeding the 28% who pointed to job creation and economic growth.

While many experts and a growing number of business executives see reason to restructure the health-care system, politicians have shied away from wholesale changes since the failure of the Clintons' initiative in the 1990s.

The Bush White House is unlikely to repeat what is widely seen as the Clintons' overreaching, but the outlines of the health-care system it envisions are becoming clear. It would rely less on generous insurance provided by employers that insulate individuals from the cost of their choices. Instead, it would rely much more on market forces, individual (as opposed to employer-provided) insurance, tax credits to help the uninsured, provider competition and using the Internet to provide consumers with more, better data about the care quality and prices charged by doctors and hospitals.

Improved information about the quality of doctors and hospitals would be valuable to people with HSAs, who according to some surveys, "don't feel like they've got enough useful information to make the best decisions about their care," said Mark McClellan, a former White House adviser who now oversees Medicare. He has been pushing the giant program for the aged and disabled to link government payments to the quality of care, instead of the volume of care. Medicare, for instance, is experimenting with paying hospitals a bonus if they perform well on preset quality standards.

A slim new book, "Healthy, Wealthy & Wise," by former Bush advisers R. Glenn Hubbard and John F. Cogan, along with Daniel Kessler of the Hoover Institution, outlines the case for moving in the direction that the Bush administration is heading. It argues that "the unintended consequences of a handful of public policies" -- including tax and health-insurance rules -- "are in large part responsible for the problems of the health-care system" because they hinder "the proper functioning of markets." (See excerpts and more information1.)

DOJ_NMG_0009523

Mr. Bush's proposals are likely to draw fire from conservatives for not going far enough. And they will draw fire from Democrats and unions, who fear the administration would undermine the employer-based system and, by making individuals pay for more of their own health, discourage people from getting preventive health care. "I think this is a classic risk shift onto individuals that is both unpalatable to people and bad policy," said Jared Bernstein of the Economic Policy Institute, a liberal Washington think tank.

Analysts on both sides express skepticism that Mr. Bush, unable to persuade Congress to embrace his Social Security proposals, can make much headway this year.

Write to John D. McKinnon at john.mckinnon@wsj.com4 and Sarah Lueck at sarah.lueck@wsj.com5

Bush To Aim For Tight 2007 Budget: Card (REU-Y2)

By Susan Cornwell

Reuters, January 12, 2006

The Bush administration's upcoming budget blueprint for the U.S. government will "tighten the belt," White House chief of staff Andrew Card said on Wednesday.

Speaking to the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, Card gave no budget details in a speech that was short on particulars and long on reminders that the country was at war and that sacrifices were required. He also spoke mysteriously about a "dark cloud that seems to be gathering around the political world" but did not explain.

Card said the U.S. Congress did not appear to be in the mood to do anything about Social Security reform this year but thought lawmakers could tackle the issue in 2007 with President George W. Bush helping lead the way.

The White House was in the final stages of drafting a "very disciplined" new budget for fiscal 2007, starting October 1, Card said.

"It will fund the appropriate priorities of winning the war on terror, securing the homeland, but it will say, 'Tighten the belt,'" he said.

The administration faces budget pressures stemming from the war in Iraq and the cost of rebuilding in the Gulf Coast after the devastation from hurricanes Katrina and Rita in August and September.

Card said the 2007 budget will "make the tough decisions about which programs are necessary, and fund them appropriately but exercise prudence with the taxpayers' money."

Bush also will continue calling for tax cuts he initiated in his first term to be made permanent, Card said. The White House had considered launching a push this year for broad tax-code changes but is delaying that amid fears it could prove too controversial in a congressional election year.

The White House's effort to overhaul the Social Security system, which has an uncertain financial future as increasing numbers of Americans retire, has stalled and Card was not optimistic about congressional action on it this year.

"I think the reality is that Congress is predisposed not to do the heavy lifting that is necessary for Social Security reform in 2006 but they definitely should be prepared to start lifting in 2007," he said.

Inside The Beltway (WT)

By John Mccaslin

The Washington Times, January 12, 2006

Good stuff

One well-known politician in Washington was overheard this week discussing his personal angst regarding a widely heard political commentator in town and his repeated violation of the "off-the-record" rule.

"Every time I tell him something, and explain that it is 'off the record,' I hear it broadcast the next day. And every time I confront him about it, he says: 'I know it was off the record, but it was too good not to use.' "

Who knows anymore?

In light of news yesterday that D.C. Council member and former Mayor Marion Barry tested positive for cocaine after a recent court-ordered drug test, maybe a joke circulating around the John A. Wilson Building isn't such a stretch of the imagination: that his honor wasn't really "robbed" at gunpoint in his apartment kitchen recently; rather, it was "a drug deal gone bad."

Honest politician

"Unfortunately, we Republicans have taken earmarking to an unprecedented level. It is now our responsibility to clean it up."

That's an honest assessment from Rep. Jeff Flake, Arizona Republican, who is out to reform the practice of earmarking — spending items slipped into appropriations bills without congressional oversight.

DOJ_NMG_0009524

In a letter to House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Mr. Flake goes so far as to say that it is "no secret that over the past several months, our reputation as a governing majority has taken a beating. It is clear that continuing ... indictments, possible indictments, plea deals, tainted campaign contributions, etc., has severely eroded public trust."

Worse yet, he said, disgraced lobbyist "Jack Abramoff reportedly referred to the Appropriations Committee as a 'favor factory.' "

And here's the kicker: "No one who has seen the process firsthand, as we have, would honestly dispute his characterization," Mr. Flake told his Republican boss.

All about money

The National Republican Senatorial Committee (NRSC) has been keeping close tabs on Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, who is out raising money for Democrats this week, even though his name continues to surface in the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal.

Those in charge of Republican campaign coffers find it ironic that Mr. Reid, despite the cloud hanging over his head, has been raising money in Western Republican "red" states that backed President Bush in 2004 (his final stop today is Nebraska, having stumped for cash earlier this week in Arizona, Colorado, Utah and Idaho.)

Mr. Reid has called the Abramoff affair a "Republican scandal," telling Fox News viewers: "So don't lump me in with Jack Abramoff. This is a Republican scandal. Don't try to give any of it to me."

Nevertheless, the NRSC continues to peddle as many links as it can find between the Democrat and the disgraced lobbyist, not the least being a letter Mr. Reid wrote in 2002 to Interior Secretary Gale A. Norton on behalf of an Abramoff client.

"The day after Reid penned his letter, clients of Abramoff donated $5,000 to Reid's leadership [political action committee]," the NRSC states.

Madison's notes

Don't look now, but that's former Attorney General Edwin I. Meese III participating in this week's contentious Senate Judiciary Committee hearings for Supreme Court nominee Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr.

Or at least that's the Heritage Guide to the Constitution, co-edited by Mr. Meese, sitting on the desk of Sen. Tom Coburn, Oklahoma Republican, as he takes in Judge Alito's testimony this week surrounding the nominee's interpretation of the Constitution.

"It's obviously playing a significant role in the Alito hearings," Rebecca Hagelin, vice president of the Heritage Foundation, tells us.

The thick volume contains the opinions of more than 100 of the nation's top legal analysts who have examined, line by line, the Constitution and its contemporary meaning. They zero in on the original intent of the Framers as the authoritative standard of constitutional interpretation, relying heavily on their early writings, particularly the "invaluable" notes taken at the Constitutional Convention by James Madison.

Treasury Undersecretary Says He's Paid To Worry (USAT)

By David J. Lynch

USA Today, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — From his Treasury Department office overlooking the White House, Timothy Adams scans the globe trying to spot economic brushfires before they become infernos.

Right now, he doesn't see much to worry about. But he's still looking. “If I weren't paid to worry, I would argue that the glass is half full and there's a lot that we should celebrate. But my job isn't to celebrate; it's to think about how this all could go awry,” Adams, undersecretary of Treasury for international affairs, said recently.

Many things could derail the locomotive of global growth. In an interview, Adams singled out imbalances in the world economy, oil prices and China's stability.

Last year, the Chinese minister of public security acknowledged 74,000 incidents of mass protest. Most involve peasant anger over illegal land seizures, local government corruption or environmental woes. The discontent has done nothing to disrupt the economy or the river of foreign investment flowing into China. So far.

“Global industry has been extremely sanguine in their outlook for China … as a manufacturing, export and production platform. But there are a lot of risks there, and those risks bear close watching because any disruptions in China will have global implications,” he said.

Adams, 44, is preparing for his fourth trip to Beijing in the six months he's been in this job. He moved into one of the department's top posts after serving as chief of staff to then-Treasury secretary Paul O'Neill and several years as a Washington consultant. He also worked in the administration of President George H.W. Bush.

Each week, Adams receives a variety of financial intelligence reports from Treasury experts.

The department's “blue-chip early-warning system” monitors countries around the world for evidence of brewing currency, debt or banking crises. Adams wouldn't say whether his analysts have spotted any.

Current imbalances in the global economy will eventually adjust, Adams said. The only question is whether they move into balance gradually or with a painful crash.

Believing that today's calm won't last forever, Treasury officials also routinely carry out financial war-gaming to practice their handling of potential crises.

“We still are in extraordinarily benign conditions,” Adams said.

“… I suspect that whatever the crisis we have to address in the future — and we will — will probably come from someplace we least expect.”

Into The Oversight Void Step The Inspectors General (Washington Post)

By Christopher Lee

Washington Post, January 12, 2006

When a Chicago newspaper reported in 2004 that Illinois ranked last in federal disability payments to veterans, the secretary of veterans affairs -- prodded by House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and other influential lawmakers -- turned to his department's inspector general for an explanation.

After four months, 1,900 interviews and a review of 2,100 disability claims, a team of 36 auditors found reasons that veterans in top-ranked New Mexico got an average of $12,004 in annual disability payments while Illinois veterans received $6,961. Their 192-page report made eight recommendations for addressing the inequity, and the Department of Veterans Affairs is implementing many of them.

"It's a really big project," said Michael L. Staley, assistant inspector general for auditing, who led the effort. "Our national reviews generally take about 11 months, and we accomplished this from January to April."

For their labor, Staley and his team recently picked up the Alexander Hamilton Award. The annual honor recognizes the foremost effort by an inspector general to improve the efficiency and effectiveness of executive branch operations.

Created by an act of Congress in 1978, "IGs," as they are known, can trace their roots to the Continental Army, which had an inspector general independently assess the readiness of combat troops. Their modern mission is to foster integrity and efficiency in government through the prevention and detection of waste, fraud and abuse.

Initially Congress created 12 independent audit and investigative offices, and every affected agency opposed them. Over the past 27 years, inspectors general have become a fixture of the bureaucracy. Their ranks have grown to 57 -- more than half appointed by the president -- and their offices employ 11,400 auditors, investigators, inspectors and other professionals.

The role of inspectors general has taken on new prominence, as one-party control of Capitol Hill and the White House has dampened the appetite in Congress for close oversight of the executive branch, analysts say.

"They are becoming the de facto overseers of government," said Paul C. Light, a professor of government at New York University and the author of a book on IGs. "As congressional oversight has declined sharply over the last decade, many IGs are getting into areas that were once reserved for the investigatory committees of Congress. And many, but not all of them, have risen to the challenge. . . . Some of these reports are very hard-hitting."

Clay Johnson III, deputy director of the Office of Management and Budget, agreed that Congress is not "as aggressive as it needs to be," but not because the GOP dominates the levers of power.

"The executive branch pays more attention to whether we spend money on real needs and whether we get what we pay for than Congress does," said Johnson, who heads the President's Council on Integrity and Efficiency, an umbrella group of 29 presidentially appointed inspectors general. "That has nothing to do with which party is in charge of what branch."

In 2004, the most recent year for which figures are available, inspectors general processed 189,500 complaints, identified $18 billion in potential savings through audits, and were instrumental in nearly 6,500 prosecutions that led to convictions or settlements with the Justice Department. They collected $3.5 billion in fines, settlements and voluntary repayments, making the $1.9 billion spent to fund them look like a bargain.

Notable reports last year included a finding by the Transportation Department IG that the Federal Aviation Administration's inspection program had failed to address safety risks posed by airline industry cost-cutting and the rapid growth of budget carriers. A report by the Justice Department IG found that the FBI's failure to detect the Sept. 11, 2001, hijacking plot stemmed in part from "widespread and long-standing deficiencies" in the way the agency handled terrorism and intelligence cases.

Last year, the special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction found federal mismanagement complicated by corruption among government contractors and Iraqi officials that led to at least one criminal indictment.

And more than 350 investigators, auditors and evaluators from the inspectors general offices at the Department of Homeland Security and other departments were dispatched to scrutinize federal spending in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina.

DOJ_NMG_0009526

The job can bring as much grief as acclaim. Before becoming IG at the Corporation for National and Community Service in 2002, J. Russell George, then a staff director for a House subcommittee, called around to current and former IGs to ask what the job was like: "The vast majority of them said, 'Don't do it,' " he said.

George was told that IGs considered too aggressive by the White House can be perceived as too docile by Congress. He took the job anyway, and last year he was promoted by President Bush to be the inspector general overseeing the Internal Revenue Service.

"There's no question that being an IG is difficult," said George, who says he likes his work. "It's human nature that people many times do not like to be criticized or to be told that what they are doing is either wrong or could be done better. That is exactly what we as IGs have to do."

Some IGs are as controversial as the agencies they oversee.

Pentagon Inspector General Joseph E. Schmitz resigned in September after learning that he was the target of a congressional inquiry into whether he had blocked two criminal probes. Janet Rehnquist resigned the IG's post at the Department of Health and Human Services in June 2003, ending a controversial 22-month tenure in which she improperly kept a firearm in her office and initiated personnel changes that led at least 20 senior managers to retire, resign or be reassigned. That same summer, U.S. Postal Service Inspector General Karla W. Corcoran retired after a federal investigation found that she abused her authority, spent more than $1 million on each of three employee award ceremonies and conducted questionable personnel practices.

A few critics say the work of inspectors general has been undermined by politics. A 2004 report by the Democratic staff of the House Government Reform Committee found that fewer than 20 percent of inspectors general appointed by Bush had audit experience, while nearly two-thirds had held political positions, such as working for a GOP member of Congress or in a Republican White House. Under President Bill Clinton, more than 60 percent had audit experience and fewer than one-quarter had held political positions, the report said.

Yet, as Light, the government professor, pointed out, "Yes, there are more politicals, but some have become very aggressive IGs."

Clark Kent Ervin, a Texan who served in Bush's gubernatorial administration, got the inspector general's job at the Department of Homeland Security through a recess appointment because the Senate would not schedule a confirmation vote. Once in, Ervin became a thorn in then-Secretary Tom Ridge's side, issuing reports critical of spending and management practices at DHS agencies. He left in December 2004 (the expiration of his appointment) when it became clear that the White House would not renominate him.

"Here's a guy who was being groomed as a political type, but they canned him as quickly as possible," Light said.

Kenneth M. Mead, the IG at the Transportation Department, said inspectors general must set politics aside and "speak truth to power."

"It's important that the IG be a player," Mead said. "If you don't go after the big issues, you can be marginalized. I think it's important that we're not just sitting around looking at vouchers."

Lawmakers Move To Cut Lobbyists' Influence Scandal Jars Loose Stuck Legislation (USAT)

By Jim Drinkard

USA Today, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — A scramble is on to write new rules restricting how lobbyists ply their influence trade as the capital is embroiled in a spreading corruption scandal.

Bills aiming to chill the relationships between lobbyists and members of Congress, stalled for months, are now on a fast track as leaders battle the perception of misconduct. “These scandals aren't going away,” said Rep. Marty Meehan, D-Mass., a sponsor of one proposal to curb lobbyists' influence. “What we know is probably only a fraction of the story.”

The rush began last week when Jack Abramoff, a former top lobbyist, pleaded guilty to fraud and conspiracy charges and agreed to help prosecutors investigating corruption on Capitol Hill and in the Bush administration.

Abramoff plied congressmen and their aides with trips, free meals and entertainment. He gave thousands of dollars in campaign contributions and steered thousands more — including raising more than $100,000 for President Bush's re-election in 2004.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., and House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., have ordered packages of new ethics rules intended to take effect before lawmakers face voters in November.

House Rules Committee Chairman David Dreier, R-Calif., who is drafting the House package, said it likely will include a ban on members of Congress taking fact-finding trips paid for by private interests.

DOJ_NMG_0009527

Nearly $20 million has been spent on such trips since 2000, and they have come under scrutiny because Abramoff used trips — sometimes including golf at exclusive courses — as tools of influence.

Dreier said he also is looking at increasing the amount of information available on lobbyists' activities, including their campaign contributions and fundraising efforts.

"Greater transparency, greater disclosure … that is first and foremost," he said. "We need to expand the respect that the American people have for the institution, which is not all that high right now."

Current lobbying rules exempt "grass-roots" lobbying — sophisticated and often expensive efforts to generate public pressure on Congress through advertising, mail and e-mail. They also don't require lobbying coalitions to disclose the interests behind them.

Also under consideration: requiring lawmakers to fully disclose when they hop corporate planes for political travel and to reimburse the plane's owner for the full value of the flight.

Now, no such disclosure is required, and lawmakers have to reimburse only the priceof a first-class commercial ticket.

In the Senate, the bill drafting has been assigned to Sen. Rick Santorum, R-Pa. Spokesman Robert Traynham says Santorum is looking at restrictions on gifts from lobbyists, privately paid travel and fundraising.

Santorum and Dreier are looking at bills such as Meehan's and a similar one advanced by Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., and Rep. Christopher Shays, R-Conn., for ideas. They aim to complete draft bills by early next month.

Paul Miller, president of the American League of Lobbyists, a trade association, says the definition of lobbying also needs to be re-examined. Lobbying reports are filed by those who directly contact Congress or the executive branch. That leaves out others who seek to influence the government indirectly, including public relations consultants, Miller notes.

Ethics watchdog groups said new rules will mean little unless they are enforced, noting that the scandal arose at a time when congressional ethics enforcement was largely on hold.

"The House ethics committee is dead, and the Senate committee is not known to be effective," said Larry Noble, director of the non-partisan Center for Responsive Politics. "No matter what rules they put in, if they don't get a working enforcement mechanism, it's going to be meaningless."

Hill Weighs Curbs On Lobbying (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

Congress is poised to pass measures early this year that would clamp down on lobbying activity and possibly end some lawmaker travel.

Lawmakers are moving quickly to devise lobbying legislation and to approve it soon after Congress returns later this month. The rush has been caused by recent lobbying scandals, including the guilty plea last week of lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who is cooperating with prosecutors in a corruption investigation of Congress.

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) have delegated to colleagues the writing of bills that would increase lobbying disclosure and restrict the ways that lobbyists and lawmakers interact. Hastert said he is considering an outright ban on privately paid travel as one component of such a bill.

"Our intention is to have a very strong package," said Ron Bonjean, a spokesman for Hastert. The speaker, who skipped a planned trip to Asia in part to work on the lobbying proposal, expects the House to pass a bill "as soon as possible," Bonjean added. Rapid action is also expected in the Senate.

The details of that legislation have not yet come into focus. Proposals are coming from members of both political parties. A touchstone for all sides, however, is the plan introduced last month by Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Rep. Christopher Shays (R-Conn.). Rep. David Dreier (R-Calif.), who is Hastert's emissary on the issue, has consulted with McCain and said yesterday: "We're going to use a lot of what he has as a basis from which we'll proceed."

The McCain bill would beef up lobbying disclosure considerably and cover grass-roots lobbying campaigns, which now go unreported. It would also require lobbyists to report each fundraising event that they host or sponsor for candidates for federal office, including the amount raised.

In addition, the McCain bill would require lobbyists to report the donations they give to lawmakers directly and at events that honor lawmakers or entities that they created or control. It would also require lobbyists to disclose quarterly -- which would be twice as often as they file now -- any gift worth more than $20 that they give to lawmakers or their aides, including meals and tickets to events.

But one particularly powerful group is gearing up to oppose several of the most sweeping proposals: lobbyists. Lobby organizations ranging from the U.S. Chamber of Commerce to the American Society of Association Executives (ASAE) are concerned that some of the measures under consideration would overburden them with paperwork or unfairly limit their ability to do their jobs. They are already planning to lobby against those parts of any new lobbying law.

DOJ_NMG_0009528

"We need to sit down with people up there and give them some honest understanding of what can and what cannot be done," R. Bruce Josten, a Chamber executive, said, referring to Congress.

Josten worries that too much paperwork might bury lobbying groups and prove costly without much payoff for the public. He also doubts whether grass-roots lobbying disclosure is practical or wise. Jim Clarke of the ASAE has reservations about a ban on privately paid travel because it might isolate members of Congress from interest groups.

"Requiring us to write down every meeting we have with staff and members -- what will the public get from that? Nothing," said Paul A. Miller, president of the American League of Lobbyists. Miller frets that a ban on gifts to lawmakers would disadvantage small lobbyists in favor of their bigger colleagues who can offer sizable campaign contributions.

Miller said he expects extensive lobbying by lobbyists on the legislation.

But not all lobbyists think that is a good idea. "It would be foolish for the lobbying community to go up and fight these things," said Ralph Hellmann of the Information Technology Industry Council. "In the current environment, anything the lobbying community says is not good for itself will end up happening."

Lobbyists' Emergence Reflects Shift In Capital Culture (WP)

By Thomas B. Edsall

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

Corporate lobbyists Mark Valente III and Troup Coronado don't have to hang out in the hallways of Capitol Hill, waiting to buttonhole Rep. John M. Shimkus (R-Ill.). Both men have more convenient ways of reaching the lawmaker.

Valente is the treasurer of Shimkus's political action committee, the John S Fund. And Coronado, who lobbies for BellSouth, played host at a Dec. 17 fundraiser for Shimkus at MCI Center. Guests made contributions -- $1,000 per person, $1,500 per couple -- to his reelection campaign, and in turn they got to take in a Bon Jovi performance from the BellSouth suite.

There is nothing exceptional about Valente's relationship with Shimkus, or Coronado's fundraising party. But they do illustrate the capital's changing mores.

Although the excesses of Jack Abramoff have captured the news, a wide range of other practices -- rarely publicized and fully legal -- reflect the steady dismantling of the wall between lobbyists and members of the House and Senate.

Fallout from the Abramoff scandal is likely for a time to chill certain aspects of the capital culture, in which access to power on Capitol Hill is lubricated by lobbyist-funded meals, travel and campaign contributions, according to congressional veterans of both parties. But some public interest advocates believe the relationships between lobbyists and politicians have become so institutionalized in recent years that fundamental change is unlikely, absent changes in the law. Among the examples:

· Since 1998, lobbyists have served as treasurers of 79 lawmakers' campaign committees and leadership PACs, according to the Center for Public Integrity. These committees often pay for senators and House members to enjoy such fundraising events as golfing in Palm Springs, Calif., and fishing tournaments off the Florida Keys -- outings at which the lobbyists will also be prominently in attendance.

· Major trade associations have bought Capitol Hill townhouses for fundraisers so that lawmakers can quickly go back to cast votes and then return to the event.

· At election time, many lobbyists put on a new hat and become political consultants, guiding incumbents to reelection. Afterward these lobbyists return to their traditional roles, being able now to ask for votes from those they helped put in office.

"The border has broken down. Not only has it broken down, it's sort of 'barbarians at the gate,' " said Lawrence F. O'Brien III, a Democratic lobbyist. "There is sort of the naked 'Well, we are one, you are us' type of notion between the members of Congress and the lobbying community downtown."

The change in standards of what is objectionable versus what is commonplace is suggested by a nearly forgotten uproar nearly two decades ago. On Feb. 3, 1987, newspapers disclosed that then-Sen. Lloyd M. Bentsen (D-Tex.), chairman of the Finance Committee, had set up a "breakfast club" for lobbyists who donated $10,000 to his campaign committee.

The implied bargain -- money for access -- struck many as just too obvious. Three days later, Bentsen ended the breakfasts and acknowledged that his error of judgment had been "a doozy."

Now, every day Congress is in session, there are lobbyist-organized fundraisers for senators and representatives -- at breakfast, brunch, lunch or dinner -- at which the basic transaction is little different than what got Bentsen in hot water. Take Dec. 14, 2005:

Lobbyists for BNSF Railway and United Parcel Service held a luncheon for Rep. Jim Gerlach (R-Pa.) at the Associated General Contractors townhouse ($1,000 per PAC, $500 a person), according to the Web site for the National Republican Congressional Committee. A few blocks away, according to the NRCC, lobbyists for MasterCard, Time Warner and DuPont honored Rep. J. Gresham Barrett (R-S.C.) at Tortilla Coast ($1,000). That evening, Promia Inc.'s Adrian Plesha hosted a reception for Rep. John E. Sweeney (R-N.Y.) at his East Capitol Street home -- $5,000 for "sponsors," $1,000 for PACs and $500 for individuals.

DOJ_NMG_0009529

The pivotal point in Washington's changing culture, according to lobbyists and congressional ethics analysts, came in 1995, shortly after Newt Gingrich and his "Republican Revolutionaries" roared to power in the 1994 midterm elections. Tom DeLay, the new majority whip, and his allies began the "K Street Project" -- the pressuring of trade associations and lobbying firms to hire Republican, and to contribute to Republican campaigns if they wanted access to key leaders and committee chairmen in the House.

"We're just following the old adage of punish your enemies and reward your friends. We don't like to deal with people who are trying to kill the revolution. We know who they are," DeLay told The Washington Post.

DeLay announced last week he will not try to regain his former post of majority leader, even if he is cleared in a Texas trial over allegations of illegal fundraising. But his absence does not necessarily mean the lobbyist-lawmaker relationship will change on Capitol Hill.

One lawmaker hoping to move up in the GOP leadership is Rep. John A. Boehner (Ohio), chairman of the House Education and the Workforce Committee. He maintains the lobbyist-financed Freedom Project, with a lobbyist as treasurer and an all-lobbyist executive board. It has raised $5.94 million over 10 years and has contributed $3.26 million to fellow Republicans.

Some 2003-2004 expenditures include $21,990 at Sam and Harry's steakhouse, $16,189 in fees at Manassas's Robert Trent Jones Golf Club and $5,990 for lodging at La Quinta Resort & Club near Palm Springs.

"What used to be considered in Washington conduct to be hidden was turned into conduct to be flaunted," said Fred Wertheimer, president of Democracy 21, a group seeking campaign finance changes.

Although DeLay was a catalyst, some of the cultural changes he represented preceded him. And Democrats participated with vigor.

In 1981, then-Rep. Tony Coelho (Calif.), chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, began to "marry" businesses seeking legislation with Democratic lobbyists, especially former staffers. The maneuver gave the businesses better access and turned many into contributors to the DCCC.

That same year, the Republican firm Black, Manafort and Stone became the first in which partners served both as political consultants to candidates for federal office and lobbyists on behalf of corporations and trade associations.

Lobbyists also have unprecedented sway with the national party organizations. They held all the top positions at the 2004 GOP convention in New York.

The House GOP leadership has also brought them directly into the legislating process, institutionalizing the practice of using large networks of lobbyists to help "whip" bills by keeping vote counts and finding ways to persuade wavering members to vote with the caucus.

Recent years have even shown how the traditional lobbyist-lawmaker financial pipeline can flow in both directions. In addition to helping legislators raise reelection money, lobbyists have received large sums from politicians' PACs for vaguely defined services.

The soon-to-be-closed Alexander Strategy Group, for instance, received funds from committees associated with acting House Majority Leader Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) and DeLay -- $386,552, and $392,740, respectively.

DeLay's wife, Christine, and three former top aides -- Edwin A. Buckham, James W. Ellis and Tony C. Rudy -- worked for Alexander Strategy Group. Gregg Hartley, Blunt's former top political aide and now a lobbyist, defended the payments and said the money was paid "to utilize the services of several individuals who assisted with staffing, fundraising, strategy and operational services for the development, implementation and resource generation for a very effective and absolutely legal political campaign committee." Stanford political scientist David Brady said that in terms of overt corruption, this era does not compare to the gilded age of "robber barons" in the 19th century. Simon Cameron, a senator from Pennsylvania at that time, said of his colleagues: "An honest politician is one who, when he is bought, will stay bought."

L. Sandy Maisel, director of the Goldfarb Center for Public Affairs and Civic Engagement at Colby College, said the issue now is less a matter of criminality or overt corruption than a change in standards: "Congress as an institution now defines as ethical actions that would be derided elsewhere in society."

Let All The Sunshine In (WT)

By Paul M. Rodriguez

The Washington Times, January 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0009530

As John Boehner said when he threw his hat into the House majority leader's race, "adding more new rules isn't the answer" to clean up real and perceived egregious behavior now embroiling Congress as a result of the Rep. Tom DeLay, Jack Abramoff and Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham's disgraceful crimes.

Indeed, instead of adding more rules, how's this for a good government concept? Simply eliminate the very rules that sprang out of the Watergate-era campaign finance laws or many of the "reforms" following the House Bank and House Post Office scandals.

The concept isn't as far fetched as it sounds. Consider that it's one that has served well the residents of the Commonwealth of Virginia. The model is simplicity itself -- there are no restrictions governing political donations or gift giving other than making all of it public.

What a refreshing thought when one stops for a minute to ponder that, so far as memory serves, such a system has not led to any scandals in Virginia. Total transparency between donors and recipients, actual dollar amounts and specific goodies received are all put into the public domain for anyone to see, report and contemplate.

The major political parties have been fighting such rules since the 1974 Federal Campaign Act was signed into law to, basically, maintain some political advantages and loopholes. The sad fact is that, with approval by the Supreme Court, the only losers have been the American people and the First Amendment.

That said, the reality is that the large percentage of lobbyists (like journalists and government workers) are honest, good people. So the Abramoff's of this world really stink up the joints for all of us.

So it's rather ironic really when one considers that it's been under conservative Republican rule in the last few years that produced the McCain-Feingold legislation to supposedly -- yet again -- clean up campaign finance rules. Anyone remember the much-ballyhooed 527 political action committees?

Like prostitution, politics is as old as human kind. Maybe not much of a difference but the fact remains that each generation has seen its fair share of hookers and money scandals. And though laws are on the books to outlaw prostitution (except in certain locales in Nevada), no one has given serious consideration to outlawing politicians.

Instead, we've seen laws passed to protect pols from themselves and, arguably, to protect us from them. The sad fact is that our free speech rights to "speak" via political contributions -- whether individually or in groups -- have been abridged. Congress and the courts have theorized that losing some of these rights is okay if it's in the greater interest of the body politic. Something about a camel's nose in the tent springs to mind.

The result has been a body of laws, regulations and rulings that even experts in campaign finance and ethics law find confusing. So, how about trying something Virginia knows works?

Simply allow any American to givetoanypolitician(or wannabe) as much money as they want. And let anyone buy any politician or senior staff anything of value -- including a Rolls Royce or a yacht a la the Cunningham fiasco. Just make it all public within 30 days down to the last penny.

"Oh my God," I can hear naysayers scream, "you can't do that! Then the millionaires would buy up every politician and the little people would get suckered!" Really?

Consider the scores of millions spent by the likes of New Jersey Gov. John Corzine for his state's top job (and previously for the Senate seat), and New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg's lavish spending -- twice. Obviously, people can made up their minds when there's full public disclosure.

When the Republicans took over Congress in 1994 they promised to clean up the culture of corruption in Washington after 40 years of Democrat power. They promised to apply the laws of the land to themselves. They promised to live by the spirit of ethics, not just the rules. And Democrats joined them gladly after the myriad scandals from the late 1980s into the early 1990s.

The simplicity of the GOP "Contract with America" was its appeal. Republicans gambled that the public would support such common sense rules. They believed in the power of the people. So how about trusting the people yet again? We're all not as stupid as lawmakers or interest groups make us out to be.

Rep. David Drier, the California Republican who chairs the House Rules Committee, has been tasked by Speaker Dennis Hassert to come up with some lobbying rule changes. How about this David -- just scrap all the rules and truly shine the light on all that hidden money giving. Make it all public.

Arizona Legislator May Join Race To Succeed DeLay (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON -- As the two front-runners slowed, a third candidate edged closer to entering the nasty Republican contest to pick a successor to the party's fallen majority leader, Rep. Tom DeLay.

DOJ_NMG_0009531

Rep. John Shadegg stepped up calls seeking support from colleagues, and his allies were optimistic that the six-term Arizona lawmaker will offer a more change-oriented alternative to the two establishment figures in the field: Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R., Mo.) and Rep. John Boehner (R., Ohio), chairman of the House Education and Workforce Committee.

Last evening, Mr. Shadegg's office said no final decision had been made on the leadership race, but issued a statement critical of Reps. Blunt and Boehner for not being aggressive enough, in the congressman's words, "to clean up our act in the wake of the recent ethics scandals and get back to the agenda that brought us the majority in the first place."

"At the end of the day, he hinted, he'd be in the race. I don't know what his decision is," said Speaker Dennis Hastert (R., Ill.), who spoke by telephone with Mr. Shadegg. Neither Mr. Blunt nor Mr. Boehner appears close to the 116 votes needed to win. With so many Republicans uncommitted, Mr. Shadegg has the potential to shake up the race, forcing at least a second ballot and greater discussion of changes that many members are demanding.

"I'd say uncommitted is leading by two lengths," said Rep. Charles Bass (R., N.H.), one of those encouraging Mr. Shadegg's candidacy.

"I think it's important to pin these people down," said Rep. Jeff Flake (R., Ariz.), a Shadegg ally. "I'm not convinced those running realize the trouble we're in as a party and that a modest course correction won't do."

The jockeying takes place against a background of scandal and drift within Republican ranks that threatens the party's hold on the House going into November's elections. Mr. DeLay's decision to surrender the majority leadership post came just days after his friend, lobbyist Jack Abramoff, pleaded guilty to three felonies in federal court and promised to cooperate in a larger Justice Department probe that likely will touch other lawmakers as well.

The party was stunned by the actions of former Rep. Randall "Duke" Cunningham, a California Republican who resigned from Congress in November after pleading guilty to taking bribes in exchange for helping steer contracts to defense companies.

The Abramoff and Cunningham scandals cast light on the dangers of lawmakers earmarking funds in spending bills for favored projects, a practice common to both parties, but which has grown under Republican rule. Mr. Flake argues that whoever succeeds Mr. DeLay must address not only lobbying abuses but internal institutional changes within the House.

Reps. Blunt and Boehner are both promising overhauls, but the two men are so closely linked to the Washington lobbying community that they have trouble convincing their colleagues that they will be real advocates for change. In frustration, each camp has stepped up its behind-the-scene attacks on the other. As the race turns nastier, a fresh face such as Mr. Shadegg could be at an advantage.

The Republican Study Committee, representing House conservatives, will hold a retreat in Baltimore before the Feb. 2 leadership elections. An effort to move up the party deliberations by a week -- something that might have helped Mr. Blunt -- failed yesterday. A petition drive began to require that nearly all of the leadership posts except the speakership be thrown open for fresh elections.

The timing of the Baltimore retreat could help Mr. Shadegg, a former RSC leader. He showed an ability to reach out to moderates when he quietly won a foothold in the leadership at the beginning of this Congress. Mr. Hastert has since tapped him to lead a series of dinners with Republicans on immigration issues -- a divisive issue. He has been an ally in promoting legislation to help small, sole proprietorships gain access to cooperative health insurance.

Congress Watch: Few Expect Dark Horse In House GOP Race (USNEWS)

By Paul Bedard

U.S. News and World Report, January 12, 2006

House Republican lawmakers do not think that a third candidate will move forward this week to challenge Ohio Rep. John Boehner and Missouri Rep. Roy Blunt for the House majority leader's post.

Senators hope to strip oil taxes from Katrina bill (12/21/05)

Frist predicts Jan. 20 Alito confirmation (12/19/05)

Aides say Bush has bottomed out (12/13/05)

More from Washington Whispers

More from Nation & World

"It's just too late to get in," said a key GOP leadership aide. However, added another, if neither Blunt nor Boehner can nail down the job within the next six to eight days, a move could be made to seek a consensus candidate. The leading alternative there, said several leadership officials and GOP consultants, is Rep. Tom Reynolds, head of the National Republican Congressional Committee. Insiders close to the two campaigns to replace Rep. Tom DeLay as the permanent majority leader said that while Blunt is the leader, Boehner is gaining ground.

"Boehner is making good progress, so Blunt may have some vulnerability," said a key source, who added that Blunt's position as House whip should make it easy for him to nail down the job quickly. "If we don't see Blunt wrapping it up this week, then all bets are off," added the insider. A Republican consultant who was involved in the 1998 coup and installation of Dennis Hastert as speaker said that the first week is critical.

"If you can't nail it down then, the members start looking for somebody else. And in that case, anybody could emerge," he said. Meanwhile, socially and fiscally conservative members want a candidate who is close to them on their issues, but one said Tuesday that they don't expect to persuade a member from their caucus to enter the race.

House Republicans Outline Lobbying Reform Ideas (REU-Y2)

By Richard Cowan

Reuters, January 12, 2006

The two candidates vying to become the next U.S. House of Representatives majority leader set forth their ideas on Wednesday for stamping out ethics problems that have threatened Republicans' control of the chamber beyond this year.

Ohio Republican Rep. John Boehner (news, bio, voting record) called for outlawing the earmarking of federal funds for special-interest projects sought by lobbyists, which do not go through the regular oversight process in Congress.

In a letter to House Rules Committee Chairman David Dreier, Boehner called for "enacting a ban on unauthorized earmarks for private entities that serve private interests at the expense of the public interest."

Boehner, a 16-year House veteran, said, "We all need to acknowledge that the system is spinning out of control and that it's time to do something about it."

Annual spending bills have become a magnet for such projects, which critics call special-interest "pork."

Boehner's only opponent so far in the race for majority leader is Acting Majority Leader Roy Blunt of Missouri, who offered his own set of ethics reforms.

Blunt, in his fifth two-year House term, called for banning privately-funded travel for House members and aides or at least requiring advance approval of such travel.

Rep. Tom DeLay, who is battling money laundering charges in a Texas court, told fellow Republicans on Saturday he had decided to permanently vacate the position of majority leader, the number 2 leadership position behind Speaker. House Republicans are to vote on his replacement on February 2.

House Republicans have put ethics and lobbying reform at the top of their legislative agenda this year, following lobbyist Jack Abramoff's recent guilty pleas in an expanding fraud and bribery investigation.

At least one Republican representative is known to be under investigation related to the Abramoff probe and many more could be drawn into the scandal. Abramoff deposited millions of dollars into lawmakers' coffers on behalf of himself, his wife and casino and American Indian clients.

DeLay took expensive trips to London and Scotland in 2000 that were paid for by Abramoff.

Besides travel restrictions, Blunt has proposed new limits on political contributions made by Indian tribes and called for quicker disclosures of lobbying expenditures.

Boehner also called for better disclosure of lobbyists' contributions to federal campaigns.

Both Boehner and Blunt received political contributions since 1999 from Abramoff or the Indian tribe or casinos he represented, according to the private Center for Responsive Politics. Boehner said he has not received "a single penny" from Abramoff. Last week, Blunt said he was donating to charity Abramoff-related campaign contributions.

In Majority Leader Race, Lobbying Rules Are The Easy Target (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 11 - With the need for new ethics and lobbying rules emerging as a central theme in the race for House Republican leader, the two contenders on Wednesday engaged in an arms race over who supported the most stringent changes.

Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio, trying to appeal to fiscal conservatives unhappy with an explosion in pet projects being inserted in broad spending bills, proposed banning such "earmarks" unless they received individual Congressional scrutiny and approval.

"We all need to acknowledge that the system is spinning out of control and that it's time to do something about it," Mr. Boehner wrote in a letter to Representative David Dreier of California, the Rules Committee chairman who is leading a Republican effort to assemble a proposal to overhaul rules for lobbyists. Mr. Boehner said the plan should also end lobbying rule exemptions for advocates for government-financed institutions like universities.

Representative Roy Blunt of Missouri, Mr. Boehner's rival for the position of majority leader, backed Speaker J. Dennis Hastert's proposal to eliminate Congressional travel paid by special interest groups. Mr. Blunt's other proposals include penalties on lobbyists for violations of the Congressional gift ban. It is now improper only for lawmakers to accept gifts of more than $50, not for a lobbyist to provide such gifts.

DOJ_NMG_0009533

It was not just the leadership rivals seeking to replace Representative Tom DeLay who sought to up the ante over Congressional ethics.

Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, the House Democratic leader, wrote Wednesday to Mr. Hastert, asking him to join her in urging the House ethics committee to investigate the conduct of Representatives Bob Ney of Ohio, Mr. DeLay of Texas and other lawmakers whose names have emerged in a federal lobbying inquiry.

"To restore the integrity of the House in the eyes of the American people, the conduct of those members and staff whose unethical behavior has severely damaged the reputation of the Congress itself must be immediately and fully investigated," Ms. Pelosi wrote. She blamed Mr. Hastert's decision to replace the ethics committee chairman and to institute other changes for paralyzing the panel in 2005.

In the wake of a guilty plea to corruption charges by the lobbyist Jack Abramoff and the conviction of a California lawmaker on bribery charges, Mr. Hastert has conceded that a review of lobbying rules is necessary and has given the job to Mr. Dreier. Congressional Democrats are preparing their own proposals.

Representatives Boehner and Blunt are trying to establish their credentials on lobbying changes in part to offset criticism that they have their own well-established links to Washington's lobbying community and that neither would represent a significant departure from the reign of Mr. DeLay.

Mr. Blunt, No. 3 in the House leadership, has been filling in for Mr. DeLay, who stepped aside after being indicted on campaign-finance charges in Texas. Mr. Boehner, chairman of the Education and the Workforce Committee, had held the No. 4 position in the leadership after Republicans won control of the House in 1994 but lost the job in 1998.

Some House Republicans are advocating a broader leadership review beyond the vacant majority leader's post and say that some new blood is needed at the top.

"We have been mired in the mud of Jack Abramoff, and our message has been lost," said Representative Todd Tiahrt of Kansas, who has said he wants the No. 3 position held by Mr. Blunt. "In order to regain the faith and confidence of the American people, the speaker must have new faces on his leadership team. The status quo may lead to minority status."

While Mr. Blunt is ahead in public pledges of support, having 62 of the 116 needed compared with Mr. Boehner's 35, Mr. Boehner's lobbying plan struck a chord with Representative Jeff Flake of Arizona, one of the House conservatives who had pushed to replace Mr. DeLay permanently.

Mr. Flake has sought to rein in the growth in pet projects that end up in the final versions of huge spending bills without previous consideration by Congress, preventing them from being eliminated without defeating the entire bill. Watchdog groups say that earmarks have contributed to lobbying abuses as contractors and others seeking the special spending go to extremes to win support from influential lawmakers.

"Leadership candidates are going to have a difficult time convincing the Republican conference that they're serious about reform without a proposal for earmark reform," Mr. Flake said.

Some lawmakers and senior Republicans said the fact that neither contender had been able to wrap up the race leaves the door open for others to jump in, with Representative John Shadegg of Arizona mentioned as a possible contender. Republicans on Wednesday dropped plans to move the election forward to conclude it before the Jan. 31 State of the Union address. Instead, they said, it will take place on Feb. 2.

House Members Weigh Blunt's Reputation, Ties To DeLay (SCCD)

By Sam Hananel

The State College Centre Daily, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON - If Rep. Roy Blunt is chosen the new House majority leader, it will be in large part because of his reputation as a consensus builder and a good listener.

Should colleagues pass him over for the No. 2 House post, the Missouri Republican can blame his close ties to former Majority Leader Tom DeLay and the desire for a clean break from controversy and scandal, according to members of Congress and other observers.

Clear divisions are already emerging in the camps that have committed to supporting Blunt or his main opponent for the position, Rep. John Boehner, R-Ohio. The election is expected early next month.

As of Wednesday afternoon, Blunt had at least 62 publicly declared supporters while Boehner claimed more than 30 supporters. It takes 116 votes from GOP members to win the post.

"Roy is a Midwestern conservative," said Rep. Christopher Shays, R-Conn., a GOP moderate backing Blunt and a longtime critic of DeLay.

DOJ_NMG_0009534

"He understands that a Republican in Connecticut is different than a Republican in Missouri and there needs to be room in our party for both," Shays said. "Roy has done a good job of reaching out to moderates and conservatives alike."

While DeLay, R-Texas, gave new meaning to the word "arm twisting," Blunt has taken a gentler approach to corralling the votes needed to pass legislation. He has served as both majority whip and majority leader since DeLay was forced aside to face money laundering charges, and the experience could give Blunt an edge in the race against Boehner.

"Roy Blunt has been enormously effective for two reasons: He has a servant's heart and he listens. Both are prerequisites for leadership," said Sen. Jim Talent, R-Mo.

Rep. Jo Ann Emerson, R-Mo., praised Blunt's performance filling in for DeLay. Despite a rocky start, he was able to push through controversial measures to cut the budget and trim spending.

"Roy did a very good job in very difficult circumstances, having to do both his whip job and be temporary majority leader," Emerson said. "He's an excellent consensus builder and he's able to work well with all of the different factions within our conference."

But some members want something else. Rep. Anne Northup, R-Ky., who is backing Boehner in the race, wants to send voters a message that Congress is cleaning house.

"When all the same people are at the leadership table, patterns develop, deferences occur," Northup said. "And John Boehner has been out of that circle, and I think he will bring fresh ideas and a fresh perspective and shake that up."

That perspective is catching on after disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff pleaded guilty last week to federal charges in a congressional corruption investigation. Investigators are now focused on several members of Congress and their aides, including a former aide to DeLay.

Blunt's rise in the leadership ranks is closely tied to DeLay and his own connections to Abramoff or his clients could derail his leadership bid. Blunt spokeswoman Burson Taylor says all the congressman's dealings with lobbyists were ethical.

"For Blunt, DeLay is both an asset and a liability," said Stuart Rothenberg, an independent political analyst in Washington. "DeLay empowered Blunt and Blunt was clearly his guy and was loyal to DeLay. But at the same time, he kind of carries the aroma of DeLay, and some people might want to put on a whole new scent."

When Boehner was elected to the House 15 years ago, he championed ethics reform amid a scandal involving the House bank and Democrats. He became part of the Republican leadership when the GOP gained a majority in 1994, but was ousted four years later in an internal party struggle.

Yet Boehner, too, is linked closely to lobbyists. In 1995, he was criticized for handing out campaign checks from the tobacco industry to colleagues on the House floor.

The two Republicans who began a petition last week calling for elections to replace DeLay - Reps. Jeff Flake of Arizona and Charlie Bass of New Hampshire - are now urging their colleagues not to endorse either candidate until they offer detailed reform plans to end the wave of corruption.

Blunt made that pitch when he officially launched his candidacy Sunday. He pledged to "regain the trust and confidence of our constituents by enacting new lobbying reforms and enhanced penalties."

But Flake is already expressing doubts about Blunt's commitment to reform. Flake wants to end the practice known as "earmarking" - inserting costly local projects into big spending bills.

Flake said Boehner's has a great record because he opposes earmarks.

"There's a stark contrast between him and Blunt on that regard," Flake said. "Blunt is a champion of earmarks."

New Majority Leader Election Date Rejected (AP)

By Andrew Taylor

The Associated Press, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON -- House Republican leaders Wednesday rejected calls to move up the election of a new majority leader to replace Tom DeLay before President Bush's State of the Union address Jan. 31. Rep. Roy Blunt claimed more than half the votes needed to win, even as a potential new candidate, John Shadegg, R-Ariz., publicly weighed a run.

Speaker Dennis Hastert decided Wednesday to stick with a Feb. 2 caucus election scheduled after DeLay, facing trial in Texas on charges of laundering campaign funds, said last weekend he would not try to regain the job.

Supporters of Missouri Rep. Blunt, currently the No. 3 Republican in the House as party whip, had called this week for holding the election before the House reconvenes Jan. 31. Blunt, who has been acting as majority leader since DeLay's indictment, is seeking election to the job in a race against Ohio Rep. John Boehner, chairman of the House Education and the Workforce Committee.

DOJ_NMG_0009535

At the same time, some House Republicans are pressing for more sweeping changes in their leadership. Rep. John Sweeney, R-N.Y., is drafting a petition calling for elections for several junior leadership posts. Every position but Hastert's would be at stake.

"There ought to be a full review and commitment by those who present themselves as leaders to a new agenda so we can re-instill the confidence of the American people," said Sweeney.

Sweeney's maneuver reflects sentiment among some rank and file Republicans such as Mary Bono and Dan Lungren of California and Jeff Flake of Arizona for new faces at the leadership table. Simply replacing DeLay is not enough, Bono says.

"The problem people are seeing is they want new leadership and that's not offering enough new leadership," said Bono.

In a separate bid to recover the GOP's standing with voters in the wake of a lobbying scandal, Hastert has suggested banning privately funded congressional trips, a senior Republican lawmaker said Wednesday.

Rep. David Dreier, R-Calif., said GOP leaders were "seriously considering" the need to eliminate all privately financed travel. "That would be a very strong statement. We want to be bold," said Dreier, chairman of the House Rules Committee.

In the leadership race, Blunt claims to have more support than Boehner has. But with many Republicans undecided and some calling for a third alternative, and Rep. John Shadegg, R-Ariz., has conspicuously declined to take himself out of the running.

"I am very definitely still considering (a run)," Shadegg said. "I've come to the conclusion we need significant change."

Sixty-two lawmakers are publicly supporting Blunt and 34 are supporting Boehner according to tallies released by the rival campaigns. Both say they have additional supporters who have not approved disclosure of their names. It would take 116 votes to claim the post.

DeLay, who had tried to get the election delayed until February in hopes that he would be tried and acquitted in a Texas court by then, announced last Saturday he would not seek re-election. He made the announcement after several Republicans expressed concerns about his ties to lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who pleaded guilty last week to three federal felony charges related to congressional influence peddling.

U.S. House Republicans Set Majority Leader Election On Feb. 2 (BLOOM)

By Laura Litvan

Bloomberg, January 12, 2006

Jan. 11 (Bloomberg) -- U.S. House Republicans set an election to replace Tom DeLay as majority leader for Feb. 2, two days after President George W. Bush's annual State of the Union address.

House Republicans will meet that day at 1 p.m. to hold their first contested leadership elections since 1998. Representative Roy Blunt of Missouri and John Boehner of Ohio are both vying for the majority leader job and a third candidate -- John Shadegg of Arizona -- has indicated he might join the race.

``I think he's looking at it very seriously," said Representative Charles Bass, a New Hampshire Republican, who said he talked to Shadegg today.

DeLay stepped aside from the leadership post in September after being indicted by a Texas grand jury on money laundering charges. On Jan. 7 Delay said he wouldn't try to return to the post even if his trial ends in an acquittal. His announcement last week set off the race to replace him.

Blunt, who has served as acting majority leader since late September, has lined up 56 Republicans who support his election as majority leader, his aides said. Boehner, the chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, has been endorsed by more than 30 lawmakers, his aides said.

House Speaker Dennis Hastert said Saturday that the election would be held the week of Jan. 30. Some House Republicans, including Representative Clay Shaw of Florida, had urged Hastert to call Republicans back to Congress earlier. In a letter to Hastert this week, Shaw and four other Florida Republicans said the elections might ``overshadow" Bush's speech.

Across-the-Board Votes On House GOP Leaders Sought (LAT)

By Mary Curtius

The Los Angeles Times, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — Rank-and-file House Republicans on Wednesday launched a push to require every member of their leadership but Speaker J. Dennis Hastert to face elections for their posts Feb. 2, saying the step was necessary to convince the public that the party was serious about ethics and lobbying reform.

Rep. John E. Sweeney (R-N.Y.) planned to start circulating a petition as early as Wednesday night asking for broad elections. The move underscored many House Republicans' belief that their leaders needed to do more to respond to the unfolding corruption scandal involving former lobbyist Jack Abramoff, if the party was going to keep its congressional majority in the November elections.

DOJ_NMG_0009536

Only days ago, House Republicans appeared set to hold a single election to replace Tom DeLay, who had resigned as majority leader, the No. 2 leadership position in the House. DeLay has been indicted in Texas on campaign finance-related charges unrelated to the Abramoff case.

But under Sweeney's petition, House Republicans would hold elections for five leadership posts in addition to picking a successor to DeLay as majority leader.

"Most of this year, I have felt like our leadership needed new people at the table," said Rep. Anne M. Northup (R-Ky.), a conservative who normally is supportive of the leadership. "The fact is that they are tired."

She added: "I have not seen evidence of our leadership being able to stand up to special interests. I think it is important that every person in leadership is on the spot and has to convey to us why they should continue in leadership."

Republican concerns about the fallout from the lobbying scandal also echoed through the race to replace DeLay.

So far it has been a two-way competition between DeLay's hand-picked successor, Rep. Roy Blunt (R-Mo.), and Rep. John A. Boehner (R-Ohio), chairman of the House Education and the Workforce Committee.

Rep. John Shadegg (R-Ariz.) was said by lawmakers to be close to announcing that he would also run for majority leader, urged on by members who feared that Blunt and Boehner were too closely tied to DeLay.

"I've talked to Shadegg a number of times," said Rep. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.). "We'd all benefit if he runs…. I think he is leaning in that direction."

DeLay stepped down from the majority leader post in September after a Texas grand jury indicted him on money-laundering charges. He had hoped to clear up the Texas charges and regain his leadership job, but that ambition was dashed when Abramoff pleaded guilty this month to attempting to bribe and corrupt members of Congress. Three former senior DeLay staffers were implicated in the federal case.

Rank-and-file House Republicans circulated a petition demanding that a permanent successor to DeLay be elected, a move that forced DeLay's decision last weekend not to try to reclaim his leadership position.

Encouraged by their success, a coalition of conservative and moderate Republican lawmakers was "emboldened to talk about things that have been bothering them for a long time" and to push for broader and deeper ethics reforms, said one Republican lawmaker, speaking on the condition of anonymity because of the political sensitivity of the issue.

Hastert (R-Ill.) has scrambled to respond. He has announced he will push for new ethics rules and restrictions on lobbyists when Congress returns Jan. 31 from its winter recess.

Ron Bonjean, Hastert's press secretary, declined to respond Wednesday to the move to seek broad leadership elections.

For the time being, lawmakers and political analysts said, Hastert's position as speaker is thought to be secure, although he too had ties to Abramoff. Hastert sent a letter to Interior Secretary Gale A. Norton in June 2003, asking that she block a casino that Abramoff's tribal clients thought would threaten their own casino profits.

Just days before Hastert wrote to Norton, tribes represented by Abramoff contributed more than $20,000 to Hastert's political action committee.

"My instinct is that he's safe, but what you're starting to pick up is a new dynamic that's surfaced … for the first time," said Mike Franc, director of government relations for the Heritage Foundation, a conservative think tank. "There is a growing desire on the part of the rank-and-file membership to have a fresh beginning — a sense that you have to do something that is a clean break from the previous practices."

Rep. David Dreier (R-San Dimas), charged by Hastert with putting together a lobbying rules reform package, said one measure under consideration would put restrictions on the so-called revolving door of lawmakers and their staffers leaving Congress to take lobbying positions and then returning to lobby Congress.

Another measure under consideration would end the widespread practice of allowing private groups to fund congressional trips. Political MoneyLine, a nonprofit organization that tracks money in politics, says that private organizations have spent about $20 million in the last five years on trips for members of Congress.

Hastert and other members have in the past defended the practice, saying it saves taxpayers money and helps educate lawmakers about important issues. But trips are being scrutinized by federal investigators as one way that lobbyists and other groups seek to unduly influence members of Congress. One trip that has received media attention is DeLay's sojourn with Abramoff to a luxury golf resort in Scotland in 2000.

Some members said that simply banning such trips did not address the root cause of the GOP's problem as the party prepares to face voters in November: a leadership that, in their view, has allowed ethics problems to go unanswered for too long.

Northup, the Kentucky lawmaker, said she called for all members of the leadership except Hastert to stand for election during a conference call Hastert held with Republican lawmakers Monday.

Rep. Dan Lungren (R-Gold River) said he had worked out the language of the election petition with Sweeney, and would help him seek the 50 signatures it takes to call a meeting of House Republicans to vote on holding broad elections.

"This is really coming to a head because of the Abramoff stuff," Lungren said. "I'm not suggesting there is a single member of the current leadership or a single staffer of the current leadership who has involvement with him, but we need to do our due diligence."

Lungren said Republicans could not afford to elect another majority leader who might, in a few weeks, face accusations that he was closely tied to Abramoff.

Even if 50 members sign the petition, Lungren acknowledged, it is far from a forgone conclusion that a majority of Republican House members would agree to broaden the elections beyond replacing DeLay.

"Obviously, there are those who would not like to see this go forward," Lungren said. "They would like to presume that we don't need to do this … but we need to show voters that we confront this issue."

Texas Redistricting Is One More Hurdle For DeLay (NYT)

By Rick Lyman

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

HOUSTON, Jan. 11 - Representative Tom DeLay is in the toughest re-election campaign of his 11-term House career, a battle that might be decided not only by his legal problems, but also by the Congressional redistricting plan he spearheaded in 2003.

The redistricting led to the loss of six Democratic seats in Texas in 2004, but it also shifted thousands of Democratic voters to strong Republican districts. Among those, Mr. DeLay's 22nd District added several Democratic-leaning parts of Galveston County; several political analysts estimate they may have raised the district's Democratic vote around 5 percent.

"There is huge irony here," said Richard Murray, a University of Houston political scientist. "Six Democrats in Congress were eliminated, but the seventh victim may turnout to be the author of the plan."

Should Mr. DeLay survive, as expected, a March 7 primary challenge by three Republican opponents, in November he will face a former Democratic congressman, Nick Lampson, whose district once included those parts of Galveston County now in Mr. DeLay's district.

Mr. Lampson lost his seat in 2004 when his district, the Second, was reconfigured into a Republican-dominated one. He moved into the 22nd District last April, he said, with the intention of taking on Mr. DeLay.

"I'm not running against him because he took my district," Mr. Lampson said, seated in a two-room suite of campaign offices in Clear Lake. "I'm running against him because I think I was a better member of Congress than he was, and I can be again."

Mr. DeLay, who has been a regular presence in the district in recent weeks, paused on his way out of a speech to the Rotary Club of Pasadena South to reflect on the race ahead.

"Of course, it's going to be a tough race," he said, spinning in his right palm a silver dollar a constituent had just given him as a good-luck piece. "The entire Democratic machine has come down here from all over the country after me."

Local Republican leaders play down the chances that Mr. DeLay will be defeated in a district that remains predominantly Republican.

"The only people who consider this possible are clearly delusional," said Eric Thode, Republican chairman in Mr. DeLay's home county of Fort Bend. "It's not a competitive district. It's not even an issue."

Without question, Mr. DeLay has had a rough patch.

Indicted by a Travis County grand jury in September for state campaign finance law violations, he was forced to step down from his post as House majority leader temporarily. Next, a longtime political associate, Jack Abramoff, was indicted, then pleaded guilty last week to public corruption charges under an agreement to cooperate with federal prosecutors. Mr. DeLay, who failed to have his own case expedited, permanently resigned as majority leader on Saturday, saying he did not want his travails to become a distraction for the party.

Now, he will be running for re-election while standing trial in Austin on money laundering charges in a case over campaign financing that Mr. DeLay paints as politically motivated. Meanwhile, Washington waits to see what other indictments might flow from the Abramoff scandal.

"I think there is a 50-50 chance DeLay won't even be in the race in November," said Calvin C. Jillson, a political scientist at Southern Methodist University in Dallas.

If he does stay in the race - and Mr. DeLay insists he will - he has the demographics of the 22nd District to bolster him.

"Despite everything, it's extremely difficult to dislodge Tom DeLay in a district with such a strong Republican base and a strong, straight-ticket Republican voting trend," said Ted Delisi, a Republican strategist in Austin.

DOJ_NMG_0009538

Yet the district has changed since 2003, and not in Mr. DeLay's favor. Running in the reconfigured district for the first time in 2004, Mr. DeLay won handily, but with a smaller margin than in previous elections: 55 percent compared with his Democratic opponent's 41 percent.

The district spreads across the southern rim of the Houston metroplex, from Galveston through the southern Houston suburbs of Harris County and into more rural Brazoria County and Fort Bend County, which includes Mr. DeLay's hometown of Sugar Land.

"I am sure the Democrats are going to pour money into this race," said Jared Woodfill, the Harris County Republican chairman. "But I think the congressman is going to be successful in March and in November. What is different this cycle is that people on both sides have started working harder and earlier."

Mr. DeLay is opposed in the Republican primary by Michael Fjetland, who has run against him before; Pat Baig, a former teacher and political novice; and Tom Campbell, a Houston lawyer who lives in Sugar Land and served in Washington as general counsel to the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration during the administration of the first President Bush.

Supporters of Mr. DeLay portray Mr. Fjetland and Ms. Baig as mischief-makers with little financing. Mr. Campbell, the latest entrant, appears to have solid credentials as a conservative Republican and promises to raise $400,000 to fight Mr. DeLay over the next two months.

"He seems like a decent enough guy," Mr. Woodfill said of Mr. Campbell, "but the fact is he has not been active in the party. And he hasn't got much time to mount a serious campaign."

Mr. Campbell said that his outsider status would help him with voters weary of Mr. DeLay's hard-knuckled politics.

"Congressman DeLay has employed an 'ends justified the means' approach and, somewhere along the way, has cut corners and engaged in ethical lapses," Mr. Campbell said before a campaign event at a Houston law firm Wednesday. "This is an uphill battle, but Tom DeLay has been kind enough to come part way down the hill."

The general election in November is further complicated by the emergence of another former congressman, Steve Stockman, an ardently conservative Republican who also once represented a part of what is now the 22nd District. Mr. Stockman has said he may run as an independent, a move Republican leaders fear might cost Mr. DeLay votes.

Wade Webster, a Republican precinct chairman in Clear Lake, said he thought the party would stand behind Mr. DeLay, for now.

"It's going to be tougher, yes, with all the bad publicity and the innuendos and what-not," he said. "Until something more definitive comes out, I'm supporting him. But I retain the option to change my mind."

Democrats, meanwhile, happily cite polls suggesting that Mr. DeLay is in jeopardy and insist that his problems will undermine him in the district, even if it is Republican.

In a poll for The Houston Chronicle last March, for instance, 40 percent of the respondents in Mr. DeLay's district said their opinion of him had dropped in the previous year. And a USA Today/Gallup poll in early December showed Mr. DeLay with a favorability rating of just 37 percent, and had him losing to an unnamed Democratic opponent 49 percent to 36 percent.

Mr. DeLay and his supporters question the polls' methodologies and say his support is significantly stronger. "We have our own internal polls showing us doing much better," Mr. DeLay said, flipping that silver dollar.

He paused and held up the dollar between his thumb and index finger.

"Am I allowed to keep this?" he asked. "What do you think? Am I allowed to keep this?"

Houston TV Stations Withhold Ads Attacking DeLay (REU-Y2)

By Jeff Franks

Reuters, January 12, 2006

Several Houston television stations withheld a political ad on Wednesday accusing U.S. Rep. Tom DeLay of corruption after a lawyer for the former House majority leader said the ad was false and could lead to legal action.

The ad, sponsored by public interest groups Campaign for America's Future and Public Campaign Action Fund, calls for DeLay to resign because of his indictment in Texas on campaign finance charges and his links to disgraced Washington lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

"All four of the major broadcast stations (in Houston) contacted to air the ad, as well as Time Warner cable, have stated they either will not run the ad or will keep it off the air for further review," according to a statement sent out by DeLay's office.

Some of the stations said during their newscasts they were looking at the ad to determine its credibility or that they had found some of the allegations to be questionable. The ad was supposed to run for a week, starting on Wednesday.

In a letter to the stations, DeLay attorney Donald McGahn said the ad was "reckless, malicious and false, casting Mr. DeLay in a false light by accusing him of unsubstantiated criminal conduct. Such accusations are actionable."

"We demand that you refuse or otherwise cease airing the advertisement, so as to avoid any liability," the letter said.

Public Campaign Action Fund national campaigns director David Donnelly said DeLay was trying to prevent people in his Houston-area district from knowing what "he's up to with corrupt lobbyists in Washington."

"When powerful lawmakers corrupt the political process and get caught, they often try to bully the media to try to prevent them from doing their job," he said in a statement.

Despite the menacing language in the letter, DeLay spokeswoman Shannon Flaherty said McGahn was not threatening to sue the television stations, although at least one of them reported he was.

Abramoff sent shock waves through Washington last week when he pleaded guilty to fraud charges and admitted giving lavish gifts and trips to lawmakers in return for special treatment. He has agreed to cooperate with prosecutors investigating corruption in Congress.

DeLay, who received campaign contributions from Abramoff and associates over the years, has described the lobbyist as a good friend.

After Abramoff's guilty plea, DeLay announced he was giving up trying to regain his position as House majority leader, which is the second most powerful Republican in the House of Representatives.

He stepped down from the post in September after he was indicted in Texas on charges of conspiracy and money laundering linked to campaign contributions raised by his Texans for a Republican Majority political action committee for the 2002 Texas Legislature elections. DeLay has denied any wrongdoing.

Survey Highlights Employees' Hankering For Training (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

Most federal employees like their jobs and even more are motivated by pride in their work, but almost half would like additional training to improve their job performance, according to preliminary results of a survey by the Merit Systems Protection Board.

Nearly 37,000 full-time government employees from 24 agencies participated in the survey, conducted last year. A summary of the findings appears in this month's Issues of Merit newsletter, published by the board's office of policy and evaluation, headed by Steve Nelson .

Although 64 percent of survey respondents said they have received sufficient training to do their jobs, 46 percent said they would like additional training so that they can improve on their work.

A huge majority, 81 percent, said the extra career development should be financed by their agencies and provided through formal training sessions. Slightly fewer, 77 percent, supported on-the-job developmental programs, the newsletter said.

Still, only 33 percent indicated that they had used career development plans to alert supervisors to their training expectations. Only 48 percent saw their supervisors as providing opportunities to improve their skills and performance, the survey found.

"These results suggest that better communication between employees and their agencies may be necessary if federal employees are to receive the training they need," the newsletter said.

In the MSPB survey, 71 percent of the employees said they liked their jobs, and 98 percent said they took pride in their work.

Interestingly, only 60 percent said they think their jobs are secure, possibly a sign that efforts to reduce federal spending and contract out work might be changing perceptions about federal employment. In the survey, 57 percent of rank-and-file employees and 62 percent of supervisors said their offices had been downsized in the past five years.

About 70 percent of survey respondents said they would be motivated by a hypothetical cash award of $1,000 or increased chances of promotion. Only 40 percent said they were satisfied with the recognition and awards they receive, and 61 percent said they were satisfied with their pay, according to the newsletter.

The MSPB findings, for the most part, appear in line with other recent surveys.

A 2004 report from the Office of Personnel Management found 55 percent of employees were satisfied with the training they had received for their current jobs. But only 35 percent of the employees were satisfied with their opportunities to get a better job, and only 40 percent told OPM that they were satisfied with the policies and practices of their senior leaders.New Leader for Postmasters

Dale Goff , the postmaster in Covington, La., has been elected president of the National Association of Postmasters.

He began his career 36 years ago as a postal assistant in New Orleans and has served as a postmaster for 26 years. He has served as Louisiana state president and as national secretary-treasurer with the association, which represents the interests of about 42,000 postmasters, postal officers and retirees in Congress and at postal headquarters.

DOJ_NMG_0009540

Goff and his wife, Becky, have moved to Alexandria, where the association has its main office. He succeeds Wally Olihovik , who served for four years.New AU Program Chief

Robert M. Tobias has been named director of public service executive education programs at American University's School of Public Affairs.

He will lead the Key Executive program, which allows federal managers and executives to earn a master of public administration degree. Tobias will continue to head AU's Institute for the Study of Public Policy Implementation, one of the sponsors of the "Best Places to Work in the Federal Government" rankings.

Tobias, a former president of the National Treasury Employees Union, has served on the Internal Revenue Service Oversight Board. He is a member of the National Academy of Public Administration.

Applications are being accepted for the Key Executive program, and the university will host an open house at 6 p.m. today. For information, call Jacqueline McLaughlin Linde , an assistant dean, at 202-885-6248.

The Reliable Source (WP)

By Amy Argetsinger and Roxanne Roberts

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

HEY, ISN'T THAT . . . ?

Vice President Cheney and Don Rumsfeld at Clyde's of Gallery Place on Tuesday night. The veep and defense secretary took their wives to a Department of Defense dinner at the recently opened branch of the restaurant, creating quite the security fuss in Chinatown -- many black sedans, men with earpieces. Upstairs in the private Piedmont Room, they nibbled on hors d'oeuvres (crab cakes, smoked salmon and dim sum) and then enjoyed Maryland crab soup and New York strip steaks.

Army Is Poised To Kill Spy-Plane Effort (WSJ)

By Jonathan Karp

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2006

The U.S. Army is poised to cancel a Lockheed Martin Corp. spy-plane program valued at as much as $8 billion, in the face of competing budget priorities and problems in the aircraft's development, according to industry and government officials.

The Army suspended funding for the Aerial Common Sensor surveillance plane in September as a result of concerns about the plane's cost and size, and asked Lockheed to offer alternative solutions. People familiar with the program said the Army is expected to announce the ACS's termination as early as today, the end of a 60-day period during which Pentagon officials reviewed Lockheed's four proposals.

The decision would also be a blow to Lockheed's main partner in the program, Empresa Brasileira de Aeronautica SA, or Embraer, the Brazilian aircraft company hoping to break into the U.S. defense market.

Spokespeople for the Army, Lockheed and Embraer declined to comment, saying they hadn't been informed of a final decision about the spy-plane program. It is unclear whether the Army will seek to preserve some of the technology developed for the program for future use.

The likely demise of the spy-plane program, valued at up to $8 billion over several years, underscores the complexity of Pentagon efforts to transform the way it develops weapons. The battlefield surveillance and eavesdropping plane was meant to serve the Army and the Navy, with the underlying premise that creating a joint-service program would bolster its support inside the Pentagon and on Capitol Hill. But it proved difficult to reconcile the two services' missions and equipment specifications at the cost that Lockheed originally proposed.

Given the Pentagon's budget pressures amid the military operations in Iraq, the Navy's increasing ambivalence toward the Army-led spy plane and inevitable program delays and cost increases, the Army concluded it was a losing battle. "In the big scheme of things, ACS loses out," said an Army official. "Anytime you have a wounded weapons program, the sharks circle." The Army's head of acquisitions recommended canceling the program in December, but Army Secretary Francis Harvey decided to extend the review by a month, this official said.

Lockheed, based in Bethesda, Md., the U.S.'s biggest defense contractor by sales, has conceded it made mistakes in projecting weight, power and technical issues for the proposed spy plane. It has been scrambling for months to salvage the program, which unraveled with unusual speed for a company that has supplied the Pentagon with surveillance, combat and cargo planes for decades.

In August 2004, Lockheed beat out Northrop Grumman Corp. and won an $879 million initial-development contract for the spy plane by proposing a modified version of an Embraer 50-seat passenger jet. As it became clear that the array of sensors and radar would make the plane too heavy to fly, Lockheed proposed switching to a larger Embraer airframe or a modified business jet made by Canadian plane maker Bombardier Inc. In November, it also proposed to strip some equipment out of the original Embraer plane or to keep working on the electronics.

DOJ_NMG_0009541

Army officials say the need for battlefield surveillance and eavesdropping remains a priority. The service is expected to focus on upgrading aging propeller-driven planes that perform the task under a contract led by Northrop.

Endless Probe, Secret Result (USAT)

USA Today, January 12, 2006

Washington investigations, especially those by independent counsels, can roll on for years, eating taxpayer dollars long after their original purpose has been achieved.

So it is with the investigation of former Housing secretary Henry Cisneros, now in its 11th year.

Cisneros, accused of paying hush money to an ex-mistress and misleading officials about it, pleaded guilty in 1999 to lying to the FBI and was fined $10,000. His former paramour and others pleaded guilty to charges of bank fraud and making false statements. President Clinton, on his last day in office, pardoned Cisneros and the woman.

The independent counsel law has expired. Clinton and Cisneros are on to new careers. But the investigation, which has cost $22 million since David Barrett was appointed independent counsel in 1995, isn't officially over. The reason isn't known. Barrett says only that the investigation was extended to explore accusations that attempts had been made to obstruct the investigation and related misconduct. Several news organizations, citing anonymous sources, have reported that those accusations involve the Internal Revenue Service and the Justice Department. Barrett's report was completed by August 2004, but it has been sealed by a special federal court that oversees independent counsels. Lawyers for people named in it have filed more than 140 motions to keep their clients from being identified publicly.

In October, the court announced it would release the full report only to some members of Congress. But legislators from both sides of the aisle demanded that the entire report be made public.

The problem is the court could still black out large portions to protect the privacy of those named. Some in Congress, particularly Sen. Chuck Grassley, R-Iowa, worry that IRS abuses could go unexposed. "The American taxpayers have spent a lot of money on this report, and they deserve the right to see it," Grassley says.

We agree. So does Barrett, whose office will close after the report's imminent release.

It seems obvious now that Barrett's investigation, like so many others, took too long, cost too much and achieved too little. But at least those failings were the result of honorable intentions: to expose and punish corruption by public officials.

Burying his report now serves no such noble goal. Instead, it would give wrong-doers even more reason to believe they can abuse the public's trust, confident that their actions would be hidden from the public's view.

Credit Where It's Due (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2006

Perhaps Dustin Hoffman's rich adviser had it right when he pronounced in "The Graduate" that the future is in "plastics." Last year the credit card industry handled more than $2 trillion in consumer transactions and gobbled up nearly $30 billion in fees, according to the Nilson Report newsletter on the credit card industry. These fees are now the source of mounting angst among retailers, which have launched 47 antitrust lawsuits against the credit card companies for alleged collusion in setting these fees.

Retailers have also rushed to Washington demanding that Congress impose a de facto price cap on credit card charges -- as Australia and the European Union have already done. This campaign against credit card fees and the clamor for price controls sound eerily familiar. A few years ago dim-witted politicians employed price controls to try to limit fees for using ATMs. In localities where that was tried, the result was not lower fees, but fewer ATMs, and thus much less convenience for customers.

Once upon a time, credit cards were the playthings of the rich. But today credit (and debit) cards are a ubiquitous feature of the U.S. economy, with three of four adults owning either credit or debit cards as America moves closer to becoming a "cashless society." Certainly the shift toward plastic payments suggests the industry is satisfying its customers.

The controversy surrounds the way Visa and MasterCard and their issuing banks make money -- which is by collecting what is called an "interchange fee" from merchants. This fee averages about 1.75% of the sales price of the good or service purchased. The average convenience store paid $31,000 in interchange fees in 2004 -- a figure approaching the average per-store pretax profit of $36,000. The retailers say this charge is a "hidden transaction tax on consumers."

This complaint ignores the value added that the credit card company provides. Consumers benefit in an obvious way: They don't have to carry around wads of cash, because the credit card bank essentially holds the funds for them. Retailers benefit too: They don't have to deal with cash transactions, which minimize theft at the cash register. They receive a guaranteed payment from the bank that issues the credit card (i.e., no bounced checks). Most importantly, they lure customers into their stores by accepting a credit card of choice. If the retailers didn't think these benefits exceeded the costs of the interchange fee, they could simply refuse to accept credit cards at the register.

DOJ_NMG_0009542

That said, many small retailers operate on thin profit margins and there does appears to be some merit to their complaint that credit card fees have risen above the levels one would expect in a perfectly competitive market. Interchange fees in the U.S. are among the highest in the world.

These fees, according to a recent study by economists at the Federal Reserve Bank of Kansas City, have also been paradoxically trending upward in recent years when the industry's costs due to technology and economies of scale have been falling. But these rising interchange fees have also corresponded with lower annual fees charged to cardholders and increasingly lucrative incentive packages to entice shoppers to pay with plastic: cash back rewards, airline frequent flyer miles, and even exotic benefits like free "concierge service" to get tee times on the golf course.

We're all in favor of more competition to drive down interchange fees. But the argument retailers are making that this industry operates as a cartel is highly unpersuasive. There are five major competitors in the credit/debit card market aggressively vying for customers: Visa, MasterCard, American Express, Discover, and the newest player, Star.

Meanwhile, mega-retailers such as Wal-Mart and Sears are using their market power to cut separate deals with credit card companies to lower their interchange fees. Wal-Mart and Target also want to establish their own banks so they can reduce interchange fees. Federal regulators should welcome this development.

Another merchant recourse is to offer price discounts to customers who pay cash. Retailers could also band together and start their own credit card competitor to Visa and MasterCard. Antitrust laws have typically winced at this kind of relationship, but in this case the Justice Department should consider that such arrangements could lower costs to consumers and foster competition.

The worst option is the one retailers seek most fervently: price controls. We now have several years of evidence from Australia and other nations that have gone this route. Studies indicate that lower retail prices haven't materialized. Instead, retailers have mostly pocketed the savings, while Visa and other card companies have withdrawn the popular rebates and bonus awards while increasing the annual fees they charge to card holders.

In other words, consumers were the losers, which is what inevitably occurs when governments intervene in markets that aren't broken. That's why Congress and the courts should keep their paws off this industry and let the market give credit, where credit is due.

OTHER NEWS:

World Economy Expanding (USAT)

By David J. Lynch

USA Today, January 12, 2006

If things go according to plan, the world economy will chug along nicely through the new year.

That would be comforting news if things ever did go according to plan.

Actually, 2006 could see plenty of nasty surprises. For one thing, the world economy, though expanding, is dangerously imbalanced. The resulting U.S. current account deficit — reflecting the gap between the nation's ravenous appetite for imports and its anemic savings — is now at levels that many experts fear could trigger a run on the dollar, soaring interest rates and global economic pain.

Meanwhile, investment is pouring into risky emerging markets as if the past decade's turmoil in Argentina, Turkey, Thailand and Russia never happened.

And all that stands between a barrel of oil and a triple-digit price tag is a strike in Nigeria, unrest in Venezuela or revolution in Saudi Arabia.

For all that, both the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank expect solid global growth of 3.2% this year, about the same as in 2005.

If prognosticators seem sanguine, perhaps it's because many of the same warning signals flashed red one year ago, and yet, the economy still barreled ahead, even overcoming epic natural disasters.

“2005 was a year that has lulled a lot of investors, policymakers and government officials into a dangerous and false sense of complacency,” says Stephen Roach, chief economist for Morgan Stanley in New York.

Terror attacks. A trade war with China. Even a historic epidemic of potentially lethal “bird flu.” There's no end to the list of potential economic catastrophes that could arise this year.

DOJ_NMG_0009543

But three dangers — mushrooming global imbalances, vulnerable emerging markets and volatile oil prices — seem especially noteworthy.

To many economists, the swollen U.S. current account deficit looms as the biggest potential hazard. In a nutshell, the United States spends too much and saves too little, and Asia saves too much and spends too little. (Moribund Europe doesn't do enough of either.)

No one knows for certain when the day of reckoning will come. But Roach, and many others, say the USA and the world cannot go on like this indefinitely.

"There are significant downside risks to the global economy … financial markets right now are not pricing in any of these risks," warns Nouriel Roubini, a former White House economist in the Clinton administration who runs the influential www.rgemonitor.com website.

Last year, the U.S. financed its excessive spending by selling almost $800 billion worth of Treasury securities to foreign central banks and investors.

At 6.4% of total economic output, that's an unprecedented level for a major economy. The U.S. is able to get away with such profligacy largely because the dollar plays a uniquely central role in global commerce.

But here's how a crisis could unfold: If foreigners conclude the dollar was headed for a fall because of the enormous U.S. deficit, they would cut back on purchases of U.S. debt. To entice them to buy, the Federal Reserve would have to raise interest rates, perhaps significantly. Higher interest rates could choke off economic growth, even as the falling dollar ignited inflation by boosting the prices of imported goods.

In 2005, the dollar defied predictions of an inevitable decline. But it is unlikely to keep doing so, according to Roubini.

The greenback benefited last year from a one-time change in U.S. tax law that encouraged companies to repatriate foreign profits and from the Fed's rate increases.

The tax provision has expired, and the Fed is believed to be near the end of its monetary tightening.

"Our ability to finance ourselves depends upon the willingness of foreign central banks to hold dollars. That willingness is going to be shrinking (this) year," Roubini says.

Even under optimistic assumptions, once the crisis hits, the economic pain in the USA could be like nothing the country has suffered in decades.

An abrupt end to the USA's ability to obtain sufficient foreign financing could send the dollar into free fall, cutting 21% to 28% from its value, according to research by Sebastian Edwards, a professor at UCLA's Anderson School of Management. That would increase the price of a $21,000 foreign-made sedan to almost $27,000, unless dealers opted to absorb the blow.

In the first year, 3.6% to 5% would be slashed from per capita economic growth. That would almost certainly push the USA into recession, perhaps for several years, according to Edwards, who presented his findings at last summer's annual Federal Reserve conference in Jackson Hole, Wyo.

"Never in the history of modern economics has a large industrial country run persistent current account deficits of the magnitude posted by the U.S. since 2000."

Another danger might be brewing in the so-called emerging markets. Capital flows this year into developing nations in Latin America, Asia and Central Europe are expected to hit a record $345.2 billion, according to the Institute of International Finance. That surpasses the previous high set in 1996, just before the Asian financial crisis, and is up 62% in the past two years.

Emerging markets enthusiasts shrug off reminders of the euphoria-and-collapse cycles that hit Thailand in 1997, Russia in 1998, and Argentina in 2000. It's different this time, say firms such as JPMorgan. Countries, particularly in Latin America, have built up foreign-exchange reserves that should allow them to ride out any financial crisis and have introduced economic reforms that give their economies greater stability. Rather than depend on private capital flows from rich countries as they did in the 1990s, developing nations now rely on strong export industries.

Bond holders are so impressed that they regard emerging market securities as little riskier than U.S. Treasuries, according to the JPMorgan Emerging Markets Bond Index Global (EMBIG). In late 2002, investors demanded an additional 91/2 percentage points of yield as compensation for the risk involved in holding emerging markets bonds compared with U.S. Treasuries. Today, the spread on the EMBIG is down to little more than 2 percentage points.

But emerging markets also have had the economic winds at their back for the past couple of years. Strong global demand boosted commodity prices, a major help for soybean exporters such as Argentina and oil producers such as Venezuela. And U.S. interest rates were so low, yield-hungry investors — including normally cautious pension funds — were drawn into countries such as Brazil or Hungary.

Now, global growth is slowing, and U.S. rates are higher. "There's a lot to worry about," says Desmond Lachman of the American Enterprise Institute, who was among the first to warn of problems in Argentina before its historic default.

DOJ_NMG_0009544

While no one is predicting a repeat of the problems that rocked half a dozen countries in the 1990s, emerging markets remain vulnerable to sharp changes in the global environment. If the dollar tanks, their surging exports would stall. Higher oil prices could deal them a double whammy, inflating their energy costs while depressing the economies of major customers.

Any unexpected mishap could cause the spreads between emerging market debt and U.S. securities to balloon, making it more expensive for corporations in developing countries to finance their operations, Lachman says.

Politics also might complicate the economic outlook, especially in Latin America. Elections are scheduled in eight countries this year, including presidential and legislative contests in Brazil and Mexico. The voting takes place amid a clear drift away from the free-market policies favored by the United States.

So far, little of this seems to be making an impression. “The markets seem to be pricing in close to zero probability of something going wrong,” Barclays Capital wrote in a Dec. 8 note to clients.

One year ago, no one predicted twin hurricanes would wreck much of the U.S. Gulf Coast oil infrastructure, sparking gas shortages and soaring pump prices. But today, with oil prices at about $64 per barrel, it doesn't take much imagination to conjure up fresh scenarios of price jumps.

Spare oil supplies amount to 1.9 million barrels per day, down from more than 6 million a day three years ago. Any event that idles significant output for a prolonged period — political turmoil in Venezuela, revolution in Saudi Arabia, a general strike in Nigeria — would threaten the world economy.

“With spare production capacity so low, the market is particularly vulnerable to a supply shock,” the World Bank said in its 2006 economic forecast.

If oil supplies were cut by 2 million barrels per day, prices would hit $90 a barrel this year and remain at $70 next year, according to the World Bank. The price spike would add 2.6 percentage points to the inflation rate, which is 2.1% now, and cut global growth in half.

How likely is such a price spike? Goldman Sachs oil analyst Arjun Murti spooked markets in March with a forecast of a “super spike” taking oil prices as high as $105 per barrel. On Dec. 12, he reiterated that view in a note to clients, adding that “non-existent spare capacity” supported the prediction.

John Kingston, global director of oil for Platts, is more optimistic. He expects prices to ease this year with new producing wells in the Gulf of Mexico, Russia and Nigeria boosting the market's cushion.

Still, he frets that continued Iraqi turmoil could pinch. Daily exports there of 1.4 million barrels remain below prewar levels, according to Platts. Anti-U.S. insurgents last year mounted 96 attacks on the country's aging network of pipelines and production facilities, or one every four days. There is little reason to expect quick improvement.

“The spot that concerns me the most is Iraq, and not so much the insurgents,” he says. “The oil industry there has been held together by spit and bailing wire. … It's antiquated and needs massive capital investment.”

To those such as Roach, who are inclined to emphasize the risks that things won't go exactly as expected, the links between potential problems are the most worrisome element. The USA's fat current account deficit could sink the dollar. As it plummets, emerging markets' exports dry up and oil prices, which are denominated in dollars, rise. In no time, what starts as one country's difficulty becomes a global contagion.

“This is what we signed up for when we bought into globalization,” Roach says. “The next global adjustment or downturn most likely will reverberate very quickly around the world with a speed we haven't seen before.”

2006 Rally Keeps Chugging (WSJ)

By Scott Patterson

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2006

In another late-day surge, stocks pushed higher, overlooking an earnings gaff by chemical behemoth DuPont and a jump in oil prices.

Monday and Tuesday, stocks also rallied late in the day to finish near their highs. Such end-of-day spurts are typical of strong markets, analysts said.

"If you dissect periods where the market is rallying overall, you'll find an intraday pattern that starts out on the weak side and finishes with strength," said Kenneth Tower, chief market strategist at CyberTrader. "It's another positive for this market rally."

One pivot point for stocks Wednesday was the 11000 level on the Dow Jones Industrial Average. At the opening bell, the average dipped from yesterday's close of 11011.58 and tested 11000. It bounced higher, then slid once again. By the end of the day, the Dow average tested 11000 four times, and even dipped below it twice. After the fourth test, the industrials moved decisively higher and finished up by 31.86 points to 11043.44.

DOJ_NMG_0009545

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index added 4.49 points to 1294.18 and the Nasdaq Composite Index gained 11.04 to 2331.36.

Such action is created by new money flowing into the market on dips, analysts said. Each time the market declined, "we got a new wave of buying," said Peter Cardillo, chief market analyst at S.W. Bach. Zigzag patterns that end on a high note are a strong sign for stocks, he said, and could mean that "the bull is getting ready to stampede."

Despite the strong action, some market watchers remain concerned that investors are getting ahead of themselves. A slower-than-expected holiday season and high oil prices will ultimately catch up with stocks, they say, and the January rally "is going to end with a slow-motion slowdown," said Barry Ritholtz, chief market strategist at Ritholtz Capital Partners.

Investors have already looked past negative earnings news from two Dow components. Wednesday, shares of DuPont fell 3.3% after it cut its fourth-quarter earnings guidance8, citing disruptions in operations due to hurricanes Katrina and Rita. Tuesday, an earnings whiff by Alcoa, also a Dow component, nicked the average in early trading, losses it made up by the closing bell.

Treasury bonds declined Wednesday after an auction of $13 billion in five-year notes drew a poor response, with just 29% of the buyers coming from foreign bidders.

Crude-oil prices, down earlier, recently jumped 57 cents to $63.94 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange after the Energy Information Administration said crude-oil inventories fell more than expected last week.

Investors also eyed comments by Timothy Geithner, head of the New York branch of the Federal Reserve. Mr. Geithner said the economy remains "remarkably stable" and that inflation, excluding food and energy, "has been quite moderate."

Last Tuesday, minutes from the Fed's December meeting indicated policy makers may be closer to winding up their 18-month rate-raising campaign sooner rather than later, which triggered a five-day rally that helped push the Dow industrials past 11000 for the first time since June 2001.

In major market action:

Stocks rose9. On the Big Board, where 1.7 billion shares traded, 1,896 stocks rose and 1,460 fell. On the Nasdaq Stock Market, where 2.4 billion shares traded, 1,544 rose and 1,479 declined.

Bonds slid10. The benchmark 10-year Treasury note slipped 8/32, or $2.50 for every $1,000 invested, to yield 4.401% Wednesday. The 30-year bond fell 14/32 to yield 4.642%. Yields move inversely to prices.

The dollar was mixed.11 It traded at 114.35 yen, up from 114.31 yen late Tuesday, while the euro rose to $1.2088 from $1.2068.

The Church Of GDP (WP)

By Robert J. Samuelson

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

What's the dominant religion of the past 100 years? The answer isn't Christianity with its 2.1 billion followers, or Islam with its 1.3 billion. It's the idea of economic growth, the Church of GDP. Countless countries have embraced rapid growth as a cure to their ills. Getting richer is now an almost universal craving. And yet the worship of growth inspires enormous ambivalence. It is widely seen -- especially in already wealthy societies -- as morally corrupting: the mindless pursuit of empty materialism (do flat-panel TVs really make us better off?) that drains life of spiritual meaning and also wrecks the environment.

Exactly wrong, says Benjamin Friedman.

Friedman, a Harvard economist, has written a hugely provocative book ("The Moral Consequences of Economic Growth") arguing that rapid growth is morally uplifting. "Economic growth -- meaning a rising standard of living for the clear majority of citizens -- more often than not fosters greater opportunity, tolerance of diversity, social mobility, commitment to fairness, and dedication to democracy," he writes. Further, the opposite is true. Poor growth feeds prejudice, class conflict and antidemocratic tendencies.

Look at history, he says. In the United States, exploding economic growth after World War II coincided with a broad expansion of rights for women, blacks and the poor. During the prosperous Progressive Era, from roughly 1895 to 1919, the "idea of mass high school education first took hold." In 1912 the federal government created a Children's Bureau to discourage child labor. The same year, Congress passed the 17th Amendment, switching the election of senators from state legislatures to popular vote. In 1919 it passed the 19th Amendment, giving women the vote.

Good times often played out similarly in Europe. From 1850 to 1870, Britain's per capita income rose 35 percent. In 1870 the government opened civil service jobs -- until then reserved "for candidates with family connections" -- to competitive testing. Comparable reforms broadened the military's officer corps. Religious tolerance improved; no longer was membership in the Church of England required to teach at Oxford and Cambridge. After the Franco-Prussian War of 1870, France also prospered: In 1875 it adopted universal male voting; in 1881 and 1882 it embraced compulsory schooling up to age 13.

DOJ_NMG_0009546

Nazi Germany is, of course, the classic case of the converse: that growth's absence is morally destructive. From 1929 to 1932, German industrial production dropped 42 percent; in 1932 unemployment was 44 percent. The rest is history. Friedman offers other examples. The Ku Klux Klan (anti-Catholic and anti-Jewish as well as anti-black) flourished in the 1920s, which he describes as a period of disappointing growth.

People, Friedman argues, instinctively compare themselves to "two separate benchmarks: their own (or their family's) past experience, and how they see people around them living." When living standards rise rapidly, more people feel optimistic, unthreatened and tolerant. Friedman also cites Adam Smith's insight that commerce fosters trust, civility, mutual dependence and legal protections (contracts, property rights). Economic growth isn't mainly about greed and exploitation.

Case closed? Well, not exactly.

One problem with Friedman is Friedman. His meticulous scholarship unearths much contrary evidence. In the United States, the Great Depression didn't diminish democracy; instead, it "fostered a broader commitment to opportunity and mobility for all citizens." Britain passed momentous reforms (unemployment insurance, old-age pensions) from 1908 to 1911, a period of weak growth. Among poorer countries, many (Chile, South Korea, China) first achieved rapid growth under authoritarian regimes, though Chile and South Korea are now democratic.

Friedman's view of the 1920s is also dubious. Agriculture aside, America was mainly prosperous. The KKK's strength reflected raw prejudice -- and perhaps a sense of a threat created by economic growth, which left farms and small towns behind.

Friedman has identified a tendency, not an iron law. Still, his moral case for economic growth is solid. It's true that growth alone rarely creates happiness. Beyond a certain income, happiness depends on family relationships, a sense of belonging, personal beliefs. But growth surely can cure misery. In the 1700s, life expectancy in France was 25 years, and about 30 percent of infants died before their first birthday. Now life expectancy in advanced countries is almost 80 years, and infant mortality is usually less than 1 percent. Anyone who cares about world poverty must favor economic growth.

Another moral plus: Societies whose politics focus on the gaining and sharing of prosperity can promote their own stability. First, everyone can win. Second, though remaining economic conflicts can be nasty, they're easier to mediate than religious or ethnic differences -- where one side must face eternal damnation or discrimination. It's no accident that the United States and Britain are the oldest successful democracies.

But Friedman mostly misses the real growth predicament facing most advanced societies. It's not environmental spoilage. As he notes, most rich societies protect their environments through tougher antipollution regulations. In the past two decades, U.S. emissions of sulfur dioxide are down 54 percent, he reports. Whether global warming will break this environmental truce remains to be seen.

The immediate dilemma involves the welfare state. It requires fast economic growth to generate the income and government revenue to pay all the promised benefits. But the mounting costs of those benefits -- especially as populations age in the United States, Europe and Japan -- may stifle growth through higher taxes and budget deficits. If so, the welfare state may cause the stagnation and strains against which Friedman warns. The dilemma for most rich societies is that they are wedded both to advancing materialism and to policies threatening that advance. Friedman would have strengthened his point by clearly saying so.

As Bernanke Era Begins, Former Fed Governors Expect Change (KRT)

By Kevin G. Hall

Knight Ridder, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON - Imagine that you wake up one morning with the power to rattle or rally financial markets across the globe, determine the strength or weakness of the U.S. dollar and encourage or discourage the purchases of cars or homes across America.

That's the power Ben Bernanke will wield when he replaces Alan Greenspan as the chairman of the Federal Reserve. The 79-year-old Greenspan will retire Jan. 31, the same day the Senate will confirm Bernanke, 52, and begin his era.

A shy academician, Bernanke is expected to distinguish himself from Greenspan as more of a consensus-builder and clear-speaking communicator. He must do it while still establishing his authority over an institution historically run by strong-willed chairmen with deeper real-world experience than he brings to the role.

Short of the presidency, few jobs affect the lives of ordinary Americans more tangibly than the Fed chairman, yet few citizens know much about the Fed. So mysterious are its workings that transcripts of its closed-doors meetings are kept classified for five years.

Over the past 27 years, there have been only three Federal Reserve chairmen, and only 13 in the Fed's 92-year history. A change atop the secretive institution is a big deal, as rare as a papal installation.

DOJ_NMG_0009547

The Fed's mission is to control the money supply in ways that boost employment and dampen inflation. It does so by effectively setting bank-lending rates to individuals and businesses, which in turn accelerates or slows economic activity.

For the past 25 years, two towering Fed chairmen - Paul Volcker and Greenspan - have steered the world's largest economy. On Volcker's watch, inflation was wrestled to the mat. During Greenspan's tenure, the end of the Cold War ushered in a truly global economy with the United States as its engine.

Those are tough acts to follow. And Bernanke, a seasoned academic from Princeton University who served on the Fed from 2002 to 2005, arrives without the clout that either man carried on Wall Street or in Washington. Only time will tell if that makes him less effective than his predecessors.

History is clear on one point, however: Incoming Fed chairmen tend to face early tests. Less than 10 weeks into the job in 1987, Greenspan wrestled with a stock market crash.

Bernanke arrives facing an expected economic slowdown late this year. He must decide by March whether to break a string of what's expected by then to be 14 straight quarter-point rate hikes, which began in June 2004. He also must decide how to deal with America's heavy reliance on foreigners buying Treasury debt, weak regulatory control over hedge funds that can roil markets and concerns that the nation's hot housing market is cooling and could nosedive.

Five former Fed governors told Knight Ridder in interviews that Bernanke will have to earn the trust of financial markets. The five also expect Bernanke to be more considerate of opposing viewpoints than was Greenspan, who sometimes left Fed governors feeling that their views were marginalized.

"When the chairman made his recommendation at the start of the go-round, the game was up, it was over. Everybody knew what the chairman would be in favor of," Laurence Meyer, a Fed governor from 1996 to 2002, said in an interview.

In his 2004 book "A Term at the Fed," Meyer doubted whether he made a difference because "I ended my term not sure I had ever influenced the outcome of an FOMC meeting, but it never stopped me from trying." He was referring to the Federal Open Markets Committee, the Fed's policy-making unit.

Greenspan's dominance sometimes chafed his colleagues.

Princeton University professor Alan Blinder, who was Fed vice chairman from 1994 to 1996, felt that Greenspan didn't give his views sufficient weight. He's the only governor to fall out publicly with Greenspan, who's so revered in Washington that Bob Woodward named his flattering Greenspan biography simply "Maestro."

Blinder alleges that Greenspan and a few senior Fed staffers dubbed "the barons" essentially ran the Fed with little serious input from others.

Blinder and Bernanke rotated the job of chairman in Princeton's big-ego economics department. The department included Paul Krugman, a liberal economist and controversial columnist. That experience leads Blinder to expect Bernanke to be more collegial and open to the views of others as Fed chairman than Greenspan was.

"I'm pretty sure Ben Bernanke, coming out of the environment that he does, and being the person that he is, would rather use these occasions to engage in discussions and real debate with the committee," Blinder said.

Some other ex-Fed governors agree that Greenspan wasn't exactly a first among equals - he was a first without equals, fully in charge.

"I think Blinder is probably on the mark there," said Lyle E. Gramley, a Fed governor from 1980 to 1985. "When the greatest central banker that ever lived talks ... it does tend to have an intimidating influence on the committee."

To be sure, there were times when Greenspan sensed between meetings that he had weak support on the board. There's an unwritten rule that the chairman will resign if he loses a vote on a rate-setting action, so Greenspan took care either to persuade his colleagues of his position beforehand or to adopt rival views as his own before the vote.

"I never monitored Alan Greenspan's phone calls, but I just bet you he could sense those times, and I can bet you he got on the phone with key members of the committee," said Edward M. Gramlich, a former Fed governor whose 1997-2005 term overlapped with Bernanke's. "Whether Ben will sense that and do that is an open question."

Unlike his predecessor, Bernanke enters the big job with the benefit of Fed experience. That means he knows how difficult it is for the Fed to read the nation's economic pulse, said Alice Rivlin, a Fed vice chairman from 1996 to 1999.

"Its decisions are made in the light of considerable uncertainty," she said, adding that "there's never a clear road map of the future."

That's why Greenspan is so widely hailed. His instincts and confidence in his judgment made him authoritative. He saw through the mist; only time on the job will reveal whether Bernanke's judgment is equipped with similar fog lights.

"Greenspan was a very independent thinker; he looked at very different data than everybody. He often came to the table with very different views than the staff and had to persuade them," Meyer recalled. "Bernanke is much more a conventional thinker and is much more close with staff. He's more likely to come to the table with a position consistent with the staff forecast."

That's not necessarily good.

DOJ_NMG_0009548

For example, Meyer and Fed staffers were pushing for higher interest rates in the mid-1990s to ensure that the economy didn't overheat and spark inflation. But Greenspan correctly intuited that productivity - worker output per hour - wasn't being measured adequately. He held rates low and his view proved correct, as inflation didn't rise and his policy fostered the late `90s boom.

"What we're (going to be) missing is this unique Alan Greenspan. There's just no way of getting around it," Meyer said. "Bernanke needs to keep himself open to views outside the staff, and make sure there are enough ideas (from) outside."

Stem Cell Research Funding In Md. Raises Bioethics Issue (BSUN)

By Jennifer Skalka And Jonathan Bor

The Baltimore Sun, January 12, 2006

Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr.'s $20 million plan for funding stem cell research sparked sharp criticism Wednesday from scientists and legislators after a key state official disclosed that preference will be given to work on non-embryonic stem cells.

With leading Democratic legislators renewing their call for support of embryonic stem cell research, the lines were clearly drawn for a debate that will dominate the General Assembly session that began Wednesday. Some Ehrlich allies argue that state dollars spent primarily on adult stem cell lines will advance science and thrust Maryland into the forefront of stem cell research. Many scientists say that cells derived from embryos hold the most promise for scientific breakthroughs.

Either way, Maryland appears poised to join a growing number of states spending money on stem cell research in the wake of a federal prohibition on funding research involving new embryonic stem cell lines.

Ehrlich discussed his plan to commit $20 million in state money to stem cell research at a news conference Wednesday in Baltimore, calling on lawmakers to forgo political wrangling in favor of good science.

But hours later, Ehrlich's top science adviser, Chris Foster, said he doesn't believe the money would be best spent on embryonic stem cell research.

"I don't think at this time that we need to" fund embryonic cell research, said Foster, deputy secretary of the Department of Business and Economic Development. "I think there are other ways to solve the problem."

Foster said the state would en tertain applications for embryonic research but there would be a preference for non-embryonic research, a position that brings Ehrlich closer to President Bush on this contentious issue.

Four years ago, Bush halted federal funding of embryonic stem cell research except for some existing cell lines, prompting some states to begin providing support.

The governor's proposal includes $13.5 million for a new Center for Regenerative Research at the university's BioPark. Henry Fawell, a spokesman for Ehrlich, said the $20 million for research is a one-year allocation that would likely be followed by future requests for funding.

Initially, Ehrlich's plan brought cheers from proponents of the research, who had thus far labored fruitlessly to get him to back state funding. Paul Schurick, Ehrlich's communications director, told reporters Tuesday evening that the administration would not impose restrictions on how the research money would be used.

And during his news conference Wednesday morning, Ehrlich -- joined by first lady Kendel Ehrlich, Howard County Sen. Sandra B. Schrader and others -- implored lawmakers to help him "make sure the science prevails to push us forward."

"I would hope we keep the politics to a minimum; that is my sincere hope," Ehrlich said. "I will attempt to do so."

That there would be a preference for non-embryonic research disappointed and confused some officials and scientists.

"That's not been the understanding or the indications that I think many of us had had," said William E. Kirwan, chancellor of the University System of Maryland. "Certainly I'd be anxious to hear if there's been any different thinking than what was presented today."

Research involving embryonic stem cells is controversial because it requires the destruction of embryos that could otherwise develop into babies. So far, scientists have created stem cell lines by using embryos donated by couples who had produced more embryos at in-vitro fertilization labs than they needed.

Embryonic stem cells are the master cells that give rise to every specialized tissue in the human body, including those making up bone, blood, the heart, brain and spinal cord. Many scientists believe they could be used to generate replacement tissues for people suffering from diseases from Parkinson's to diabetes.

Though these scientists say such cells hold the best promise for restorative treatments because they are the most flexible, others are focusing on so-called "adult" stem cells that are programmed to create specific tissues. Some re searchers, for instance, hope they can cure heart disease with transplants of cardiac stem cells.

Several leading stem cell researchers said favoring proposals for non-embryonic research would defeat the purpose of state funding -- to support projects for which federal funding is limited.

DOJ_NMG_0009549

"This certainly won't fly in the community of people who are actively seeking the state's support for embryonic stem cell work," said Dr. John Gearhart, a leading stem cell researcher at the Johns Hopkins School of Medicine. "There is no evidence that these other sources give cells that have the same properties as embryonic stem cells."

"That's exactly the opposite of what I think is needed," said Dr. Curt Civin, a Hopkins cancer researcher studying ways to harness stem cells to treat childhood leukemia. "The hole in our funding is for embryonic stem cell research."

Civin also expressed concern that the preference for non-embryonic research would skew the process of choosing the most deserving projects.

But Dr. Paul Fishman, a neurologist at the University of Maryland Medical Center, said Ehrlich's approach might have merit. He said many experts think that treatments derived from adult stem cells, as opposed to embryonic stem cells, are closer to being realized. Some biotech companies prefer working with non-embryonic stem cells because they feel the technology could yield profits faster, he said.

"If the goal is fostering biotech, that strategy may have some value," Fishman said.

Foster, an electrical engineer, said the Maryland Technology Development Corp. will appoint an expert committee to review all proposals and award grants to the most deserving.

By giving greater weight to proposals involving adult stem cells, the committee will avoid the political furor that could arise if it awards much of the money to embryonic research, he said.

"I don't want to get bogged down in politics," Foster said. "If we're going to spend state money and it's going to embryonic research, it will generate so much debate and controversy we'll make no progress."

Gearhart disagreed.

"This kind of proposal is certainly not one that will take politics out of stem cells," he said. "It will do nothing but inflame and reinvigorate the push for funding for embryonic stem cell research in the state."

Del. Samuel I. Rosenberg of Baltimore, who along with fellow Democrat Sen. Paula C. Hollinger of Baltimore County is proposing $125 million over five years for embryonic stem cell research, said Foster's statements took him by surprise.

"This is not where the need is in terms of priorities," he said. "You've got the feds not involved because of political pressure from the right wing."

Susan O'Brien, executive director of Maryland Families for Stem Cell Research, said preference for non-embryonic research "puts politics back in this issue."

The research proposal surprised top officials at the University of Maryland, Baltimore. They were expecting the governor to announce his commitment to support the new center, which had been in the works for some time, but did not anticipate a research component to his proposal.

"That's completely new," said David J. Ramsay, president of the University of Maryland, Baltimore. "We were talking about the facility. He actually sprung this as a surprise yesterday."

The governor's office says, however, that Ehrlich has always backed stem cell research and simply took the time to give the issue proper consideration.

"The governor has many stakeholders in this issue that he has had conversations with," said Ehrlich spokesman Henry Fawell. "Like any other chief exec with a major announcement, he's entitled to keep certain components of his proposal private."

Ehrlich Proposes Stem-cell Funding (WT)

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, January 12, 2006

BALTIMORE -- Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. yesterday proposed $20 million in state funds for stem-cell research.

The research funds, under the governor's proposal, would be disbursed through a committee controlled by his administration, alleviating concerns among Maryland religious groups that the studies would involve embryonic stem-cell research, considered a form of abortion by some.

"Clearly, no one is going to be funding embryonic, because in 25 years, there have been nothing but miserable failures," said Nancy Fortier, an associate director at the Maryland Catholic Conference. "Nonembryonic is what is being used to treat cancer, blindness, heart disease, Parkinson's disease. The $20 million is going to be distributed by capable, unbiased people on a review board."

Still, the governor did not rule out embryonic research.

"If it's embryonic with the best chance for therapeutic results, it will be embryonic," said Mr. Ehrlich, a Methodist.

Mr. Ehrlich said a committee, yet to be named, at the Maryland Technology Development Corporation (TEDCO), "will make those decisions."

DOJ_NMG_0009550

Chris Foster, deputy secretary at the Department of Business and Economic Development, will work with TEDCO to select the eight- to 12-person review committee.

Mr. Foster, a gubernatorial appointee and former federal researcher, said the committee will include representatives from research universities like Johns Hopkins University and the biotechnology industry and will solicit proposals for research.

"We'll use a model very similar to NIH. We know how they work," Mr. Foster said.

Mr. Ehrlich did not support an attempt last year by Democratic legislators to fund stem-cell research, including embryonic stem-cell research. The bill stalled in the Senate.

Del. Samuel I. Rosenberg, Baltimore Democrat, and Sen. Paula C. Hollinger, Baltimore County Democrat, who were last year's sponsors, are again sponsoring bills in their respective chambers that would provide $25 million over five years for stem-cell research.

Mr. Ehrlich's one-year proposal includes $13 million for a new Center for Regenerative Research at the University of Maryland at Baltimore, where he made his announcement yesterday.

Mrs. Hollinger said that the governor's proposal was "a step in the right direction, but that in order to do it right, we need to pass our legislation."

TEDCO, she said, doesn't "have the scientific or bioethics expertise." Mrs. Hollinger's bill would create a Maryland Scientific Peer Review Committee that would award grants through the Department of Health and Mental Hygiene.

Susan O'Brien, spokeswoman for Maryland Families for Stem-Cell Research, called TEDCO a "political peer review," instead of "scientific peer review."

"It absolutely has to have scientific peer review, not a politically appointed board," she said.

Mr. Ehrlich, in response, said, "What's not political? What we're trying to do is maximize science, not divide people."

TEDCO was created in 1998 by the state legislature and exists to promote "technology-based economic development." It is governed by a 15-member board appointed by the governor with "advice and consent of the Senate," according to its Web site.

Maryland Families for Stem-Cell Research is headed by former Gov. Harry Hughes, whose wife has Parkinson's disease. Mr. Hughes was supposed to attend the governor's press conference yesterday, but did not come because of a "family emergency."

Stem Cell Hype And Hope (WP)

By David A. Shaywitz

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

The apparent fabrication of results by South Korean researcher Hwang Woo Suk has already prompted a serious reevaluation of stem cell science, and the release this week of Seoul National University's final report on the affair is certain to add fuel to the fire. Many detractors of stem cell research (and, privately, even some proponents) have begun to wonder whether this might mark the beginning of the end. More likely this controversy -- and the ensuing scrutiny and self-reflection -- will provide exactly what our discipline needs most: the opportunity to modulate the extravagant expectations for this research while we reaffirm our underlying commitment to it.

The rapid ascent of stem cell research into the spotlight reflects the collision of exciting science with uncharted ethics. President Bush's Aug. 9, 2001, prohibition on the use of public funds to create new human embryonic stem cell lines ignited interest in this field, even as it made it much more difficult for American scientists to conduct the research. The concern that important medical science was being deliberately thwarted by the federal government enraged many patient advocates and further ratcheted up the demand for results.

Meanwhile, stem cell research itself trudged ahead slowly, for all the usual reasons -- as well as some unique ones. Scientific research is notoriously difficult, and progress typically incremental; human embryonic stem cells also happen to be intrinsically difficult to grow. Moreover, government restrictions severely hampered the ability of researchers to pursue the best science and discouraged many bright young investigators from entering the field.

As the demand for results far outstripped the ability of researchers to supply them, a seller's market emerged in which goods were overvalued and even low-quality merchandise was snatched up by eager buyers. This is the context in which Hwang's studies appeared.

While most in the field of stem cell research were shocked by the reports of fraud, the shock was only one of degree; it is common knowledge that the bar for publication in this field often has appeared remarkably low, with even well-respected research journals seeming to fall over one another for the privilege of publishing the next hot paper. The result of this frenzy has been an entire body of literature that is viewed with extreme skepticism by most serious stem cell investigators.

The good news is that underneath all this mess, stellar science really is happening. Stem cells have proved even more captivating than we could have imagined, and understanding the process by which a stem cell progressively differentiates into a specialized cell such as a neuron or a pancreas beta cell is perhaps the most compelling biology question for our generation. Stem cells have sparked our interest for good reason.

DOJ_NMG_0009551

But we're not going to figure out how they work overnight; it will take a very long time and require our best minds, as well as our collective effort (and, ideally, our collective dollars). Translating this knowledge into clinically meaningful applications is certain to take even longer and present still more challenges -- yet it should be achievable. If the current controversy were to cause us to precipitously abandon this exciting area, it would be a catastrophic shame.

What we really need is to refine our expectations for this research. This doesn't mean we should scale back our ambitions or demand less of our researchers. Rather, we need to recognize just how arduous and painstaking good science usually is and remind ourselves that data do not become dogma when published, but only when independently validated.

Difficult or not, good research is the only responsible way to proceed. If the promise of stem cells is to be fulfilled, the pursuit will require a solid scientific foundation, one grounded in reliable, reproducible facts and not simply supported by hype and hope.

States, Flush In Election Year, Loosen Up (WSJ)

By Deborah Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2006

Facing fat budget deficits, the Bush administration is preparing a tight 2007 budget that squeezes most domestic programs. Flush with cash, state governors across the country are doing the opposite.

That includes members of Mr. Bush's party and the opposition. Republican Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger of California proposes a $222 billion bond offering because, he says, "we need more roads, more hospitals, more schools ... more, more, more." Democratic Gov. Janet Napolitano of Arizona seeks "$100 million in smart tax relief that strengthens our economy and invests in new technologies."

In "State of the State" speeches now echoing through state capitols, others propose a beefed-up minimum wage and tax credits to help with energy costs. It's a far cry from the somber tones many governors struck earlier in the Bush era, as they struggled with the plunge in revenue that followed the 2001 recession.

Confronting a similar shortfall, the federal government has cut taxes and continued spending at a rapid rate -- on wars in Afghanistan and Iraq, on farm and highway bills, on a Medicare prescription-drug benefit. But many governors spent the first half of this decade cutting expenses and raising taxes to meet state balanced-budget requirements. The revenue surge that accompanied economic recovery has left them in the black at an opportune time: the 2006 election season.

"The revenue picture has improved very significantly," said Sujit Canaga Retna, a fiscal analyst with the Council of State Governments. "So, as a result of that, we see a number of projects geared towards economic development and long-term infrastructure needs."

Mr. Retna and other fiscal experts caution that states still face expenses in the next few years that will be a challenge, no matter how good the books look now. Among them is Medicaid, which continues to outpace the rate of state revenue growth, according to the Kaiser Family Foundation.

On average, Medicaid costs accounted for about 17% of states' general-fund budgets in 2005, up from 12% in 1995. Only K-12 education funding exceeds Medicaid as a percentage of general-fund expenditures. "Medicaid ... has not shown any signs of slowing down or losing its position as the fastest-growing component of state budgets," says Arturo Perez, a fiscal analyst with the National Conference of State Legislatures.

States also face growing costs associated with employee pension plans, many of which are underfunded, as well as retiree health-care costs. Nicholas Jenny, senior policy analyst at the Nelson A. Rockefeller Institute of Government, says states could "run ... into a ditch" by overreacting to today's flush treasuries.

Yet state executives aiming to survive the 2006 elections -- which include 38 gubernatorial races -- are eyeing voter-friendly ways to spend the extra cash. Several governors have proposed tax cuts and projects that they say will stimulate long-term economic development and make states healthier in the long run.

In Arizona, Ms. Napolitano has proposed tax credits for businesses that provide health care for employees and a three-day "sales tax holiday." In her address earlier this week, she also proposed spending $100 million on border security, saying such efforts "will mean big future payoffs" and help the state "to deal with the crisis down the road."

Tax relief also is on the agenda in Kansas, where Democratic Gov. Kathleen Sebelius is looking to eliminate the property tax on new business equipment. In New York, retiring Republican Gov. George Pataki, a potential 2008 presidential candidate, seeks a property-tax rebate, among other cuts.

Few welcome the changed fiscal picture more than Republican Gov. Bob Riley of Alabama, who drew criticism for proposing $500 million in higher taxes earlier in his term. Now he is calling for a five-year $200 million tax cut, including an annual "sales tax holiday." He's also seeking $500 million to fund school construction, along with a $1 billion increase in other education funding.

DOJ_NMG_0009552

"This record surplus exists because we fought for fiscal discipline, and because our workers, our industries and our economic-growth strategy have succeeded in putting Alabama's economy on the right track," Mr. Riley says.

Perhaps the most ambitious plan was proposed by Gov. Schwarzenegger. He's pushing for a 10-year, $222 billion infrastructure plan while noting that "a strong economy has produced billions of dollars of unexpected revenues." Over the next two decades, he says, the Golden State will need to lay out $500 billion on infrastructure projects.

Mr. Schwarzenegger warns that the "structural deficit" in California's state budget may soon return. But after politically debilitating battles with public employees in 2005, he's proposing to increase the minimum wage by $1 an hour and to boost education funding by several billion dollars.

With winter heating bills an issue among voters, several governors have called for state outlays to help residents cope. In Idaho, Gov. Dirk Kempthorne proposed a $63 million plan to give every resident a $50 energy-relief check, while Gov. Pataki called for a $500 heating-fuel tax credit to "thousands of seniors across New York."

Whether state legislatures go along with the governors' plans remains to be seen. Credit-rating agencies also are watching what states do with their surpluses; some states are seeking to replenish their "rainy day" funds, which were drained during the fiscal crisis.

"It is time to even out the ride," notes Democratic Gov. Christine Gregoire of Washington. "While the roller coaster is fun at the amusement park, it is no model for state budgeting."

Robin Prunty, a director with the ratings concern Standard & Poor's, said that while some targeted tax reduction or reserve replenishment is to be expected, a favored approach is "any tax-reduction measure that's nonrecurring and where you're not reducing the tax base."

Gov.'s Top Aide To Woo Donors (LAT)

By Robert Salladay

The Los Angeles Times, January 12, 2006

SACRAMENTO — Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger is dispatching his newly appointed chief of staff to woo wealthy Republican donors for his reelection effort, injecting his most influential policy advisor into the job of collecting money for his campaign.

Susan Kennedy, once a top-level Democrat, will play a key role in the governor's reelection bid, the administration confirmed Wednesday. She is being paid campaign funds in addition to her $131,000 government salary and will mix freely with influential contributors.

Campaign finance experts and legislative Democrats questioned why Kennedy — the lead negotiator on major decisions in the Schwarzenegger administration — would be allowed to attend private meetings with donors when many have business before the administration.

Paul S. Ryan, associate legal counsel at the Campaign Legal Center in Washington, D.C., said allowing donors access to Kennedy creates "the appearance of corruption in California. If you are fortunate to afford the price of admission, then you automatically gain access that the vast majority of Californians do not have."

Appointed last month to the highest-ranking position in the Schwarzenegger administration, Kennedy is a former Democratic Party executive and aide to former Gov. Gray Davis. She has nevertheless vowed loyalty to the Republican governor and his 2006 reelection effort.

California law allows her to attend fundraisers for the governor and work on his campaign, as long as she is doing it on her own time.

Under Davis, however, an informal rule prohibited staff members — including Kennedy — from attending any fundraisers, said Steve Maviglio, a former spokesman for Davis.

Schwarzenegger communications director Rob Stutzman said Kennedy would take vacation days to meet donors and work on the campaign, and would "absolutely" separate her policy job from the fundraising effort. He said that "her insight strategically on how the campaign will proceed will be invaluable."

Maviglio, who now works for Assembly Speaker Fabian Nuñez (D-Los Angeles), said Democrats see problems with Kennedy and other Schwarzenegger officials moving back and forth between policy discussions in the Capitol and meetings with donors. The governor's former chief of staff, Patricia Clarey, took time off from her government job to serve as Schwarzenegger's campaign manager last year.

DOJ_NMG_0009553

A "Join Arnold 2006" memo sent to donors Tuesday outlines a conference call and a series of luncheons planned for Schwarzenegger and contributors. The meetings will include "briefings from senior campaign officials, including the governor's chief of staff, Susan Kennedy," according to the memo, a copy of which was obtained by The Times.

"The concern is that you are offering donors, in exchange for campaign contributions, access to a decision maker that the rest of us don't have," said Derek Cressman, founder of TheRestofUs.org, a Sacramento nonprofit organization that monitors state and federal campaign finance laws.

Ryan of the Campaign Legal Center said contributors might benefit more from access to high-ranking aides than to the elected official hosting the fundraiser.

"The staff member often has more experience in a particular subject area than the elected official. The actions of that official are going to reflect the advice they get from the advisor," he said.

Kennedy's appointment last month shocked the political establishment. Conservative Republicans, already concerned that Schwarzenegger was drifting too far left, were appalled that he would hire the former abortion rights activist and Democratic political operative to help him run the government.

Stutzman said some Republicans were concerned that Kennedy would have access to secret financial information about the Republican Party. He said Kennedy would not be privy to that kind of information, but "she is absolutely going to know reelection strategy."

The memo suggests that Schwarzenegger has begun his reelection fundraising effort in earnest, after tapping his donors for about $50 million last year in the unsuccessful special election campaign. The governor is expected to raise another $50 million for his reelection. His fundraising has already eclipsed that of Davis — who was recalled from office in part because of perceived excesses in raising money.

Schwarzenegger's political schedule with Kennedy is busy for the next few weeks. Planned for hotels and country clubs from Jan. 18 to Feb. 9, the eight meetings are known among campaign workers as "donor maintenance" events. The information dispensed is often cursory and broad, but the gatherings allow a donor access to the highest ranks of government.

Some Capitol interests, such as environmentalists and consumer groups, have complained in the past of not having direct access to the governor's staff. But this month, lobbyists say, the administration has been more willing to reach out to non-donors, holding a series of meetings in the Capitol to outline the governor's agenda.

The "Join Arnold 2006" briefings with Kennedy are being hosted by the top tier of the Schwarzenegger money machine. The memo was sent to potential donors by a group of 30 major supporters, such as former U.S. Secretary of State George P. Shultz and California Chamber of Commerce President Allan Zaremberg.

The hosts of the gatherings include some of California's biggest developers, who could benefit from Schwarzenegger's $222-billion proposal to rebuild the state's overburdened freeways, schools, ports and waterways.

The Jan. 18 meeting is scheduled for the Island Hotel in Newport Beach and will be co-hosted by George L. Argyros and William Lyon, both major housing developers. Argyros is the former U.S. ambassador to Spain and a major donor to President Bush and the Republican Party.

The campaign has also arranged a Feb. 1 meeting at the Regency Club in Los Angeles, co-hosted by real estate developer Rick Caruso. Developer Alex Spanos, owner of the San Diego Chargers, is hosting a fundraising meeting the next day at the Sutter Club in Sacramento.

The memo shows that Schwarzenegger is linking his legislative agenda to the reelection effort this year. It mentions the rebuilding plan, which is now before the Legislature. Kennedy is leading negotiations to get the package through the Assembly and Senate, both controlled by Democrats.

"As the governor is fond of saying, he cannot do this job alone," the campaign memo tells potential donors. "He is looking to us, California's business leaders and the leaders in the communities where we live, work and raise our families to help him communicate his message to the voters during the 2006 election campaign."

State law prohibits linking campaign contributions to specific governmental decisions. But the Political Reform Act of 1974 says nothing about barring elected officials and government aides from discussing policy at fundraising events, according to the state Fair Political Practices Commission.

Kennedy, who declined to comment, has been unapologetic in the past about her new loyalty to Schwarzenegger, a relationship that developed after a year of private meetings between the two. And she has acknowledged that politics would inevitably bleed into her policy job.

"Are there politics involved in legislative strategy? Absolutely," Kennedy told The Times recently. "My job is to help Gov. Schwarzenegger, and I won't hesitate for one second to do that. Obviously, that means helping people who support him in the Legislature."

DOJ_NMG_0009554

Outside Audit Forecast: More Pension Freezes (WSJ)

By Ellen E. Schultz, Charles Forelle And Theo Francis

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2006

Look for more companies to cut back on pension benefits as an unusual alignment of financial conditions makes such moves more lucrative than usual.

Two trends have emerged in the broad shift away from traditional pensions, which provide workers set benefits based on their salary and years of service. Financially strapped companies such as airlines and auto makers are garnering much of the attention as they seek to ditch their badly underfunded pension liabilities and try to stay afloat.

Meanwhile, relatively healthy companies -- many with fully paid-up pension plans -- are seeking to shift to retirement programs that put more of the burden for savings and planning on employees. (How safe is your pension? See Personal Journal1.)

Last week, International Business Machines Corp. informed 117,000 workers in its U.S. pension plans that they will stop earning additional benefits after 2007, saving an estimated $2.5 billion to $3 billion over five years in the process, including the impact of other changes. Verizon Communications Inc. froze its pension for 50,500 managers last month, saving $3 billion in the coming decade.

Effective Jan. 1, many workers at Hewlett-Packard Co. and Sears Holdings Corp. also stopped building benefits in their plans. The companies said they are enhancing their 401(k) plans, which typically involve employee contributions that may be matched all or in part by employers.

Current interest rates offer employers the possibility of a particularly big income boost if they freeze their pensions, effectively wiping out part of a debt owed to future retirees. While assets in a plan still will be paid out when workers retire or leave the company, benefits don't grow with additional years on the job.

There is no legal barrier to freezing a pension unless it is prohibited by a union contract. Verizon, for example, unilaterally froze the pensions of its managers, but changes to pensions for its union employees are subject to negotiations.

"I wouldn't be surprised if many of the largest [companies] are in fact evaluating" pension freezes, said Vadim Zlotnikov, chief investment strategist for Sanford C. Bernstein & Co. Mr. Zlotnikov says the potential for locking in bigger accounting benefits is one of several reasons big pension sponsors might choose to freeze a pension now.

Under accounting rules, companies calculate how much they expect to pay out in pensions over the lives of their employees, including amounts workers haven't earned yet, and then reflect that amount as a liability on their books.

When a company freezes its pension -- halting the buildup of additional benefits for employees -- it is no longer obligated to make some of the payments it had planned. That allows the company to reduce the value of the liability it was carrying on its books, which generates accounting gains that are counted as income. Although this "income" isn't money that can be spent, it can affect the stock price and often management's pay incentives.

Benefits consultants, which earn fees in part by helping employers restructure pension plans, have begun telling clients that competitors are considering changes. Hewitt Associates LLC says that 29% of 152 companies it surveyed recently were considering closing some of their pensions to new employees, and 16% of 157 companies said they might freeze benefit accruals for some or all of current participants.

Today's low long-term interest rates allow companies to lock in particularly high gains. The value of a future obligation in today's dollars is bigger when interest rates are low, because the employer would have to put more money aside at prevailing rates to meet the payments when they come due.

Short-term rates, which contrary to long-term rates have been trending higher in recent months, offer the potential for even bigger gains to companies with so-called "cash-balance" plans, such as IBM, Verizon, H-P, Sears and many other big companies. Under these plans, workers have hypothetical "accounts" to which the employer credits interest each year, often tied to short-term rates. Higher short-term rates means higher interest credits. That, too, raises the pension obligation, and in turn, the savings from reducing the obligation.

Thus, by freezing their U.S. plans at a time when both long- and short-term interest rates are creating bigger liabilities, many companies stand to reap a bigger benefit by reducing their obligation. The companies can lock in the savings today, even if, like IBM, the benefits won't stop growing for two more years.

Meanwhile, employers also are worried that proposed pension-accounting changes proposed by the Financial Accounting Standards Board might make their profits more volatile.

It is impossible to say for sure which companies will follow in the footsteps of IBM and Verizon. Technology and telecom companies such as Lucent Technologies Inc., BellSouth Corp. and Electronic Data Systems Corp., like IBM, Verizon, H-P and Sears, have cash-balance plans that could generate gains if frozen in the current interest-rate environment.

DOJ_NMG_0009555

Spokesmen at all three companies declined to comment or said they weren't aware of any plans to change their plans. Lucent is among those reviewing options, says a person familiar with the matter.

IBM wouldn't break out the specific effects of freezing the U.S. pension, but says they account for about a third of its expected savings from pension changes. Nor would it identify how much its projected savings are offset by the estimated cost of increasing 401(k) contributions, which the company announced last week as well. IBM officials said the company began examining a pension freeze in earnest sometime early in 2005, and that the current interest-rate environment didn't play a role in the decision.

Verizon too, didn't disclose how much of the $3 billion in savings it expects will come from freezing the pension, nor would it say how much the savings are offset by increased 401(k) costs. The company declined to comment on whether the interest-rate environment played any role in its decision; it said the decision was driven by its merger with MCI, which didn't offer managers a pension.

An H-P spokesman said the company froze its pension for competitive reasons. "I wouldn't say [interest rates] played a significant role," he said. H-P didn't freeze its entire plan; rather, it closed it to younger employees and new employees, a move similar to what NCR Corp., did in 2004. NCR also has a cash-balance plan.

Sears said it froze its plan because traditional pensions have "become competitively unaffordable," and cause "significant volatility in a company's earnings and cash funding requirements."

Companies like Sears, which has an underfunded pension, get cash savings when they freeze their plans in addition to the pension income that boosts the bottom line. Because the obligation is reduced, the plan immediately becomes better-funded, which ultimately reduces or eliminates the need for the company to make cash contributions to the pension fund. Freezing its pension reduced Sears's pension liability by $80 million.

Clinton In Deal To Cut AIDS Treatment Costs (NYT)

By Donald G. Mcneil Jr.

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

Former President Bill Clinton plans to announce today that his foundation has negotiated lower prices on AIDS tests and on two important AIDS drugs.

Four companies, from the United States, India and China, will offer rapid H.I.V. tests for 49 cents to 65 cents, which will reduce the typical cost of a test in poor countries by half, Mr. Clinton said in a written statement. Another four companies - three from India and one from South Africa - will make the antiretroviral drug efavirenz for as little as $240 per patient per year. One of the Indian companies, Cipla, will also make the antiretroviral abacavir for $447.

The most common three-drug combination pill for H.I.V. now costs $136 per year, so the new drugs, even at steep discounts from the thousands of dollars they cost in the West, can easily triple the cost of therapy. But as patients become resistant to their first-line drugs, doctors must have new options.

The William J. Clinton Presidential Foundation acts as a broker, meeting with the health ministries of about 50 poor countries in Africa, Asia and Latin America and with drug makers.

Clinton Charity Gets Price Cuts For AIDS Drugs In Poor Countries (WSJ)

By Mark Schoofs

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2006

Former President Bill Clinton is expected to announce today that his foundation has secured price discounts on medicines for AIDS patients in developing countries and for HIV test kits.

The price reductions -- involving nine companies from five countries -- cover two AIDS drugs usually used on patients who have become resistant to first-line medications or who develop unbearable side effects. The deal reduces by 30% or more the cost of already cut-price products offered in most poor countries. The William J. Clinton Foundation's first agreement with generic-drug makers for major price reductions came in October 2003.

Today's announcement will mark the foundation's first foray into reducing the price for second-line AIDS drugs. Second-line regimens are between seven and 30 times as expensive as first-line therapies, according to Doctors Without Borders, a relief organization.

"We're very concerned that in the next few years there will be a dramatic increase in need for second-line drugs, and we fear they won't be available or that they will be very expensive," says Daniel Berman, coordinator of Doctors Without Borders' Access to Essential Medicines Campaign.

While the Clinton program generally offers the lowest price for the drugs and tests its agreements cover, it is only one of many pipelines through which developing countries can purchase drugs. Most brand-name pharmaceutical and generic-drug companies offer their own discount plans. In addition, private companies and nonprofit charity groups make purchases on their own.

DOJ_NMG_0009556

More than 240,000 people in Africa, the Caribbean and other developing parts of the world receive drugs through the foundation's agreements. The World Health Organization estimates that more than one million people now receive AIDS medicines in the developing world.

The Clinton team worked to lower prices by helping obtain cheaper ingredients to manufacture drugs. For example, one chemical ingredient accounts for most of the cost of making the drug abacavir. The foundation found an alternative supplier willing to slash the price for that ingredient, according to people at the foundation and at the manufacturing company, Matrix Laboratories Ltd. of India.

To make efavirenz another raw material is crucial but expensive, so the foundation approached a university researcher and asked him to develop a cheaper method of synthesizing that ingredient, which he has done.

"They are really providing a very comprehensive assistance program and are very sensitive to the commercial needs of companies," said Nimmgadda Prasad, executive chairman of Matrix Laboratories of Bangalore, India. Because the Clinton Foundation has 50 eligible countries in its purchasing consortium, it offered high enough volumes to justify lower margins, Mr. Prasad said.

Under the Clinton deal to be announced today, the drug efavirenz will be produced by three Indian generics firms -- Cipla Ltd., Ranbaxy Laboratories Ltd. and Strides Arcolab Ltd. -- and one South African generics maker, Aspen Pharmacare Holdings Ltd. The drug abacavir will be produced only by Cipla. Under the deal, efavirenz would sell for no more than $240 per patient per year, and abacavir for no more than $447 as long as orders meet volume and other specifications.

Four companies will manufacture HIV "rapid tests" -- which can determine a person's HIV status in less than 20 minutes -- for between 49 cents and 65 cents per test. The companies are Chembio Diagnostics Systems, a unit of Chembio Diagnostics Inc. of Medford, N.Y.; Orgenics Ltd. of Yavne, Israel, owned by Inverness Medical Innovations Inc. of Waltham, Mass.; Qualpro Diagnostics of India, and Shanghai Kehua Bio-Engineering Co. of Shanghai.

In the U.S. and Europe, abacavir is marketed as Ziagen by GlaxoSmithKline PLC. In the U.S., efavirenz is marketed as Sustiva by Bristol-Myers Squibb Co.; in most of the rest of the world it is marketed as Stocrin by MSD, the international trademark of Merck & Co.

Beating Up On Wal-Mart (WP)

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

AMERICAN BUSINESS has few whipping boys so irresistibly whippable as Wal-Mart Stores Inc., whose treatment of employees, competitors and suppliers conjures cold-eyed corporate heartlessness. It's hard to root for Wal-Mart; one might as easily cheer on Scrooge or the shark in "Jaws." But state lawmakers in Maryland are preparing to impose legislation on the retailer so arbitrary that it may achieve the near-impossible feat of casting Wal-Mart as the victim.

The Maryland bill would force firms with more than 10,000 in-state employees to spend at least 8 percent of their payrolls on workers' health insurance plans or make compensatory payments to the state. Only three other Maryland employers have more than 10,000 workers on their payrolls -- Johns Hopkins University, Northrop Grumman Corp. and Giant Food Inc. -- and they already meet or exceed the 8 percent threshold. Apparently, only Wal-Mart, with about 15,000 full- and part-time employees in Maryland, does not; thus the bill applies uniquely to Wal-Mart.

Maryland's legislature passed the bill last year, but Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) vetoed it. Lawmakers, urged on by big unions, appear on the verge of overriding the veto despite furious lobbying by Wal-Mart. The legislators, joined by Giant Food (Wal-Mart's unionized competitor), insist disingenuously that they are not singling out the big-box retailer but are merely setting a standard. Yet hundreds of smaller companies in Maryland that fail to meet the 8 percent spending threshold for health care are untouched by the legislation; in total their uninsured employees may be a greater drain on the state's health system than Wal-Mart's. The bill's backers say that Wal-Mart, because it is so large, bears a special obligation to set a good example. But since when do states have the right to penalize firms simply because they are big and successful?

The Maryland bill is a legislative mugging masquerading as an act of benevolent social engineering. It is true that skyrocketing health care costs and the growing ranks of uninsured workers represent a burden on the state's health system that other corporations in effect help subsidize. But Wal-Mart employees, like the employees of other large retailers that employ many low-wage workers, are only slightly more likely to collect Medicaid benefits than the national average. And unlovable as it may be, Wal-Mart serves low- and middle-income people, both by creating entry-level and part-time jobs for people who might otherwise be unemployed and by saving its moderate-income customers a staggering amount of money.

The legislation has prompted imitators in 30 states. Where it passes, no one should be surprised by unintended consequences. Wal-Mart and other targeted firms may shift jobs or planned facilities elsewhere. Many low-wage younger workers may still opt out of health coverage even if offered a more generous plan. In trying to address the national problems of health care and uninsured workers, lawmakers in Maryland and other states could inflict on themselves a new set of problems while failing to solve the underlying one.

DOJ_NMG_0009557

Russia Won't Block U.S. On Iran (WP)

By Dafna Linzer

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

The Bush administration, working intensely to galvanize international pressure on Iran, has secured a guarantee from Russia that it will not block U.S. efforts to take Tehran's nuclear case to the U.N. Security Council, American and European officials said yesterday.

The commitment, made in a Tuesday night phone call between Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, will likely help the United States and its European allies win support from key countries weighing a tougher line in response to Iran's resumption of sensitive nuclear work.

Vice President Cheney and British Prime Minister Tony Blair suggested yesterday that Iran now faces the possibility of U.N. economic sanctions if it does not halt nuclear enrichment research it began Tuesday.

According to three senior diplomats who were briefed on the call, Lavrov told Rice that Russia would abstain, rather than vote against U.S. efforts to move the issue from the International Atomic Energy Agency to the Security Council. State Department spokesman Sean McCormack confirmed to reporters that Rice had spoken with Lavrov and other foreign ministers but did not divulge details.

Russia's pledge was good only for when a vote takes place inside the IAEA. U.S. officials said they remain uncertain as to how Moscow, a traditional ally of Iran's, would react if the issue gets to the Security Council, where Moscow is one of five countries with veto power.

Still, Bush administration officials who spoke on the condition of anonymity saw the Russian decision as a victory and said they would spend the next several weeks lobbying China for a similar commitment. "We spent much of our time working on the Russians, but we're now moving the focus to China," said one administration official who would only discuss the backroom diplomacy on the condition of anonymity.

The White House is hoping the IAEA board will refer Iran's case to the Security Council before President Bush delivers the State of the Union address at the end of the month, according to two senior administration officials.

Four years ago, in his annual address, Bush referred to Iran as a one of three "axis of evil" countries, along with Iraq and North Korea. But his administration has been criticized by friends and opponents for failing to come up with a strategy to curb Iran's nuclear program.

The White House has been pushing for more than two years to bring Iran's case before the Security Council, but only now -- as a result of Iran's recent actions -- has it found a chance to win enough international support to do so. The timing is ideal, U.S. officials said. John R. Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, takes over the presidency of the Security Council for one month beginning on Feb. 1, giving Washington the opportunity to place Iran at the top of the council agenda.

In an interview yesterday with Fox News Radio, Cheney said "the number one item on the agenda" at the Security Council would be a "resolution that could be enforced by sanctions." He cautioned that the process, still in flux, was "speculative at this point" but added, "that will be the next step once the Board of Governors of the International Atomic Energy Agency meets and concludes that the diplomatic track they've been on isn't going to work."

In London, Blair told parliament that sanctions are a serious option. "We don't rule out any measures at all," Blair said. "It is important Iran recognizes how seriously the international community treats it."

The foreign ministers of France, Britain and Germany, who are now closely allied with Washington's position on Iran, are expected to call today for an emergency meeting of the IAEA board to vote on sending Iran's case to New York.

They are assured of winning a majority of the votes from the board's 35 members. But diplomats from all three countries, who spoke on the condition of anonymity, said the meeting may not take place in time for Bush's speech, saying they may need several more weeks to lobby China and other influential board members, such as India. Undersecretary of State R. Nicholas Burns will travel to India next week to press for its support.

"We expect the meeting will most likely take place around the beginning of February," one European official said.

Robert Einhorn, who was assistant secretary of state for nonproliferation until 2001, said it would be best to press Russian and China for more than abstentions. "What we need to do now is get the Russians and Chinese to tell the Iranians they won't be in a position to help them out in the [Security] Council if they go forward with this work," he said. "If the Russians and Chinese told them that, it would have quite an impact in Tehran."

DOJ_NMG_0009558

Iran says its program is designed solely to generate electricity, but the Bush administration is convinced Tehran is using it as a pathway to a nuclear bomb. So far, the IAEA has not found proof of a weapons program, but Iran's cooperation with inspectors has been shaky, and many questions remain unanswered.

Iran Defiant As Sanctions From West Likely (AP-Y2)

By Nasser Karimi

AP2, January 12, 2006

The U.S. and Britain said Wednesday that Western countries will likely seek Iran's referral to the U.N. Security Council after it restarted nuclear activity. Iran's president said his country would not be bullied and would push ahead with the program.

British Prime Minister Tony Blair said he could not rule out the possibility that Iran will face economic sanctions.

International impatience with Iran was growing after it broke U.N. seals at a uranium enrichment plant Tuesday and said it was resuming nuclear research after a two-year freeze. Enriched uranium can be used as a fuel for both nuclear energy and nuclear weapons.

"I think the first thing to do is to secure agreement for a reference to the Security Council, if that is indeed what the allies jointly decide, as I think seems likely," Blair told the House of Commons in London, adding that he was in close contact with Washington on the issue.

"We obviously don't rule out any measures at all," Blair said when asked about possible sanctions. "It's important Iran recognizes how seriously the international community treats it."

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said "it is more likely than ever" that the U.N. nuclear watchdog, the International Atomic Energy Agency, will refer Iran to the Security Council. The council could then impose sanctions.

White House spokesman Scott McClellan said Tuesday if Iran continued on its present course, "there is no other choice but to refer the matter to the Security Council."

McCormack said Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice had discussed the situation by telephone with IAEA chief Mohamed ElBaradei and British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw.

Russia, a longtime ally of Iran, expressed anger as well. Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov talked with Rice, and both sides shared "a deep disappointment" over Iran's move, the Russian Foreign Ministry said.

But Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad shrugged off the international outcry.

"Unfortunately, a group of bullies allows itself to deprive nations of their legal and natural rights," Ahmadinejad told a crowd during a visit to the port city of Bandar Abbas. His speech was broadcast live on state-run television. "The Iranian nation is not frightened by the powers and their noise."

Former President Hashemi Rafsanjani took a sharper tone, denouncing the West's "colonial policy."

"If they cause any disturbance, they will ultimately regret it," the cleric warned in a speech for the Islamic holiday of Eid al-Adha aired on state TV.

"Even if (the Westerners) destroy our scientists, their successors would continue the job," he said. "It would not be easy for them to solve the (nuclear) case by imposing sanctions or anything like that."

Rafsanjani, who was Iran's president in the 1990s, lost to Ahmadinejad in a runoff election in June. The policy of pursuing the nuclear program has become a point of national pride for many Iranians, a rare issue that crosses the reformist-conservative divide.

Rafsanjani now serves as head of the Expediency Council, a powerful body that mediates between the elected parliament and Iran's unelected Islamic clerical leadership, which holds ultimate say in the country.

Iran insists its research is for peaceful energy production only. But the United States suspects Tehran has ambitions to produce nuclear weapons.

"I tell those superpowers that, with strength and prudence, Iran will pave the way to achieving peaceful nuclear energy," Ahmadinejad said. "In the near future, (nuclear) energy will be completely carried out by the Iranian nation."

The president accused the West of seeking to prevent Iran's technological development and control the country by forcing it to buy nuclear fuel abroad.

"They falsely say that they oppose nuclear weapons. They want to have nuclear monopoly to sell it drop by drop at an expensive price and use it as an instrument for domination over nations," he said.

Blair said Iran's decision to restart its nuclear program, coupled with Ahmadinejad's recent inflammatory comments about Israel, "cause real and serious alarm right across the world." Ahmadinejad recently called for Israel to be "wiped off the map" and said the Holocaust was a "myth."

German Deputy Foreign Minister Gernot Erler cautioned against referring the dispute to the Security Council, saying it could further destabilize the Middle East.

DOJ_NMG_0009559

Foreign ministers from Britain, France and Germany, who have spent two years trying to persuade Iran to halt its uranium conversion and enrichment activities, will meet in Berlin on Thursday to consider their next step.

___

Associated Press Writer Ed Johnson contributed to this story from London.

A Test Of Wills Between Iran And The West (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 11 - One day after Iran moved to break the internationally monitored seals on its nuclear facilities, a contest of wills between Iran and its adversaries unfolded, with the Europeans threatening to refer Iran to the United Nations Security Council for possible punitive actions and Iran issuing defiant new warnings.

Signaling this strategy, Vice President Dick Cheney, in an interview with Fox News, said Wednesday that the United States would seek the adoption of "a resolution that could be enforced by sanctions, were they to fail to comply with it." Prime Minister Tony Blair of Britain told the Parliament the same thing, saying that "we have to decide what measures to take and we obviously don't rule out any measures at all."

Among the possibilities being discussed, various officials said, were a ban on travel by Iranian diplomats, restrictions on new commercial contracts or sports contests and other small steps falling short of what would be the toughest sanction of all - either a ban on oil purchases or on the export of refined gasoline to Iran.

But it was unclear whether the Europeans could get Russia, China, India and other countries to join a consensus for sanctions, making it possible for the Security Council to act on them. Nor was it certain that Iran would change its behavior in response to new pressures.

"The issue cannot be solved by imposing sanctions or similar measures," said Ali Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani, the former Iranian president. The West would regret any such attempts, he warned in a speech on Wednesday as Iran celebrated the Muslim holiday of Id al-Adha.

"I believe the West has played this game too late and played into Iranian hands," said Abbas Milani, director of Iranian studies at Stanford University. "At this stage, they are convinced that the more hardball they play, the more the West will collapse." Mr. Milani said that news reports from Iran suggested that its government had used the last few years to sign up oil deals with various countries to gain their political support, dispersed its nuclear activities to some 300 sites around the country and stockpiled food, medicine and other materials to survive any sanctions.

American and European officials say that two years of efforts to negotiate with Iran, including the discussion of incentives for ending its nuclear programs, has at least brought leading countries of the world closer to a willingness to apply coercion now that talks have failed.

They have indicated that the next phase of pressure is likely to take place a step at a time, perhaps starting with a referral of Iran's case by the International Atomic Energy Agency to the United Nations Security Council early next month.

"A lot of what can be done is simply related to Iran's status in the world," said Mitchell B. Reiss, a policy and planning director at the State Department in the first Bush term. "The Iranians are very sensitive to challenges to their own legitimacy, and there are a lot of things you can do before bringing down the hammer big time."

But others are less sure of such a course of action, and they fear that Iran can string out the process by appearing to cooperate at each phase, peeling off Russian and Chinese support with a show of reasonableness.

"I've been surprised that so many people are acting like referral to the Security Council is some important event that will bring about change in the government of Iran," said an administration official, asking not to be identified as questioning the Western strategy. "I don't buy it."

A second official, asked if the period of diplomacy had now ended, said: "No. Diplomacy just passes to a new phase, one of diplomatic judgment of Iran." Such a judgment, he said, will be easier because of the recent inflammatory comments from its new president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, about wiping Israel off the map.

For the time being, there is no talk of military action against Iran, except hypothetically, in part because any kind of airstrike or covert attempt to sabotage its facilities would provoke retaliations in Iraq, Israel and elsewhere.

A few years ago, for example, Bush administration hawks spoke of the powerfully persuasive effect on Iran of 150,000 American troops in neighboring Iraq. Now, the United States is angrily calling on Iran not to support lethal attacks on American troops by insurgents. There remain some in the Bush administration who say that American officials could have made a greater attempt in the last year or so to reach out to the Tehran government. But there is no indication that Iran was interested.

The American ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, was authorized to engage Iranians in discussions about cross-border infiltration of bombs and other devices used against Americans, but has been rebuffed.

DOJ_NMG_0009560

Meanwhile, the United States has concentrated its efforts on trying to isolate Iran diplomatically, proclaiming success repeatedly but without proof that it has gotten anything more than lip service so far.

State Department officials say that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has been concentrating this week on getting Russia on board the campaign to confront Iran. They say Russia has responded with surprisingly tough talk to Iran's rebuff of an offer to enrich uranium on Russian soil, but that Russia could still call for more delays.

China, administration and European officials say, is considered likely to accept sanctions if Russia does.

In its five years in office, the Bush administration has engaged in a long-running internal debate over how to deal with Iran. Hard-liners at the Pentagon and Mr. Cheney's office argued against having any diplomatic contacts with Tehran.

Some at the State Department say privately that more efforts might have yielded some results, and they got the administration to go along with the European efforts to offer economic benefits last year.

Iran has had two military plane crashes in the last month, for example, and these officials argue that the offer of spare parts for commercial aircraft might have done the trick.

Some conservatives in the administration have begun to play with the idea that the best that could be done is to delay Iran's nuclear bomb-making ability, and the United States should use the time to try to encourage political change within Iran.

A small effort has begun to provide assistance to dissident groups, for example. But a meeting to discuss further openings with Iran as a means to undermine the government was canceled last year after The Wall Street Journal disclosed the plans and hard-liners attacked them as too conciliatory.

Pressure Mounts On Iran As UK Vows To Go To UN (FT)

By Roula Khalaf In London And Daniel Dombey In Brussels

Financial Times, January 12, 2006

Britain yesterday vowed to report Iran to the United Nations Security Council, intensifying diplomatic pressure over Tehran's nuclear programme.

Responding to Iran's decision to resume limited uranium enrichment research, Tony Blair, the UK prime minister, told parliament: "I think the first thing to do is to secure agreement for a reference to the Security Council, [if] that is indeed what the allies jointly decide, as I think seems likely."

European officials warned that Tehran would have to reinstate the seals at its Natanz research facility and refrain from all the activities it announced this week if it wanted to avoid a UN referral. "We made clear in December they had to retain the full suspension. Removing the seals [at the Natanz plant] was the critical step. They've crossed the red line," said one diplomat. "A half-step back will not stop us [in seeking a UN referral]."

A meeting between the British, French and German foreign ministers in Berlin on Thursday is expected to call for an emergency session this month of the International Atomic Energy Agency, the UN's nuclear watchdog, which would then discuss a referral of the dispute to the UN. A referral would require a majority vote in the 35-member IAEA board.

Angela Merkel, German chancellor, will also discuss the issue with George W. Bush, US president, in Washington tomorrow and with Vladimir Putin, Russian president, in Moscow on Monday.

Germany, previously often seen as taking a "softer" policy on Iran than the other large EU countries, now maintains that there is no remaining ground for discussions with Iran, following Tehran's actions this week.

The case for referral will be strengthened by the report for the next IAEA board meeting, in which Mohamed ElBaradei, the agency's director-general, is set to conclude that he has made "no progress" in convincing Iran to reveal more about its nuclear programme, which Tehran maintains is peaceful.

European diplomats also appeared confident that Russia would not oppose a referral although so far Moscow has been reluctant to back such a move publicly.

The diplomats emphasise that over the weekend Russia and China joined with the three other permanent UN Security Council members and sent diplomatic "demarches" calling for Iran to desist from its nuclear research. The demarches also asked Iran to pass on a sensitive document it received from Pakistan's AQ Khan nuclear procurement network in the 1980s that some diplomats see as evidence of Tehran's interest in developing nuclear weapons.

Nuclear experts yesterday cautioned that Iran's current plans posed no short-term risk of large-scale production of nuclear material. Iran on Tuesday said it was planning to install small-scale gas ultracentrifuge cascades at a pilot enrichment plant in Natanz and to feed UF6 gas into the cascades for research purposes.

But experts familiar with UN inspectors' work in Iran said any enrichment was a long way off because some of the centrifuges at the pilot plant had crashed when the plant was shut down in 2004. But diplomats, say even small-scale enrichment would bring Iran closer to mastering the production of fuel that could be used for military or civilian purposes.

DOJ_NMG_0009561

If it reaches the UN Security Council, the first step is likely to be a UN resolution calling on Iran to abide by the demands of the IAEA.

Additional reporting by Bertrand Benoit and Hugh Williamson in Berlin, and Mark Turner at the United Nations

Iran Crosses Last Red Line; UN Sanctions Ahead? (CSM)

By Peter Ford

The Christian Science Monitor, January 12, 2006

PARIS - Iran's abrupt resumption of its nuclear program this week, throwing Tehran's clerical regime into open conflict with the rest of the world, appears to have doomed current diplomatic efforts to curb the country's nuclear ambitions.

Ending a two-year freeze on research into uranium enrichment - an essential step in the production of both nuclear reactors and bombs - Iranian officials reopened the Natanz nuclear research facility on Tuesday. European leaders who had negotiated the research suspension said the move marked the end of their readiness for talks.

Foreign ministers from Britain, France, and Germany, whose two years of diplomatic efforts failed to persuade Iran to drop uranium enrichment permanently, are expected to launch a bid Thursday to refer Iran to the UN Security Council, which could enforce economic and political sanctions. There are signs, for the first time, that Russia and China may not stand in their way.

"We were in crisis management mode, offering dialogue," says a European diplomat close to the negotiations. "Now we have gone through every single red line. We have to move to another stage."

"The European Union door is shut and the Iranians have thrown away the key," added Ali Ansari, an expert on Iranian politics at St. Andrew's University in Scotland. "This was a symbolic slap in the face for the Europeans."

Iran insists its nuclear program is only for peaceful, electricity-generating purposes, and that it therefore has the right under the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT) to develop the full nuclear fuel cycle.

The US, increasingly supported by EU nations, claims Tehran is seeking to build a nuclear bomb. It is also worried by Iran's program to develop a long-range missile that could deliver it to Vienna - or Israel.

A three-year probe by the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) has found no hard evidence that Iran is seeking a nuclear weapon but has raised many unanswered questions. Chief among them is why the Iranian authorities hid large parts of their nuclear program for years, before they were revealed by an exile opposition group in 2002.

"I am running out of patience, the international community is running out of patience" with Iran's evasiveness over nuclear issues, IAEA chief Mohammed ElBaradei told Britain's Sky News television earlier this week.

If enriched to a low level, uranium can be used in power stations. But enriched to a higher degree, it can be used in nuclear warheads. To reassure the world of its peaceful intentions, Iran promised its European negotiating partners in October 2003 to suspend all activities related to the enrichment of uranium in return for political and economic incentives. Iran broke that pledge Tuesday.

While Washington and European governments appear ready to push for United Nations sanctions, which can be imposed only by the UN Security Council, Russia and China - both veto-wielding members of the Council - appear more cautious.

Traditionally Moscow and Beijing have been sympathetic to Tehran, but European diplomats had some success in winning their understanding.

Both China and Russia wrote letters to the Iranian government last weekend urging it to maintain its enrichment moratorium. Tuesday's move snubbed both.

Russian Defense Minister Sergei Ivanov said Wednesday he was "disappointed and worried" by Tehran's decision, which he added was "not following the best case scenario." In Beijing, the chairman of China's National People's Congress, Wu Bangguo, told visiting US lawmakers Wednesday that his government "agreed to working with the United States and especially the EU3 on Iran," according to Mark Kirk, a Republican Congressman.

Recent inflammatory comments by Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad attacking Israel and calling the Holocaust into doubt have not helped Iran's cause abroad. "Ahmadinejad has given them (the Americans) an open goal," says Dr. Ansari. "Even the Russians and the Chinese are getting fed up."

The first test of the diplomatic waters will come at the "extraordinary" meeting of the IAEA board which the European foreign ministers and EU foreign policy czar Javier Solana are expected to call for on Thursday, after consulting with US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

At the IAEA, Russia may seek to delay a referral of Iran's nuclear program to the UN Security Council because Moscow is still offering one possible way out of the crisis - a proposal that Iran's uranium be enriched in Russia, to ensure that none of it is diverted to illegal military purposes.

Iran hasn't rejected the idea, and is due to send a delegation to Moscow on Feb. 16 to discuss it further. But some observers think Iranians won't take the offer seriously, against a background of prickly relations.

DOJ_NMG_0009562

"The history of Iranian-Rusisan is pretty appalling. It's not a track record you'd want to rely on," says Dr. Ansari.

If Iran is referred to the Security Council for violating the NPT by hiding much of its nuclear program for two decades, members will face a number of sanctions options, ranging from a suspension of economic ties to breaking diplomatic relations with Tehran.

None of them is pain-free for the international community, however, say observers.

"Interrupting diplomatic relations would send a powerful signal but its consequences would not be obviously favorable to us, since we would lose direct knowledge of what was going on in Iran," points out François Heisbourg, head of the Strategic Research Foundation, a think tank in Paris.

Refusing to buy Iranian oil - another option - would raise international oil prices to levels that would threaten the world economy, he adds. The Russians, too, are cautious about sanctions, says Yevgeny Bazhanov of Moscow's Diplomatic Academy.

"We're not against sanctions, but think they should be ... targeted to solve the problem. We wouldn't support blanket punishment, or ultimatums, but only sanctions that really work," says Mr. Bazhanov.

The EU is anxious to steer the crisis towards the United Nations if only to head off the prospect of an Israeli strike on Iran's nuclear facilities.

Though some US voices have been raised in favor of a military strike against Iranian nuclear installations, such an attack would undoubtedly prompt Iran to use all its considerable influence among Shiite Muslims in Iraq to undermine US goals there.

"The diplomatic game is the only game in town" when it comes to dealing with Iran's nuclear program, argues Mr. Heisbourg. "It is not working, but I know of no other."

Iran's Nuclear Challenge (WP)

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

IRAN'S RESUMPTION of uranium enrichment dramatically narrows the options of Western governments that hope to prevent its Islamic regime from acquiring nuclear weapons. The breaking of seals at its Natanz plant Tuesday directly violated an agreement Tehran struck with Britain, France and Germany in 2004 to suspend its enrichment program; that should end European hopes that economic favors could be exchanged for a permanent freeze. A Russian offer to enrich Iranian uranium has no greater prospect of success: Tehran announced its new, supposedly experimental work before it had responded to Moscow. Notions of a broader "grand bargain" between Iran and the West have been rendered ludicrous by the rantings of President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, who has denied the Holocaust more vigorously than he has Iran's plans to become a nuclear power. And thanks to better footwork by the Bush administration, European governments no longer have the option of blaming the United States for the failure of diplomacy.

That leaves the strategy that the United States has been pressing all along, which is referring Iran's case to the U.N. Security Council. Such a referral, which must come from the board of the International Atomic Energy Agency, probably won't change Iranian behavior or lead to Security Council action; North Korea has been before the council for three years without result. But having promised that consequence in the event of a resumption of enrichment, European governments must now move forward. To shrink from referring Iran to the Security Council now would strip the West of its remaining credibility in Tehran and all but eliminate the possibility of a peaceful solution.

As it is, the weak response to Iran's last provocation, the reopening of a uranium conversion facility in August, probably encouraged this week's escalation. European governments issued angry statements and helped pass an IAEA resolution that spoke of bringing Iran to the council at some indefinite time. In the following weeks, however, the Europeans returned to the same negotiating strategy that had already failed, offering to resume talks with Iran and backing Russia's intervention. The Bush administration, too, supported this course, in keeping with its strategy of building a coalition rather than squabbling over tactics with allies. The net result was that Iran's belligerence was answered with more appeasement.

The mullahs are gambling that the same will happen in this case: that European governments will once again temporize or that Russia and China will prevent any meaningful Security Council action. Even if the Europeans respond firmly, and a resolution is adopted by the IAEA, the latter calculation is probably a good one. Russia, which just signed a $1 billion arms sale agreement with Iran, is increasingly hostile to Western initiatives, and China is a major consumer of Iranian oil. So while the means of the Security Council must be tried, Western governments should also begin fashioning a policy of sanctions and containment for Iran that can be applied by a coalition of the willing. That should be coupled with a more concerted effort to support the large part of the Iranian population that yearns to free itself from repressive clerical rule. If there is to be a credible alternative to military action against Iranian facilities -- or the concession of nuclear weapons to a regime that openly advocates wiping Israel from the map -- now is the time for Europe and the United States to agree on it.

DOJ_NMG_0009563

Help Us, America . . . (WSJ)

By Farouz Farzami

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2006

TEHRAN -- On the surface, it would appear that pressure from the United Nations and the United States has little effect on the mullahs who rule Iran. The opposite is true.

The best current example is the standoff over Iran's nuclear program. Fearing that the mullahs are secretly developing nuclear weapons, the U.N. wants strict limits on Iran's nuclear program. The country's top nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, and Iran's new president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, have refused to consider any such limits, even after Russia offered a compromise that would permit Iran to enrich uranium on its soil. The president and the top negotiator have been defiant -- on state-run TV recently, Mr. Larijani, thinking several steps ahead, pledged a "crushing response" to any military attack by the U.S. or Israel.

But if you look past this headline-generating bluster, you see that Western pressure is having an effect. The hard-line position of the Iranian government has begun to splinter. There are now three minds about this issue in the Majlis, the Iranian parliament:

· A categorical rejection of the Russian proposal to allow Iran to enrich uranium at its facilities, a compromise that would deny Iran the privilege of enriching uranium on its own soil.

· Modifying the Russian proposal to allow for enrichment to occur in both Russia and Iran.

· Suspending all enrichment until further notice or even to some agreed-upon future date, to defuse tension and rebuild confidence with the European Union.

The existence of these more conciliatory positions in a Majlis completely composed of religious hard-liners is a surprise. (A fourth point of view unrepresented officially, since reformers have been thrown out of the government, calls for Iran to comply with the U.N.'s demands and give up on enrichment of nuclear fuel altogether.)

There is only one reason why these divisions have appeared within the formerly monolithic Majlis: the tough stand by the international community backed by American and Israeli military might. I understand the opposition of liberals in America and Europe to America's military moves in the Middle East, and they are right to be concerned about the continuing loss of life. But they should also appreciate the importance of American power in enforcing global standards. Without U.S. military, economic and diplomatic pressures, the leader-for-life of Libya, Col. Moammar Gadhafi would not be behaving himself today, and the people of Afghanistan would still be under the thumb of the Taliban.

Iran is, of course, not comparable to Libya or Afghanistan, but everyone in Tehran's bazaar knows that any flare-up of tension between Iran and the West has an immediate adverse impact on the Rial, the country's currency, particularly against the U.S. dollar. The slightest Western pressure and Tehran's stock market nose-dives.

Why won't the U.S. take advantage of this? Why not impose smart sanctions on Iran instead of smart bombs, and apply strong international pressure for the formation of independent and secular political parties? Currently, the only parties allowed are Islamic ones approved and subsidized by the authoritarian, theocratic regime. We desperately need a push from America and the West to separate church from state in Iran.

If I were an American, I would probably be content with the well-being of myself and my own family, and would be inclined to oppose my country's involvement in Middle East politics -- but I am not an American. I am an Iranian. I am a subject, not a citizen, of a Middle Eastern country with a long history of despotism. My country will not change without help from the West. I wish the only superpower in the 21st century would realize its full potential in diplomacy, economic leverage and, as a last resort, military action -- not just to stop Iran's nuclear ambitions, but to speed up democratization in the region.

I am impatient for it. We have those like Shirin Ebadi, Iran's Nobel Peace Prize winner and prominent reformer, who call for allowing democracy to evolve. But Ms. Ebadi is a rich woman, a member of the country's small elite that has never had to struggle to make a living. Maybe she and those patient ones like her can afford to wait another century for democracy to materialize out of the blue.

Not me. I need help. If America could accept its power and potential, it could begin forcing change right now.

Ms. Farzami is an Iranian journalist who is forbidden to publish in her own country.

A Firebrand In A House Of Cards (NYT)

By Dariush Zahedi And Omid Memarian

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

Berkeley, Calif.

IN defying international monitors and breaking the seals on its nuclear facilities, Iran seems to be courting confrontation. But Western leaders would do well to consider what President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's bravado really says about Iran's likely posture in the region and at the nuclear talks that are scheduled to resume at the end of January. To continue down the path of conflict could be very costly, both for the regional interests of the United States and most of all, for the territorial integrity of Iran.

DOJ_NMG_0009564

Mr. Ahmadinejad is surely motivated by ideology and the desire to solidify the position of the security faction within Iran's ruling elite. But he also appears to be acting on the perception that the United States is in a position of considerable, indeed unprecedented, weakness. America's military is overstretched in Iraq and Afghanistan, and Washington has focused on monitoring North Korea's nuclear program rather than Iran's. If threatened, Iran could wreak havoc in Afghanistan, Iraq, Lebanon and Israel. These observations may lead Mr. Ahmadinejad to an incorrect assessment of Iran's strength relative to any American threat.

In fact, Iran has serious domestic frailties, including a shaky economy and its attendant unemployment and popular resentment, not to mention soaring levels of drug abuse and a brain drain. But President Ahmadinejad no doubt takes comfort not only in his belief in divine protection but also in the knowledge that Shiite religious parties aligned with Iran are now the dominant political forces in Iraq, while the American public hardly seems amenable to waging another war in the region. Moreover, Mr. Ahmadinejad very likely believes that the best way to guard against regime change from without is to emulate North Korea by swiftly advancing Iran's nuclear capacity.

The new president also surely knows that even if Iran's nuclear dossier is referred to the United Nations Security Council, meaningful multilateral sanctions against the Islamic Republic will most likely be vetoed by Russia or China. Flush with petrodollars, Iran has become a major purchaser of Russian technology, including roughly $1 billion worth of allegedly defensive weapons that Moscow recently agreed to sell to Tehran. Meanwhile, China, seizing on Iran as a key producer of oil and gas not beholden to the United States, has quickly emerged as one of Iran's largest trading partners.

Given this favorable strategic picture, Mr. Ahmadinejad might even welcome an American or Israeli strike on Iran's nuclear facilities. Tehran could then retaliate against American and Israeli interests by mobilizing its Shiite allies in Iraq, the Persian Gulf countries and Lebanon - or even by making common cause with some Sunni rivals. All the while, Mr. Ahmadinejad's faction in government would make full use of the war footing to marginalize its rivals at home and crush the remnants of Iran's civil society.

But the Iranian regime is not invulnerable, and Washington knows this. Just as Iran can use the Shiite card to create mischief in the region, the United States could manipulate ethnic and sectarian tensions in Iran, which has significant, largely Sunni, minority populations along its borders.

Many of Iran's ethnic and religious minorities see themselves as victims of discrimination, and they have not been effectively integrated into Iranian economic, political or cultural life. Some two million disgruntled Arabs reside mainly in the oil- and gas- rich province of Khuzestan. The United States could make serious trouble for Tehran by providing financial, logistical and moral support to Arab secessionists in that province. Other aggrieved Iranian minorities would be emboldened by the Arabs' example - for example, the Kurds and the Baluchis, or even the Azeris (though the Azeris, being Shiites, are better integrated into Iranian society). A simple spark could suffice to set off centrifugal explosions.

Furthermore, the plummeting Iranian economy will only worsen if the United States succeeds in referring Iran's nuclear file to the Security Council, whether or not meaningful sanctions follow. Such a referral would accelerate capital flight, deal a blow to the country's already collapsing stock market, devastate its hitherto booming real estate market, and wipe out the savings of a large part of the middle class. It would also most likely result in galloping inflation, hurting Iran's dispossessed, whom the Ahmadinejad administration claims to represent.

In light of these ominous possibilities, both Mr. Ahmadinejad and Mr. Bush would do well to avoid overplaying their hands. They should take a leaf from the book not of Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini the ideologue, but of Ayatollah Khomeini the pragmatic politician. Like Mr. Ahmadinejad, Ayatollah Khomeini argued that the "Zionist entity" should be wiped off the map. But he chose regime preservation over ideology when he ended the Iran-Iraq war and even bought weapons from Israel.

IRAN should endeavor to regain the trust of the international community by engaging in compromise, and the United States should allow this compromise to be sufficiently face-saving for Iran's ruling elite. To regain the confidence of the international community, Iran should accept the Russian offer to process Iranian uranium gas into fuel and voluntarily stop, for a specified time, insisting on its right to do so at home.

In return, the United States should lift its unilateral sanctions from Iran. These sanctions, which include a ban on the sale of aircraft and spare parts to Iran, have absolutely no effect on the regime's nuclear capacity, but they harm Iranian civilians.

Today the incentive for both sides to step away from the brink of conflict is even greater than it was at the end of the Iran-Iraq war. If the United States responds to a perceived Iranian threat by exploiting Iran's ethnic, sectarian and economic cleavages, it is not just the Islamic Republic that will be threatened - Iran itself could be dismembered as well.

Rice Threatens Syria With U.N. Action (AP)

By Anne Gearan

DOJ_NMG_0009565

The Associated Press, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice issued a new threat Wednesday to haul a defiant Syria before the U.N. Security Council if Damascus does not cooperate with an investigation into a political assassination in Lebanon.

"The United States has grave and continuing concerns about Syria's destabilizing behavior and sponsorship of terrorism," Rice said in a statement.

Syria has failed to heed U.N. Security Council warnings about its behavior in Lebanon and elsewhere, Rice said.

"We call upon the Syrian regime to respond positively to the requests" of the U.N. investigator looking into the killing of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri, Rice said. "We intend to refer this matter back to the Security Council if Syrian obstruction continues."

The United States opposes "any deals or compromises" with Damascus that would undermine the investigation, she said.

The U.N. probe into Hariri's killing has already implicated Syria, but Damascus has denied the allegations.

Hariri, a Lebanese nationalist who sought to assist his country in wiggling free from Syrian control, was assassinated in a truck bombing Feb. 14 in Beirut. The blast killed 20 other people and set off street demonstrations that forced withdrawal of Syrian forces from Lebanon after nearly three decades.

The United States has not accused Syria outright of ordering Hariri's killing, although it has come close. Washington pulled its ambassador from Damascus shortly after the killing and has since steadily increased pressure on the government of Bashar Assad.

The United States also wants international investigation of other political killings in Lebanon that followed Hariri's death.

"Syria must once and for all end its interference in the internal affairs of Lebanon," Rice said. "Continuing assassinations in Lebanon of opponents of Syrian domination ... create an atmosphere of fear that Syria uses to intimidate Lebanon."

U.S. Tells Syria To Cooperate, Threatens UN Action (NYT/REU)

By Reuters

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

Condoleezza Rice threatened on Wednesday to send the inquiry into the murder of Lebanon's former prime minister back to the U.N. Security Council if Syrian ``obstruction'' continued.

In a strongly worded statement, Rice also voiced grave concerns about what she said was Syria's ``destabilizing behavior and sponsorship of terrorism'' and said Damascus must stop interfering in the affairs of neighboring Lebanon.

``Syria must cease obstructing the investigation into the assassination of former Lebanese Prime Minister Hariri and instead cooperate fully and unconditionally as required by U.N. Security Council resolutions,'' said Rice in a statement.

U.N. investigators have been trying to interview Syrian President Bashar al-Assad as part of an inquiry into the February 14 Beirut murder of former Prime Minister Rafik al-Hariri, an opponent of Syrian domination of his country.

The United Nations announced on Wednesday that Serge Brammertz, a Belgian prosecutor with the International Criminal Court, will be the new head of its investigation.

Rice urged Damascus to respond positively to the request by U.N. investigators to interview key officials.

``We intend to refer this matter back to the Security Council if Syrian obstruction continues,'' she said.

U.N. investigators have made clear in their reports to the Security Council that senior Syrian intelligence officials and their Lebanese allies were probably behind the killing of Hariri and 22 others. Syria has denied that Assad's government was involved in the assassination.

Rice said Washington rejected any deals or compromises that would undermine the U.N. investigation.

``We are firmly committed to seeking justice and pursuing the investigation to its ultimate conclusion,'' Rice said.

She also called for the full implementation of U.N. resolutions calling for the disarmament and disbanding of Hizbollah and other militias.

``Syria must once and for all end its interference in the internal affairs of Lebanon,'' she said.

Continued assassinations in Lebanon of opponents of Syrian domination, including the murder of journalist Gebran Tueni last month, created an atmosphere of fear that Syria used to intimidate Lebanon, she said.

``Syria must cease this intimidation and immediately come into compliance with all relevant Security Council resolutions,'' said Rice.

Rice Threatens Syria With U.N. Action (NSDY/AP)

By Anne Gearan, Ap Diplomatic Writer

Long Island Newsday, January 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0009566

WASHINGTON -- Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice issued a new threat Wednesday to haul a defiant Syria before the U.N. Security Council if Damascus does not cooperate with an investigation into a political assassination in Lebanon.

"The United States has grave and continuing concerns about Syria's destabilizing behavior and sponsorship of terrorism," Rice said in a statement.

Syria has failed to heed U.N. Security Council warnings about its behavior in Lebanon and elsewhere, Rice said.

"We call upon the Syrian regime to respond positively to the requests" of the U.N. investigator looking into the killing of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri, Rice said. "We intend to refer this matter back to the Security Council if Syrian obstruction continues."

The United States opposes "any deals or compromises" with Damascus that would undermine the investigation, she said.

The U.N. probe into Hariri's killing has already implicated Syria, but Damascus has denied the allegations.

Hariri, a Lebanese nationalist who sought to assist his country in wiggling free from Syrian control, was assassinated in a truck bombing Feb. 14 in Beirut. The blast killed 20 other people and set off street demonstrations that forced withdrawal of Syrian forces from Lebanon after nearly three decades.

The United States has not accused Syria outright of ordering Hariri's killing, although it has come close. Washington pulled its ambassador from Damascus shortly after the killing and has since steadily increased pressure on the government of Bashar Assad.

The United States also wants international investigation of other political killings in Lebanon that followed Hariri's death.

"Syria must once and for all end its interference in the internal affairs of Lebanon," Rice said. "Continuing assassinations in Lebanon of opponents of Syrian domination ... create an atmosphere of fear that Syria uses to intimidate Lebanon."

U.S. Threatens To Take Syria To UN For Obstructing Hariri Probe (BLOOM)

By Janine Zacharia

Bloomberg, January 12, 2006

Jan. 11 (Bloomberg) -- The U.S. threatened to take Syria back to the United Nations Security Council if the nation's government continues to hinder a UN investigation into the murder of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri.

``Syria must cease obstructing the investigation into the assassination of former Lebanese Prime Minister Hariri and instead cooperate fully and unconditionally as required by UN Security Council resolutions," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said in a statement today in Washington.

Rice said Syria must ``respond positively" to investigators' requests or the U.S. will ``refer this matter back to the Security Council." Syrian President Bashar al-Assad and Foreign Minister Faruq al-Shara have rejected investigators' requests for interviews, Agence France-Presse reported Jan. 2.

Rice's statement came as Belgian prosecutor Serge Brammertz agreed to take over the UN-authorized probe of the Feb. 14 2005 truck bombing in Beirut that killed Hariri and 22 others. Syria has denied involvement in the attack.

Brammertz, 42, has served since September 2003 as a deputy prosecutor and head of the investigations division of the International Criminal Court at The Hague. Chosen by Secretary- General Kofi Annan, Brammertz succeeds German prosecutor Detlev Mehlis, who resigned after six months to return to his post in Berlin.

Mehlis said Lebanese and Syrian intelligence officials, including Assad's brother and brother-in-law, were implicated in the truck bombing.

Oct. 31 Resolution

Asked about the timing of Rice's statement, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said ``there's been a lot of discussion concerning Syria's failure to comply" with the Security Council Resolution passed 15-0 on Oct. 31 that says Syria must fully cooperate with the inquiry or face economic sanctions.

The Council voted Dec. 15 to extend the Hariri investigation for six months.

Public outrage at the murders forced Syria to comply with international demands to pull its troops from neighboring Lebanon in April.

The withdrawal ended a 29-year presence and led to an election victory in June that gave the anti-Syrian political bloc a majority in Lebanon's parliament.

The U.S. says Syria continues still to influence affairs in Lebanon. She said in her statement that the U.S. ``has grave and continuing concerns about Syria's destabilizing behavior and sponsorship of terrorism."

There was no answer at the Syrian embassy in Washington.

U.S. Ratchets Up Pressure On Syria In Hariri Probe (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr.

DOJ_NMG_0009567

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Bush administration stepped up pressure on Syria to cooperate with a United Nations inquiry into the killing of a prominent Lebanese politician, threatening to bring Damascus before the world body for international censure.

In an unusually blunt statement, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said the U.S. "has grave and continuing concerns about Syria's destabilizing behavior and sponsorship of terrorism." Washington, she said, would bring Syria back before the U.N. Security Council if Damascus continues to "obstruct" the probe into the killing of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri.

U.S. officials declined to specify what particular action the U.S. might pursue, but suggested the threat of some form of economic sanctions would be the logical next step. The U.S. also is vowing to seek economic sanctions within the U.N. against Iran because of its nuclear program.

Administration officials said Ms. Rice's statement was timed to underscore U.S. seriousness on the Syria front, but also to play off recent developments that pointed more strongly toward Syrian involvement in the Hariri killing as well as rifts within Syrian President Bashar Assad's government.

The U.S. ultimatum comes as former Syrian Vice President Abdul-Halim Khaddam, now in exile in Paris, has openly accused Mr. Assad of ordering the assassination of Mr. Hariri, a powerful critic of Syria's deep involvement in Lebanese affairs. Mr. Khaddam said in a French radio interview Tuesday that it is his "ultimate conviction" that Mr. Assad personally directed the February truck bombing of Mr. Hariri's motorcade in Beirut.

The U.S. has supported a push by U.N. investigators to interview Mr. Assad. Mr. Khaddam, a veteran Ba'ath Party official who was forced out of office in June, met with the U.N. team last week in Paris.

Ms. Rice, in her statement, suggested that the U.S. suspects Syrian involvement in two other prominent assassinations in Lebanon late last year, one of a prominent journalist and the other of a member of the Lebanese Parliament. Sean McCormack, a State Department spokesman, said the U.S. couldn't "connect the dots" between Damascus and the most recent killings, but "there is certainly very clearly an attempt on the part of some to create this atmosphere of fear and violence in Lebanon."

The U.S., Britain and France tried last year to persuade the other two permanent Security Council members, Russia and China, to include the threat of at least targeted sanctions in a resolution demanding Syrian cooperation in the Hariri killing. Syria withdrew thousands of troops it had stationed in Lebanon for decades amid international pressure following the incident.

Likud Cabinet Ministers To Resign (WT)

The Washington Times, January 12, 2006

JERUSALEM -- Cabinet ministers from the Likud Party were to resign from the coalition government today, signaling an end to a weeklong political cease-fire following the massive stroke that felled Prime Minister Ariel Sharon.

The return to politics-as-usual began yesterday, with parties trading bitter slurs over whether to allow Palestinians to vote in their own elections in East Jerusalem this month and a suggestion that Mr. Sharon's name may remain atop his party's list of candidates for parliamentary elections in March.

Mr. Sharon's doctors reported "further slight improvement" in the ailing leader but cautioned that he could remain in the hospital for months.

Senior Hadassah hospital official Dr. Yair Birenbaum said it was "a little too soon" to say he is out of danger, while another doctor said he "can die tonight [or] go back to normal, relatively normal, life in six months."

Nevertheless, a new poll showed Mr. Sharon's recently formed Kadima party is a strong favorite to form the next government, even with his likely successor, Ehud Olmert, at the helm.

Channel Two said Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu had told his party members to go ahead with the Cabinet resignations, which had been planned for earlier in the week but were postponed after Mr. Sharon's stroke.

The step will have little practical impact on the government, which will serve only as a caretaker until the March elections. Likud hopes to sharpen the distinctions between itself and Kadima as it goes into the campaign.

Labor had already withdrawn its ministers from the Cabinet, meaning the government will be reduced to just six ministers after today.

Tempers flared earlier yesterday in response to suggestions from some of Mr. Sharon's allies that his name could remain at the top of Kadima's list of candidates.

Politicians from both Likud and Labor accused the centrist party of cynically exploiting the prime minister's name, acutely sensitive that Mr. Sharon's plight is liable to attract a large sympathy vote for his party.

Polls in the Ha'aretz and Ma'ariv dailies found that Kadima led by Mr. Olmert would take 44 to 45 seats in the 120-seat parliament, up from previous polls. The Labor Party under Amir Peretz would get 16 to 18 seats while Likud would get 13 to 15, the surveys found.

DOJ_NMG_0009568

"As someone who knows and values Sharon, it pains me that there are various elements around him who are trying to make a political fortune on the back of his illness," said Likud legislator Moshe Kahlon.

Mr. Peretz, who had previously instructed Labor activists to avoid strong campaign rhetoric, promptly reversed his decision.

"The election is starting right now. This is the first phase of the election," he told reporters at the party's election headquarters just outside Tel Aviv, now open for business.

Likud members, meanwhile, reacted angrily to an announcement by Defense Minister Shaul Mofaz that the government has agreed in principle to let Arab residents of East Jerusalem participate in this month's Palestinian parliamentary elections.

Mr. Sharon, before his stroke, had threatened to block voting in the city as long as the militant Palestinian movement Hamas was running candidates.

The United States has pressed Israel not to interfere in the balloting but Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice yesterday raised her strongest objections yet to the participation of Hamas, which is mounting a strong challenge to President Mahmoud Abbas' disorganized Fatah party.

"It remains the view of the United States that there should be no place in the political process for groups or individuals who refuse to renounce terror and violence, recognize Israel's right to exist, and disarm," she said in Washington.

Hamas has carried out nearly 60 suicide bombings against Israelis over the past five years and is considered a terrorist group by the United States. But it remains popular with Palestinians, largely because of its charity work and the provision of basic services that Fatah has failed to provide.

Sharon Physicians Fear Brain Damage (WT)

By Joyce Howard Price

The Washington Times, January 12, 2006

The movement that Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon experienced on both sides of his body after a massive stroke last week bodes well in terms of his survival, but he could live with brain damage, said physicians who treat stroke victims.

"The prime minister's life is still in danger," Dr. Jose Cohen, one of Mr. Sharon's neurosurgeons at Hadassah University Medical Center in Jerusalem, told the Associated Press. "Every day, although we are getting further out of danger, we are still in danger."

Doctors are weaning Mr. Sharon, 77, from sedatives that have kept him in an induced coma to reduce his blood pressure.

Dr. Cohen said the cerebral hemorrhage Mr. Sharon experienced Jan. 4 certainly would have caused cognitive damage.

"There is nothing you can do about that," he said.

Brain damage is experienced in "virtually 100 percent" of patients who suffer the kind of hemorrhagic stroke that felled Mr. Sharon, said Dr. Richard Zorowitz, a specialist in stroke recovery at the University of Pennsylvania Hospital in Philadelphia.

After Mr. Sharon is weaned from the sedatives, his doctors in Jerusalem can assess brain damage and function.

"I personally would not expect him to make a full recovery. ... He'll have to learn to walk and take care of himself all over again. ... It's highly unlikely he could resume his official duties," Dr. Zorowitz said.

Survival beyond a month typically is less than 50 percent for victims of the type of massive brain hemorrhage that Mr. Sharon suffered.

"It is looking better in terms of his survival, but there are still uncertainties in terms of his quality of life and level of function," said Dr. Zorowitz, also chairman of the National Stroke Association's recovery and rehabilitation advisory committee.

On Monday, the prime minister moved his right hand and leg slightly in response to pain stimulation. On Tuesday, movement on his right side increased, and he moved his left hand. Movement on his left side further improved yesterday.

"Injuries to the right side of the brain can cause significant deficits," although not usually as catastrophic as those to the left side, said Dr. Chelsea Kidwell, medical director of the Stroke Center at the Washington Hospital Center.

Dr. Kidwell and Dr. Zorowitz said these brain injuries could result in weakness or numbness on the body's left side, loss of vision in the left eye and paralysis.

Dr. Kidwell said it will have to be determined whether Mr. Sharon will need a feeding tube because some stroke patients have difficulty swallowing.

Dr. Zorowitz cautioned that the prime minister could be left with "problems of memory, judgment and attention."

He said this could mean Mr. Sharon is no longer articulate and could have cognitive deficits in the "subject matter and content" of his speech.

Israelis' Anger At Evangelist May Delay Christian Center (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0009569

JERUSALEM, Jan. 11 - Israel said Wednesday that it was breaking off negotiations on a tourism project with the evangelical leader Pat Robertson in response to his remarks suggesting that Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's stroke was divine retribution.

"We cannot accept these statements, and we will not sign any contracts with Mr. Robertson," said Ido Hartuv, a spokesman for the Tourism Ministry.

Israel has been in advanced negotiations with American evangelicals over a proposal for a large pilgrimage and tourism center in the hills near the Sea of Galilee, where Jesus lived and preached. Mr. Robertson has been the leading figure in the negotiations. Mr. Hartuv said Israel would be willing to continue the talks without him.

A spokeswoman for Mr. Robertson, Angell Watts, said in a statement from Virginia Beach: "We have not talked to the Israelis on this topic. We continue to maintain our longstanding commitment to the Jewish people and the State of Israel."

Under the proposal, Israel planned to provide at least 35 acres for the project, the Christian Heritage Center, and the evangelicals intended to raise $50 million for construction. Reports have said it would include a theme park, an auditorium and an outdoor theater.

Israel hopes the project would draw large numbers of Christian tourists from around the world and generate thousands of jobs in a thinly populated region that the government has long struggled to develop.

But Mr. Robertson upset many Israelis by suggesting Mr. Sharon's devastating stroke last Wednesday was divine punishment for pulling Israel out of Gaza last summer.

"God considers this land to be his," Mr. Robertson said Thursday on his television program, "The 700 Club." "For any prime minister of Israel who decides he will carve it up and give it away, God said, 'No, this is mine.' "

"I would say woe unto any prime minister of Israel who takes a similar course," Mr. Robertson added.

He went on to say Mr. Sharon was a "very likable person and I am sad to see him in this condition."

Evangelicals are strong supporters of Israel, and have formed alliances with various groups, particularly those opposed to any territorial concessions to the Palestinians. Israel has generally welcomed the political and financial support.

"Evangelicals are the best friends of Israel and they are very, very welcome here," Mr. Hartuv said.

Mr. Sharon's condition improved slightly on Wednesday, his doctors said. "We are pleased that there are small phases of development in the prime minister's condition," Dr. Yair Birenboim, a senior official at Hadassah-Ein Kerem Hospital in Jerusalem, said on Army Radio.

The doctors had said Tuesday that Mr. Sharon, 77, was out of immediate danger, but one of his neurosurgeons offered a more restrained prognosis on Wednesday.

"Until we have passed a few more stages, we are still very cautious," Dr. José Cohen told Israeli television. "We know that every day, although we are getting further out of danger, we are still in danger."

Doctors have been reducing the level of anesthetic since Monday, with the intention of gradually bringing Mr. Sharon out of his medically induced coma. The hospital statement said he remained lightly sedated on Wednesday.

The campaign for March 28 national elections have been on hold since Mr. Sharon's stroke but the politicking has begun to pick up again.

In a poll on Wednesday in the newspaper Haaretz, Mr. Sharon's recently established Kadima Party had gained support in the past week despite the almost universal assumption that Mr. Sharon will not return to political life.

Several polls before and just after Mr. Sharon's stroke indicated that Kadima would win about 40 of the 120 seats in Parliament. But Wednesday's survey found that the centrist Kadima would take 44 seats. Its closest rival, the left-leaning Labor Party, would get 16 seats, and the rightist Likud would take 13. The poll questioned 640 voters, but did not provide a margin of error.

In the West Bank, Israeli security forces scuffled in the rain and mud with 300 Jewish settlers who tried to prevent the dismantling of an unauthorized settlement outpost south of Jerusalem.

The security forces eventually used tear gas to force out protesters who had barricaded themselves inside a new home near the formal settlement of Neve Daniel. Six protesters were arrested, the police said.

Israel has pledged to remove the West Bank outposts and has taken down some, but dozens remain, according to monitoring groups.

Is The Road Map's Moment Gone? (WP)

By Jim Hoagland

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0009570

The United States, its European and Arab allies, and the United Nations have labored for four months to turn Israel's unilateral withdrawal from the Gaza Strip into a catalyst for the creation of an independent, viable Palestinian state. They are visibly failing.

Law and order have disappeared in the Gaza territory since the Israeli withdrawal. Kidnappings and gunfights, not campaign rallies, are the tools of electioneering there. Financial mismanagement by Mahmoud Abbas's Palestinian Authority has forced the World Bank to freeze $60 million in budget support and effectively move the PA toward bankruptcy in a matter of weeks.

The spiral toward chaos in Gaza and Ariel Sharon's sudden incapacitation by a severe stroke are destabilizing blows to President Bush's proclaimed strategy for transforming the Middle East into a zone of democracies. Bush must reassess whether he can get there from here.

With Sharon in power, the odds on the "road map" diplomatic process delivering the democratic Palestinian state that Bush and Sharon conditionally endorse were slim. Without Sharon in power, the odds drop to virtually zero.

The Gaza withdrawal was the product not of understandings between Sharon and Abbas but of an ambivalent if productive relationship between Sharon and Bush. Ending the occupation of Gaza was above all an Israeli-American arrangement, tied to the expectation that the Israeli prime minister's time in office would begin and end roughly with the American president's tenure.

The eight-year political balance sheet of give-and-take that the two leaders set up underpinned Sharon's formal acceptance of the U.N.-blessed process for creating a Palestinian state. The road map toward peace was a risk that the audacious Sharon was willing to take to secure Bush's backing, not an objective he sought or ever planned.

Just as Europeans abandoned colonialism to improve their own lives and not the lives of the Africans, Arabs and Asians they set free, Sharon ended Israel's occupation of Gaza solely for Israeli security reasons. He would wall in the Gazans with security fences and other measures and remain seemingly indifferent to what became of them.

But Sharon's daring gave Bush, the international community and, most of all, the Palestinians an opening that seemed to promise complete autonomy in Gaza and significant unilateral withdrawals from the West Bank if Sharon won reelection in March.

Sharon's incapacitation and the Gaza upheavals now call that opening into question. No other Israeli politician has the domestic support, the audacity and the force of personality to bulldoze forward historic change in the West Bank by the end of Bush's term. Moreover, the turmoil in Gaza is closing the window of international support for such change.

The road map, like most formulas for peacemaking, is based on the commendable premise that everyone deserves a second or even third chance. Right now the Palestinians are severely testing that article of faith -- at a moment when they have everything to gain from taking responsibility for their affairs and demonstrating political maturity.

Forcing Egyptian police officers and European Union observers to flee their posts for safety hardly suggests maturity. Neither does the decision by the Palestinian Authority to raise salaries and break its commitment to live within the large aid flows that international donors provide. That act triggered the freeze on budget support by the World Bank.

After Yasser Arafat died, "we hoped for new momentum in the direction of governmental reforms and the fight against corruption," World Bank representative Nigel Roberts told the Israeli daily Haaretz this week. But "Arafatism" lives on without Arafat and has grown worse, Roberts added.

Instead of moving to transform themselves into the nucleus of one of the Arab world's first true democracies -- as Bush, Sharon and their road-map partners pretended the Palestinians quickly could -- the Palestinian territories continue to be angry, explosive ghettos. In Gaza, gunmen who recently were receiving financial rewards for attacking Israelis are now "unemployed" and threaten their neighbors and the Palestinian Authority.

It must be said that four months is a short time to fix the consequences of centuries of occupation of the Palestinians by Turks, Arabs and Israelis, as well as the damage caused by the scandalous insistence of Arab states and the United Nations that the Palestinians remain enclosed in permanent refugee camps, even on their own lands.

Yes, that must be said. But so must this: The striking down of Ariel Sharon at a crucial moment of transformation demonstrates that in the Middle East today, a short time is the only time you've got.

U.S. Wants To Resume N.Korea Nuke Talks (AP)

By Kwang-tae Kim

The Associated Press, January 12, 2006

SEOUL, South Korea — The United States wants to quickly resume nuclear talks with North Korea, the U.S. envoy to Seoul said Thursday, as the top American negotiator headed to China for discussions on the North's nuclear ambitions.

DOJ_NMG_0009571

"The United States is eager to resume negotiations as soon as possible so that we can make rapid progress toward the elimination of North Korea's nuclear programs," U.S. ambassador Alexander Vershbow said in a speech in Seoul. "Our negotiators are packed and ready to go."

Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, who arrived in South Korea late Wednesday from Tokyo, said he would seek information in Beijing on the latest North Korean thinking from its closest ally.

Hill's Asia trip comes as six-nation nuclear talks aimed at getting North Korea to abandon its nuclear programs are stalled over Pyongyang's anger at U.S.-imposed sanctions related to alleged counterfeiting and other wrongdoing by the North.

"We'll have to see what the Chinese have heard most recently from the DPRK side, and perhaps they have some very fresh news," Hill said upon arrival in Seoul, referring to the North by the abbreviation of its official name, the Democratic People's Republic of Korea.

His schedule of talks with counterparts in Tokyo, Seoul and Beijing is taking place amid unconfirmed reports that reclusive North Korean leader Kim Jong Il is in China.

The North Korean strongman is widely believed to have gone by train Tuesday to China, his country's closest ally. But the trip has yet to be officially announced by North Korean or Chinese authorities, and his ultimate destination is unknown.

"I must say the trip that Chairman Kim Jong Il took to China was a surprise to all of us," Hill said upon arrival in Seoul. "It's a complete coincidence that I'm in the area at the same time. There is no such plan of any kind" to meet Kim.

In South Korea, Hill talked with his South Korean counterpart Song Min-soon about "ways to resume the nuclear talks and to produce substantial progress," Song told The Associated Press after the closed-door meeting.

China, Japan, Russia, South Korea and the United States have been engaged in negotiations with North Korea since 2003 aimed at persuading it to abandon its nuclear programs. The process resulted in a breakthrough in September when the North pledged to give up its nuclear program in exchange for aid and security assurances. But follow-up negotiations have stalled.

Vershbow said a Treasury Department delegation planned to visit South Korea in about 10 days for consultations with South Korean officials over the alleged North Korean financial activities that led to the sanctions.

In September, Washington slapped the sanctions on a bank in the Chinese territory of Macau, alleging it helped the North distribute counterfeit currency and engage in other illicit activities. The next month, Washington sanctioned eight North Korean companies it claimed were fronts for proliferating weapons of mass destruction.

North Korea denies the allegations.

Vershbow said the Treasury delegation would travel to Macau after visiting South Korea.

North Korea And Iran Win Special Notice At Spy Center (NYT)

By Douglas Jehl

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 11 - The director of national intelligence, John D. Negroponte, has created new "mission managers" for Iran and North Korea, adding those two countries to a short list of top-priority challenges for American intelligence agencies.

Iran and North Korea join counterterrorism and nuclear counterproliferation as areas of focus for senior management posts that were recommended last year by a high-level presidential commission.

The new managers for Iran and North Korea will be responsible, among other things, for identifying and filling gaps in intelligence on those two countries, Mr. Negroponte's office said Wednesday in announcing the appointments. Joseph DeTrani, who has served most recently as the American special envoy to the six-party talks on North Korea, has been given the rank of ambassador and is taking on the North Korea portfolio; S. Leslie Ireland, a career intelligence officer and Middle East specialist, is to become mission manager for Iran.

Ambassador DeTrani and Ms. Ireland are to provide strategic leadership over American intelligence agencies' work on North Korea and Iran, whose nuclear-weapons programs remain a major concern of the Bush administration, in part because so little is known about them. In its report last year, the Robb-Silberman commission, an independent panel appointed by President Bush, described American intelligence on Iran and North Korea as woefully inadequate.

The other two mission managers appointed by Mr. Negroponte have already assumed their roles. They are Vice Adm. John Scott Redd, retired, director of the National Counterterrorism Center; and Kenneth Brill, the director of National Counterproliferation Center.

Admiral Redd served as executive director of the Robb-Silberman commission, which recommended the creation of the mission-manager posts. Mr. Negroponte has said that the mission managers have his full proxy, and should be expected to play the same role that he would if he could devote his full day to a single issue.

DOJ_NMG_0009572

Ambassador DeTrani, who speaks Chinese and French, spent a number of years in East Asia and the Middle East during a career that included senior assignments at the Central Intelligence Agency, according to his official biography. At the C.I.A., his posts included director of European operations, director of the crime and narcotics center, and director of East Asia operations.

Ms. Ireland has served most recently as the executive assistant to Porter J. Goss, the C.I.A. director. According to her official biography, she is also a recipient of the Intelligence Commendation Medal. Over a 20-year career, she has also served as deputy chief for Arab-Israeli issues and special adviser for Iran collection issues, and as country director for Iran and Kuwait in the office of the Secretary of Defense.

North Korean Leader's Whereabouts Unknown (AP)

By Elaine Kurtenbach, Associated Press Writer

The Associated Press, January 12, 2006

The whereabouts of North Korean leader Kim Jong Il remained unclear Thursday, with a Hong Kong-based television network speculating he may be headed for the south Chinese city of Guangzhou, while other reports put him in Beijing or Russia.

Phoenix Television reported that three major hotels in Guangzhou known to be used for VIP visitors were largely empty and requiring guests to check out by tomorrow.

A sales department employee at Guangzhou's famed White Swan hotel confirmed that they were expecting a "a very important visitor" beginning on Friday. She would not give her name, since she was not authorized to speak publicly.

"From January 12th-15th, we won't accept any new bookings. Some guests may have to move," said the hotel's assistant general manager, Janet Xie, without giving a reason.

A staffer at the hotel's publicity department, meanwhile, denied that Kim was expected to visit.

Local officials said they were in the dark.

"I've never heard of this," said Shi Lishi, a spokesman for the Guangzhou city government.

The White Swan, a large, elegant hotel on a quiet island in the Pearl River, would offer relatively good security and secrecy given its location.

Reports of a visit by Kim to China, a rare foray overseas for the reclusive leader, came amid efforts to restart stalled six-nation talks on dismantling North Korea's nuclear program.

The chief U.S. envoy to the nuclear talks, Christopher Hill, was visiting South Korea on Thursday, en route from Tokyo to Beijing. The U.S. ambassador to Seoul, meanwhile, said Washington was hoping to quickly resume the talks.

U.S. and Chinese officials said they could not confirm various reports, mostly by South Korean media, saying that Kim entered China by special train earlier in the week and traveled either to Beijing, Shanghai or Russia.

In Washington, U.S. State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said he had seen the news reports, "But I can't confirm or deny them."

Hill was not expected to meet with Kim, McCormack said.

On Wednesday, officials in Shanghai also disavowed any information about Kim's whereabouts.

"I have not received any information whatsoever about this," Jiao Yang, the city government spokeswoman, said at a regularly scheduled news conference.

In the past, visits by Kim to China have been reported only after his departure. The Chinese Foreign Ministry said Tuesday that Kim planned to visit China, but would not give the exact timing.

Kim last visited China in April 2004. According to the North's Korean Central News Agency, one of his last appearances was to attend a New Year's performance of "Blue Sky Over My Country" in Pyongyang on Jan. 6.

Despite China's modern communications networks and crowded cities, the country has an elaborate and pervasive state security network well practiced at preserving the secrecy of its Communist Party leaders.

Disclosure of the wide range of information deemed to be state secrets can result in long prison terms.

Kim Jong Il Said To Reach Shanghai By Plane (WP)

By Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

SEOUL, Jan. 11 -- North Korean leader Kim Jong Il toured Shanghai on Wednesday after reportedly arriving on a direct flight from the North Korean capital in what would mark the reclusive ruler's first overseas trip by plane, according to South Korea's semi-official Yonhap news service.

Quoting unnamed diplomatic sources, Yonhap said Kim was on a three-day trip to China's business hub, which he last visited in 2001 to see the city's vast economic expansion. Kim reportedly fears flying, and news agencies in Japan and South Korea said earlier that he had arrived in China aboard his private train and was perhaps en route to Russia.

DOJ_NMG_0009573

But Yonhap said Kim had landed in Shanghai after a direct flight from Pyongyang and was likely to stop in Beijing for meetings with President Hu Jintao and other Chinese leaders before returning to North Korea.

South Korean officials could not immediately confirm Yonhap's report and North Korea's official media did not comment on the visit.

If the report is true, analysts said that Kim's visit could represent an effort to win China's support for lifting U.S. economic sanctions imposed late last year against North Korean companies believed to have ties to illicit activities, including currency counterfeiting. North Korea has said it would not return to six-nation talks aimed at dismantling its nuclear weapons program until those sanctions were lifted.

-- Anthony Faiola

US Hopes N.Korea's Kim In China For Nuclear Talk (REU)

By Jon Herskovitz

Reuters, January 12, 2006

The United States has little information about Kim Jong-il's apparent trip to China but hopes the North Korean leader is having talks that add life to stalled nuclear discussions, a senior U.S. official said on Thursday.

Various media reports -- citing witnesses, diplomatic sources and those familiar with his movements -- have said Kim is making a rare overseas trip to China. But his whereabouts, mode of travel and the purpose of his trip are all unclear.

Some reports have said Kim took his train to China and was possibly on his way to Russia. South Korea's Yonhap news agency said he flew to Shanghai on what could be his first flight.

Media reports and diplomats say Kim -- like his late father, state founder Kim Il-sung -- has an aversion to flying.

The U.S. ambassador to South Korea, Alexander Vershbow, told a breakfast meeting of business leaders the United States was also trying to sort through the clues about Kim's possible visit to China, Pyongyang's main ally and source of aid.

"We hope that he is there and having high-level meetings," Vershbow said. "We hope they will produce a new impulse for progress in the six-party talks."

North Korea has threatened to boycott the nuclear talks among the two Koreas, China, Japan, Russia and the United States because of a U.S. crackdown on its finances. Pyongyang wants Washington to end the sanctions.

The United States has clamped down on several companies it suspects of aiding North Korea in counterfeiting, money laundering and the drugs trade, saying the illicit business has helped fund Pyongyang's nuclear weapons programmes.

A South Korean official would not speculate on whether Kim is out of the country but noted his overseas trips usually lead to better ties between the reclusive country and the outside world.

"If he is visiting China, this could have positive results," Vice Unification Minister Rhee Bong-jo told reporters.

"ILLICIT ACTIVITIES"

Vershbow said U.S. Treasury officials will head to South Korea, China and Macau in the next 10 days to discuss U.S. concerns about North Korea's suspected illicit activities.

"We do have some concerns not just about counterfeiting, but about a number of illicit activities carried out by North Korea," Vershbow said, reiterating that Washington sees the crackdown on North Korean finances as separate from the six-party talks.

He said the United States wanted to get the talks back on track as quickly as possible and had no preconditions for resuming the discussions. The last round was held in November.

The envoy said the United States was ready to honor its obligations under a deal struck in September among the six parties under which North Korea would scrap its nuclear weapons programmes in exchange for economic aid, security assurances and increased diplomatic recognition.

He added it would be important to address North Korea's suspected illegal activity, "if we are to achieve full normalisation of our relations with North Korea."

Vershbow raised the ire of North Korea -- and some concern among South Korean officials -- on December 7 by branding Pyongyang a "criminal regime," but he did not use such language in his comments on Thursday.

He also called on South Korea to help persuade North Korea to give up illegal activities and return to the bargaining table on its nuclear programmes.

(With additional reporting by Lee Jin-joo)

China Seen Unlikely To Press Nuke Issue (WT)

By Andrew Salmon

The Washington Times, January 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0009574

SEOUL -- Pyongyang's nuclear ambitions are likely to figure in any negotiations North Korean leader Kim Jong-il holds in China this week, but Asian analysts see little chance that Beijing will use its growing economic clout to bring its neighbor to heel.

Analysts say China has become virtually the sole provider of consumer goods to North Korea, as well as a conduit for most foreign aid, giving it substantial economic leverage over the North.

But as Mr. Kim travels through China on an unannounced trip with a mysterious itinerary, those same analysts see little chance that Beijing will threaten him with an economic cut-off if his country does not return to six-nation talks on its nuclear program.

"Nothing would convince [the Chinese] to use their leverage," said Choi Jin-wook of Seoul's Institute of National Unification. "China said it does not tolerate North Korea's nuclear programs, but it does not want North Korea to collapse."

South Korea also has been reluctant to bring economic pressure on Pyongyang, partly for fear of falling further behind China in a long-term competition for trade opportunities in its northern neighbor.

The result is a narrowing of policy options for the United States, which reportedly was rebuffed by China last April when Assistant Secretary of State Christopher R. Hill asked it to cut off fuel supplies to North Korea.

Mr. Hill arrived in South Korea yesterday, a day after Mr. Kim was reported to have arrived in China by train. He said the timing was coincidental, but expressed hope that the Chinese will have "some very fresh news" about the North Korean leader's nuclear plans.

There still has been no official announcement about Mr. Kim's trip, and Mr. Hill said it "was a surprise to all of us." China has previously announced Mr. Kim's visits only after his return to Pyongyang.

However, the North Korean has plenty to discuss with China besides the nuclear talks -- including economic and trade issues and new financial sanctions imposed by the United States in response to evidence his government is counterfeiting U.S. currency.

U.S. officials, ranging from Mr. Hill to Vice President Dick Cheney, have called in recent months for China to use its influence to press North Korea for greater cooperation in the nuclear talks.

But Peter Beck, regional director of the International Crisis Group, said that "China's top concern is stability" and that it was unlikely to do anything to undermine its neighbor's economy.

"They don't want border instability," agreed Moon Chung-in, a foreign-policy analyst at Seoul's Yonsei University and an adviser to South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun.

China already faces international criticism for forcibly sending North Korean refugees -- variously numbered at between 100,000 to 300,000 -- back to their homeland, where many face severe penalties. Heightened instability would almost certainly drive much larger numbers across the 600-mile frontier.

Chinese leaders also are reluctant to overrule the old guard in the Chinese Communist Party, which remembers the "blood alliance" forged between the two countries during the 1950-1953 Korean War.

China still maintains a 1961 treaty with North Korea which, on paper at least, places Beijing on Pyongyang's side in any military confrontation with Washington.

Nevertheless, Beijing's economic clout in North Korea is large and growing. Visitors to the North note that goods traded in markets are almost exclusively of Chinese origin.

"North Korea will, left to itself, become an economic province of China -- and can do very well," said a European businessman with close experience with the country, speaking on the condition of anonymity. "That is a route it can take, independent of aid."

He added that Chinese businessmen have experience in operating within a communist system that South Korean investors lack, as well as the advantages of lower labor costs.

Trade Surplus Tripled In '05, China Says (NYT)

By David Barboza

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

SHANGHAI, Jan. 11 - China said on Wednesday that its trade surplus with the rest of the world had tripled in 2005, to a record $102 billion, a figure that could reignite global trade frictions and step up pressure on the government to allow its currency to appreciate further.

The United States and European Union officials have been pressuring China during the last few years to allow its currency to appreciate. The hope is to restrain the flood of Chinese exports to the world and to rebalance China's economy to allow for more imports.

The report on Wednesday showed that imports into China had begun to rise and exports to the rest of the world had slowed in the latter part of 2005, easing concern among some economists.

DOJ_NMG_0009575

Still, China released a set of blockbuster trade figures that were another reflection of the nation's unparalleled rise as a global economic power.

The government said that exports in 2005 were a record $762 billion, up 28 percent, while imports climbed to $660 billion, up nearly 18 percent, from 2004. The $102 billion surplus was up from about $32 billion in 2004.

Total foreign trade in 2005 topped $1.4 trillion, making China No. 3 in the world in foreign trade after the United States and Germany and ahead of Japan.

Just a decade ago, the value of China's foreign trade was only $289 billion. But today, a giant portion of the world's toys, clothing, furniture and electronic goods carry the label "Made in China."

Indeed, the customs figures released on Wednesday showed that the bulk of China's trade surplus in 2005 came from exports to the world's wealthiest regions, particularly the United States and Europe. The surplus with the United States reached a record $114.7 billion, up from $80 billion a year earlier and $28 billion in 2001. Excluding the United States, China actually had a trade deficit with the rest of the world of about $12 billion in 2005, largely with South Korea, Japan, Malaysia, Saudi Arabia and even Angola.

And yet China's figures may not be telling the entire story. According to United States government data, China's trade surplus in 2005 could be nearly $200 billion. Just through October 2005, according to official government statistics in the United States, China already had a trade surplus with the United States of over $166 billion. The gap arises from differences in counting, like whether Hong Kong figures are integrated with those of China. The growing bilateral trade deficit could strain ties between the United States and China. In 2004, the United States had a record $617 billion trade deficit with the rest of the world, and it is on track to break that record.

In Beijing on Tuesday, Senator Max Baucus, Democrat of Montana, called on China to do its part to reduce its deficit with the United States, calling on the country to allow its currency to appreciate.

"U.S. politics will become unmanageable if China's trade deficit with the U.S. continues to grow," Senator Baucus said. He was on a trip through Asia to assess trade relations. He added: "It is in China's interest to make concrete progress in reducing the trade imbalance."

Europe fared only slightly better last year, according to the Chinese government. China reported a $70 billion trade surplus in 2005 with the European Union, with the Netherlands and Britain having notable imbalances.

The trade figures suggest a changing role for China in the global economy, indicating that it will influence things like prices at Wal-Mart and global interest rates.

When 2005 economic statistics are complete, China is likely to be home to the fourth- or fifth-largest economy in the world, surpassing France, Italy and possibly Britain.

The government last month readjusted its gross domestic product figure by $280 billion to account for previously unreported activity. That suggests that the Chinese economy probably grew as much as 10 percent annually in many of the last few years.

China may also soon have more foreign currency reserves than any other country in the world, giving it even more influence on global interest rates. As of November, China reported having about $794 billion in foreign currency reserves, just behind Japan, which had about $828 billion at the end of last year.

Last year, China revalued its currency, ending a decade-long peg to the American dollar, allowing it to appreciate by more than 2 percent. China also reached separate textile trade agreements with the United States and the European Union after Chinese textile and apparel exports flooded those markets with the end of global quotas in January.

American and European officials have argued that the weak value of the Chinese currency, the yuan, gave China an unfair advantage in world markets, making its goods extremely cheap.

As China has grown into an economic power, it has racked up trade surpluses of about $350 billion over the last decade, according to Chinese customs data. And yet, some economists say those figures may still misstate the country's real gains because a large portion of goods are funneled through Hong Kong.

Government figures from other parts of the world are at variance with Chinese government statistics.

For example, the Commerce Department said that in 2004, China had a $162 billion trade surplus with the United States. And last year, through October, the surplus was $166 billion, which suggests that China's trade surplus last year was double what the government reported in its own figures.

China's figures do, however, suggest that in the second half of the year, export growth eased some from gains of more than 30 percent earlier in the year, and imports picked up from the low double digits.

Jonathan Anderson, an economist at UBS, calls the record trade surplus "old news," because it has already begun to fall.

"This is not a harbinger of things to come," he says. "If you look at the numbers seasonably adjusted, things peaked at the middle of the year. Exports are now slowing down and imports are picking up."

DOJ_NMG_0009576

But even if trade begins to balance, some economists think that 2006 will not be much different from 2005. China could report another $100 billion surplus, though the growth rate may moderate slightly.

"If you do the math, you'll need imports to more than double the size of exports to begin to close these gaps," an economist for Goldman Sachs, Hong Liang, said. "China's trade surpluses will continue to rise."

China's Trade Surplus Tripled, Topping $100 Billion Last Year (WSJ)

By Murray Hiebert

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2006

BEIJING -- China's trade surplus more than tripled in 2005 from the previous year to break the $100 billion mark, a surge that's likely to intensify protectionist sentiment in the U.S. against one of its biggest trading partners.

The General Administration of Customs reported on its Web site yesterday that China's trade surplus hit $101.9 billion last year, with exports rising 28% from 2004 to $762 billion and imports up 18% to $660 billion. The trade surplus for 2004 was $32 billion.

Beijing's swelling trade surplus is likely to become an increasing irritant in its relations with the U.S., which is expected to report a trade deficit with China of more than $200 billion for 2005, up from $162 billion in 2004.

But some economists believe China's trade surplus could narrow this year because its imports have begun to pick up in recent months. Beijing is also seeking to reduce trade frictions by promoting domestic consumption.

"China is gradually becoming a more positive force for global growth as its policies are adjusted towards boosting domestic demand," Goldman Sachs said in a report yesterday.

At the same time, economists point out that the overall U.S. deficit with Asia has remained roughly in balance over the past decade. Many of America's trading partners in Asia have moved production lines to China in recent years to take advantage of the country's low labor costs, resulting in "Made In China" labels on goods previously made in their own countries. As a result, the U.S. trade deficit with much of the rest of Asia has dropped roughly in step with the growth of its deficit with China.

Economists attribute China's large trade surplus in 2005 in part to Beijing's efforts to cool overheated sectors of the economy, which helped spark a sharp slowdown in import growth in the first half. The cooling campaign targeted sectors including real estate, steel and aluminum production. The measures turned China into a major exporter of steel from a large net importer, economists say.

However, property development started to pick up again in the last few months of 2005, boosting imports of construction materials. Imports of electronic components and machinery also increased.

The pickup in demand was reflected in December's trade figures, with exports rising 18% from a year earlier to $75.41 billion but imports growing faster at 22%, to reach $64.4 billion, according to customs figures yesterday.

A think tank under the National Development and Reform Commission, China's top economic planning agency, yesterday suggested that the trend would continue this year. It predicted that imports would grow about 18%, while exports would expand by about 15%, according to the official Xinhua news agency.

The think tank attributed the anticipated slower export expansion to slowing growth in the global economy due to high oil prices and to rising trade frictions between China and its trading partners.

Even if this year's trade surplus were to fall, the 2005 numbers will likely fuel protectionist sentiment in the U.S. and calls for China to further revalue its currency, the yuan.

Beijing revalued the yuan by 2.1% last year, but critics say the currency remains undervalued against the dollar, making China's exports unfairly cheap.

China's two-way trade with the U.S. surged 23% to $211.63 billion last year, according to the Chinese customs service. It didn't give a breakdown for imports and exports. The European Union was China's largest trading partner, with two-way trade increasing 23% to $217.31 billion.

In Beijing Tuesday, U.S. Sen. Max Baucus, the top Democrat on the Senate Finance Committee and an advocate of free trade with China, warned China that it risks fanning protectionist moves in Congress if it doesn't take steps soon to cut its trade deficit with the U.S. But he also pointed out that American consumers benefit greatly from low-cost Chinese goods. "Freer trade with China alone saves U.S. households $600 each year," he said.

Abuse Of Power Enables 'Economic Terrorism' In China (WP)

By Peter S. Goodman

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

SHANGHAI -- Terry Petty and his Chinese representatives thought the terms were ridiculous.

DOJ_NMG_0009577

An American investor, Petty had forged a venture with the son of a local Communist Party official to open a machine shop here in the industrial outskirts of China's most cosmopolitan city. But after two years of internal disputes, the venture had disintegrated. The local man was urging Petty's people to sign a contract selling him their stake and surrendering full control. They would not go along.

But even as the negotiations proceeded on this September afternoon, the local partner was mobilizing to seize the factory: A team of 15 men under his employ -- many with shaved heads and donned in black -- arrived at the plant, according to managers. They told the workers that they were now in charge. They ordered production to cease.

Over subsequent weeks, the hired men forced their way in, brandishing guns, sparring with workers and disabling machinery, according to people at the plant and photos seen by The Washington Post. Calls to the police proved futile, factory managers said, because the police took direction from local officials connected to the Chinese partner. The factory now sits mostly empty, its 60 original workers scattered, while the local partner tries to resume production with his own people. The case has garnered the attention of both the United States and Shanghai governments.

The battle for control of a factory on the fringes of Shanghai -- a city often touted by China's leaders as a showcase for foreign investment -- highlights how some Communist Party officials abuse their influence over local governments to enrich themselves and their cronies. A quarter-century of market reforms has diminished the role of the state in China's economy, yet it has also spawned entrepreneurs whose wealth derives from their links to officials and their continued power to secure land and direct police.

"In China, the legal system and state power are completely intertwined," said Yu Nanping, an economist at East China Normal University in Shanghai. "Government officials control the process, and they tend to abuse the process when their own interests are on the line."

Petty, 49, the American who owns some 40 percent of the failed venture through a Hong Kong-based investment company, put it this way: "This is economic terrorism."

His estranged joint-venture partner, Hu Weijun, denied that he abused connections and described the conflict as a simple business deal gone awry.

"I sent a work team to the factory to inspect operations," Hu said. "As a shareholder, I have that right. But there was no bloodshed, no intimidation by so-called thugs." He said the guns his men carried were plastic toys. "They were just playing," he said.

Hired thugs have often been involved in business disputes in southern provinces such as Guangdong and Fujian. According to Petty, concern that such episodes are on the rise in the vast manufacturing zone around Shanghai prompted the interest of the U.S. government when he asked for help at the Shanghai consulate.

This battle took shape 2 1/2 years ago when Petty sought a site to produce oil-field equipment for Chinese and foreign energy companies. He had spent more than two decades doing business in China and had a similar factory in Nanjing. With direct air links to much of the world and a giant port, Shanghai beckoned.

Petty enlisted a longtime associate, Huang He. They settled on Baoshan, a district near Bao Steel Co., a major supplier of raw materials. The Baoshan government introduced them to the man who would become their new partner.

The son of the vice chief for Yuepu, one of the counties in the district, Hu controlled a prime five-acre parcel in an industrial park, but he lacked capital to develop it. He offered to forge a joint venture, a term that provokes fear among foreign investors in China: Messy divorce is a common ending.

"We didn't want to do a joint venture," Huang said. "But the local government said this was the only available land."

In June 2003, they signed the contract. Petty invested $2.2 million, and Huang and other partners put in $3.3 million. They would split the factory in two. One bay would be owned completely by Petty and Huang and devoted to making oil field gear. The other would be a basic machine shop -- Mei Zuan Machinery and Equipment Co. -- owned 51 percent by Petty and Huang, and 49 percent by Hu.

Almost immediately, tension emerged over Hu's insistence that the building work go to a construction company he controlled. And once the factory opened in February 2004, Hu became angry that most of the orders in the machine shop were coming from the equipment company owned by his partners, who he thought were underpaying for the shop's services. "They were exploiting the joint venture for their own business," Hu said. He began bringing in his own orders.

In April 2005, with mutual suspicions growing, Hu called Huang.

"He said, 'I want to buy you out,' " Huang recalled. " 'You have to get out quick. You have to agree.' He said, 'If you don't, there will be serious consequences.' " Huang and Petty insisted that the local government mediate any sale. According to Huang, this enraged Hu, who began boycotting board meetings and ordered the joint venture's accountant to stop paying wages to workers, forcing Huang and Petty to pay them directly.

"We had no ability to make any decisions," Huang said. "He could oppose everything."

DOJ_NMG_0009578

In August, Huang agreed to sell for about $1.4 million. On Sept. 13, in a meeting at the Yuepu government office, Hu offered a contract proposal, demanding full control after paying only 15 percent. Representatives for Petty refused.

As the meeting continued, Hu's team of 15 men arrived at the factory, according to a security officer and the general manager, Qiu Xuhao. The men identified themselves as working for Hu, Qiu said. The two guards at the gates put up no resistance.

"All the workers gathered around, and these thugs told them that they had to stop working immediately," said Li Jun, a manager at the factory. "When a few of the workers said, 'I'm not listening to you, you're not the boss,' the thugs started threatening them."

Someone pulled the main circuit breaker, and the factory went quiet. A few minutes later, 10 more of Hu's men walked in wearing hard hats, said Sun Sujun, one of the managers. Sun called the local police, bringing two uniformed officers from the Yuepu force. They ordered Hu's men out. Power was restored. Work resumed.

But the next day, three of Hu's men returned. The guards called the police. This time, Hu arrived. When the police pulled in, they greeted him warmly and ordered that he and his entourage be allowed in, according to Li.

Li said one of the officers later confided that Hu was dictating that the police hold back. The Baoshan Public Security Bureau declined a request for an interview.

Over the next days, Hu's men remained at the factory. When they again sought to disable the central power supply, fights broke out with the workers, Li said.

On Sept. 16, Qiu, the factory manager, went to the Public Security Bureau for Yuepu village to complain that Hu's men were harassing workers and damaging equipment. Three of Hu's men then arrived at Qiu's apartment late one night. They were turned away by Qiu's wife, but they made their point: On Sept. 20, Qiu quit, leaving the factory in the hands of a man who worked for Hu.

"The situation was crazy," Qiu said. "Every time we called the police, they would come and do nothing."

On Oct. 9, two of Hu's men brandished pistols at the workers, according to Sun and Li. The workers ceased operations. On Oct. 18, four men drove in with rifles and fired shots behind the factory, said Chen Jiafang, a security guard. He went to the Yuepu police station to report it, but no officers ever arrived, Chen said.

With the situation in crisis, Petty flew to China from his home in Houston, arriving at the factory Oct. 20. Six of Hu's men encircled him, and cars pulled in front of the gates and blocked his exit, he said. Police eventually allowed him to leave.

Petty assembled photos of the gunmen captured by the factory's cameras and brought them to the U.S. consulate. In late October, the consulate sent letters to the Shanghai mayor's office and the city's Public Security Bureau calling for a "just resolution" of the dispute.

"This intimidation campaign has spiraled out of control and has caused both a disruption in business and destruction of factory property," said the letter, adding that "the enclosed photographs of the individuals involved in this intimidation, some of whom are carrying assault weapons, will make the severity of the situation clear to you."

Four days later, Petty was called for a five-hour interview at the Shanghai Criminal Investigations Division.

"They assured me that there would be no favoritism," Petty said. "These guys said they were independent."

But Petty later learned that the chief of the Baoshan Public Security Bureau formerly worked in the city's Criminal Investigations Division. In other words, the police he accuses of protecting Hu have close ties to the institution now investigating their conduct.

"In China," Petty said, "you can just be closed off to any legal process if powerful people are involved."

China Proposes Fewer Dams In Power Project To Aid Environment (NYT)

By Jim Yardley

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

BEIJING, Thursday, Jan. 12 - A government environmental review has recommended reducing the number of dams included in a controversial hydropower proposal on the Nu River in southwestern China in order to limit environmental damage and decrease the number of people who would be resettled, a Hong Kong newspaper has reported.

The newspaper, Wen Wei Po, which has ties to the Communist Party, reported on Wednesday that the recommendation called for 4 dams instead the 13 in the original Nu proposal. The article, citing an unnamed source close to the governmental review, said fewer dams would still meet "the needs for economic development and environmental protection."

The project has been delayed for nearly two years, and it will now be presented to the National Development and Reform Commission, a powerful government ministry, and later to the State Council, or China's cabinet.

But the article also suggested that the full 13 dams had not been completely ruled out. The source described the four dams as "a pilot proposal" and said more study would be needed to assess the larger project.

DOJ_NMG_0009579

The original Nu River proposal, which would generate more electricity than the huge Three Gorges Dam, has become an international controversy. Environmental groups inside and outside China have called for more openness and public input in deciding whether to go forward on the project.

The environmental assessment report cited by the Hong Kong newspaper has itself become a point of contention. A coalition of environmentalists, lawyers, journalists and nongovernmental groups has called for the release of the report as well as public hearings on the project. They cited a 2003 environmental law that required public participation, including hearings, in deciding such major projects.

But the central government has refused to release the report and has not yet called any hearings.

The Hong Kong newspaper said the Ministry of Water Resources and the State Secrets Bureau had classified the report as a state secret.

A Stand Against China's Pollution Tide (WP)

By Edward Cody

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

XIANGTAN, China -- Tired and frustrated, Wang Guoxiang and other Xiangtan city officials were slurping a midnight snack of instant noodles last Friday when the anti-pollution chief for Hunan province walked into their crisis room. Immediately, Wang said, he stopped eating and shouted at the visitor.

At the top of his voice, he insisted that something be done to stop the discharge of poisonous metals that had begun three days earlier into the slow, meandering Xiang River, from which Xiangtan, 800 miles south of Beijing, draws its drinking water. As a people's delegate, Wang recalled complaining to the environmental official, he and his allies had been fighting for months for more controls on upstream smelters but had found little support from the provincial authorities.

"You guys pay no attention to the safety of drinking water for our Xiangtan people. If you can't solve the problem this time, your position is in danger," Wang said he told the anti-pollution chief, Jiang Yimin. "And I wasn't kidding," he added.

The late-night confrontation in Xiangtan, a sprawling city of 500,000, was a telling episode in China's latest pollution drama: the accidental release into the Xiang River of heavy doses of cadmium, a likely carcinogen, by a state-owned smelter in an industrial park about 25 miles upstream.

The fouling of the Xiang River attracted wide attention, but it was far from unique as China struggles to reconcile breakneck economic growth with protection of the environment. After more than two decades of swift industrialization, a recent government report found that up to 70 percent of the country's rivers and lakes are seriously polluted.

In reaction, extensive national regulations have been put into place, including a government decision Sunday requiring local officials to immediately notify officials in Beijing of any toxic spills. But on the ground, business owners and Communist Party officials often cooperate closely. Enforcement of environmental rules has often been lax, and the result has been frequent contamination of the waterways that China's 1.3 billion people depend on for drinking water.

At about the same time that Xiangtan faced its pollution crisis, a frozen pipe burst in eastern Henan province, releasing six tons of diesel fuel that floated in a 40-mile-long slick down a branch of the Yellow River. Authorities said 63 water pumps had to be shut down, including some at Jinan, the capital of neighboring Shandong province.

Farther south, Guangdong provincial authorities announced Tuesday that water drawn from the Bei River was safe to drink again three weeks after an unauthorized discharge of cadmium. And the famed Pearl River, which runs through Guangdong into the South China Sea, has turned dangerously saline at its southern end because of low water levels and high tides.

Xie Shaodong, an environmental specialist at Peking University, said China is passing through a stage of economic development in which, as the history of other countries has shown, ecological damage is to be expected. To halt the degradation, he said, China's environmental protection agencies should be granted more power and the news media should be allowed to report more fully on the issue.

Although pollution has long been recognized as a major problem in China, local officials and the government-controlled press have focused particular attention on it recently because of an internationally embarrassing spill in November. In that episode, benzene contamination of the Songhua River forced a cutoff of drinking water in Harbin, a major city 650 miles north of Beijing, and sent toxic waste downstream to cities and towns in the Russian Far East.

Local officials made the Songhua calamity worse by concealing it for several days, leading to complaints from Russia and, ultimately, sanctions from China's central government and the new notification rule issued Sunday. Officials involved in the coverup were dismissed and one committed suicide. But as Wang's experience in Xiangtan showed, the instinctive reaction of many local party and government officials is still to conceal and minimize.

DOJ_NMG_0009580

Only hours before Jiang walked into the Xiangtan crisis meeting Friday evening, Wang had learned that the city's Environmental Protection Administration had measured cadmium levels at 25 times the amount considered safe for drinking water. His own measurement, Wang said, showed even higher levels.

Cadmium, a soft element found in metal ores, can cause liver, kidney and bone disease if ingested in large quantities. For most of the year, Wang said, he and two colleagues in the People's Congress, an appointed city council, had been trying to persuade provincial authorities to tighten controls over the smelters upstream from Xiangtan, which he said frequently dump dangerous quantities of cadmium and other elements into the river.

Frustrated by the lack of response at the provincial level, Wang had arranged for Xiangtan's Environmental Protection Administration to test the water every 10 days. When he received Friday's report, "I just couldn't believe my eyes," he said in an interview.

Wang alerted Communist Party officials in the city, who met into the night. Jiang made his appearance about midnight and, before dawn, set in motion a large-scale cleanup operation. Later that day, he and provincial environment officials announced at a news conference that the cadmium would be neutralized with chemicals dumped into the river and diluted with water diverted from upstream reservoirs.

The cadmium entered the Xiang River on Jan. 4 when workers mistakenly diverted river water into two basins used to separate cadmium and other smeltering by-products, Wang said. The water overwhelmed the basins and washed back into the river, which carried the accumulated poisons downstream.

Jiang, the provincial anti-pollution chief, told reporters that authorities halted the backflow and took other steps that ensured water supplies were safe. "The Hunan provincial authorities properly handled the cadmium spill in the Xiang River," People's Daily, the official party newspaper, concluded in its Monday editions.

Local newspapers and broadcast stations were ordered to limit their reports to Jiang's statement and were barred from reporting about drinking water conditions in Xiangtan and Changsha, the capital of Hunan province farther downstream, during the three days from Jan. 4 until emergency measures were put into place.

As a result, Xiangtan residents appeared unconcerned by the crisis. "If you want to know about pollution, go ask the people at the Environmental Protection Administration," said an elderly man basking in winter sunshine beside the Xiang River.

Provincial propaganda authorities also prohibited reporters from focusing on Wang's earlier efforts to get the smelters to adhere to national environmental standards, local journalists said. Jiang said in a telephone interview Wednesday, however, that his office would now carry out an investigation.

"We will punish those who pollute the Xiang River," he added, "as well as related officials from the local Environmental Protection Administration for their malpractices."

The controlled press, meanwhile, published official assurances that drinking water was safe because of the emergency chemical treatment by Xiangtan's water distribution system. Nevertheless, the news reports said, the river water still contained unhealthy amounts of cadmium.

Researcher Jin Ling contributed to this report.

Don't Drink The Water (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2006

Another week, another chemical spill in China. The recent spate of environmental mishaps on the mainland isn't new, though at least we're hearing about them now. If Beijing really wanted to tackle its environmental malaise, it would move faster to dump state enterprises and speed the development of a private economy in which managers are held accountable both for making a profit and for fouling the air and water.

One thing's for sure: The recent news has been bad PR for the PRC. Last November, a petrochemical plant explosion in Jillin, in northeastern China, released 100 tons of benzene and other nasty things into the Songhua River, creating a slick that flowed all the way to Russia. That mess forced three million people in the city of Harbin to go without running water for nearly five days. The news was too big to hide, though officials tried. Foreign journalists sniffed the story and moved in to report it.

Now, problems are popping up all over. In December, a metal factory in Shaoguan, a southern Chinese city near Hong Kong, leaked cadmium -- a potentially cancer-causing agent -- into the Bei River. And in recent days, a fertilizer-plant accident dumped 600 tons of sulfuric acid into the Qijiang River, near Chongqing; cadmium was spilled into the Xiangjiang River in Hunan Province; and in Shandong Province several tons of diesel oil were dumped accidentally into the Yellow River.

It's hard to tell exactly how widespread the problems are, but we'd go out on a limb and guess, oh, "pretty vast." China's State Environmental Protection Administration reported 1,441 environmental accidents in 2004, with most incidents related to water. We'd wager that figure is underestimated by a wide margin. The manager responsible for the Harbin slick was later found dead, by the way.

DOJ_NMG_0009581

China's current environmental problems stem from its rampant misallocation of capital and resources over many decades. The country is stuck with rotting factories that the state has neglected to maintain and manage. From Mao Tse-tung's Great Leap Forward, which led to the haphazard construction of hundreds of thousands of factories and power stations in the late 1950s, to his Third Front defense industrialization campaign, China's hinterland is now dotted with rotting hulks of metal. We're reminded of the former Soviet bloc, which upon the fall of the Berlin Wall turned out to have some of the worst pollution problems on earth.

It will take a long time to replace these Chinese hulks with industries that will be better managed by owners outside the state political system. But Beijing's bureaucrats may be forced to act sooner than they'd like. Social unrest, the sole thing that seems to make Chinese politicians tremble, is rising across the country, and environmental problems are a big trigger. As Chinese citizens accumulate wealth, they'll naturally push for potable water and clean air.

China may fall into the trap of trying to solve the problem by the same means that brought it about. Beijing puts out "five-year plans" to fix things like water pollution -- in other words, more central planning. But the cleanest countries in the world are those in which citizens can protest if pollution occurs, and where companies are forced by market competition to come up with the best industrial technology available. Such technology doesn't waste a valuable product by dumping it into a river. China today is a long way from industrial modernity -- so for now, we'd recommend you don't drink the water.

After WHO Request, China Reports Two More Bird Flu Deaths (WP)

By Edward Cody

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

BEIJING, Jan. 11 -- The World Health Organization identified China's latest bird flu victims Wednesday as a 10-year-old student and a 35-year-old street vendor who succumbed to the H5N1 strain of the virus last month in different parts of the country.

Roy Wadia, the WHO spokesman in Beijing, said the Chinese government reported the deaths during the past 48 hours in response to the agency's request for updated data on bird flu. The man died Dec. 30 in Jiangxi province in eastern China and the girl Dec. 16 in southern Guanxi province, he said.

The new deaths increased to five the number of people in China who have succumbed to the virus.

The Health Ministry's spokesman, Mao Qunan, spoke at length about bird flu at a news conference Tuesday but did not mention the additional deaths. Mao's omission and the delay in reporting the deaths to WHO fed concerns about the reliability of official information on the extent of bird flu among China's 1.3 billion residents.

International officials have complained that they fear they are not getting official data fast enough from the Chinese government. Wadia refrained from criticism of the latest delay, but suspicions are easily aroused because of China's record. The government sought to conceal the 2003 outbreak of severe acute respiratory syndrome, or SARS, and Chinese officials have long been reluctant to share information with outsiders.

Since the SARS controversy, the government has pledged to deal squarely with health information. But in addition to the complaints from international health officials, Chinese reporters have said they are frequently forced to seek information about China's bird flu situation from WHO or foreign publications because China's official sources refuse to provide it.

"News about the virus often takes a detour to reach domestic audiences," Hu Shuli wrote in the Oct. 31 issue of Caijing business magazine. "It is first covered by foreign media, and then picked up by the domestic press. Journalists sent to infected areas also say local officials have not been cooperative enough."

At his news conference, Mao said the outlook on bird flu in China is "not optimistic" because the country's rural health care system is ill-equipped to identify the H5N1 strain and guarantee swift treatment.

Mao said 66 percent of China's township-level hospitals and 90 percent of its county-level hospitals are part of the country's reporting system for infectious diseases. That leaves thousands of hospitals outside the loop, meaning ministry officials might not learn of bird flu infections until long after they break out in remote areas.

Twenty-eight outbreaks of bird flu and eight cases of human infection have been reported across the country since October. The Agriculture Ministry on Tuesday reported a new outbreak killed 16,000 quails during the first week of this month on a farm in Guizhou province in south-central China.

Turkey May Have Lasting Traces Of Flu (NYT)

By Elisabeth Rosenthal

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

ANKARA, Turkey, Jan. 11 - Although Turkish officials are now taking appropriate steps to contain the outbreaks of avian influenza that have spread across this country, their slow initial response in detecting the arrival of bird flu three weeks ago has created a health crisis that may be very hard to correct, international experts said Wednesday.

DOJ_NMG_0009582

The Turkish government has reported more than 20 outbreaks of avian influenza in birds, spread all across the country. Fifteen human cases of the virus, A(H5N1), have been confirmed, at least two children have died and more than 100 people are in hospitals under observation.

"Turkey has provided us with a double problem," said Dr. Joseph Domenech, chief of veterinary services at the United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization in Rome. "First, their detection was not early enough, so the virus was able to spread for weeks. And even with that, we do not understand why so many people have become infected.

"And when you have a big question like that, you have a big worry."

Dr. Domenech said there was now a risk that the virus had become so entrenched in Turkey that it would be impossible to eradicate it, meaning that a permanent reservoir of the dreaded virus would exist on the fringes of Europe and along bird migration routes to Africa.

Both he and United Nations health officials agreed that Turkey was now taking the problem "seriously." Current measures are "correct and proper," said Dr. Marc Danzon, World Health Organization regional director for Europe, speaking at a news conference here. He added that there was no reason to avoid travel to the country.

In the last three days, the Turkish authorities began large-scale culling of birds in affected cities to stamp out outbreaks. Hundreds of thousands of birds have been destroyed.

A senior United Nations official urged Turkey's neighbors to be ready to respond quickly and effectively to outbreaks of bird flu in their countries. The official, Dr. David Nabarro, the United Nations coordinator for avian and human influenza, urged countries to hold drills to confirm that their laboratories have all the necessary materials and competent staff.

Health workers "need to be on the ball to be comprehensive in their response," he said. "It is not easy to run around catching chickens," making sure none escape and then putting them in sacks, killing and burying them properly, Dr. Nabarro said.

Dr. Nabarro said that two of Turkey's neighbors, which he declined to name, have begun taking the recommended intensive efforts with help from the United Nations.

If there is a bright side to the outbreaks in Turkey, it is the news that several people infected with the virus have suffered only mild symptoms, and sometimes none at all, leading experts to theorize that the disease may not be as deadly as they feared.

New suspected cases in humans are being treated with antiviral drugs, and the Health Ministry has undertaken a broad public education campaign warning residents to report bird deaths and to avoid contact with sick poultry and wild birds.

"We expect there will be less and less human cases as animal reservoirs around the country diminish and education intensifies," said Dr. Guénaël Rodier, a communicable diseases expert with the World Health Organization who led a team of United Nations scientists to Turkey this week to investigate the outbreak.

He noted that all of the humans seemed to have become infected after contact with sick birds, and that there was no evidence that the virus had acquired the ability to spread between humans, a development that scientists say could herald a worldwide flu epidemic.

In many ways, the outbreak in Turkey is a cautionary tale about how rapidly avian influenza can become a widespread problem if it is not detected early and attacked aggressively. In the far eastern part of Turkey, where most of the human cases and deaths have occurred, officials waited for weeks to investigate widespread bird deaths that started in mid-December, villagers say, even after the deaths were reported to government veterinarians. In that time window, the virus spread from bird to bird and - to a lesser extent - from bird to man.

This week, government health warnings blared from loudspeakers mounted on trucks all across Turkey, and were being broadcast on all of its television stations. Still the dangers seemed to be sinking in only slowly.

Even in Dogubayazit, the city that was home to siblings who died, occasional roosters could be heard crowing on Tuesday morning, despite an official culling that was supposed to have eliminated all domesticated birds. Turkish television broadcasts showed government culling teams dressed in full biohazard gear assisted by barehanded children gleefully chasing poultry around in the snow, oblivious to the dangers of exposure.

China announced Wednesday that two people had died of bird flu, bringing to five the country's death toll from the disease. Chinese agricultural officials also announced a new outbreak of the disease, this time among quail in rural Guizhou Province. Earlier this week, Chinese health officials warned that the number of human infections from the disease was likely to increase.

U.N. Seeks To Quell Flu Panic (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, January 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0009583

NEW YORK -- The United Nations yesterday sought to calm fears about the deadly avian flu virus as signs of near-panic spread through Turkey and its neighbors.

At least 15 persons in Turkey have been stricken with the respiratory virus, although none of the cases appears to be the result of a human-to-human transmission.

Agriculture teams and farmers culled sick birds and infected flocks yesterday in 30 of Turkey's 81 provinces.

World Health Organization officials praised Ankara's response to the crisis, but officials insisted that the counterinfluenza measures must be maintained.

In Russia, scientists warned against taking Turkish vacations and the government advocated the shooting of migrating birds.

The U.N. Food and Agriculture Organization, which has taken an early lead in the detection and prevention of the H5N1 virus, yesterday called on Turkey's neighbors to increase their surveillance of flocks.

"The virus may be spreading despite the control measures already taken," said Juan Lubroth, the senior FAO animal health officer.

"Far more human and animal exposure to the virus will occur if strict containment does not isolate all known and unknown locations where the bird-flu virus is currently present," he said.

Dr. David Nabarro, the coordinator of the U.N. response to the avian flu, stressed that "there is no evidence of human-to-human transmission in the Turkey outbreak."

He said each case appeared to be traceable to avian contact.

Early surveillance and containment efforts would take at least $1.4 billion, a figure that is sure to soar if the flu becomes a pandemic, he said.

Epidemiologists are puzzled that the virus that has flashed through Turkey does not appear to be as deadly as the strain that killed roughly half of the 139 persons infected in China and Southeast Asia.

Of the 15 known Turkish infections, only the deaths of three siblings have been traced to the virus.

Dr. Nabarro said more people might have been infected in Asia than were reported, yielding a lower rate of fatality, or the Turkish government's rapid response and use of Tamiflu, a powerful antiviral, might have been the reason.

Another prospect, he said, is that the Turkish strain of H5N1 might be less deadly than its Asian predecessor.

Scientists have been watching for mutations as the virus jumps to humans: If it grows less virulent, it might be easier to treat with existing or adapted medications or it might be adapting for maximum transmission by not killing its host.

The Chinese government, along with the European Union and the World Bank, will sponsor a two-day pledging conference next week to raise roughly $1.4 billion to identify, contain and combat the virus.

"We view this as a beginning," Dr. Nabarro said.

Bird Flu Mutation Of Concern, Experts Say (WP)

By Daniel Williams And Alan Sipress

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

ISTANBUL, Jan. 11 -- Preliminary tests show that the strain of bird flu virus that has stricken at least 15 people in Turkey has evolved in a way that could make it somewhat more hazardous to human beings, although it still lacks the capacity to be passed easily from person to person, international health officials said Wednesday.

The analysis, based on the sequencing of one of the virus's genes, suggests that at least some of the H5N1 bird flu virus here carries a change in one of its proteins, according to Michael L. Perdue of the World Health Organization. That protein is what lets the virus attach to cells and penetrate them.

"It's a little concerning because the virus is still trying new things in its evolution," said Perdue, who is overseeing the agency's response to the Turkish outbreak from WHO headquarters in Geneva.

Influenza experts are studying the apparent change to determine its significance, Perdue said. A spokesman for Britain's Medical Research Council, which is involved in the research, said it would take a few days to confirm the preliminary findings.

The experts say they believe the genetic change could make it easier for bird flu to pass from chickens to people. If the virus were to eventually gain the capacity to be passed easily from person to person, it could trigger a global epidemic.

Nancy J. Cox, who heads the influenza branch at the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention in Atlanta, said the change was found in one sample of H5N1 isolated from a Turkish child who recently died of the infection. The hemagglutinin protein, which the virus uses to attach to cells of the respiratory tract, had an alteration not usually seen in avian influenza viruses. Other incremental changes in the virus have been seen in China and Vietnam since outbreaks began in 2003.

DOJ_NMG_0009584

Experts from the U.N. Food and Agriculture Organization warned that the virus could become permanently entrenched in Turkey, thereby increasing its risk to people and the chance it could evolve further. "The highly pathogenic avian influenza virus H5N1 could become endemic in Turkey," the organization said in a statement.

Two deaths have been attributed to bird flu in Turkey. The fatalities were the first outside China and Southeast Asia, areas where a total of 78 people have died in the past two years. More than 100 people have been hospitalized in Turkey with flu symptoms. The patients are under observation as they await test results to reveal whether they suffer from bird flu.

The virus has spread across 30 of Turkey's 81 provinces, from the far east to the Mediterranean coast, and has sparked a frantic effort to stem the disease by killing infected poultry. Even in cosmopolitan Istanbul, bird catchers for the Agriculture Ministry are rounding up fowl raised in the outskirts of the city, gassing them to death and burying them in mass graves.

Perdue noted that the Spanish influenza of 1918, which caused an estimated 40 million deaths worldwide, began as an ordinary bird virus but gradually evolved into a global human killer through a series of these incremental changes.

At a news conference in Ankara, the Turkish capital, international health officials played down fears of a pandemic.

"There is no transmission from human to human so far with a mutation of the virus," said Marc Danzon, WHO's regional director for Europe. "We are not there at the moment, but it is the responsibility for the WHO to look at this. . . . There is no reason to panic."

Bernard Vallat, director of the World Organization for Animal Health, said that the virus was probably introduced in Turkey in October. Vallat said that besides weeding out poultry in infected areas, fowl might have to be vaccinated. "The idea is that you create a protective area around an outbreak through vaccination. This could involve an entire province," he said.

Turkish health workers have killed more than 300,000 domestic birds in roundups across the country since late December. In one district of Istanbul, municipal sanitation officials went door to door in a rural hillside suburb asking residents if they raised chickens and ducks. They chased strays up and down the slippery, muddy hills and ravines, and when they caught one, they stuffed it into a plastic bag. Signs around the neighborhood read, "This District Has Chicken Plague."

Workers dressed in protective gear threw the bags into green containers that looked like large garbage cans. A sanitation worker attached a blue tube from a tank of carbon dioxide to the airtight container, opened the valve and killed the birds. "We prefer to say we are putting them to sleep," said Hikmet Karacay, an Agriculture Ministry official.

Residents, most of whom raised chickens as a sideline to collect the eggs, cooperated. "The real problem is the children," said Gilsen Kaya, who has two daughters. "They like the chickens. They are like pets. That's why it's better to do it at night, when they don't witness the whole thing."

Sipress reported from Jakarta, Indonesia. Staff writer David Brown in Washington contributed to this report.

Opec Nations 'set For Record Oil Revenues' (FT)

By Carola Hoyos

Financial Times, January 12, 2006

The oil revenues of the Organisation of the Petroleum Exporting Countries, the cartel that controls 40 per cent of the world's oil supplies, will increase by 10 per cent to a record $522bn this year, the US Department of Energy forecasts.

Opec's increased wealth, driven by continuing high oil prices and an increase this year in the group's production, should help keep interest rates low if members of the group continue to spend their increasing wealth in the US bond market, economists said. The yield of the 10-year bond has remained nearly flat since mid-2004 in spite of the Federal Reserve increasing official interest rates by 3.25 percentage points during that period.

Everything from mergers and acquisitions to the energy sector and art market are expected to benefit.

Opec's 2006 revenue would be the largest in real terms in 25 years. The group's wealth, when adjusted for inflation, peaked at $572bn in 1980 when oil prices spiked after the Iranian revolution.

But the recent growth in Opec's wealth, which began in 2000, will reverse course next year, with the group's wealth falling back to $495bn as the oil price eases, the Energy Information Administration (EIA), the US Department of Energy's statistical arm, forecasts.

As the oil price boom continues into 2006 Opec countries are becoming less and less cautious about their spending. "This is reflected in the fact that some Opec countries are undertaking ambitious projects, like weapons purchases by Saudi Arabia," said Manouchehr Takin, senior analyst at the Centre for Global Energy Studies. "These kinds of projects would be impossible with lower revenues." Saudi Arabia, the world's biggest oil producer, is expected to earn $162bn in 2006.

"It's just been a phenomenal transfer of wealth from consuming to producing nations," said Francisco Blanch, analyst at Merrill Lynch.

DOJ_NMG_0009585

Forecasts for the average price of New York benchmark crude oil futures in 2006 range between $45 and $75 a barrel, a similar level to that the EIA used to calculate total revenue Opec may expect in 2006. Although prices are notoriously difficult to estimate, the range is given credence by Opec's hints that it will aim to defend prices of at least $50-$55 a barrel.

The central bankers of the world's largest developed and emerging nations on Monday lent further support to the strong oil price thesis when they forecast global growth would continue at a "dynamic" pace in 2006. The optimistic prognosis has prompted analysts to expect demand for oil to increase at least 1.7m barrels a day to more than 85m b/d in 2006.

The factor that keeps many of those who forecast high oil prices for 2006 up at night, however, is that oil demand data may prove less robust than assumed.

The wildcards are factors such as hurricanes and political unrest.

Bahrain Pact Signed By Bush (NYT/REU)

By Reuters

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 11 - President Bush signed a bill on Wednesday establishing a free trade agreement with Bahrain, the first such pact with a Persian Gulf country.

The agreement requires Bahrain to eliminate its already low tariffs on American consumer and industrial goods and most agricultural products. In turn, the United States will eliminate tariffs on Bahraini goods. Annual trade between the two countries totals about $800 million.

The pact commits Bahrain to a further opening of its market to American banks and other services and to strengthen copyright and patent protections.

Bahrain, a small island country on the Saudi border, is home to the United States Fifth Fleet.

Mr. Bush has now signed trade deals with Singapore, Chile, Australia, Morocco and, most recently, six countries in Central America and the Caribbean: Costa Rica, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras, Nicaragua and the Dominican Republic. Other Arab countries that have free trade status with the United States are Morocco and Jordan.

Canada's Conservatives Boost Lead (WP)

By Doug Struck

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

TORONTO, Jan. 11 -- With a militant drumbeat and an ominous tone, a campaign ad here warns that election of Conservative Party leader Stephen Harper "would bring a smile to George W. Bush's face."

Well behind in the polls two weeks before a parliamentary election, the governing Liberal Party led by Prime Minister Paul Martin this week brought what in Canadian politics is a most damning indictment: Martin's opponent is too close to the Americans, the party's ads say.

"Mr. Harper, the United States is our neighbor, not our nation," warns one.

Harper is "pro-Iraqi war, anti-Kyoto, socially conservative . . . Bush's new best friend," says another ad, quoting a commentary from the conservative Cato Institute, a Washington research group.

Yet another ad speculates that Harper may have received illegal campaign funds from American conservatives. "We know he is very popular with right-wingers in the U.S. They have money. Maybe they helped him," the announcer muses on the commercial, unveiled Tuesday.

The ads are running before an election in which Martin's party appears likely to lose its hold on the government. After Christmas, the Conservatives, the main opposition, jumped suddenly from behind and now lead the Liberals by 10 percentage points, 38 to 28 percent, according to a poll conducted for the Globe and Mail newspaper.

In Canada's system, the party with the largest number of seats after the Jan. 23 election can join with smaller parties, if needed, to form a government and select the prime minister.

The Conservatives, who have been out of power for 12 years, have traditionally favored closer ties to U.S. administrations. Martin's Liberals portrayed Harper as too pro-American in their election faceoff in June 2004, and have now boosted the stridency of that accusation.

Despite his party's ads, Martin came to office 25 months ago pledging to improve fractured relations with the Bush administration. A former finance minister, he created and heads a cabinet committee whose mission is to work closely with the United States, Canada's largest trading partner. Last year Martin hosted Bush in Ottawa.

But "in an election, you run on what will aid your cause. Canada is not unique in playing the anti-American card," said Nelson Wiseman, a political scientist at the University of Toronto.

DOJ_NMG_0009586

"I understand political expediency," U.S. Ambassador David Wilkins said last month of the anti-American potshots in the campaign. "But the last time I looked, the United States was not on the ballot."

But it often has been, in one way or another. People here have long had mixed feelings about their larger, more powerful neighbor, defending their separate, Canadian identity in spite of ever-closer ties with the United States.

"It used to be a huge thing in Canadian politics to be as close as possible with the American president," said Norman O'Reilly, a marketing professor at Ryerson University in Toronto. "But after the Iraq war, that has changed. There's been a backlash to the war."

Hostility toward the Bush administration is strongest in eastern cities, traditional strongholds of the Liberal Party. With opinion polls showing the party losing some of that support, Martin's strategists are trying to tap the sentiment, Wiseman said.

"You hope to run a positive campaign. If things get bad, you pull out the negative ads," he said. "If things get really bad, you pull out the really negative ads."

In a nationally televised debate in Quebec on Tuesday, Martin hammered his point home. He suggested that Harper would shift Canada's policies to mimic Washington's and described Harper as being "in favor of the missile shield and the Iraq war. His positions are contrary to the values that Quebecers defend." Martin was referring to the Bush administration's anti-missile system, which is widely unpopular here.

"These ads are a new low in Canadian political advertising," one of Harper's party chiefs, Parliament member Jason Kenney, said in an interview. "Paul Martin will do or say anything to hold on to power. The ads speak of sophomoric anti-Americanism."

"They are factual ads. They reveal Stephen Harper's views on a number of issues," responded Amy Butcher, a spokeswoman for the Liberal Party. " We think it's important for Canadians to be aware of where Mr. Harper stands."

The ads could backfire if seen as ham-handed or desperate, political strategists here said. Martin's party quickly withdrew one advertisement that focused on a proposal by Harper to station Canadian troops closer to cities to help with national disasters and emergencies. The ad suggested that the troops would be an ominous presence.

The ad "was never approved by the party to run," Butcher insisted. "It was inadvertently" posted with the other ads on the party Web site, she said.

Deadline Nears In Mexican Election (USAT)

By Judy Keen

USA Today, January 12, 2006

CHICAGO — Gregoria Alavez de Cortez lives here, but she'll soon become part of Mexico's history as her native country for the first time allows expatriates to vote in a presidential election.

“It's really necessary for me to do this. I want to stay aware of what's going on in the election,” she said as she picked up an absentee ballot application at the Mexican Consulate west of downtown.

Sunday is the last day to mail ballot requests for the July 2 voting for a successor to Mexico's President Vicente Fox, who can't run again because of term limits.

With the deadline looming, only a fraction of eligible Mexicans in the USA have participated because of confusion about the application, lack of interest in the campaign and concern that applying for ballots could result in problems with U.S. immigration officials.

Only about 15,000 of the estimated 4 million expatriates who have Mexican voting cards, nearly all of them in the USA, have mailed in applications, said Pilar Alvarez of Mexico's Federal Election Institute.

The Chicago region has 1.3 million Mexicans, the nation's second-largest Mexican community after Los Angeles.

De Cortez, 41, who works at a fast-food restaurant, heard about the deadline on TV. The application she picked up says in Spanish, “Mexico waits for your vote. Exert your rights!” She left with the form, but was soon back with questions. She needs to submit a copy of a utility bill as proof of her address, but she moved recently and didn't have a current bill.

Miguel Herrera, 37, a maintenance worker, took an application, glanced at it and put it back. “Too much trouble, too complicated,” he said.

In the Chicago region, about 600 people have applied for the absentee ballots. Cesar Romero, spokesman for Chicago's Mexican Consulate, said a last-minute push could result in 1,000 more — though he admitted that might be too optimistic. In all, 115,000 applications have been distributed here.

“We started late, but we've come far,” he said. “The process is complicated, and we don't have a long tradition of political participation. We'll do much better next time.”

Chicago's large immigrant population has had big turnouts for other foreign elections. Last month, more than 4,000 Iraqis from across the Midwest came to Skokie, Ill., to vote in their country's elections. In 2003, about 9,000 Poles in the area registered to vote in a referendum on Poland's entry into the European Union. Almost 4,000 Ukrainians here voted in their native country's 2004 presidential election.

DOJ_NMG_0009587

Last-minute efforts are underway to boost ballot applications:

·Mexico's Federal Election Institute is running ads in Hispanic newspapers and on radio and TV in selected cities.

·In Chicago neighborhoods, volunteers are distributing ballot request forms in banks, groceries and libraries.

·In San Diego and Los Angeles, community organizations are helping people photocopy the required documents and fill out applications.

·In Houston and other Texas cities, applications are at restaurants, music stores and money-wiring agencies.

Mexico passed a law in June allowing expatriates to vote in presidential elections to acknowledge the importance of Mexicans living abroad. They send billions of dollars home each year that boost Mexico's economy.

Those wanting to vote must have Mexican voter cards, Mexico-issued identification and proof of U.S. residency. Those without voter cards — an estimated 6 million people outside Mexico — must apply in Mexico, then return to pick them up. Last month, advocacy groups in California arranged bus trips to Tijuana for people to apply for the cards.

The application period began Oct. 1, but forms were originally available mostly at consulates, making it difficult for people outside big cities to get them. That has changed as the deadline has neared. Maria Curry, who has helped Mexicans in the San Diego area get involved, said the consulate there at first would give her only five applications at a time to distribute. For the past month, community groups have been recruited to help spread the word and can get as many forms as they need, Romero said.

Complicated forms are just one reason for lagging participation. Some people left their voting cards in Mexico so relatives could pay property taxes in their absence or conduct other business, said Salvador Pedroza Moreno, chamber of commerce president in Little Village, a Hispanic neighborhood on Chicago's South Side.

Some Mexicans who are here illegally threw away their cards to avoid having any identification, he said. And some can't spare $9 to send their applications by registered mail, as required.

Others aren't focused on the election because no campaigning is allowed in the USA. Campaigning in Mexico was banned during the holidays and won't resume until next week, Pedroza Moreno said. As a result, many Mexicans, even those who went home over Christmas, haven't been exposed to the views of the three candidates.

Curry said “all kinds of people are just afraid” that applying would cause legal problems over their immigration status.

Tony Payan, a professor of political science at the University of Texas at El Paso, said, “So many Mexicans in the USA live in the shadows, and they would rather not be seen as activists, as politically involved. They don't want to jeopardize their future in this country.”

Alvarez, of Mexico's election institute, said the size of the turnout isn't as important as the chance to vote. “We do not qualify it a success or a failure, because the first time, you don't have anything to compare it to,” she said.

She said many Mexicans in the USA will finally feel a part of their native country's political process, and “all candidates have to have proposals for migrants.”

Despite the problems, Pedroza Moreno predicted that 20,000 Mexicans in the USA will vote. “This is historic,” he said. “Twenty thousand voices that were never heard before will be heard.”

Has Citgo Become A Political Tool For Hugo Chavez? (USAT)

By David J. Lynch

USA Today, January 12, 2006

HOUSTON — From the glass-walled building and manicured lawn to the security guard who greets visitors in a cheerful Texas drawl, everything at Citgo Petroleum seems perfectly ordinary.

But in fact there's nothing ordinary about Citgo. One of the USA's largest refiners, Citgo is a subsidiary of Venezuela's state-owned oil company, Petroleos de Venezuela S.A. (PDVSA). As such, it ultimately belongs to Venezuelan President Hugo Chvez, an avowedly anti-American leader who counts Fidel Castro among his closest friends and mocks President Bush as a “genocidal murderer.”

The question of Chvez's influence over Citgo was highlighted by the company's recent provision of 25 million gallons of subsidized home-heating oil to poor people in the northeast USA. More than 100,000 households in four states should eventually benefit from the low-cost heating aid.

Some worry that Venezuela's ownership of more than 6% of U.S. refinery capacity gives Chvez, a former paratrooper given to wearing red berets and military fatigues, the power to cripple as well as comfort.

As Hurricanes Katrina and Rita demonstrated, any disruption to the nation's refining industry instantly increases gas prices. What if Chvez, who periodically threatens to curtail oil shipments to the USA, closed Citgo's refineries?

DOJ_NMG_0009588

“He'd only have to do that for 90 days, and he'd destroy our economy,” worries Matthew Simmons, a prominent energy investment banker. “He actually has our livelihood in his hands.”

Others note that imported oil from elsewhere eventually could compensate for any interruption in Citgo supplies. And, because Chvez depends on the company's specialized refineries to process Venezuela's sulfur-rich crude oil, a shutdown would cost him and his country dearly.

“His capacity to make life difficult for George Bush would be at the cost of burying himself,” says Claudio Loser, a former International Monetary Fund official.

Late last year, as winter's first chill sent consumers reaching for their thermostats, a dozen U.S. senators asked 10 major oil companies to donate a portion of their record profits to help the poor. Only Citgo responded, dispatching tankers to housing projects in New York and Massachusetts in what Felix Rodriguez, the company president and chief executive, called a purely “humanitarian” gesture.

Today, the program expands to homeless shelters and Native American tribes in Maine. Friday, Rhode Island gets its initial delivery.

Many analysts, however, saw the move as a stunt by Chvez aimed at embarrassing the Bush administration. And some say Citgo's generosity — likely to cost it more than $20 million — suggests the company may be turning into a political tool for Chvez.

“It has had a turn for the worse, perhaps the much worse. … Now it's a different entity. It's not completely run like a business,” says Antonio Szabo, a former PDVSA official and the president of Stone Bond Technologies, a Houston energy software firm.

Citgo executives say the company, founded in 1910 as Cities Service Co., is solidly profitable and can afford to offer the poor 40% discounts on heating oil. In an interview, Rodriguez said Chvez, 51, ordered the giveaway so poor Americans wouldn't have to choose between food and heat.

“The only difference between Citgo and other companies is that Citgo has only one shareholder,” he said, referring to the Venezuelan president.

State Department spokesman Adam Ereli welcomed the heating aid, saying, “Citgo is an American company. They are helping Americans in need. That is a good thing.”

Earlier, the company's Hurricane Katrina aid efforts earned a nod from Bush. “The good works of Citgo demonstrate the character and great strength of our nation,” the president wrote Citgo Sept. 27.

Yet, there are echoes in Citgo's recent performance of what has transpired elsewhere in Venezuela's oil industry since Chvez was elected in 1998. After a coup in 2002 briefly ousted him from power, Chvez retaliated by purging the state-owned oil company. Thousands of veteran executives and petroleum engineers were cashiered, replaced by those politically loyal to the president's revolutionary aims.

Today, PDVSA's oil production is down to 1.5 million barrels a day from 3.3 million barrels in 1999, says Luis Giusti, who quit as national oil company president when Chvez took over. But thanks to oil prices above $60 a barrel, Chvez's control of PDVSA has allowed him to lavish billions of dollars on social projects and an anti-American foreign policy.

Citgo, which sells gasoline through more than 13,500 retail stations and is known for its iconic sign towering over Fenway Park's left-field wall, paid the Venezuelan government $697 million in dividends in 2005, up from the previous year's $400 million, Rodriguez said.

PDVSA — the acronym is pronounced Ped-a-vay-sa — first acquired 50% of Citgo in 1986. Four years later, the Venezuelans bought the remaining half of the company from Southland, better known for its ownership of the 7-Eleven convenience stores. The company's six refineries, with a capacity of 1.1 million barrels of oil a day, are ideally suited for Venezuela's sulfurous, heavy crude oil.

Throughout the 1990s, Venezuelan oil officials allowed the company's American managers enormous autonomy. “Citgo was an American company. We happened to own it,” said Giusti, who headed PDVSA until Chvez took over. “We managed it at arm's length.”

That changed under Chvez. In October 2000, the new president tightened control over Citgo by naming as company president a former army general, Oswaldo Contreras. He was the first Venezuelan to hold the position.

Bush was elected president the following month, but relations didn't completely sour until after Sept. 11, 2001, when Chvez likened the U.S. war in Afghanistan to the terror attacks in New York. Washington later publicly welcomed the coup that toppled him for two days in 2002. Chvez has accused the Bush administration of planning his assassination.

In November, two weeks after leading anti-American protests at a hemispheric summit in Argentina, Chvez told a business group in Caracas: “The planet's most serious danger is the government of the United States. … The people of the United States are being governed by a killer, a genocidal murderer and a madman." The comment followed congressional testimony by a State Department official that labeled Venezuela "a threat to regional stability."

DOJ_NMG_0009589

Asked how the persistent bilateral friction was affecting Citgo, Rodriguez replied, "No effect. Nothing at all." But Chief Operating Officer Jerry Thompson, the most senior American remaining at the company, acknowledged Citgo's customers are concerned. "What it introduces is an element of anxiety, and our competition takes full advantage of that," he says.

The uncertainty was exacerbated for much of last year by a protracted and costly relocation of corporate headquarters, management upheaval and Venezuelan officials' repeated suggestions that they might sell some or all of Citgo.

After decades in Tulsa, Citgo last year completed an $82 million shift to its new five-story headquarters in the heart of Houston's Energy Corridor. The move was designed to benefit the company by planting it squarely in the world's self-proclaimed "energy capital."

But asked whether the move was worth the cost, Thompson says, "In my personal opinion, no."

The relocation also cost the company managers who opted not to leave their longtime home, compounding executive turnover that saw several top American executives and the entire board replaced with Venezuelans.

Giusti, the former PDVSA president, says the current Venezuelan management team is weak. He criticized CEO Rodriguez for lacking substantial international experience and fluency in English. "Felix Rodriguez belongs to a group of engineers who never made it to the top. They only took their positions as a result of being loyal to the revolution of Chvez," he says.

In an interview, Rodriguez, 56, noted he is a petroleum engineer with 32 years experience. Speaking in heavily accented English, with occasional help from an interpreter, he said he had held a series of planning and supervisory positions, traveled to the North Sea oil fields on "special assignment" and had been vice president of PDVSA before being named Citgo's CEO.

Even as Rodriguez moved into the top job, Venezuela's energy minister said he was discussing a sale of some or all of Citgo with "several companies." But Rodriguez says there are no sales plans and despite political tensions between Washington and Caracas, the commercial relationship remains "win-win."

Citgo executives also point to their financial record to rebut suggestions that politics are taking precedence over profits. For the first nine months of 2005, the company reported net income of $419.3 million on revenue of $31 billion compared with $430.3 million in profit on revenue of $23.7 billion for the same period last year.

Asked if he was satisfied, Rodriguez replied, "So far, so good." Thompson said the company enjoyed a strong fourth quarter that will push net income above last year's figure. But at a time when industrywide profit margins are fat, some competitors have done much better. Industry leader Valero, for example, earned $2.7 billion on $56.3 billion in revenue for the same period. For every sales dollar, Valero earned 4.7 cents in profit. Citgo reaped just 1.3 cents.

Citgo's most notable recent financial deal involved refinancing its outstanding corporate debt. In October, the company secured bank financing of $1.85 billion, which it used to pay off its bond holders. Among the bonds paid off was an issue of $250 million in 6% senior notes the company had issued just one year earlier.

The move was the corporate equivalent of refinancing a home twice in 12 months. "They did what we thought was a fairly strange thing," said John Addeo, portfolio manager for the MFS High Income fund, which owned $5.7 million of Citgo bonds.

Citgo says it refinanced to obtain greater financial flexibility. The terms of its bond offerings restricted the company's ability to take actions, such as selling assets and paying dividends, according to filings with the Securities and Exchange Commission.

Meanwhile, company executives say drivers pulling up to Citgo gas pumps aren't worried about who owns the refineries that produce the gas. "Being owned by a political entity ultimately means, from time to time, you have to do things with a political bent to them. Heating oil is an example of that," says Thompson. But "By and large, people see us as an American company."

New Era Of U.S-German Relations Set To Begin (KRT)

By Matthew Schofield

Knight Ridder, January 12, 2006

BERLIN - When new German Chancellor Angela Merkel sits down on Friday with President Bush in Washington, they'll be ushering in a new era of trans-Atlantic relations - that much is clear. But what those relations will be is less certain.

After three years of European division and acrimony over the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq, Bush finally has a German friend in Merkel. Yet Merkel has shown that, like much of Europe, she finds some of Bush's policies distasteful, and analysts are wondering how far she'll be willing to go in voicing disagreement.

"She has to battle the image of being Bush's poodle," said Karl-Heinz Kamp, a security policy coordinator for the conservative Konrad Adenauer Foundation in Berlin.

Merkel's strongest criticism of Bush policy to date came last week when she told Der Spiegel, Germany's leading news magazine, that the U.S. prison camp for suspected terrorists at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, should be closed.

DOJ_NMG_0009590

"An institution like Guantanamo in its present form cannot and must not exist in the long term. We must find different ways of dealing with prisoners," she said. "As far as I'm concerned, there's no question about that."

The timing of the remarks, just ahead of her trip to the United States, was seen here as hardly coincidental. In 2003, Merkel was widely criticized in Germany for speaking in favor of Bush's Iraq policy during a trip to Washington, even though German government policy opposed it. Her comments were seen as breaking a taboo against showing division in foreign affairs.

"She was seen by many after that visit as uncritically pro-Bush," Kamp said.

Merkel also has expressed concerns about the U.S. practice of rendition - sending suspected terrorists to third countries for interrogation, where some say they've been tortured. When Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice visited in December, Merkel asked specifically about the legality of the seizure of German citizen Khaled al-Masri. U.S. agents took al-Masri from Macedonia to Afghanistan, where he was held for five months before he was released. Merkel said the United States admitted that al-Masri's arrest had been a mistake.

It's unknown whether Merkel will raise the issue again when she meets with Bush, but there's little doubt in Germany that she's the only European leader with the staying power to help Bush improve his relations with Europe, where he's strongly disliked.

The influence of Bush's main European allies, British Prime Minister Tony Blair and Italian Prime Minister Silvio Berlusconi, is waning. Analysts believe Blair will leave office in the next year, and Berlusconi is dogged by allegations of corruption and inefficiency.

That leaves Merkel in a key position. The Times of London recently called her "Europe's new power broker."

"Germany is the biggest player in Europe, and she's the newest leader," said Richard Whitman, the head of the European Program for the Britain's Chatham House research center. "She's untainted by the past."

Merkel, who took office in November, already has succeeded on domestic and European fronts. The German parliament passed laws she favored that increase governmental transparency, raise sales taxes and grant tax breaks to parents. And she won continentwide praise when she chided European Union members for sacrificing progress to quibble about small amounts of money.

Whitman said he doesn't expect Merkel to offer Bush much: She won't reverse Germany's refusal to send troops to Iraq or increase the German presence in Afghanistan. But she gets along with Bush.

"She may disagree on issues, but she offers a sympathetic ear," he said.

Jan Friedrich Kallmorgen, a trans-Atlantic specialist with the German Council on Foreign Relations, said he expects Merkel won't be as critical of Bush as her predecessor, Gerhard Schroeder, who aligned Germany with Europe as a counterweight to U.S. influence, was. But she also won't return to the days when Germany saw itself as tied to the United States. Her comments about Guantanamo in Der Spiegel show that, he said.

"It does make a statement to Germans and Europeans that she's not forgetting their concerns about the war on terror," he said.

Karsten Voigt, a coordinator for German-American affairs with the German Foreign Ministry who'll accompany Merkel on her visit to the United States, said Merkel's Guantanamo comments were the result of her growing up in then-communist East Germany and believing that the United States was a symbol of freedom. He said her statements reflect her belief that a U.S. president would want to hear open and honest criticism.

"Washington will be eager to see how she defines herself as chancellor, but so will we," he said. "This is a new role for Germany, involvement in international issues when we are not the cause or the location of the crisis."

After Frosty Times, A Thaw In US-German Relations? (CSM)

By Howard Lafranchi

The Christian Science Monitor, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON - When German Chancellor Angela Merkel visits the White House Friday, no one doubts that a closer rapport between the US and German leaderships will be on display. Like President Bush, she hails from the political right, and as a daughter of the former East Germany, she identifies with Mr. Bush's focus on freedom.

The bigger question is whether the diplomatic defrosting portends a deeper restrengthening of US-German relations and indeed of transatlantic cooperation.

Certainly the personal warmth expected between Ms. Merkel and Bush - so different from the chilly relations the president had with former Chancellor Gerhard Schröder - will be a welcome change. But with differences over Iraq and strategies for the international war on terror continuing to dog the relationship, and with some US officials expressing skepticism about the Atlantic alliance's long-term utility, many experts will be looking for signs that the warming is more than a matter of personalities.

DOJ_NMG_0009591

"Both sides understand this is an opportunity to build a new dynamic, but people will be watching for whether that translates into any concrete policy initiatives," says Karen Donfried, senior policy director of the German Marshall Fund of the US. "My sense is there won't be [any], that this will be the first step down a much longer path." Iran on the agenda

Iran and its nuclear program will be on the agenda, and the two leaders can be expected to express a common insistence that Iran not develop nuclear weapons. Some observers speculate that after Iran's resumption of its nuclear research program this week, the two leaders could go further and announce an initiative to take Iran before the United Nations Security Council.

But German officials say it is probably "too early" for such a step. They add, however, that a meeting of the International Atomic Energy Agency later this month could prompt such a move. European Union foreign ministers were set to meet today on Iran, which could move the EU closer to Security Council referral.

On other fronts, Merkel could use the US meeting to demonstrate decreasing tensions over Iraq by announcing an acceleration of German training of Iraqi police. German officials are hinting such an announcement could be in the offing.

Still, the improvement in US-German atmospherics is not likely to reverse the general drifting apart in transatlantic relations, some experts say.

"The climate has dramatically improved, but below the surface the rift remains alive and well," says Charles Kupchan, who teaches 21st-century geopolitics at Georgetown University in Washington. "The trend lines continue to be those of fragmentation and disillusion."

Mr. Kupchan, who is also a transatlantic scholar at the Council on Foreign Relations, says the Iraq war is the dividing line - when Germany changed from being a country that followed Washington's leadership "as a matter of course," to instead becoming a European leader increasingly independent of Washington that seeks "to rebuild relations on new terms."

"Common values" have replaced dependence as the transatlantic relationship's chief attribute, he adds, but that change requires deeper consultation and cooperation - something Kupchan says the Bush administration is pursuing with Europe in the second term.

But it also leaves the door open to disagreement: For all the common vision on democracy's enlargement, economic development, and fighting AIDS, he says, there is also a list of issues over which the two sides part company, including Iraq, the International Criminal Court, climate change, and US policy toward detainees in the war on terror.

Examples of European countries prepared to roil relations with the United States extend beyond Germany. The Netherlands has so far not extended the mission of its forces within NATO in Afghanistan. If confirmed, such a move could threaten NATO's plans to expand into volatile parts of the country. The Dutch debate has prompted some US officials to question the long-term viability of the Atlantic alliance, if countries opt out of what are deemed crucial missions. Desire for the US to be world leader

German officials say questions about US treatment of detainees at Guantánamo and at secret foreign prisons - an issue of enough importance to European public opinion that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice focused on it during a recent European trip - are meant to help the US rebuild its leadership role.

"We want the US to be the world leader, but to do that we see that the US has to regain its moral high ground," says one European diplomat in Washington. Issues of US treatment of foreigners since the Abu Ghraib scandal have contributed to a decline in America's global image, the official says, and in turn make the US leadership role more difficult.

Indeed, Kupchan says public opinion is one complicating factor that Merkel must face as she seeks to improve relations with the US. Another is that Merkel heads a coalition government - one in which the foreign ministry remains in hands that have a more tempered view of US relations.

Still, the leader-to-leader warmth that is anticipated for tomorrow's meeting has its roots in similar perspectives that are likely to infuse future actions.

Ms. Donfried of the German Marshall Fund notes, for example, that Merkel stressed in her inaugural address the role that gaining freedom has played in her life. "That's something that will resonate in the Bush White House," she says.

It is also likely, she adds, to cause Merkel to give "a different priority" to the perspective of Central and Eastern Europeans - a perspective, experts note, that is generally closer to Washington than that of other Europeans.

As one German official notes, there is good reason for Merkel to value America's role in the world. "Without US support for [German] reunification, a woman from the east could not be leading Germany today and meeting the American president."

Ukraine's Leader Dismisses Parliament's Vote To Fire Premier (NYT)

By Steven Lee Myers

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0009592

KIEV, Ukraine, Jan. 11 - President Viktor A. Yushchenko of Ukraine on Wednesday criticized as illegitimate a parliamentary vote to dismiss his prime minister and government, deepening the country's political turmoil ahead of new elections in March.

"The decision was made by a Parliament that was elected four years ago by the old regime and is living its last weeks," Mr. Yushchenko said during a visit to Kazakhstan, where he attended the inauguration of President Nursultan A. Nazarbayev. "The decision only demonstrates one thing: the destabilization of the situation."

The prime minister, Yury I. Yekhanurov, defied Parliament's vote on Tuesday by presiding over a meeting of the government's ministers on Wednesday.

"We are continuing to fulfill our duties," he said at the meeting, according to news agencies, reversing his initial statement after Tuesday's vote that the ministers would serve only in an acting capacity.

The dispute - prompted by the handling of negotiations with Russia over the price of natural gas - in effect left Mr. Yushchenko's government in a sort of political limbo. It not only undermined his political position before the elections but also called into question recent constitutional changes that gave Parliament new powers, including the authority to dismiss the government.

Those changes, which went into effect on Jan. 1, were part of an agreement reached in December 2004 to hold a new presidential election after tens of thousands of Ukrainians protested a fraudulent vote that initially handed victory to Mr. Yushchenko's rival, Viktor F. Yanukovich.

Mr. Yushchenko, who has since criticized the agreement, did so sharply again on Wednesday. "In fact, we are dealing with the first consequences of inconsiderate changes to the Constitution," he said in a statement released by his office.

The Parliament that assembles after that vote will elect the country's next prime minister, a significant shift in constitutional power. Given the current impasse, it appeared unlikely that a new government would be formed before then, leaving Mr. Yekhanurov's in place for now.

It also appears unlikely that Mr. Yushchenko's bloc of deputies, Our Ukraine, will be able to control the majority needed to choose the new prime minister. Polls show Mr. Yanukovich's party leading, followed by a bloc led by Yulia V. Tymoshenko, Mr. Yushchenko's erstwhile ally whom he dismissed as his first prime minister in September.

Ms. Tymoshenko, whose supporters voted to dismiss the government, has been a vociferous critic of the agreement that ended the dispute over gas prices, vowing to challenge it in court. Others in Parliament said that while lawmakers could not directly reject the deal, they could challenge related interstate agreements with Russia, including those setting the amounts of gas supplied.

Nestor I. Shufrich, a deputy who voted against Mr. Yushchenko's government on Tuesday, questioned why Ukraine had agreed to changes in gas contracts that were valid until at least 2009. "We still have time to review this contract and return to the earlier signed and ratified contracts," he said in an interview.

Under the complicated terms of the deal, reached last week after a brief shutdown of Russian gas, Ukraine agreed to pay nearly double the price it paid under a 2004 agreement.

While in Kazakhstan, Mr. Yushchenko met with President Vladimir V. Putin of Russia, and called the deal "a healthy compromise." Mr. Putin praised the "mutually beneficial decisions" reached after the showdown.

Blair In Plea To Bush For Rolls Contract (FT)

By Edward Alden and Peter Spiegel and James Blitz

Financial Times, January 12, 2006

Tony Blair, the British prime minister, has made a “very forceful” personal plea to President George W. Bush to save a $2.4bn (€2bn) contract for Rolls-Royce and General Electric to develop a second engine for the Joint Strike Fighter, the world’s biggest military programme.

According to US and UK officials, the request was made in a video-conference call between the two leaders, which came just days after Mr Blair sent a letter to Mr Bush outlining his case.

“The prime minister was very clear and very forceful,” said a British official close to the issue, referring both to the letter and the subsequent personal conversation. “This is obviously important to Rolls-Royce. But as a matter of policy, we also want to promote as much co-operation as possible between the US and our defence industry.”

Mr Blair is hoping the White House will reverse a Pentagon decision to kill the engine before the proposed 2007 defence budget is sent to Congress next month. The $2.4bn contract calls for the two companies to develop a second JSF engine that would compete with the primary engine being developed by Pratt & Whitney of the US.

The second engine was originally intended to provide competition for all buyers of the JSF, but the war in Iraq has forced the Pentagon to find a series of equipment cuts in order to meet administration budget targets, and the second engine is among the cuts currently being proposed. GE controls 60 per cent of the consortium building the second engine, and Rolls of the UK has a 40 per cent stake.

DOJ_NMG_0009593

People familiar with the lobbying campaign said Mr Blair has lent his full muscle to the effort and involved several senior British officials, including Jonathan Powell, Mr Blair's chief of staff. "This is at a level and degree of intensity that few outsiders appreciate," said Loren Thompson, a defence analyst with close ties to the Pentagon. Given the Pentagon's budgetary problems, securing a change of position would be a remarkable and surprising political achievement for Mr Blair.

Sir Digby Jones, director-general of the CBI, the country's largest business lobbying group, added: "This is personal for Blair. Britain is in many, many ways the only friend America has got. Blair personally takes the heat everywhere he goes because of that relationship, and we don't see very much coming back by way of America saying, 'We understand that, thank you'."

Despite Mr Blair's personal lobbying, industry and Whitehall insiders said yesterday that there is considerable debate within the British government about how forcefully to back Rolls with the Bush administration.

The UK, which is the Pentagon's lead partner on the $240bn JSF programme, is in the middle of tense, long-term negotiations with the US over whether it will get access to all the technologies it needs to operate the aircraft independently of American contractors.

In addition, the entire programme has been under threat from Pentagon budget cutters.

"The important thing is keeping the programme together," said one industry official.

Blair Program To Teach Respect (WT)

By Al Webb

The Washington Times, January 12, 2006

LONDON -- British Prime Minister Tony Blair, introducing a key plank of his third and final term in office, has started a $140 million action plan dubbed "Respect" to attack anti-social problems ranging from street hooligans to "neighbors from hell" who could be thrown out of their homes.

In an address to social workers at his office at 10 Downing St., Mr. Blair said the nation has been fighting "21st-century crime with 19th-century methods" and called for a system of speedy "summary justice" to bypass traditional courts.

The judge and jury process, he claimed, is "too cumbersome, too remote from reality to be effective" in today's world.

Mr. Blair has already announced that he intends to step down as prime minister after completing the third term to which he was elected in May, and the ambitious, 44-page "Respect Action Plan" was seen as a shot at gaining a major political -- and popular -- success as his trouble-plagued governance nears its end.

To promote the plan, Mr. Blair traveled to Swindon, about 60 miles west of London, to hose down graffiti on a red-brick wall -- a public relations exercise that police said had among its spectators the youths suspected of spraying on the graffiti in the first place. They were not arrested.

Critics immediately attacked Mr. Blair's plan, one dismissing it as "rubbish," and another describing it as a package of "minor tweaks to existing measures and shock tactics."

The program he announced yesterday envisions evicting out-of-control families from their homes, even if privately owned, for up to three months, and rehousing them in a network of residential centers, or "sin bins," to teach them how to behave.

Mr. Blair, who admitted to the BBC on Tuesday to having disciplined his own children with an occasional "smack," said the bill targets so-called "neighbors from hell" whose anti-social activities run the gamut from loud music at all hours to fighting and brawling, including yelling, screaming children and bullying others. Problem families also could find their government housing benefits, worth hundreds of dollars a month in many cases, cut off.

The "Respect" plan outlines on-the-spot fines of up to $175 for street hooligans and vandals caught attacking passers-by, damaging vehicles and scrawling graffiti on walls, buses and trains. It says stiffer penalties are in store for thugs who attack government workers, and there are instant fines for causing trouble in hospitals.

It gives police and other authorities increased powers to close and board up "nuisance" premises, including houses, pubs and other bars -- a problem that some fear has already been worsened by the recent expansion of bar hours, in some cases to around the clock, for establishments selling alcohol.

A key element in the action plan centers on efforts to control unruly children and to help their beleaguered parents. Schools are given the go-ahead to take out parenting orders for children of any age who seriously misbehave, and a national parenting academy is to be set up to train health and social-service staff how to teach families "responsibility."

But in a television appearance, Mr. Blair insisted the public would have to help if the action plan is to work.

"I can provide the power and resources," he said, but "I cannot force everyone to implement these powers ... [although] I can ask them to do it."

DOJ_NMG_0009594

The prime minister immediately came under fire.

"Respect?" One police officer gibed. "They [hooligans and vandals] can't even spell the word. What they need is to be named and shamed."

The officer targeted the government's use of "anti-social banning orders" -- "asbos" -- aiming at halting youths from causing trouble in specific areas. "Even an 'asbo' is a badge of honor to some of these kids."

The prime minister also faced accusations that some of the "initiatives" were, in fact, old policies that have been tried and found wanting. Parenting orders were introduced in 1998, during the first Blair administration, but political critic Edward Heathcoat Amory said only 1,425 have been used, "so their effect after eight years is vanishingly small."

On-the-spot fines were ordered up a few years ago, but they were ridiculed by police, and few were ever paid. Attempts to punish misbehavior in schools have already seen teachers and education officials overruled by local government councils under pressure from parents.

Kazakh Chief Extends Rule (WT)

By Christopher Pala

The Washington Times, January 12, 2006

ALMATY, Kazakhstan -- In a ceremony as rich in irony as in glitter, President Nursultan Nazarbayev, who has led Kazakhstan for 16 years, was sworn in yesterday for another seven-year term.

It unfolded on live television in the new presidential palace in Astana, which Mr. Nazarbayev, 65, made the country's capital since 1996. Located at the end of a promenade reminiscent of the Mall in Washington, the year-old palace is modeled on the White House, but is much larger.

Mr. Nazarbayev entered a large hall wearing a business suit and a heavy medallion necklace. The rousing national anthem, which he had rewritten, was played. Then, his hand resting on the constitution -- which he largely wrote -- he swore, in a low monotone, to "serve the people honestly."

Among the guests and eight heads of state were Presidents Mikhail Saakashvili of Georgia, Viktor Yushchenko of Ukraine and Kurmanbek Bakiyev of Kyrgyzstan -- all advocates of Western-style democracy brought to power by popular uprisings sparked by stolen elections.

They helped inspire the campaign of a former prosecutor, Zharmakhan Tuyakbay, who challenged Mr. Nazarbayev in the Dec. 4 presidential election.

Mr. Tuyakbay's supporters wore yellow scarves, an echo of the orange scarves that came to symbolize the Ukrainian revolution.

Opinion polls had given Mr. Tuyakbay 20 percent of the vote and Mr. Nazarbayev between 60 percent and 70 percent. But, after reports of widespread ballot-stuffing, the election commission announced that Mr. Nazarbayev had won 91 percent while Mr. Tuyakbay -- whose party has since been decertified -- got 6 percent.

But in Kazakhstan, unlike the other three countries, not a single street demonstration erupted to protest the vote. Opposition leaders said they did not want to be blamed if the government opened fire on demonstrators.

Mr. Nazarbayev had promised an honest election as part of his drive to become the first post-Soviet country to head the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE), the region's premier pro-democracy organization.

The election had presented the West with an unusual conundrum: how to deal with a genuinely popular dictator of an oil-rich and strategic country who, despite muzzling the press, stifling the opposition and brushing aside mounting evidence of nepotism and corruption, would have won easily without cheating.

The answer could be seen in the praise that Columbia University-educated Mr. Saakashvili heaped on his host in an interview on state television, and in the letter from President Bush that the head of the six-member U.S. delegation, Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns, handed to Mr. Nazarbayev before the ceremony.

"I look forward to working with you to fulfill our nations' shared commitment to strengthen democracy and increase regional prosperity," Mr. Bush wrote, according to a text released by the Kazakh Embassy in Washington.

Britain, which has advocated denying Kazakhstan the OSCE chairmanship unless Mr. Nazarbayev reverses the increasing authoritarianism that began a decade ago, sent only its ambassador.

Student Says He Was Detained In Zimbabwe (WP)

By David A. Fahrenthold

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0009595

CAMBRIDGE, Mass., Jan. 11 -- A Harvard University student from the District said Wednesday that he had been arrested in Zimbabwe during a trip to research his senior thesis, then held in grimy cells for five days before his parents and local lawyers managed to free him.

Amar Bakshi, 21, a Harvard senior and a 2002 graduate of St. Albans School in Northwest, said the key to his release might have been a surreptitious cell phone call he made soon after his arrest on Dec. 30. Speaking quietly in a bathroom, he told a friend that he had been pulled off an outbound airplane by plainclothes officers.

"That was the scariest thing," Bakshi said. "A lot hinged on that phone call."

Bakshi described his ordeal in an interview at a mall near the Harvard campus. It was difficult to find immediate official corroboration: A spokeswoman said the State Department was aware of the case but was unable to provide further information because of privacy concerns. A spokesman for Harvard's Faculty of Arts and Sciences said he would confirm only that Bakshi is a student.

At the Zimbabwean Embassy in Washington, spokesman Wilbert Gwashavanhu said that he could not confirm any part of Bakshi's account. He added that he thought it implausible that a Harvard student would be jailed in Zimbabwe simply for doing research.

"I'm wondering really where the truth rests," Gwashavanhu said.

Bakshi's account of the ordeal was reported previously by the Harvard Crimson, the student newspaper, and in Zimbabwe by the Standard, an independent weekly.

Bakshi said he had gone to Zimbabwe, a southern African nation that has spiraled into poverty and repression in recent years, on Dec. 18. It was the second of two trips he made there last year for his thesis, which concerns political propaganda and the country's youths during the past five years.

During this trip, Bakshi said, he talked to officials in the information ministry for longtime President Robert Mugabe, and collected tapes of news, arts programs and jingles designed to promote government policies on Zimbabwean television.

Bakshi said he was on a plane waiting to depart the airport in Harare, the capital, when five or six men appeared in the jetway. They took him off the plane and into a small room.

"Why are you here? What are these videotapes? You're spying on us," Bakshi recalled the officers saying. They threatened him: "You don't know how horrible this will become."

Bakshi said he made up a diversion, something like "I urgently need to go to the bathroom." Although he had been told to turn his phone off, he called his friend, who then called the U.S. Embassy.

After that, "I was confident that if people knew I was there, the situation would improve," Bakshi said.

It did not at first, however. Initially, Bakshi said, he was taken to a bare holding cell, covered with graffiti left by previous inmates, phrases such as, "Please get me out of here," he said.

After one night, he was moved to a larger jail, where about 120 prisoners were squeezed in among flea-infested mattresses and overflowing toilets. By this time, however, Bakshi said his case had made it to the embassy, which he said sent officials to assure him he would eventually be released.

The news also had made it back to the District, where Bakshi's parents -- both doctors -- live near Sibley Memorial Hospital.

"The first few moments were of panic and of 'My God, what's happening to my boy!' " said his mother, Gita Chopra Bakshi, a pulmonologist. "Then it was a job to do, which was we have to go over there and get him back."

His parents flew to Harare, made connections with local lawyers and eventually had the charges dropped. Bakshi spent a few days in Washington, then returned to Harvard on Wednesday. He said he probably will not be going back to Zimbabwe "for a while."

He said, however, that he intends to write about his experience, on behalf of the many people he met who are probably still in jail. Bakshi recalled one of his fellow inmates, who told him, "in your thesis, make sure to write about all the good things that you saw here with us."

"Then there's sort of this dot-dot-dot . . . and [he] says, 'And be sure to tell them how bad the situation is, too,' " Bakshi said.

DOJ_NMG_0009596

Williams, Jan

From: Williams, Jan

Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 8:19 AM

To: Bradbury, Steve; Brand, Rachel; Clark, John (USMS); Clement, Paul D; Fisher, Alice; Flores, Robert; Gillis, John; Herraiz, Domingo S.; Keisler, Peter D (CIV); Kim, Wan (CRT); Leonhart, Michele M.; McCallum, Robert (SMO); McNulty, Paul J; Moschella, William; O'Connor, Eileen J. (AAG/TAX); Sanchez, William J (CRT); Tamargo, Mauricio J; Tandy, Karen P; Wooldridge, Sue Ellen (ENRD); /o=USDOJ/ou=USAPAE/cn=Recipients/cn=Mailboxes/cn=SMalloy; Agarwal, Asheesh (CIV); Akers, Eric J.; Ames, Andrew; Barnett, Thomas O.; Battle, Michael (USAEO); Beach, Andrew; Beck, Cherith (USAARE); Bianco, Joseph F.; Blomquist, Kathleen M; Boardman, Michelle; Boote, John; Bottner, Andrea; Bounds, Ryan W (OLP); Bucholtz, Jeffrey (CIV); Burch, Victoria; Chambers, Shane P; Clinger, James H; Cohen, Brian; Cohn, Jonathan (CIV); Comisac, Rena (CRT); Cook, Elisebeth C; Cook, Marita L. (USAWY); Cooperstein, Theodore M; Coppenger, Chesed L. (TAX); Costigan, Michael; Coughlin, Robert; Curtis, O. Benton; Daley, Cybele; David, Matt; Dhillon, Uttam; Dummermuth, Matt (USAVAE); Eisenberg, John; Elwood, Courtney; Elwood, John; Flaherty, Connor; Freeman, Sharee (CRT); Friedrich, Matthew; Gambatesa, Donald (USMS); Garre, Gregory G; Glut, Martha (USANE); Gober, Chris; Golden, Lois; Goodling, Monica; Gorsuch, Neil M; Greg Harris; Hagle, Timothy; Harris, Gregory; Henke, Tracy (SMO); Hertling, Richard; Hofer, Patrick F. (TAX); Hoisington, Jana; Holland, Eric W; Irving, John (ODAG); Jaffer, Jamil N; Jordan, Theresa (USADE); Jungeblut, Neal P.; Katsas, Gregory (CIV); Keehner, Laura; Kessler, Elizabeth A; Korn, Jennifer; Lesch, Jaclyn; Little, Kimani (CRT); Longlet, Benjamin; Lonick, Saundra; Luckinbill, Trent W.; Macklin, Kristi R; MacLean, Alex (CRT); Magnuson, Cynthia; Marshall, C. Kevin; Martinson, Wanda; Masoudi, Gerald; McArthur, Patrick; McDonald, Bruce; McFarland, Steven T (ODAG); McIntosh, Brent; McKee, Cindy (USAKS); McKeown, Matt (ENRD); McKnight, Cynthia M (CRT); McNally, Edward; McNeil, Tucker (OPA); Mercer, Bill (ODAG); Meron, Daniel (CIV); Metcalf, Mark H (CRT); Miranda, Matthew; Monheim, Thomas; Moore, Miriam (ODAG); Morrison, Richard T. (TAX); Murphy, Sean; Neumayr, Mary (ENRD); Nichols, Carl (CIV); Nichols, Grant W; Nowacki, John; OConnell, James; Otis, Lee L; Otis, William G.; Pagliocca, Theresa; Parsky, Laura; Peabody, Payson R. (TAX); Peed, Carl; Potter, Janet; Racicot, Tim (USAMT); Reyes, Luis (SMO); Roberts, Crystal; Roe, Price (OCIO); Roehrkasse, Brian; Roper, Matt M; Rosenberg, Chuck; Rowe, Kiri; Sampson, Kyle; Schlozman, Brad (CRT); Schmitt, Glenn; Schwartz, Arthur; Scolinos, Tasia; Seidel, Rebecca; Selim, George (CRS); Sellers, Kiahna (OAG); Smith, Kimberly A; Sours, Raquel; Strug, Kerri; Swenson, Lily F; Taylor, Bruce A.; Tenpas, Ronald J (ODAG); Todd, Gordon (OLP); Tomlinson, Linda (USANH); Turner, Donald J. (USAPAM); Tzitzon, Nicholas; Underhill, Deborah; Vargas, Omar (CRT); Voris, Natalie (USAEO); Warren, Julie; Williams, Jan; Woodruff, William; Boente, Dana J. (TAX); Nash, Stuart (ODAG); Oldham, Jeffrey L; Pacold, Martha M; Purpura, Michael M (ODAG); Rowan, Patrick (ODAG); Senger, Jeffrey M; Taylor, Jeffrey (OAG); Webb, Lauren; White, Clifford

Subject: The Morning Update: 1/12/06

Attachments: tmp.htm

Importance: Low

The Morning Update

Today, President Bush travels to the Gulf Coast to assess Federal support for Gulf Coast rebuilding and recovery. In New Orleans, the President will meet with small business owners and community leaders to discuss efforts to aid rebuilding. The President will then travel to Mississippi and will make remarks on Gulf Coast reconstruction, the progress being made, and the work still left to be done.

11:05 am: THE PRESIDENT participates in a Roundtable with Small Business Owners and

CST Community Leaders

TBA Location | New Orleans, Louisiana

1:25 pm: THE PRESIDENT makes Remarks on Gulf Coast Reconstruction

CST St. Stanislaus College | Bay St. Louis, Mississippi

6:05 pm: THE PRESIDENT attends a Republican National Committee Reception

EST Private Residence | Palm Beach, Florida

From Today's Morning Headlines

At Town Hall Meeting, President Bush Discusses His Commitment To Take The Actions Necessary To Protect The American People. "President Bush said yesterday that he is doing everything 'within the Constitution' to protect the American people from another terrorist attack, but added that congressional hearings into a top-secret U.S. spying program will be 'good for democracy.' In an unusual, 75-minute campaign-style town hall meeting - which included nearly a dozen questions from members of the invited audience - Mr. Bush said he firmly believes he has the authority to order warrantless wiretaps of phone calls by people thought to be linked to al Qaeda or its affiliates. 'I have the right as the commander in chief in a time of war to take action necessary to protect the American people,' <http://www.washingtontimes.com/national/20060111-112617-8839r.htm> he said during the event at the Kentucky International Convention Center in Louisville. 'I can understand concerns about this program. Before I went forward, I wanted to make sure I had all the legal authority necessary to make this decision as your president.'" (Joseph Curl, "Bush Reasserts 'Right' To Order Wiretaps," The Washington Times, 1/12/06)

Washington Times, 1/12/06)

President Bush Travels To The Gulf Coast To Assess Federal Efforts To Support The Recovery. "President Bush will make his first visit in three months to the hurricane-ravaged Gulf Coast, where, his chief of staff says, there is still 'great need - indescribable need.' Andy Card said the Thursday trip to New Orleans and Mississippi was for Bush to see progress there firsthand and personally restate his commitment to rebuilding. Bush was meeting with New Orleans business executives, then giving a speech on reconstruction in Waveland, Miss. His message was that although recovery will be long and expensive, the federal government is in it for the long haul, <http://news.yahoo.com/s/ap/20060112/ap_on_go_pr_wh/bush;_ylt=ArJXoO5ftS hcEMX2g60I7zOs0NUE;_ylu=X3oDMTA3OXIzMDMzBHNlYwM3MDM-> said White House spokesman Trent Duffy." (Nedra Pickler, "Bush To Visit Hurricane-Ravaged Gulf Coast," The Associated Press, 1/12/06)

Liberal Groups Frustrated That Democratic Senators Are Struggling In The Face Of A Confirmation That Appears "Increasingly Inevitable." "Opponents of Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr.'s nomination to the Supreme Court expressed growing frustration Wednesday at the course of his confirmation hearings, saying that Democratic senators were struggling in their effort to build a strong case against him and that his confirmation appeared increasingly inevitable. <http://www.nytimes.com/2006/01/12/politics/politicsspecial1/12dems.html ?adxnnl=1&adxnnlx=1137066036-+by69TW/P1aPqjMHhZobMA> Several said they had been particularly distressed after the first day of questioning of Judge Alito by the Senate Judiciary Committee, and had expressed that concern in calls and e-mail messages to Democratic aides on Tuesday. One Democratic aide said the results of that could be seen on Wednesday in the tougher challenges and follow-up questions to Judge Alito, though by day's end, Judge Alito's opponents said he had again largely escaped efforts to force him to answer questions about his views and record." (Adam Nagourney, "From The Left, Calls To Press Alito Harder," The New York Times, 1/12/06)

The Wall Street Journal Accuses Senate Democrats Of Using "Irrelevant Aracana" Against Judge Alito. "It's a sign of how little Democrats have on Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito that on Day Three of his confirmation hearings they were still pounding away on his membership in an obscure Princeton alumni group that flowered briefly at the judge's alma mater. They can't touch him on credentials or his mastery of jurisprudence, so they're trying to get him on guilt by ancient association. <http://online.wsj.com/article/SB113702966835944404.html?mod=opinion_mai n_review_and_outlooks> ... As for Judge Alito's prospects, if this irrelevant arcana is the most his opponents have, he can start measuring his new judicial robes." (Editorial, "Senate Civility," The Wall Street Journal, 1/12/06)

White House Chief Of Staff Andrew Card Says The President's 2007 Budget Proposal Will Reflect The Administration's Strong Commitment To Spending Restraint. "The Bush administration's upcoming budget blueprint for the U.S. government will 'tighten the belt,' White House chief of staff Andrew Card said on Wednesday. ... The White House was in the final stages of drafting a 'very disciplined' new budget for fiscal 2007, starting October 1, Card said. 'It will fund the appropriate priorities of winning the war on terror, securing the homeland, but it will say, "Tighten the belt,"' <http://news.yahoo.com/s/nm/20060111/pl_nm/bush_budget_dc;_ylt=ApdkEE3_.qpi0Ig7uEy_3KEa.3QA;_ylu=X3oDMTBiMW04NW9mBHNlYwMlJVRPUCUl> he said.

The administration faces budget pressures stemming from the war in Iraq and the cost of rebuilding in the Gulf Coast after the devastation from hurricanes Katrina and Rita in August and September. Card said the 2007 budget will 'make the tough decisions about which programs are necessary, and fund them appropriately but exercise prudence with the taxpayers' money.'" (Susan Cornwell, "Bush To Aim For Tight 2007 Budget:
Card," Reuters, 1/11/05)

Iraqis Increasingly Turning Against Al Qaeda. "The battle, which the insurgents said was fought on Oct. 23, was one of several clashes between Al Qaeda and local Iraqi guerrilla groups that have broken out in recent months across the Sunni Triangle. American and Iraqi officials believe that the conflicts present them with one of the biggest opportunities since the insurgency burst upon Iraq nearly three years ago. They have begun talking with local insurgents, hoping to enlist them to cooperate against Al Qaeda, said Western diplomats, Iraqi officials and an insurgent leader. ... But the split within the insurgency is coinciding with Sunni Arabs' new desire to participate in Iraq's political process, and a growing resentment of the militants.
<http://www.nytimes.com/2006/01/12/international/middleeast/12insurgent.html?pagewanted=1> Iraqis are increasingly saying that they regard Al Qaeda as a foreign-led force, whose extreme religious goals and desires for sectarian war against Iraq's Shiite majority override Iraqi tribal and nationalist traditions." (Sabrina Tavernise And Dexter Filkins, "Local Insurgents Tell Of Clashes With Al Qaeda's Forces In Iraq," The New York Times, 1/12/05)

Yesterday From The White House

President Participates In Discussion On The Global War On Terror <http://www.whitehouse.gov/news/releases/2006/01/20060111-7.html>

* In Focus: National Security <http://www.whitehouse.gov/infocus/nationalsecurity/>
* In Focus: Renewal In Iraq <http://www.whitehouse.gov/infocus/iraq/>

Fact Sheet: The Asia-Pacific Partnership On Clean Development And Climate <http://www.whitehouse.gov/news/releases/2006/01/20060111-8.html>

Interview Of The Vice President By Tony Snow <http://www.whitehouse.gov/news/releases/2006/01/20060111-5.html>

Interview Of The Vice President By Sean Hannity <http://www.whitehouse.gov/news/releases/2006/01/20060111-9.html>

President Signs H.R. 4340, U.S.-Bahrain Free Trade Agreement <http://www.whitehouse.gov/news/releases/2006/01/20060111-1.html>

Press Gaggle By Scott McClellan
<http://www.whitehouse.gov/news/releases/2006/01/20060111-4.html>

You are currently subscribed to Communications Update - Agencies as:
jan.williams@usdoj.gov.
To unsubscribe send a blank email to:
leave-whitehouse-communications-update-agency-1239098E@list.whitehouse.gov

The Morning Update

Today, President Bush travels to the Gulf Coast to assess Federal support for Gulf Coast rebuilding and recovery. In New Orleans, the President will meet with small business owners and community leaders to discuss efforts to aid rebuilding. The President will then travel to Mississippi and will make remarks on Gulf Coast reconstruction, the progress being made, and the work still left to be done.

11:05 am: CST	THE PRESIDENT participates in a Roundtable with Small Business Owners and Community Leaders TBA Location | New Orleans, Louisiana
1:25 pm: CST	THE PRESIDENT makes Remarks on Gulf Coast Reconstruction St. Stanislaus College | Bay St. Louis, Mississippi
6:05 pm: EST	THE PRESIDENT attends a Republican National Committee Reception Private Residence | Palm Beach, Florida

From Today's Morning Headlines

At Town Hall Meeting, President Bush Discusses His Commitment To Take The Actions Necessary To Protect The American People. "President Bush said yesterday that he is doing everything 'within the Constitution' to protect the American people from another terrorist attack, but added that congressional hearings into a top-secret U.S. spying program will be 'good for democracy.' In an unusual, 75-minute campaign-style town hall meeting – which included nearly a dozen questions from members of the invited audience – Mr. Bush said he firmly believes he has the authority to order warrantless wiretaps of phone calls by people thought to be linked to al Qaeda or its affiliates. 'I have the right as the commander in chief in a time of war to take action necessary to protect the American people,' he said during the event at the Kentucky International Convention Center in Louisville. 'I can understand concerns about this program. Before I went forward, I wanted to make sure I had all the legal authority necessary to make this decision as your president.'" (Joseph Curl, "Bush Reasserts 'Right' To Order Wiretaps," The Washington Times, 1/12/06)

President Bush Travels To The Gulf Coast To Assess Federal Efforts To Support The Recovery. "President Bush will make his first visit in three months to the hurricane-ravaged Gulf Coast, where, his chief of staff says, there is still 'great need – indescribable need.' Andy Card said the Thursday trip to New Orleans and Mississippi was for Bush to see progress there firsthand and personally restate his commitment to rebuilding. Bush was meeting with New Orleans business executives, then giving a speech on reconstruction in Waveland, Miss. His message was that although recovery will be long and expensive, the federal government is in it for the long haul, said White House spokesman Trent Duffy." (Nedra Pickler, "Bush To Visit Hurricane-Ravaged Gulf Coast," The Associated Press, 1/12/06)

Liberal Groups Frustrated That Democratic Senators Are Struggling In The Face Of A Confirmation That Appears "Increasingly Inevitable." "Opponents of Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr.'s nomination to the Supreme Court expressed growing frustration Wednesday at the course of his confirmation hearings, saying that Democratic senators were struggling in their effort to build a strong case against him and that his confirmation appeared increasingly inevitable. Several said they had been particularly distressed after the first day of questioning of Judge Alito by the Senate Judiciary Committee, and had expressed that concern in calls and e-mail messages to Democratic aides on Tuesday. One Democratic aide said the results of that could be seen on Wednesday in the tougher challenges and follow-up questions to Judge Alito, though by day's end, Judge Alito's opponents said tougher challenges and follow-up questions to Judge Alito, though by day's end, Judge Alito's opponents said he had again largely escaped efforts to force him to answer questions about his views and record." (Adam Nagourney, "From The Left, Calls To Press Alito Harder," The New York Times, 1/12/06)

The Wall Street Journal* Accuses Senate Democrats Of Using "Irrelevant Aracana" Against Judge Alito. "It's a sign of how little Democrats have on Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito that on Day Three of his confirmation hearings they were still pounding away on his membership in an obscure Princeton alumni group that flowered briefly at the judge's alma mater. They can't touch him on credentials or his mastery of jurisprudence, so they're trying to get him on guilt by ancient association. ... As for Judge Alito's prospects, if this irrelevant arcana is the most his opponents have, he can start measuring his new judicial robes." (Editorial, "Senate Civility," The Wall Street Journal, 1/12/06)

White House Chief Of Staff Andrew Card Says The President's 2007 Budget Proposal Will Reflect The Administration's Strong Commitment To Spending Restraint. "The Bush administration's upcoming budget blueprint for the U.S. government will 'tighten the belt,' White House chief of staff Andrew Card said on Wednesday. ... The White House was in the final stages of drafting a 'very disciplined' new budget for fiscal 2007, starting October 1, Card said. 'It will fund the appropriate priorities of winning the war on terror, securing the homeland, but it will say, "Tighten the belt,"' he said. The administration faces budget pressures stemming from the war in Iraq and the cost of rebuilding in the Gulf Coast after the devastation from hurricanes Katrina and Rita in August and September. Card said the 2007 budget will 'make the tough decisions about which programs are necessary, and fund them appropriately but exercise prudence with the taxpayers' money.'" (Susan Cornwell, "Bush To Aim For Tight 2007 Budget: Card," Reuters, 1/11/05)

Iraqis Increasingly Turning Against Al Qaeda. "The battle, which the insurgents said was fought on Oct. 23, was one of several clashes between Al Qaeda and local Iraqi guerrilla groups that have broken out in recent months across the Sunni Triangle. American and Iraqi officials believe that the conflicts present them with one of the biggest opportunities since the insurgency burst upon Iraq nearly three years ago. They have begun talking with local insurgents, hoping to enlist them to cooperate against Al Qaeda, said Western diplomats, Iraqi officials and an insurgent leader. ... But the split within the insurgency is coinciding with Sunni Arabs' new desire to participate in Iraq's political process, and a growing resentment of the militants. Iraqis are increasingly saying that they regard Al Qaeda as a foreign-led force, whose extreme religious goals and desires for sectarian war against Iraq's Shiite majority override Iraqi tribal and nationalist traditions." (Sabrina Tavernise And Dexter Filkins, "Local Insurgents Tell Of Clashes With Al Qaeda's Forces In Iraq," The New York Times, 1/12/05)

Yesterday From The White House

President Participates In Discussion On The Global War On Terror

- In Focus: National Security
- In Focus: Renewal In Iraq

Fact Sheet: The Asia-Pacific Partnership On Clean Development And Climate

Interview Of The Vice President By Tony Snow

Interview Of The Vice President By Sean Hannity

President Signs H.R. 4340, U.S.-Bahrain Free Trade Agreement

Press Gaggle By Scott McClellan

Press Supplie By Scott McClellan

You are currently subscribed to Communications Update - Agencies as:
jan.williams@usdoj.gov.
To unsubscribe send a blank email to:
leave-whitehouse-communications-update-agency-1239098E@list.whitehouse.gov

Williams, Jan

From: Williams, Jan
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 8:46 AM
To: /o=USDOJ/ou=USAPAE/cn=Recipients/cn=Mailboxes/cn=SMalloy; Agarwal, Asheesh (CIV); Akers, Eric J.; Ames, Andrew; Barnett, Thomas O.; Battle, Michael (USAEO); Beach, Andrew; Beck, Cherith (USAARE); Bianco, Joseph F.; Blomquist, Kathleen M; Boardman, Michelle; Boote, John; Bottner, Andrea; Bounds, Ryan W (OLP); Bradbury, Steve; Bucholtz, Jeffrey (CIV); Burch, Victoria; Chambers, Shane P; Clinger, James H; Cohen, Brian; Cohn, Jonathan (CIV); Comisac, Rena (CRT); Cook, Elisebeth C; Cook, Marita L. (USAWY); Cooperstein, Theodore M; Coppenger, Chesed L. (TAX); Costigan, Michael; Coughlin, Robert; Curtis, O. Benton; Daley, Cybele; David, Matt; Dhillon, Uttam; Dummermuth, Matt (USAVAE); Eisenberg, John; Elwood, Courtney; Elwood, John; Flaherty, Connor; Freeman, Sharee (CRT); Friedrich, Matthew; Gambatesa, Donald (USMS); Garre, Gregory G; Glut, Martha (USANE); Gober, Chris; Golden, Lois; Goodling, Monica; Gorsuch, Neil M; Greg Harris; Hagle, Timothy; Harris, Gregory; Henke, Tracy (SMO); Hertling, Richard; Hofer, Patrick F. (TAX); Hoisington, Jana; Holland, Eric W; Irving, John (ODAG); Jaffer, Jamil N; Jordan, Theresa (USADE); Jungeblut, Neal P.; Katsas, Gregory (CIV); Keehner, Laura; Kessler, Elizabeth A; Korn, Jennifer; Lesch, Jaclyn; Little, Kimani (CRT); Longlet, Benjamin; Lonick, Saundra; Luckinbill, Trent W.; Macklin, Kristi R; MacLean, Alex (CRT); Magnuson, Cynthia; Marshall, C. Kevin; Martinson, Wanda; Masoudi, Gerald; McArthur, Patrick; McDonald, Bruce; McFarland, Steven T (ODAG); McIntosh, Brent; McKee, Cindy (USAKS); McKeown, Matt (ENRD); McKnight, Cynthia M (CRT); McNally, Edward; McNeil, Tucker (OPA); Mercer, Bill (ODAG); Meron, Daniel (CIV); Metcalf, Mark H (CRT); Miranda, Matthew; Monheim, Thomas; Moore, Miriam (ODAG); Morrison, Richard T. (TAX); Murphy, Sean; Neumayr, Mary (ENRD); Nichols, Carl (CIV); Nichols, Grant W; Nowacki, John; OConnell, James; Otis, Lee L; Otis, William G.; Pagliocca, Theresa; Parsky, Laura; Peabody, Payson R. (TAX); Peed, Carl; Potter, Janet; Racicot, Tim (USAMT); Reyes, Luis (SMO); Roberts, Crystal; Roe, Price (OCIO); Roehrkasse, Brian; Roper, Matt M; Rosenberg, Chuck; Rowe, Kiri; Sampson, Kyle; Schlozman, Brad (CRT); Schmitt, Glenn; Schwartz, Arthur; Scolinos, Tasia; Seidel, Rebecca; Selim, George (CRS); Sellers, Kiahna (OAG); Smith, Kimberly A; Sours, Raquel; Strug, Kerri; Swenson, Lily F; Taylor, Bruce A.; Tenpas, Ronald J (ODAG); Todd, Gordon (OLP); Tomlinson, Linda (USANH); Turner, Donald J. (USAPAM); Tzitzon, Nicholas; Underhill, Deborah; Vargas, Omar (CRT); Voris, Natalie (USAEO); Warren, Julie; Williams, Jan; Woodruff, William; Boente, Dana J. (TAX); Nash, Stuart (ODAG); Oldham, Jeffrey L; Pacold, Martha M; Purpura, Michael M (ODAG); Rowan, Patrick (ODAG); Senger, Jeffrey M; Taylor, Jeffrey (OAG); Webb, Lauren; White, Clifford Subject: Reminder: Rsvps are due today at noon

If you have not already done so, please rsvp by noon today for the breakfast with the Attorney General..

U.S. Department of Justice
Senior Executive Service and Schedule C Appointees

You are Invited to a Breakfast Reception hosted by Attorney General Gonzales

Wednesday, January 18, 2006
10:00 a.m. - 10:45 a.m.
Attorney General's Conference Room
Fifth Floor, RFK Main Building

$5.00 Cost at the Door
R.S.V.P. Required
Please respond by Thursday, January 12, at NOON to Jan Williams

Miller, Charles S

From: Miller, Charles S
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 10:08 AM
To: Ames, Andrew; Apisson, Elizabeth M; Baxter, Felix (CIV); Branda, Joyce (CIV); Brody, Stephen (CIV); Bucholtz, Jeffrey (CIV); Bukvics, Jennifer (CIV); Claterbos, Barbara (CIV); Cohen, David M. (CIV); Cohn, Jonathan (CIV); Davidson, Jeanne (CIV); Fadely, Kathlynn (CIV); Fargo, John (CIV); Fielding, Gabrielle (CIV); Figley, Paul (CIV); Flentje, August (CIV); Garren, Timothy (CIV); Glynn, J.Patrick (CIV); Gorsuch, Neil M; Hertz, Michael (CIV); Hollis, Robert (CIV); Hunt, Jody (CIV); Hussey, Thom (CIV); Jeweler, James (CIV); Katsas, Gregory (CIV); Keisler, Peter D (CIV); Kohn, Chris (CIV); Kopp, Robert (CIV); Letter, Douglas (CIV); Levine, Larry (EOIR); Lindemann, Michael (CIV); Magnuson, Cynthia; McCallum, Robert (SMO); Meron, Daniel (CIV); Nichols, Carl (CIV); Nowacki, John; Pyles, Phyllis (CIV); Reyes, Luis (SMO); Riley, Sharon (CIV); Rivera, Jennifer (CIV); Roehrkasse, Brian; Schiffer, Stuart (CIV); Scolinos, Tasia; Seidel, Rebecca; Senger, Jeffrey M; Spellberg, Dianne (CIV); Swenson, Lily F; Thirolf, Eugene; Wilson, Karen L; Zwick, Ken (CIV)
Subject: 1/12/06 Civil Division News

Soldiers sue for reimbursement; Guardsmen seek pay for post-9/11 duty

Whistleblower sues Genentech

General Dynamics, Northrop, Others to Pay $13 Million to Settle False Claims Act Suit

Judge adjusts check-out dates for FEMA-paid rooms in N.O.

R-CALF Files Motion In Canadian Border Case

Boston Globe

1/12/06

Soldiers sue for reimbursement; Guardsmen seek pay for post-9/11 duty

By Kathleen Burge, Globe Staff | January 12, 2006

Four Massachusetts National Guard soldiers, called to active duty after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, filed a federal lawsuit yesterday, arguing they were forced to pay for their own lodging, meals, and commuting expenses while they were protecting the state from terrorism.

The lawsuit is apparently the first claim of its kind nationally, and the soldiers hope to expand their suit to include hundreds of others who have served in the Massachusetts National Guard since Sept. 11, their lawyers said. If the soldiers in all approximately 300 positions at issue were fully reimbursed for every day since Sept. 11, 2001, they would be owed an estimated $73 million, the lawyers said.

The four plaintiffs said they were never given reasons why their reimbursements -- a maximum of $158 a day for food and lodging, plus travel expenses -- were denied.

Sergeant Wayne R. Gutierrez of New Bedford, one of the soldiers suing for reimbursements, said his family struggled under the financial burden of paying for travel expenses and meals while he was serving at Camp Edwards in Bourne. His Guard duty cost him about $18,000 over three years, he said.

"I had to not pay one bill to pay for another," said Gutierrez, who is married and has two children.

Major Winfield Danielson, a spokesman for the Massachusetts National Guard, said his office was reviewing the lawsuit and could not discuss it.

But he said the rules for reimbursements for soldiers are complex and depend on several factors, including what type of duty the soldiers are on, how long they are serving, and whether the government provides lodging where soldiers are working.

He said he couldn't discuss how those factors applied to the four soldiers suing because he did not know their status.

But John Shek of Boston, the soldiers' attorney, said he knew of no other state where similar Guard orders denying the reimbursements for post-Sept. 11 security were issued.

"People just didn't know how to handle this mass activation of people," said Constance A. Driscoll, a military law specialist who is advising the soldiers.

Lawyers for the soldiers say those serving in the National Guard have historically been reimbursed for reasonable expenses for travel, food, and lodging. Many soldiers traveled more than 100 miles a day to report to duty, the lawyers said. The reimbursements, they argue, are required by federal law.

The soldiers who filed the lawsuit are paid with federal money, but they work under the command of the state National Guard. Before Sept. 11, 2001, National Guard duty usually required one weekend a month and two weeks a year of training.

But after the Sept. 11 attacks, soldiers were called to guard a host of possible targets around the state, including military bases, airports, reservoirs, and nuclear power plants. Some Guard soldiers are still in those security postings.

National Guard soldiers who are sent overseas, including those sent to Iraq, are under federal command and paid by the federal government. Those who are called up to respond to natural disasters such as a blizzard are usually under state command and paid by the state.

First Lieutenant Veronica Saffo, a spokeswoman for the Vermont National Guard, said orders calling up National Guard soldiers typically lay out whether lodging and meals are provided by the government, as they are for soldiers who serve one weekend a month, she said.

"If there's not lodging available, you need to find accommodation somewhere and you should be reimbursed for that," said Saffo.

Soldiers are usually reimbursed for one round-trip to their base location for each weekend, or two-week training period, she said. But soldiers are not necessarily reimbursed for daily commutes to their base, she said.

Retired Captain Louis P. Tortorella of Brookline, N.H., another of the Massachusetts Guard soldiers who filed the lawsuit, said he spent about $14,600 of his own money on expenses necessary to carry out his 21-month assignment to Camp Edwards between 2001 and 2003.

He said the trip from his home to Cape Cod was 250 miles roundtrip and took 3 1/2 hours, a drive he made daily because he was refused reimbursement for lodging.

During part of his service, he was assigned to security at the Quabbin Reservoir, Boston's main drinking water source, overseeing about 45 soldiers.

There was no place to sleep at the reservoir, and so he and other soldiers drove home after their shifts.

The lawsuit does not detail how much the other two plaintiffs -- Sergeant Steven M. Littlefield of Plymouth and Joseph P. Murphy of Derry, N.H. -- say they are owed.

Gutierrez said he worries that he will suffer reprisals from the National Guard for his role as a plaintiff in the lawsuit. Some soldiers have told the lawyers they were threatened with discipline by senior officers when they challenged the denials.

"I got two years left," Gutierrez said at a press conference at Shek's office. "I'm just afraid they that might do something that might get me kicked out."

Shek said that although the reimbursements are federally funded, he does not know where the money sought in the lawsuit would come from. So the lawsuit names 10 defendants, including the Massachusetts National Guard, Governor Mitt Romney, and US Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

Charles Miller, a spokesman for the civil division of the US Department of Justice, another of the defendants named in the lawsuit, said he could not discuss it.

He has not seen any similar lawsuits from other states, he said.

END

AP

1/12/06

Whistleblower sues Genentech

PHILADELPHIA — A former Genentech Inc. employee has accused the biotechnology company and marketing partner Biogen Idec Inc. of illegally promoting cancer drug Rituxan as a treatment for arthritis, a use not yet approved by regulators.

Paul McDermott, who worked for Genentech in Falmouth, Maine, from March 2004 until April 2005, filed a whistleblower lawsuit in July 2005 in U.S. District Court in Maine alleging the companies' marketing of Rituxan defrauded government health-care programs.

The suit also says Genentech fired McDermott in retaliation for bringing the matter to the attention of Genentech executives. The suit seeks unspecified damages on behalf of the government, and an order that Genentech rehire McDermott and pay him back wages and other damages.

McDermott's lawsuit hasn't surfaced until now because it was filed under seal on behalf of the federal government. In December, however, the Justice Department declined to intervene in the case and requested that the lawsuit be unsealed.

Genentech, of South San Francisco, was served with a copy of the suit earlier this month, a Genentech executive disclosed Tuesday after the company reported fourth-quarter earnings.

Genentech spokeswoman Caroline Pecquet said the company hasn't fully evaluated the lawsuit. She added that the company was committed to ethical and legal promotional practices.

Officials at Biogen, which is based in Cambridge, Mass., couldn't immediately be reached.

McDermott's lawsuit is the latest legal challenge facing Genentech over Rituxan's marketing. In October 2004, Genentech received a subpoena from the U.S. Attorney's Office in Philadelphia seeking documents related to the promotion of Rituxan. Genentech is cooperating with that investigation, which it said was both civil and criminal in nature.

The promotion of off-label uses of pharmaceuticals has gotten other drug companies in trouble. In 2004, Warner-Lambert pleaded guilty to federal charges that it promoted epilepsy drug Neurontin for off-label uses beginning in the 1990s. Pfizer Inc., which acquired Warner-Lambert in 2000, agreed to pay $430 million to resolve criminal charges and civil liabilities in the case.

The U.S. Food and Drug Administration approved Rituxan in 1997 as a treatment for a type of non-Hodgkin's lymphoma. U.S. sales of the drug grew to $1.8 billion last year.

Studies have shown Rituxan also potential to treat rheumatoid arthritis.

Biogen and Genentech have applied for FDA approval to market Rituxan as such a treatment, and a decision is expected by late February.

It's generally legal for doctors to prescribe FDA-approved drugs in ways that haven't yet been approved by the FDA, and so-called "off-label" prescriptions are common. But drug companies are generally barred from actively promoting off-label uses of their drugs.

McDermott worked as a "professional educational liaison" for Genentech, according to the lawsuit, a job that involved recruiting doctors to promote the use of Rituxan as a treatment for rheumatoid arthritis.

He alleges Genentech sent sales representatives to the offices of rheumatologists, even though Genentech had no products approved by the FDA for such treatments.

Also, McDermott alleges Genentech and Biogen used "sham" consulting agreements to pay rheumatologists whom the companies identified as being "key opinion leaders," who were expected to influence other doctors to begin prescribing Rituxan for arthritis.

The lawsuit alleges that Biogen, the company that discovered Rituxan, had similar marketing practices for the drug.

END

CORPORATE CRIME REPORTER

General Dynamics, Northrop, Others to Pay $13 Million to Settle False Claims Act Suit

Hunt Valve of Salem, Ohio makes valves – but not for your faucet. They build valves for U.S. submarines. We're talking about valves that you can drive an ATV through.

Hunt Valve was a subcontractor to Newport News Shipbuilding, which is a unit of Northrop Grumman, to General Dynamics Electric Boat Company, to Lockheed Martin, and to companies that sold to Bath Iron Works.

Tina Gonter worked as a quality control inspector for Hunt Valve.

When she started working there, she found quality control systems that were badly broken.

How badly broken?

In September 2005, the quality control manager Hunt Valve was sentenced to 33 months in federal prison.

The company's vice president is awaiting sentencing.

"The types of fraud going on at Hunt Valve were staggering," said Frederick Morgan, a False Claims Act attorney at the Volkema, Thomas law firm in Cincinnati, Ohio.

Morgan represents Tina Gonter and her husband in a False Claims lawsuit against the Hunt Valve, General Dynamics, Northrop Grumman and Lockheed Martin.

"Inspections were certified to have occurred while the inspector was on vacation," Morgan told Corporate Crime Reporter. "Equipment was altered to falsify measurements. Material was used without knowing whether it met requirements, and certifications were forged, falsified, and altered on a daily basis. Improper materials were used. Submarine valves were beaten with hammers to make parts fit together."

After years of litigation, the Gonters are about the settle their False Claims Act lawsuit.

According to Morgan, the companies will pay a total of $13 million, with General Dynamics paying the lion's share – $7.7 million.

Under the False Claims Act, a whistleblower who successfully sues and recovers monies defrauded from the U.S. government is entitled to a portion of the recovery.

The Gonter's will recover about 22 percent of the $13 million – or $2.86 million.

"General Dynamics Electric Boat was the lead contractor," Morgan said. "They had personnel on site who clearly should have taken more action than they did. We took the testimony of the Electric Boat person on site. And his testimony showed a considerable degree of consternation over what was going on."

Morgan said that both the Gonters wore wires for the Defense Criminal Investigative Service – "Ms. Gonter's case over a period of many months, including a period where she was recovering from a mastectomy due to breast cancer."

"And the results of the taping were exceptional in terms of demonstrating a level of awareness of problems at Hunt Valve by Electric Boat personnel," Morgan said.

When asked whether federal prosecutors ever considered charging the companies with crimes, Morgan said this:
"That's a question for the prosecutors in Cleveland. I'll say this – the criminal team in the case was aggressive. They looked hard at all of the issues. My understanding is that there remains an open criminal investigation, but I don't think that it relates to the quality portion of the case. There was a defendant named All Stainless. We alleged that All Stainless was used as a minority contractor to funnel Hunt Valve product to General Dynamics. There may have been some certifications in connection with that effort that were inappropriate."

END

Associated Press (AP)
Published: Jan 12, 2006

Judge adjusts check-out dates for FEMA-paid rooms in N.O.

By KEVIN MCGILL

NEW ORLEANS — A federal judge on Wednesday agreed to tweak the government hotel program for hurricane evacuees, hoping to ensure none are forced out of any New Orleans hotels by an expected influx of Mardi Gras tourists.

U.S. District Judge Stanwood Duval's order, formulated in a court hearing for issuance on today, means that many evacuees in the government-funded hotel program in New Orleans will be allowed to stay in their rooms until March 1 — the day after Mardi Gras.

Hoteliers in New Orleans have complained that the ever-changing deadline for the end of the Federal Emergency Management Agency hotel program led to confusion over whether they would have vacancies for Mardi Gras.

Some booked rooms for the popular tourist season, only to learn the evacuee program had been extended.

Some evacuees have complained they were put on the street by overbooked hotels. Attorneys for the displaced have been working with hotel managers to find them other rooms.

Duval's order Wednesday applies only to New Orleans area hotels. Elsewhere around the country, the check-out date is set for Feb. 27, although some will be able to remain beyond that date under the complex rules of the program.

Attorneys for the government and for evacuees said Duval's order encompasses much of a policy that FEMA had already announced on Monday. Attorneys for evacuees wanted an order from Duval to make sure the policy is legally binding.

The policy, as explained in court Wednesday, requires anyone in the hotel program to register with FEMA and obtain an authorization code by Jan. 30. Anyone who does not register will lose FEMA funding for his hotel on Feb. 7.

People who obtain the code and who receive word on whether they are eligible for other housing assistance by Jan. 30 — such as rental aid or a trailer — can stay until Feb. 13.

Those who obtain the code but don't receive their notification about other aid by Jan. 30 can stay until at least the Feb. 27 or March 1 deadlines. If they receive notification after Feb. 13, they will still have two weeks in the hotel at FEMA expense, even if that takes them past those deadlines.

As of Monday, there were 25,697 families still in FEMA-funded hotel rooms, according to the agency. FEMA is paying for just over 8,600 rooms in Louisiana and 7,000 rooms in Texas.

The bulk of the rest of the families are in hotels in Georgia, Mississippi, Florida, Alabama and California, according to FEMA data.

END

CattleNetwork.com

R-CALF Files Motion In Canadian Border Case

The Ranchers-Cattlemen Action Legal Fund has filed a motion in U.S. District Court in Montana, requesting a hearing before U.S. District Judge Richard Cebull regarding the U. S. Department of Agriculture's minimal risk rule and the Canadian border.

Back in July, the U.S 9th Circuit reversed an injunction against USDA, allowing live cattle under 30 months of age and beef from cattle under 30 months of age into the United States. R-CALF contends that while the 9th Circuit ruling opened the border, it did not "limit or eliminate the need for oral arguments of the case and a ruling by the District Court on the summary judgment motions filed by both R-CALF and USDA," according to a statement

The July decision only affected the injunction, not "the merits of the entire case," said R-CALF President Leo McDonnell. "We're asking the District Court to resume its consideration of our case," he said.

END

Comisac, Rena (CRT)

From: Comisac, Rena (CRT)
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 10:58 AM
To: Beach, Andrew
Cc: Kim, Wan (CRT); Gorsuch, Neil M; Reyes, Luis (SMO); Swenson, Lily F; Schlozman, Brad (CRT); Longwitz, Tobi (CRT); Vargas, Omar (CRT)
Subject: Scheduling request form
Attachments: AG Scheduling Form 2.wpd

Andy -- over the holidays you were kind enough to put a placeholder on the AG's calendar for a press conference that may be held on February 10 in New York. I've attached the scheduling request form that essentially codifes that informal placeholder. Pls. let me or Tobi know if you have any questions.
Thanks.

Attorney General Scheduling Request

(for DOJ Events)

TO: Andrew Beach
Assistant to the Attorney General for Scheduling

FAX: 7-2825

THROUGH: Office of the Associate Attorney General

FROM: Rena Comisac, DAAG, CRT

REQUEST: To hold a press conference in the Eastern District of New York

PURPOSE: To announce the sentence of a defendant recently convicted of human trafficking and other offenses in United States v. Daniel Perez Alonzo; to unveil the Department's human trafficking report of activities 2001-2005; and to draw attention to the Department's funding of six new multi-disciplinary anti-human trafficking task forces.

WHAT IS THE REQUESTED ROLE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: To speak at the press conference on the topics listed above. Press conference should last approximately 1 hour.

BACKGROUND: On April 5, 2005, Daniel Perez Alonzo and co-defendants Josue Flores Carreto and Gerardo Flores Carreto pled guilty to a 27-count indictment charging them with forcing young Mexican women into prostitution in brothels throughout the New York City metropolitan area, including Queens and Brooklyn, between 1991 and 2004. Three other associates of the defendants previously entered guilty pleas, and two other defendants await extradition from Mexico. Perez Alonzo pled guilty to violating two counts of 18 U.S.C. § 371 (conspiring to engage in sex trafficking and conspiring to import aliens for immoral purposes), four counts of 18 U.S.C. § 1591 (sex trafficking), one count of 18 U.S.C. § 1594 (attempted sex trafficking), four counts of 18 U.S.C. § 1589 (forced labor), four counts of 18 U.S.C. § 2421 (Mann Act violations), four counts of 8 U.S.C. § 1328 (importation of an alien for immoral purposes) and eight counts of 8 U.S.C. § 1324 (alien smuggling). Perez Alonzo and his co-defendants admitted that they recruited young, uneducated Mexican women from impoverished backgrounds, smuggled them into Mexico to the United States, and then forced them into prostitution, using beatings and threats to children in the custody of the defendants' families in Mexico to maintain control over the women. The conspiracy may have involved as many as fifty victims.

Perez Alonzo is scheduled to be sentenced on February 10, 2006. Probation calculates his sentence at level 41 (324-405 months), but in addition points out a number of aggravating factors (including the scope of the operation and the guidelines' cap on the multiple-count adjustment), which could justify an even higher sentence.

The Civil Rights Division is presently compiling a report of the Department's cumulative efforts to fight human trafficking from 2001-2005. This report is scheduled to be completed in early February, prior to the Kaufmans' sentencing.

OJP has funded approximately six new multi-disciplinary anti-human trafficking task forces. There are currently 32 of these task forces, which combine federal, state, local, and NGO resources to share intelligence and spur investigations of human trafficking.

DATE & TIME: February 10, 2006, following sentencing at 2:30 p.m.

LOCATION: U.S. Courthouse, 225 Cadman Plaza East, Brooklyn, New York.

DURATION: The press conference will likely be concluded in an hour.

PRESS COVERAGE: TBD

POSSIBLE PARTICIPANTS AND APPROXIMATE NUMBER: In addition to the Attorney General, possible participants include Civil Rights AAG Wan Kim; E.D.N.Y. U.S. Attorney Rosslyn Mauskopf; HQ representatives and/or SACs of NY field offices of DHS Bureau of Customs and Immigration Enforcement and Federal Bureau of Investigation.

REMARKS REQUIRED: Yes

RECOMMENDED BY: CRT (AAG Wan Kim, PDAAG Brad Schlozman, DAAG Rena Comisac)

COORDINATED WITH: OASG (COS Luis Reyes, PDAAG Neil Gorsuch)

APPROVED BY:

EVENT CONTACT AND PHONE NUMBER: Tobi Longwitz, 4-3846

Elwood, Courtney

From:	Elwood, Courtney
Sent:	Thursday, January 12, 2006 12:06 PM
To:	Kim, Wan (CRT); Comisac, Rena (CRT); Sampson, Kyle; Gorsuch, Neil M; Reyes, Luis (SMO); Swenson, Lily F; Mercer, Bill (ODAG)
Cc:	Roberts, Crystal; Scolinos, Tasia; Holland, Eric W
Subject:	Re: Operation Home Sweet Home

Thanks. I'll look forward to reading this. I am also CC'ing Martha Pacold of OAG who works with us on CRT matters.

Sent from my BlackBerry Wireless Handheld

-----Original Message-----
From: Kim, Wan (CRT) <Wan.Kim@crt.usdoj.gov>
To: Comisac, Rena (CRT) <Rena.Comisac@crt.usdoj.gov>; Sampson, Kyle <Kyle.Sampson@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Elwood, Courtney <Courtney.Elwood@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Gorsuch, Neil M <Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Reyes, Luis (SMO) <Luis.Reyes@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Swenson, Lily F <Lily.Fu.Swenson@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Mercer, Bill (ODAG) <Bill.Mercer@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
CC: Roberts, Crystal <Crystal.Roberts@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Scolinos, Tasia <Tasia.Scolinos@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Holland, Eric W <Eric.W.Holland@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
Sent: Thu Jan 12 11:44:15 2006
Subject: RE: Operation Home Sweet Home

One clarification: the all time record is 329 tests in FY 2000.

In FY 2005, we conducted 205 tests -- and this is the figure we propose to double to 410 by FY 2007.

-----Original Message-----
From: Comisac, Rena (CRT)
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 11:38 AM
To: Sampson, Kyle; Elwood, Courtney; Gorsuch, Neil M; Reyes, Luis (SMO); Swenson, Lily F; Mercer, Bill (ODAG)
Cc: Kim, Wan (CRT); Roberts, Crystal; Scolinos, Tasia; Holland, Eric W
Subject: Operation Home Sweet Home

Attached is a draft proposal setting forth our strategy to increase CRT's efforts to detect race and national origin discrimination in the housing market. Our Housing and Civil Enforcement Section is confident that the target number of 410 paired tests by FY2007 would represent an all-time high (the current record is 329 tests in FY2005). The proposal, while succinct, represents the culmination of our efforts over the past month or so to "kick the tires" both within the Division and within the Department to ensure that the goals we set forth are achievable. We are working with OPA and OIPL to formulate a more specific roll-out strategy, and will submit a finalized proposal once we have a recommendation.

<< File: HCE testing memo.wpd >>

Gorsuch, Neil M

From: Gorsuch, Neil M
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 1:08 PM
To: Comisac, Rena (CRT)
Subject: Re: Operation Home Sweet Home

Any chance we could double the all tiime high?

-----Original Message-----
From: Comisac, Rena (CRT) <Rena.Comisac@crt.usdoj.gov>
To: Sampson, Kyle <Kyle.Sampson@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Elwood, Courtney <Courtney.Elwood@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Gorsuch, Neil M <Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Reyes, Luis (SMO) <Luis.Reyes@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Swenson, Lily F <Lily.Fu.Swenson@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Mercer, Bill (ODAG) <Bill.Mercer@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
CC: Kim, Wan (CRT) <Wan.Kim@crt.usdoj.gov>; Roberts, Crystal <Crystal.Roberts@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Scolinos, Tasia <Tasia.Scolinos@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Holland, Eric W <Eric.W.Holland@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
Sent: Thu Jan 12 11:37:38 2006
Subject: Operation Home Sweet Home

Attached is a draft proposal setting forth our strategy to increase CRT's efforts to detect race and national origin discrimination in the housing market. Our Housing and Civil Enforcement Section is confident that the target number of 410 paired tests by FY2007 would represent an all-time high (the current record is 329 tests in FY2005). The proposal, while succinct, represents the culmination of our efforts over the past month or so to "kick the tires" both within the Division and within the Department to ensure that the goals we set forth are achievable. We are working with OPA and OIPL to formulate a more specific roll-out strategy, and will submit a finalized proposal once we have a recommendation.

Comisac, Rena (CRT)

From: Comisac, Rena (CRT)
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 1:19 PM
To: Gorsuch, Neil M
Subject: Re: Operation Home Sweet Home

Perhaps. It would take a very significant influx of resources. I will be glad to explore it.

Sent from my BlackBerry Wireless Handheld

-----Original Message-----
From: Gorsuch, Neil M <Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
To: Comisac, Rena (CRT) <Rena.Comisac@crt.usdoj.gov>
Sent: Thu Jan 12 13:07:44 2006
Subject: Re: Operation Home Sweet Home

Any chance we could double the all tiime high?

-----Original Message-----
From: Comisac, Rena (CRT) <Rena.Comisac@crt.usdoj.gov>
To: Sampson, Kyle <Kyle.Sampson@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Elwood, Courtney <Courtney.Elwood@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Gorsuch, Neil M <Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Reyes, Luis (SMO) <Luis.Reyes@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Swenson, Lily F <Lily.Fu.Swenson@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Mercer, Bill (ODAG) <Bill.Mercer@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
CC: Kim, Wan (CRT) <Wan.Kim@crt.usdoj.gov>; Roberts, Crystal <Crystal.Roberts@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Scolinos, Tasia <Tasia.Scolinos@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Holland, Eric W <Eric.W.Holland@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
Sent: Thu Jan 12 11:37:38 2006
Subject: Operation Home Sweet Home

Attached is a draft proposal setting forth our strategy to increase CRT's efforts to detect race and national origin discrimination in the housing market. Our Housing and Civil Enforcement Section is confident that the target number of 410 paired tests by FY2007 would represent an all-time high (the current record is 329 tests in FY2005). The proposal, while succinct, represents the culmination of our efforts over the past month or so to "kick the tires" both within the Division and within the Department to ensure that the goals we set forth are achievable. We are working with OPA and OIPL to formulate a more specific roll-out strategy, and will submit a finalized proposal once we have a recommendation.

Gorsuch, Neil M

From: Gorsuch, Neil M
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 1:23 PM
To: Comisac, Rena (CRT)
Subject: Re: Operation Home Sweet Home

I think we should at least explore it. Not sure how doubling from existing level will look when someone compares it to prior highs. I'd really appreciate your lookiong hard at this with Wan.

-----Original Message-----
From: Comisac, Rena (CRT) <Rena.Comisac@crt.usdoj.gov>
To: Gorsuch, Neil M <Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
Sent: Thu Jan 12 13:19:24 2006
Subject: Re: Operation Home Sweet Home

Perhaps. It would take a very significant influx of resources. I will be glad to explore it.

Sent from my BlackBerry Wireless Handheld

-----Original Message-----
From: Gorsuch, Neil M <Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
To: Comisac, Rena (CRT) <Rena.Comisac@crt.usdoj.gov>
Sent: Thu Jan 12 13:07:44 2006
Subject: Re: Operation Home Sweet Home

Any chance we could double the all tiime high?

-----Original Message-----
From: Comisac, Rena (CRT) <Rena.Comisac@crt.usdoj.gov>
To: Sampson, Kyle <Kyle.Sampson@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Elwood, Courtney <Courtney.Elwood@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Gorsuch, Neil M <Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Reyes, Luis (SMO) <Luis.Reyes@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Swenson, Lily F <Lily.Fu.Swenson@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Mercer, Bill (ODAG) <Bill.Mercer@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
CC: Kim, Wan (CRT) <Wan.Kim@crt.usdoj.gov>; Roberts, Crystal <Crystal.Roberts@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Scolinos, Tasia <Tasia.Scolinos@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Holland, Eric W <Eric.W.Holland@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
Sent: Thu Jan 12 11:37:38 2006
Subject: Operation Home Sweet Home

Attached is a draft proposal setting forth our strategy to increase CRT's efforts to detect race and national origin discrimination in the housing market. Our Housing and Civil Enforcement Section is confident that the target number of 410 paired tests by FY2007 would represent an all-time high (the confident that the target number of 410 paired tests by FY2007 would represent an all-time high (the current record is 329 tests in FY2005). The proposal, while succinct, represents the culmination of our efforts over the past month or so to "kick the tires" both within the Division and within the Department to ensure that the goals we set forth are achievable. We are working with OPA and OIPL to formulate a more specific roll-out strategy, and will submit a finalized proposal once we have a recommendation.

Reyes, Luis (SMO)

From: Reyes, Luis (SMO)
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 2:23 PM
To: Scolinos, Tasia; Gorsuch, Neil M; Swenson, Lily F
Subject: RE: 2/10/06 Trafficking Press Event - Long Island, NY

That is exactly along the lines of what we and OAG (Sampson, Elwood) were thinking. The report will likely be published before the end of the month. (Final draft has been circulated. Just need to finalize and send to printer). Our thought would be to announce the sentencing, release the report, and reference the OJP money all in one, thereby demonstrating the continued day to day commitment to this issue. The one caveat here: these sentencing dates are in many instances pushed back, sometimes for several months. CRT reports that there is a possibility of this happening here. Accordingly, we have asked CRT to work with OIPL to put together proposed alternative venues for such an announcement in early February (i.e. a speech to an NGO or another group (a MALDEF perhaps) that has a stake this issue). CRT will have a proposed alternative roll out plan for us shortly.

From: Scolinos, Tasia
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 2:11 PM
To: Reyes, Luis (SMO)
Subject: FW: 2/10/06 Trafficking Press Event - Long Island, NY

It seems there could be the making of an event here if we take the new OJP money mentioned in this proposal and also package that with the report you all have been working on. When do you expect that the report will be done?

From: Beach, Andrew
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 12:40 PM
To: Scolinos, Tasia; Roehrkasse, Brian
Subject: 2/10/06 Trafficking Press Event - Long Island, NY

What is your recommendation on this?

From: Comisac, Rena (CRT)
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 10:58 AM
To: Beach, Andrew
Cc: Kim, Wan (CRT); Gorsuch, Neil M; Reyes, Luis (SMO); Swenson, Lily F; Schlozman, Brad (CRT); Longwitz, Tobi (CRT); Vargas, Omar (CRT)
Subject: Scheduling request form

Andy -- over the holidays you were kind enough to put a placeholder on the AG's calendar for a press conference that may be held on February 10 in New York. I've attached the scheduling request form that essentially codifes that informal placeholder. Pls. let me or Tobi know if you have any questions. Thanks.

<< File: AG Scheduling Form 2.wpd >>

Beach, Andrew

From: Beach, Andrew
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 2:29 PM
To: Comisac, Rena (CRT)
Cc: Kim, Wan (CRT); Gorsuch, Neil M; Reyes, Luis (SMO); Swenson, Lily F; Schlozman, Brad (CRT); Longwitz, Tobi (CRT); Vargas, Omar (CRT)
Subject: RE: Scheduling request form

Thanks.
I'll let you know as soon as I have an answer.

From: Comisac, Rena (CRT)
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 10:58 AM
To: Beach, Andrew
Cc: Kim, Wan (CRT); Gorsuch, Neil M; Reyes, Luis (SMO); Swenson, Lily F; Schlozman, Brad (CRT); Longwitz, Tobi (CRT); Vargas, Omar (CRT)
Subject: Scheduling request form

Andy -- over the holidays you were kind enough to put a placeholder on the AG's calendar for a press conference that may be held on February 10 in New York. I've attached the scheduling request form that essentially codifes that informal placeholder. Pls. let me or Tobi know if you have any questions. Thanks.

<< File: AG Scheduling Form 2.wpd >>

Reyes, Luis (SMO)

From: Reyes, Luis (SMO)
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 2:38 PM
To: Gorsuch, Neil M; Beach, Andrew; Scolinos, Tasia; Elwood, Courtney; Swenson, Lily F; Pacold, Martha M
Subject: FW: 2/10/06 Trafficking Press Event - Long Island, NY

Meant to copy Andy, Courtney, and Martha on this.

From: Reyes, Luis (SMO)
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 2:23 PM
To: Scolinos, Tasia; Gorsuch, Neil M; Swenson, Lily F
Subject: RE: 2/10/06 Trafficking Press Event - Long Island, NY

That is exactly along the lines of what we and OAG (Sampson, Elwood) were thinking. The report will likely be published before the end of the month. (Final draft has been circulated. Just need to finalize and send to printer). Our thought would be to announce the sentencing, release the report, and reference the OJP money all in one, thereby demonstrating the continued day to day commitment to this issue. The one caveat here: these sentencing dates are in many instances pushed back, sometimes for several months. CRT reports that there is a possibility of this happening here. Accordingly, we have asked CRT to work with OIPL to put together proposed alternative venues for such an announcement in early February (i.e. a speech to an NGO or another group (a MALDEF perhaps) that has a stake this issue). CRT will have a proposed alternative roll out plan for us shortly.

From: Scolinos, Tasia
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 2:11 PM
To: Reyes, Luis (SMO)
Subject: FW: 2/10/06 Trafficking Press Event - Long Island, NY

It seems there could be the making of an event here if we take the new OJP money mentioned in this proposal and also package that with the report you all have been working on. When do you expect that the report will be done?

From: Beach, Andrew
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 12:40 PM
To: Scolinos, Tasia; Roehrkasse, Brian
Subject: 2/10/06 Trafficking Press Event - Long Island, NY

What is your recommendation on this?

From: Comisac, Rena (CRT)
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 10:58 AM
To: Beach, Andrew
Cc: Kim, Wan (CRT); Gorsuch, Neil M; Reyes, Luis (SMO); Swenson, Lily F; Schlozman, Brad (CRT); Longwitz, Tobi (CRT); Vargas, Omar (CRT)
Subject: Scheduling request form

Andy -- over the holidays you were kind enough to put a placeholder on the AG's calendar for a press conference that may be held on February 10 in New York. I've attached the scheduling request form that essentially codifes that informal placeholder. Pls. let me or Tobi know if you have any questions. Thanks.

<< File: AG Scheduling Form 2.wpd >>

Elwood, Courtney

From:	Elwood, Courtney
Sent:	Thursday, January 12, 2006 2:52 PM
To:	Scolinos, Tasia
Cc:	McNeil, Tucker (OPA); Sampson, Kyle; Gorsuch, Neil M; Kim, Wan (CRT)
Subject:	Fw: Operation Home Sweet Home

I'm intrigued by the idea of adding the announcement of Operation Home Sweet Home to the MLK speech on Monday. What do you'all think?

Also, Tucker, would you mind sending a draft of that speech to Neil?

Thanks.

Sent from my BlackBerry Wireless Handheld

-----Original Message-----
From: Kim, Wan (CRT) <Wan.Kim@crt.usdoj.gov>
To: Elwood, Courtney <Courtney.Elwood@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
Sent: Thu Jan 12 14:23:10 2006
Subject: RE: Operation Home Sweet Home

He certainly could (CRT is prepared to implement it). And he quite possibly should (though I defer to OPA/OIPL on this issue). As I understand it, the temporary FEMA housing is due to expire in early Feb (2/7, I've heard). Now, this could well be extended again, but that's the current plan. So, the issue is a timely one -- and the audience should certainly be receptive.

I would not get into the weeds with numbers (we've put them in the memo so that you folks have them; the only relevant figure is "double the existing level"). I would suggest that the AG simply state that (1) Fair Housing is a fundamental civil right; (2) we have recently seen huge numbers of displaced Americans, many of color, in the wake of Hurricane Katrina; (3) they will be looking to restore a level of permanancy to their lives in the coming months after the temporary FEMA housing expires; (4) housing must be provided on a non-discriminatory basis; (5) he is directing CRT to engage in a initiative, called Project Home Sweet Home, to double the number of tests (by FY07) conducted under the Housing and Civil Enforcement's Testing Program to police that right; (6) the focus on the additional tests will be those areas where displaced Hurricane Katrina residents are seeking housing; and (7) we will vigorously bring lawsuits against offenders.

-----Original Message-----
From: Elwood, Courtney
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 1:55 PM

To: Kim, Wan (CRT)
Subject: Re: Operation Home Sweet Home

Is this something the AG could/should say in his MLK speech on Mon.

Sent from my BlackBerry Wireless Handheld

-----Original Message-----
From: Kim, Wan (CRT) <Wan.Kim@crt.usdoj.gov>
To: Comisac, Rena (CRT) <Rena.Comisac@crt.usdoj.gov>; Sampson, Kyle <Kyle.Sampson@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Elwood, Courtney <Courtney.Elwood@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Gorsuch, Neil M <Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Reyes, Luis (SMO) <Luis.Reyes@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Swenson, Lily F <Lily.Fu.Swenson@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Mercer, Bill (ODAG) <Bill.Mercer@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
CC: Roberts, Crystal <Crystal.Roberts@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Scolinos, Tasia <Tasia.Scolinos@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Holland, Eric W <Eric.W.Holland@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
Sent: Thu Jan 12 11:44:15 2006
Subject: RE: Operation Home Sweet Home

One clarification: the all time record is 329 tests in FY 2000.

In FY 2005, we conducted 205 tests -- and this is the figure we propose to double to 410 by FY 2007.

-----Original Message-----
From: Comisac, Rena (CRT)
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 11:38 AM
To: Sampson, Kyle; Elwood, Courtney; Gorsuch, Neil M; Reyes, Luis (SMO); Swenson, Lily F; Mercer, Bill (ODAG)
Cc: Kim, Wan (CRT); Roberts, Crystal; Scolinos, Tasia; Holland, Eric W
Subject: Operation Home Sweet Home

Attached is a draft proposal setting forth our strategy to increase CRT's efforts to detect race and national origin discrimination in the housing market. Our Housing and Civil Enforcement Section is confident that the target number of 410 paired tests by FY2007 would represent an all-time high (the current record is 329 tests in FY2005). The proposal, while succinct, represents the culmination of our efforts over the past month or so to "kick the tires" both within the Division and within the Department to ensure that the goals we set forth are achievable. We are working with OPA and OIPL to formulate a more specific roll-out strategy, and will submit a finalized proposal once we have a recommendation.

<< File: HCE testing memo.wpd >>

Gorsuch, Neil M

From: Gorsuch, Neil M
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 3:06 PM
To: Elwood, Courtney; Scolinos, Tasia
Cc: McNeil, Tucker (OPA); Sampson, Kyle; Kim, Wan (CRT)
Subject: Re: Operation Home Sweet Home

I have one concern-question on this but will raise it orally.

-----Original Message-----
From: Elwood, Courtney <Courtney.Elwood@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
To: Scolinos, Tasia <Tasia.Scolinos@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
CC: McNeil, Tucker (OPA) <Tucker.McNeil@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Sampson, Kyle <Kyle.Sampson@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Gorsuch, Neil M <Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Kim, Wan (CRT) <Wan.Kim@crt.usdoj.gov>
Sent: Thu Jan 12 14:52:08 2006
Subject: Fw: Operation Home Sweet Home

I'm intrigued by the idea of adding the announcement of Operation Home Sweet Home to the MLK speech on Monday. What do you'all think?

Also, Tucker, would you mind sending a draft of that speech to Neil?

Thanks.

Sent from my BlackBerry Wireless Handheld

-----Original Message-----
From: Kim, Wan (CRT) <Wan.Kim@crt.usdoj.gov>
To: Elwood, Courtney <Courtney.Elwood@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
Sent: Thu Jan 12 14:23:10 2006
Subject: RE: Operation Home Sweet Home

He certainly could (CRT is prepared to implement it). And he quite possibly should (though I defer to OPA/OIPL on this issue). As I understand it, the temporary FEMA housing is due to expire in early Feb (2/7, I've heard). Now, this could well be extended again, but that's the current plan. So, the issue is a timely one -- and the audience should certainly be receptive.

I would not get into the weeds with numbers (we've put them in the memo so that you folks have them; the only relevant figure is "double the existing level"). I would suggest that the AG simply state that (1) Fair Housing is a fundamental civil right; (2) we have recently seen huge numbers of displaced

Americans, many of color, in the wake of Hurricane Katrina; (3) they will be looking to restore a level of permanancy to their lives in the coming months after the temporary FEMA housing expires; (4) housing must be provided on a non-discriminatory basis; (5) he is directing CRT to engage in a initiative, called Project Home Sweet Home, to double the number of tests (by FY07) conducted under the Housing and Civil Enforcement's Testing Program to police that right; (6) the focus on the additional tests will be those areas where displaced Hurricane Katrina residents are seeking housing; and (7) we will vigorously bring lawsuits against offenders.

-----Original Message-----
From: Elwood, Courtney
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 1:55 PM
To: Kim, Wan (CRT)
Subject: Re: Operation Home Sweet Home

Is this something the AG could/should say in his MLK speech on Mon.

Sent from my BlackBerry Wireless Handheld

-----Original Message-----
From: Kim, Wan (CRT) <Wan.Kim@crt.usdoj.gov>
To: Comisac, Rena (CRT) <Rena.Comisac@crt.usdoj.gov>; Sampson, Kyle <Kyle.Sampson@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Elwood, Courtney <Courtney.Elwood@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Gorsuch, Neil M <Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Reyes, Luis (SMO) <Luis.Reyes@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Swenson, Lily F <Lily.Fu.Swenson@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Mercer, Bill (ODAG) <Bill.Mercer@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
CC: Roberts, Crystal <Crystal.Roberts@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Scolinos, Tasia <Tasia.Scolinos@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Holland, Eric W <Eric.W.Holland@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
Sent: Thu Jan 12 11:44:15 2006
Subject: RE: Operation Home Sweet Home

One clarification: the all time record is 329 tests in FY 2000.

In FY 2005, we conducted 205 tests -- and this is the figure we propose to double to 410 by FY 2007.

-----Original Message-----
From: Comisac, Rena (CRT)
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 11:38 AM
To: Sampson, Kyle; Elwood, Courtney; Gorsuch, Neil M; Reyes, Luis (SMO); Swenson, Lily F; Mercer, Bill (ODAG)
Cc: Kim, Wan (CRT); Roberts, Crystal; Scolinos, Tasia; Holland, Eric W
Subject: Operation Home Sweet Home

Attached is a draft proposal setting forth our strategy to increase CRT's efforts to detect race and national origin discrimination in the housing market. Our Housing and Civil Enforcement Section is confident that the target number of 410 paired tests by FY2007 would represent an all-time high (the current record is 329 tests in FY2005). The proposal, while succinct, represents the culmination of our efforts over the past month or so to "kick the tires" both within the Division and within the Department to ensure that the goals we set forth are achievable. We are working with OPA and OIPL to formulate a more specific roll-out strategy, and will submit a finalized proposal once we have a recommendation.

<< File: HCE testing memo.wpd >>

Gorsuch, Neil M

From: Gorsuch, Neil M
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 3:11 PM
To: Kim, Wan (CRT)
Cc: Comisac, Rena (CRT)
Subject: Fw: Operation Home Sweet Home

Fyi. I would appreciate the chance to talk orally abt this issue a bit more tomorrow if that's ok.

-----Original Message-----
From: Gorsuch, Neil M <Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
To: Comisac, Rena (CRT) <Rena.Comisac@crt.usdoj.gov>
Sent: Thu Jan 12 13:07:44 2006
Subject: Re: Operation Home Sweet Home

Any chance we could double the all tiime high?

-----Original Message-----
From: Comisac, Rena (CRT) <Rena.Comisac@crt.usdoj.gov>
To: Sampson, Kyle <Kyle.Sampson@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Elwood, Courtney <Courtney.Elwood@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Gorsuch, Neil M <Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Reyes, Luis (SMO) <Luis.Reyes@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Swenson, Lily F <Lily.Fu.Swenson@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Mercer, Bill (ODAG) <Bill.Mercer@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
CC: Kim, Wan (CRT) <Wan.Kim@crt.usdoj.gov>; Roberts, Crystal <Crystal.Roberts@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Scolinos, Tasia <Tasia.Scolinos@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Holland, Eric W <Eric.W.Holland@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
Sent: Thu Jan 12 11:37:38 2006
Subject: Operation Home Sweet Home

Attached is a draft proposal setting forth our strategy to increase CRT's efforts to detect race and national origin discrimination in the housing market. Our Housing and Civil Enforcement Section is confident that the target number of 410 paired tests by FY2007 would represent an all-time high (the current record is 329 tests in FY2005). The proposal, while succinct, represents the culmination of our efforts over the past month or so to "kick the tires" both within the Division and within the Department to ensure that the goals we set forth are achievable. We are working with OPA and OIPL to formulate a more specific roll-out strategy, and will submit a finalized proposal once we have a recommendation.

Kim, Wan (CRT)

From: Kim, Wan (CRT)
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 3:17 PM
To: Gorsuch, Neil M
Cc: Comisac, Rena (CRT)
Subject: RE: Operation Home Sweet Home

Of course. Rena is on travel, but we can arrange a time that will work.

FYI -- Rena is far more up to speed on this than I am, so I've suggested that she call you first to discuss. My presence in the initial call will only slow you two down!

-----Original Message-----
From: Gorsuch, Neil M
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 3:11 PM
To: Kim, Wan (CRT)
Cc: Comisac, Rena (CRT)
Subject: Fw: Operation Home Sweet Home

Fyi. I would appreciate the chance to talk orally abt this issue a bit more tomorrow if that's ok.

-----Original Message-----
From: Gorsuch, Neil M <Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
To: Comisac, Rena (CRT) <Rena.Comisac@crt.usdoj.gov>
Sent: Thu Jan 12 13:07:44 2006
Subject: Re: Operation Home Sweet Home

Any chance we could double the all tiime high?

-----Original Message-----
From: Comisac, Rena (CRT) <Rena.Comisac@crt.usdoj.gov>
To: Sampson, Kyle <Kyle.Sampson@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Elwood, Courtney <Courtney.Elwood@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Gorsuch, Neil M <Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Reyes, Luis (SMO) <Luis.Reyes@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Swenson, Lily F <Lily.Fu.Swenson@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Mercer, Bill (ODAG) <Bill.Mercer@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
CC: Kim, Wan (CRT) <Wan.Kim@crt.usdoj.gov>; Roberts, Crystal <Crystal.Roberts@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Scolinos, Tasia <Tasia.Scolinos@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Holland, Eric W <Eric.W.Holland@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
Sent: Thu Jan 12 11:37:38 2006
Subject: Operation Home Sweet Home

Attached is a draft proposal setting forth our strategy to increase CRT's efforts to detect race and national origin discrimination in the housing market. Our Housing and Civil Enforcement Section is confident that the target number of 410 paired tests by FY2007 would represent an all-time high (the current record is 329 tests in FY2005). The proposal, while succinct, represents the culmination of our efforts over the past month or so to "kick the tires" both within the Division and within the Department to ensure that the goals we set forth are achievable. We are working with OPA and OIPL to formulate a more specific roll-out strategy, and will submit a finalized proposal once we have a recommendation.

Gorsuch, Neil M

From: Gorsuch, Neil M
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 3:27 PM
To: Kim, Wan (CRT)
Cc: Comisac, Rena (CRT)
Subject: Re: Operation Home Sweet Home

Thanks. Rena would you mind setting up a time with Aloma Shaw for us to speak tomorrow for fifteen mins?

-----Original Message-----
From: Kim, Wan (CRT) <Wan.Kim@crt.usdoj.gov>
To: Gorsuch, Neil M <Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
CC: Comisac, Rena (CRT) <Rena.Comisac@crt.usdoj.gov>
Sent: Thu Jan 12 15:16:53 2006
Subject: RE: Operation Home Sweet Home

Of course. Rena is on travel, but we can arrange a time that will work.

FYI -- Rena is far more up to speed on this than I am, so I've suggested that she call you first to discuss. My presence in the initial call will only slow you two down!

-----Original Message-----
From: Gorsuch, Neil M
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 3:11 PM
To: Kim, Wan (CRT)
Cc: Comisac, Rena (CRT)
Subject: Fw: Operation Home Sweet Home

Fyi. I would appreciate the chance to talk orally abt this issue a bit more tomorrow if that's ok.

-----Original Message-----
From: Gorsuch, Neil M <Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
To: Comisac, Rena (CRT) <Rena.Comisac@crt.usdoj.gov>
Sent: Thu Jan 12 13:07:44 2006
Subject: Re: Operation Home Sweet Home

Any chance we could double the all tiime high?

-----Original Message-----
From: Comisac, Rena (CRT) <Rena.Comisac@crt.usdoj.gov>
To: Sampson, Kyle <Kyle.Sampson@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Elwood, Courtney <Courtney.Elwood@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Gorsuch, Neil M <Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Reyes, Luis (SMO) <Luis.Reyes@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Swenson, Lily F <Lily.Fu.Swenson@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Mercer, Bill (ODAG) <Bill.Mercer@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
CC: Kim, Wan (CRT) <Wan.Kim@crt.usdoj.gov>; Roberts, Crystal <Crystal.Roberts@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Scolinos, Tasia <Tasia.Scolinos@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Holland, Eric W <Eric.W.Holland@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
Sent: Thu Jan 12 11:37:38 2006
Subject: Operation Home Sweet Home

Attached is a draft proposal setting forth our strategy to increase CRT's efforts to detect race and national origin discrimination in the housing market. Our Housing and Civil Enforcement Section is confident that the target number of 410 paired tests by FY2007 would represent an all-time high (the current record is 329 tests in FY2005). The proposal, while succinct, represents the culmination of our efforts over the past month or so to "kick the tires" both within the Division and within the Department to ensure that the goals we set forth are achievable. We are working with OPA and OIPL to formulate a more specific roll-out strategy, and will submit a finalized proposal once we have a recommendation.

Scolinos, Tasia

From: Scolinos, Tasia
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 3:28 PM
To: Elwood, Courtney
Cc: McNeil, Tucker (OPA); Sampson, Kyle; Gorsuch, Neil M; Kim, Wan (CRT)
Subject: RE: Operation Home Sweet Home

I think this is a good proactive story and I am concerned the announcement could get lost in the speech Monday since it is on a holiday. Also, if we fly at a 30,000 foot level, as suggested by Wan's email, the reporters won't really get the whole scope of the proposal. It will need a fact sheet and probably a conference call with reporters to explain why this is significant, give past numbers, explain how the testing program works, etc. My thought was that could follow an AG speech on this with the fact sheet and roundtable. I would like to check with Paul and see if he feels strongly about holding it until after the "Key Priorities" speech of mid-February. If we all agree to move it out before then, one option is to have him talk about this during his speech here at DOJ in honor of MLK. Wan - would we have all the details ironed out by then?

-----Original Message-----
From: Elwood, Courtney
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 2:52 PM
To: Scolinos, Tasia
Cc: McNeil, Tucker (OPA); Sampson, Kyle; Gorsuch, Neil M; Kim, Wan (CRT)
Subject: Fw: Operation Home Sweet Home

I'm intrigued by the idea of adding the announcement of Operation Home Sweet Home to the MLK speech on Monday. What do you'all think?

Also, Tucker, would you mind sending a draft of that speech to Neil?

Thanks.

Sent from my BlackBerry Wireless Handheld

-----Original Message-----
From: Kim, Wan (CRT) <Wan.Kim@crt.usdoj.gov>
To: Elwood, Courtney <Courtney.Elwood@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
Sent: Thu Jan 12 14:23:10 2006
Subject: RE: Operation Home Sweet Home

He certainly could (CRT is prepared to implement it). And he quite possibly should (though I defer to OPA/OIPL on this issue). As I understand it, the temporary FEMA housing is due to expire in early Feb (2/7, I've heard). Now, this could well be extended again, but that's the current plan. So, the issue is a timely one -- and the audience should certainly be receptive.

I would not get into the weeds with numbers (we've put them in the memo so that you folks have them; the only relevant figure is "double the existing level"). I would suggest that the AG simply state that (1) Fair Housing is a fundamental civil right; (2) we have recently seen huge numbers of displaced Americans, many of color, in the wake of Hurricane Katrina; (3) they will be looking to restore a level of permanancy to their lives in the coming months after the temporary FEMA housing expires; (4) housing must be provided on a non-discriminatory basis; (5) he is directing CRT to engage in a initiative, called Project Home Sweet Home, to double the number of tests (by FY07) conducted under the Housing and Civil Enforcement's Testing Program to police that right; (6) the focus on the additional tests will be those areas where displaced Hurricane Katrina residents are seeking housing; and (7) we will vigorously bring lawsuits against offenders.

-----Original Message-----
From: Elwood, Courtney
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 1:55 PM
To: Kim, Wan (CRT)
Subject: Re: Operation Home Sweet Home

Is this something the AG could/should say in his MLK speech on Mon.

Sent from my BlackBerry Wireless Handheld

-----Original Message-----
From: Kim, Wan (CRT) <Wan.Kim@crt.usdoj.gov>
To: Comisac, Rena (CRT) <Rena.Comisac@crt.usdoj.gov>; Sampson, Kyle <Kyle.Sampson@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Elwood, Courtney <Courtney.Elwood@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Gorsuch, Neil M <Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Reyes, Luis (SMO) <Luis.Reyes@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Swenson, Lily F <Lily.Fu.Swenson@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Mercer, Bill (ODAG) <Bill.Mercer@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
CC: Roberts, Crystal <Crystal.Roberts@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Scolinos, Tasia <Tasia.Scolinos@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Holland, Eric W <Eric.W.Holland@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
Sent: Thu Jan 12 11:44:15 2006
Subject: RE: Operation Home Sweet Home

One clarification: the all time record is 329 tests in FY 2000.

In FY 2005, we conducted 205 tests -- and this is the figure we propose to double to 410 by FY 2007.

-----Original Message-----
From: Comisac, Rena (CRT)
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 11:38 AM
To: Sampson, Kyle; Elwood, Courtney; Gorsuch, Neil M; Reyes, Luis (SMO); Swenson, Lily F; Mercer, Bill (ODAG)
Cc: Kim, Wan (CRT); Roberts, Crystal; Scolinos, Tasia; Holland, Eric W
Subject: Operation Home Sweet Home

Attached is a draft proposal setting forth our strategy to increase CRT's efforts to detect race and national origin discrimination in the housing market. Our Housing and Civil Enforcement Section is confident that the target number of 410 paired tests by FY2007 would represent an all-time high (the current record is 329 tests in FY2005). The proposal, while succinct, represents the culmination of our efforts over the past month or so to "kick the tires" both within the Division and within the Department to ensure that the goals we set forth are achievable. We are working with OPA and OIPL to formulate a more specific roll-out strategy, and will submit a finalized proposal once we have a recommendation.

<< File: HCE testing memo.wpd >>

Gorsuch, Neil M

From: Gorsuch, Neil M
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 3:30 PM
To: Scolinos, Tasia
Subject: Re: Operation Home Sweet Home

Fyi Brian reports we are going to be delayed a bit further here so will have some more time on the ground.

-----Original Message-----
From: Scolinos, Tasia <Tasia.Scolinos@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
To: Elwood, Courtney <Courtney.Elwood@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
CC: McNeil, Tucker (OPA) <Tucker.McNeil@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Sampson, Kyle <Kyle.Sampson@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Gorsuch, Neil M <Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Kim, Wan (CRT) <Wan.Kim@crt.usdoj.gov>
Sent: Thu Jan 12 15:27:51 2006
Subject: RE: Operation Home Sweet Home

I think this is a good proactive story and I am concerned the announcement could get lost in the speech Monday since it is on a holiday. Also, if we fly at a 30,000 foot level, as suggested by Wan's email, the reporters won't really get the whole scope of the proposal. It will need a fact sheet and probably a conference call with reporters to explain why this is significant, give past numbers, explain how the testing program works, etc. My thought was that could follow an AG speech on this with the fact sheet and roundtable. I would like to check with Paul and see if he feels strongly about holding it until after the "Key Priorities" speech of mid-February. If we all agree to move it out before then, one option is to have him talk about this during his speech here at DOJ in honor of MLK. Wan - would we have all the details ironed out by then?

-----Original Message-----
From: Elwood, Courtney
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 2:52 PM
To: Scolinos, Tasia
Cc: McNeil, Tucker (OPA); Sampson, Kyle; Gorsuch, Neil M; Kim, Wan (CRT)
Subject: Fw: Operation Home Sweet Home

I'm intrigued by the idea of adding the announcement of Operation Home Sweet Home to the MLK speech on Monday. What do you'all think?

Also, Tucker, would you mind sending a draft of that speech to Neil?

Thanks.

Sent from my BlackBerry Wireless Handheld

Sent from my BlackBerry Wireless Handheld

-----Original Message-----
From: Kim, Wan (CRT) <Wan.Kim@crt.usdoj.gov>
To: Elwood, Courtney <Courtney.Elwood@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
Sent: Thu Jan 12 14:23:10 2006
Subject: RE: Operation Home Sweet Home

He certainly could (CRT is prepared to implement it). And he quite possibly should (though I defer to OPA/OIPL on this issue). As I understand it, the temporary FEMA housing is due to expire in early Feb (2/7, I've heard). Now, this could well be extended again, but that's the current plan. So, the issue is a timely one -- and the audience should certainly be receptive.

I would not get into the weeds with numbers (we've put them in the memo so that you folks have them; the only relevant figure is "double the existing level"). I would suggest that the AG simply state that (1) Fair Housing is a fundamental civil right; (2) we have recently seen huge numbers of displaced Americans, many of color, in the wake of Hurricane Katrina; (3) they will be looking to restore a level of permanancy to their lives in the coming months after the temporary FEMA housing expires; (4) housing must be provided on a non-discriminatory basis; (5) he is directing CRT to engage in a initiative, called Project Home Sweet Home, to double the number of tests (by FY07) conducted under the Housing and Civil Enforcement's Testing Program to police that right; (6) the focus on the additional tests will be those areas where displaced Hurricane Katrina residents are seeking housing; and (7) we will vigorously bring lawsuits against offenders.

-----Original Message-----
From: Elwood, Courtney
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 1:55 PM
To: Kim, Wan (CRT)
Subject: Re: Operation Home Sweet Home

Is this something the AG could/should say in his MLK speech on Mon.

Sent from my BlackBerry Wireless Handheld

-----Original Message-----
From: Kim, Wan (CRT) <Wan.Kim@crt.usdoj.gov>
To: Comisac, Rena (CRT) <Rena.Comisac@crt.usdoj.gov>; Sampson, Kyle <Kyle.Sampson@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Elwood, Courtney <Courtney.Elwood@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Gorsuch, Neil M <Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Reyes, Luis (SMO) <Luis.Reyes@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Swenson, Lily F <Lily.Fu.Swenson@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Mercer, Bill (ODAG) <Bill.Mercer@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
CC: Roberts, Crystal <Crystal.Roberts@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Scolinos, Tasia <Tasia.Scolinos@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Holland, Eric W <Eric.W.Holland@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
Sent: Thu Jan 12 11:44:15 2006
Subject: RE: Operation Home Sweet Home

One clarification: the all time record is 329 tests in FY 2000.

In FY 2005, we conducted 205 tests -- and this is the figure we propose to double to 410 by FY 2007.

-----Original Message-----
From: Comisac, Rena (CRT)
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 11:38 AM
To: Sampson, Kyle; Elwood, Courtney; Gorsuch, Neil M; Reyes, Luis (SMO); Swenson, Lily F; Mercer, Bill (ODAG)
Cc: Kim, Wan (CRT); Roberts, Crystal; Scolinos, Tasia; Holland, Eric W
Subject: Operation Home Sweet Home

Attached is a draft proposal setting forth our strategy to increase CRT's efforts to detect race and national origin discrimination in the housing market. Our Housing and Civil Enforcement Section is confident that the target number of 410 paired tests by FY2007 would represent an all-time high (the current record is 329 tests in FY2005). The proposal, while succinct, represents the culmination of our efforts over the past month or so to "kick the tires" both within the Division and within the Department to ensure that the goals we set forth are achievable. We are working with OPA and OIPL to formulate a more specific roll-out strategy, and will submit a finalized proposal once we have a recommendation.

<< File: HCE testing memo.wpd >>

Scolinos, Tasia

From: Scolinos, Tasia
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 3:33 PM
To: Gorsuch, Neil M
Subject: RE: Operation Home Sweet Home

We are putting together a call for 3:40 our time - ten minutes or so. SG's office gets cagey about talking about cases pending before Sup Ct. so we are going to characterize this as talking about the Graham legislation more broadly and why it applies to pending habeas cases. I think you should probably steer clear of taking too many pointed questions on Hamden and focus on the general points you laid out before. Do you want me to send you your talkers to refresh you on the key points to hit?

-----Original Message-----
From: Gorsuch, Neil M
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 3:30 PM
To: Scolinos, Tasia
Subject: Re: Operation Home Sweet Home

Fyi Brian reports we are going to be delayed a bit further here so will have some more time on the ground.

-----Original Message-----
From: Scolinos, Tasia <Tasia.Scolinos@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
To: Elwood, Courtney <Courtney.Elwood@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
CC: McNeil, Tucker (OPA) <Tucker.McNeil@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Sampson, Kyle <Kyle.Sampson@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Gorsuch, Neil M <Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Kim, Wan (CRT) <Wan.Kim@crt.usdoj.gov>
Sent: Thu Jan 12 15:27:51 2006
Subject: RE: Operation Home Sweet Home

I think this is a good proactive story and I am concerned the announcement could get lost in the speech Monday since it is on a holiday. Also, if we fly at a 30,000 foot level, as suggested by Wan's email, the reporters won't really get the whole scope of the proposal. It will need a fact sheet and probably a conference call with reporters to explain why this is significant, give past numbers, explain how the testing program works, etc. My thought was that could follow an AG speech on this with the fact sheet and roundtable. I would like to check with Paul and see if he feels strongly about holding it until after the "Key Priorities" speech of mid-February. If we all agree to move it out before then, one option is to have him talk about this during his speech here at DOJ in honor of MLK. Wan - would we have all the details ironed out by then?

-----Original Message-----
From: Elwood, Courtney
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 2:52 PM
To: Scolinos, Tasia
Cc: McNeil, Tucker (OPA); Sampson, Kyle; Gorsuch, Neil M; Kim, Wan (CRT)

Cc: McNeil, Tucker (OPA); Sampson, Kyle; Gorsuch, Neil M; Kim, Wan (CRT)
Subject: Fw: Operation Home Sweet Home

I'm intrigued by the idea of adding the announcement of Operation Home Sweet Home to the MLK speech on Monday. What do you'all think?

Also, Tucker, would you mind sending a draft of that speech to Neil?

Thanks.

Sent from my BlackBerry Wireless Handheld

-----Original Message-----
From: Kim, Wan (CRT) <Wan.Kim@crt.usdoj.gov>
To: Elwood, Courtney <Courtney.Elwood@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
Sent: Thu Jan 12 14:23:10 2006
Subject: RE: Operation Home Sweet Home

He certainly could (CRT is prepared to implement it). And he quite possibly should (though I defer to OPA/OIPL on this issue). As I understand it, the temporary FEMA housing is due to expire in early Feb (2/7, I've heard). Now, this could well be extended again, but that's the current plan. So, the issue is a timely one -- and the audience should certainly be receptive.

I would not get into the weeds with numbers (we've put them in the memo so that you folks have them; the only relevant figure is "double the existing level"). I would suggest that the AG simply state that (1) Fair Housing is a fundamental civil right; (2) we have recently seen huge numbers of displaced Americans, many of color, in the wake of Hurricane Katrina; (3) they will be looking to restore a level of permanancy to their lives in the coming months after the temporary FEMA housing expires; (4) housing must be provided on a non-discriminatory basis; (5) he is directing CRT to engage in a initiative, called Project Home Sweet Home, to double the number of tests (by FY07) conducted under the Housing and Civil Enforcement's Testing Program to police that right; (6) the focus on the additional tests will be those areas where displaced Hurricane Katrina residents are seeking housing; and (7) we will vigorously bring lawsuits against offenders.

-----Original Message-----
From: Elwood, Courtney
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 1:55 PM
To: Kim, Wan (CRT)
Subject: Re: Operation Home Sweet Home

Is this something the AG could/should say in his MLK speech on Mon.

Sent from my BlackBerry Wireless Handheld

-----Original Message-----
From: Kim, Wan (CRT) <Wan.Kim@crt.usdoj.gov>
To: Comisac, Rena (CRT) <Rena.Comisac@crt.usdoj.gov>; Sampson, Kyle <Kyle.Sampson@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Elwood, Courtney <Courtney.Elwood@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Gorsuch, Neil M <Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Reyes, Luis (SMO) <Luis.Reyes@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Swenson, Lily F <Lily.Fu.Swenson@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Mercer, Bill (ODAG) <Bill.Mercer@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
CC: Roberts, Crystal <Crystal.Roberts@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Scolinos, Tasia <Tasia.Scolinos@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Holland, Eric W <Eric.W.Holland@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
Sent: Thu Jan 12 11:44:15 2006
Subject: RE: Operation Home Sweet Home

One clarification: the all time record is 329 tests in FY 2000.

In FY 2005, we conducted 205 tests -- and this is the figure we propose to double to 410 by FY 2007.

-----Original Message-----
From: Comisac, Rena (CRT)
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 11:38 AM
To: Sampson, Kyle; Elwood, Courtney; Gorsuch, Neil M; Reyes, Luis (SMO); Swenson, Lily F; Mercer, Bill (ODAG)
Cc: Kim, Wan (CRT); Roberts, Crystal; Scolinos, Tasia; Holland, Eric W
Subject: Operation Home Sweet Home

Attached is a draft proposal setting forth our strategy to increase CRT's efforts to detect race and national origin discrimination in the housing market. Our Housing and Civil Enforcement Section is confident that the target number of 410 paired tests by FY2007 would represent an all-time high (the current record is 329 tests in FY2005). The proposal, while succinct, represents the culmination of our efforts over the past month or so to "kick the tires" both within the Division and within the Department to ensure that the goals we set forth are achievable. We are working with OPA and OIPL to formulate a more specific roll-out strategy, and will submit a finalized proposal once we have a recommendation.

<< File: HCE testing memo.wpd >>

Gorsuch, Neil M

From: Gorsuch, Neil M
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 3:34 PM
To: Scolinos, Tasia
Subject: Re: Operation Home Sweet Home

Got it on Hamdan. If you could send talkers that would be great - thanks.

-----Original Message-----
From: Scolinos, Tasia <Tasia.Scolinos@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
To: Gorsuch, Neil M <Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
Sent: Thu Jan 12 15:32:54 2006
Subject: RE: Operation Home Sweet Home

We are putting together a call for 3:40 our time - ten minutes or so. SG's office gets cagey about talking about cases pending before Sup Ct. so we are going to characterize this as talking about the Graham legislation more broadly and why it applies to pending habeas cases. I think you should probably steer clear of taking too many pointed questions on Hamden and focus on the general points you laid out before. Do you want me to send you your talkers to refresh you on the key points to hit?

-----Original Message-----
From: Gorsuch, Neil M
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 3:30 PM
To: Scolinos, Tasia
Subject: Re: Operation Home Sweet Home

Fyi Brian reports we are going to be delayed a bit further here so will have some more time on the ground.

-----Original Message-----
From: Scolinos, Tasia <Tasia.Scolinos@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
To: Elwood, Courtney <Courtney.Elwood@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
CC: McNeil, Tucker (OPA) <Tucker.McNeil@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Sampson, Kyle <Kyle.Sampson@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Gorsuch, Neil M <Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Kim, Wan (CRT) <Wan.Kim@crt.usdoj.gov>
Sent: Thu Jan 12 15:27:51 2006
Subject: RE: Operation Home Sweet Home

I think this is a good proactive story and I am concerned the announcement could get lost in the speech Monday since it is on a holiday. Also, if we fly at a 30,000 foot level, as suggested by Wan's email, the reporters won't really get the whole scope of the proposal. It will need a fact sheet and probably a conference call with reporters to explain why this is significant, give past numbers, explain how the testing program works, etc. My thought was that could follow an AG speech on this with the fact sheet testing program works, etc. My thought was that could follow an AG speech on this with the fact sheet and roundtable. I would like to check with Paul and see if he feels strongly about holding it until after the "Key Priorities" speech of mid-February. If we all agree to move it out before then, one option is to have him talk about this during his speech here at DOJ in honor of MLK. Wan - would we have all the details ironed out by then?

-----Original Message-----
From: Elwood, Courtney
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 2:52 PM
To: Scolinos, Tasia
Cc: McNeil, Tucker (OPA); Sampson, Kyle; Gorsuch, Neil M; Kim, Wan (CRT)
Subject: Fw: Operation Home Sweet Home

I'm intrigued by the idea of adding the announcement of Operation Home Sweet Home to the MLK speech on Monday. What do you'all think?

Also, Tucker, would you mind sending a draft of that speech to Neil?

Thanks.

Sent from my BlackBerry Wireless Handheld

-----Original Message-----
From: Kim, Wan (CRT) <Wan.Kim@crt.usdoj.gov>
To: Elwood, Courtney <Courtney.Elwood@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
Sent: Thu Jan 12 14:23:10 2006
Subject: RE: Operation Home Sweet Home

He certainly could (CRT is prepared to implement it). And he quite possibly should (though I defer to OPA/OIPL on this issue). As I understand it, the temporary FEMA housing is due to expire in early Feb (2/7, I've heard). Now, this could well be extended again, but that's the current plan. So, the issue is a timely one -- and the audience should certainly be receptive.

I would not get into the weeds with numbers (we've put them in the memo so that you folks have them; the only relevant figure is "double the existing level"). I would suggest that the AG simply state that (1) Fair Housing is a fundamental civil right; (2) we have recently seen huge numbers of displaced Americans, many of color, in the wake of Hurricane Katrina; (3) they will be looking to restore a level of permanancy to their lives in the coming months after the temporary FEMA housing expires; (4) housing must be provided on a non-discriminatory basis; (5) he is directing CRT to engage in a initiative, called Project Home Sweet Home, to double the number of tests (by FY07) conducted under the Housing and Civil Enforcement's Testing Program to police that right; (6) the focus on the additional tests will be those areas where displaced Hurricane Katrina residents are seeking housing; and (7) we will vigorously bring lawsuits against offenders.

-----Original Message-----
From: Elwood, Courtney

Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 1:55 PM
To: Kim, Wan (CRT)
Subject: Re: Operation Home Sweet Home

Is this something the AG could/should say in his MLK speech on Mon.

Sent from my BlackBerry Wireless Handheld

-----Original Message-----
From: Kim, Wan (CRT) <Wan.Kim@crt.usdoj.gov>
To: Comisac, Rena (CRT) <Rena.Comisac@crt.usdoj.gov>; Sampson, Kyle <Kyle.Sampson@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Elwood, Courtney <Courtney.Elwood@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Gorsuch, Neil M <Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Reyes, Luis (SMO) <Luis.Reyes@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Swenson, Lily F <Lily.Fu.Swenson@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Mercer, Bill (ODAG) <Bill.Mercer@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
CC: Roberts, Crystal <Crystal.Roberts@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Scolinos, Tasia <Tasia.Scolinos@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Holland, Eric W <Eric.W.Holland@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
Sent: Thu Jan 12 11:44:15 2006
Subject: RE: Operation Home Sweet Home

One clarification: the all time record is 329 tests in FY 2000.

In FY 2005, we conducted 205 tests -- and this is the figure we propose to double to 410 by FY 2007.

-----Original Message-----
From: Comisac, Rena (CRT)
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 11:38 AM
To: Sampson, Kyle; Elwood, Courtney; Gorsuch, Neil M; Reyes, Luis (SMO); Swenson, Lily F; Mercer, Bill (ODAG)
Cc: Kim, Wan (CRT); Roberts, Crystal; Scolinos, Tasia; Holland, Eric W
Subject: Operation Home Sweet Home

Attached is a draft proposal setting forth our strategy to increase CRT's efforts to detect race and national origin discrimination in the housing market. Our Housing and Civil Enforcement Section is confident that the target number of 410 paired tests by FY2007 would represent an all-time high (the current record is 329 tests in FY2005). The proposal, while succinct, represents the culmination of our efforts over the past month or so to "kick the tires" both within the Division and within the Department to ensure that the goals we set forth are achievable. We are working with OPA and OIPL to formulate a more specific roll-out strategy, and will submit a finalized proposal once we have a recommendation.

<< File: HCE testing memo.wpd >>

Kim, Wan (CRT)

From: Kim, Wan (CRT)
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 3:42 PM
To: Scolinos, Tasia; Elwood, Courtney
Cc: McNeil, Tucker (OPA); Sampson, Kyle; Gorsuch, Neil M
Subject: RE: Operation Home Sweet Home

Yes, CRT will be ready to go. In addition to the information in the draft memo, attached below is the fact sheet on the current Testing Program that can be found on our website. I also note that we should not stress precise numbers, as (1) these have been less than meticuously maintained prior to this Admin and (2) it might hamper our law enforcement efforts for such targets to be publicly known (I am not aware that we have publicly released such information in the past, and I do not think that we should do so in the future). It is clear, though, that we will be both (1) doubling the current level of testing, and (2) reaching a new historical high in the testing program.

Testing Program

At the Department of Justice, the Housing and Civil Enforcement Section of the Civil Rights Division brings suit on behalf of the United States to enforce the Fair Housing Act, which prohibits discrimination on the basis of race, color, religion, national origin, sex, disability, and familial status. The Act authorizes the Department to bring suits where investigations yield evidence of a pattern or practice of illegal housing discrimination.

In 1991, the Civil Rights Division established a fair housing testing program within the Housing and Civil Enforcement Section and commenced testing in 1992. Testing refers to the use of individuals who, without any bonafide intent to rent or purchase a home, apartment, or other dwelling, pose as prospective buyers or renters of real estate for the purpose of gathering information, which may indicate whether a housing provider is complying with fair housing laws. The primary focus of the Section's fair housing testing program has been to identify unlawful housing discrimination based on race, national origin, disability, or familial status. The Section also has responsibilities to enforce Title II of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, the nation's public accommodations law, and, on occasion, has tested places of public accommodation.

The testing program staff presently consists of eight test coordinators, an evidence technician, and a secretary, all of whom are under the direction of a program supervisor. The Section employs various means to accomplish testing in local communities, including contracts with private fair housing organizations, contracts with individuals, and by using non-attorney Department employees throughout the country. The Department employees are volunteers who have been trained to participate as testers. Since 1992, the testing program has recruited and trained over 1000 employees from various Department components throughout the nation to participate as testers. The Section conducts approximately a dozen testing investigations simultaneously at any given time.

Over the past ten years, the Department of Justice has filed 78 pattern and practice testing cases with evidence directly generated from the fair housing testing program. The vast majority of testing cases filed to date are based on testing evidence that involved allegations of agents misrepresenting the availability of rental units or offering different terms and conditions based on race, and/or national origin, and/or familial status. The Department's testing has resulted in the filing of testing cases in 19 states including Alabama, California, Florida, Georgia, Illinois, Indiana, Louisiana, Michigan, Missouri, Mississippi, New Jersey, New Mexico, North Carolina, Ohio, Pennsylvania, South Dakota, Virginia, West Virginia and Wisconsin. Of the 78 suits filed, 75 have been resolved. Of the 75 resolved cases, the Department has recovered more than $11 million, including over $1.7 million in civil penalties and over $9.3 million in other damages.

The Department has demonstrated that testing can be a valuable tool to investigate housing market practices and to document illegal housing discrimination. The testing program has greatly enhanced the ability of the Department to identify and to challenge the discriminatory housing practices that persist in the rental and sale of housing.

-----Original Message-----
From: Scolinos, Tasia
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 3:28 PM
To: Elwood, Courtney
Cc: McNeil, Tucker (OPA); Sampson, Kyle; Gorsuch, Neil M; Kim, Wan (CRT)
Subject: RE: Operation Home Sweet Home

I think this is a good proactive story and I am concerned the announcement could get lost in the speech Monday since it is on a holiday. Also, if we fly at a 30,000 foot level, as suggested by Wan's email, the reporters won't really get the whole scope of the proposal. It will need a fact sheet and probably a conference call with reporters to explain why this is significant, give past numbers, explain how the testing program works, etc. My thought was that could follow an AG speech on this with the fact sheet and roundtable. I would like to check with Paul and see if he feels strongly about holding it until after the "Key Priorities" speech of mid-February. If we all agree to move it out before then, one option is to have him talk about this during his speech here at DOJ in honor of MLK. Wan - would we have all the details ironed out by then?

-----Original Message-----
From: Elwood, Courtney
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 2:52 PM
To: Scolinos, Tasia
Cc: McNeil, Tucker (OPA); Sampson, Kyle; Gorsuch, Neil M; Kim, Wan (CRT)
Subject: Fw: Operation Home Sweet Home

I'm intrigued by the idea of adding the announcement of Operation Home Sweet Home to the MLK speech on Monday. What do you'all think?

Also, Tucker, would you mind sending a draft of that speech to Neil?

Thanks.

Sent from my BlackBerry Wireless Handheld

-----Original Message-----
From: Kim, Wan (CRT) <Wan.Kim@crt.usdoj.gov>
To: Elwood, Courtney <Courtney.Elwood@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
Sent: Thu Jan 12 14:23:10 2006
Subject: RE: Operation Home Sweet Home

He certainly could (CRT is prepared to implement it). And he quite possibly should (though I defer to OPA/OIPL on this issue). As I understand it, the temporary FEMA housing is due to expire in early Feb (2/7, I've heard). Now, this could well be extended again, but that's the current plan. So, the issue is a timely one -- and the audience should certainly be receptive.

I would not get into the weeds with numbers (we've put them in the memo so that you folks have them; the only relevant figure is "double the existing level"). I would suggest that the AG simply state that (1) Fair Housing is a fundamental civil right; (2) we have recently seen huge numbers of displaced Americans, many of color, in the wake of Hurricane Katrina; (3) they will be looking to restore a level of permanancy to their lives in the coming months after the temporary FEMA housing expires; (4) housing must be provided on a non-discriminatory basis; (5) he is directing CRT to engage in a initiative, called Project Home Sweet Home, to double the number of tests (by FY07) conducted under the Housing and Civil Enforcement's Testing Program to police that right; (6) the focus on the additional tests will be those areas where displaced Hurricane Katrina residents are seeking housing; and (7) we will vigorously bring lawsuits against offenders.

-----Original Message-----
From: Elwood, Courtney
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 1:55 PM
To: Kim, Wan (CRT)
Subject: Re: Operation Home Sweet Home

Is this something the AG could/should say in his MLK speech on Mon.

Sent from my BlackBerry Wireless Handheld

-----Original Message-----
From: Kim, Wan (CRT) <Wan.Kim@crt.usdoj.gov>
To: Comisac, Rena (CRT) <Rena.Comisac@crt.usdoj.gov>; Sampson, Kyle <Kyle.Sampson@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Elwood, Courtney <Courtney.Elwood@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Gorsuch, Neil M <Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Reyes, Luis (SMO) <Luis.Reyes@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Swenson, Lily F <Lily.Fu.Swenson@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Mercer, Bill (ODAG) <Bill.Mercer@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
CC: Roberts, Crystal <Crystal.Roberts@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Scolinos, Tasia <Tasia.Scolinos@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Holland, Eric W <Eric.W.Holland@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
Sent: Thu Jan 12 11:44:15 2006
Subject: RE: Operation Home Sweet Home

One clarification: the all time record is 329 tests in FY 2000.

In FY 2005, we conducted 205 tests -- and this is the figure we propose to double to 410 by FY 2007.

-----Original Message-----
From: Comisac, Rena (CRT)
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 11:38 AM
To: Sampson, Kyle; Elwood, Courtney; Gorsuch, Neil M; Reyes, Luis (SMO); Swenson, Lily F; Mercer, Bill (ODAG)
Cc: Kim, Wan (CRT); Roberts, Crystal; Scolinos, Tasia; Holland, Eric W
Subject: Operation Home Sweet Home

Attached is a draft proposal setting forth our strategy to increase CRT's efforts to detect race and national origin discrimination in the housing market. Our Housing and Civil Enforcement Section is confident that the target number of 410 paired tests by FY2007 would represent an all-time high (the current record is 329 tests in FY2005). The proposal, while succinct, represents the culmination of our efforts over the past month or so to "kick the tires" both within the Division and within the Department to ensure that the goals we set forth are achievable. We are working with OPA and OIPL to formulate a more specific roll-out strategy, and will submit a finalized proposal once we have a recommendation.

<< File: HCE testing memo.wpd >>

Comisac, Rena (CRT)

From: Comisac, Rena (CRT)
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 3:44 PM
To: Gorsuch, Neil M; Kim, Wan (CRT)
Subject: Re: Operation Home Sweet Home

I am on travel today and tomorrow, but I will give you a call from the road.

Sent from my BlackBerry Wireless Handheld

-----Original Message-----
From: Gorsuch, Neil M <Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
To: Kim, Wan (CRT) <Wan.Kim@crt.usdoj.gov>
CC: Comisac, Rena (CRT) <Rena.Comisac@crt.usdoj.gov>
Sent: Thu Jan 12 15:26:31 2006
Subject: Re: Operation Home Sweet Home

Thanks. Rena would you mind setting up a time with Aloma Shaw for us to speak tomorrow for fifteen mins?

-----Original Message-----
From: Kim, Wan (CRT) <Wan.Kim@crt.usdoj.gov>
To: Gorsuch, Neil M <Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
CC: Comisac, Rena (CRT) <Rena.Comisac@crt.usdoj.gov>
Sent: Thu Jan 12 15:16:53 2006
Subject: RE: Operation Home Sweet Home

Of course. Rena is on travel, but we can arrange a time that will work.

FYI -- Rena is far more up to speed on this than I am, so I've suggested that she call you first to discuss. My presence in the initial call will only slow you two down!

-----Original Message-----
From: Gorsuch, Neil M
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 3:11 PM
To: Kim, Wan (CRT)
Cc: Comisac, Rena (CRT)
Subject: Fw: Operation Home Sweet Home

Fyi. I would appreciate the chance to talk orally abt this issue a bit more tomorrow if that's ok.

-----Original Message-----
From: Gorsuch, Neil M <Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
To: Comisac, Rena (CRT) <Rena.Comisac@crt.usdoj.gov>
Sent: Thu Jan 12 13:07:44 2006
Subject: Re: Operation Home Sweet Home

Any chance we could double the all tiime high?

-----Original Message-----
From: Comisac, Rena (CRT) <Rena.Comisac@crt.usdoj.gov>
To: Sampson, Kyle <Kyle.Sampson@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Elwood, Courtney <Courtney.Elwood@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Gorsuch, Neil M <Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Reyes, Luis (SMO) <Luis.Reyes@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Swenson, Lily F <Lily.Fu.Swenson@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Mercer, Bill (ODAG) <Bill.Mercer@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
CC: Kim, Wan (CRT) <Wan.Kim@crt.usdoj.gov>; Roberts, Crystal <Crystal.Roberts@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Scolinos, Tasia <Tasia.Scolinos@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Holland, Eric W <Eric.W.Holland@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
Sent: Thu Jan 12 11:37:38 2006
Subject: Operation Home Sweet Home

Attached is a draft proposal setting forth our strategy to increase CRT's efforts to detect race and national origin discrimination in the housing market. Our Housing and Civil Enforcement Section is confident that the target number of 410 paired tests by FY2007 would represent an all-time high (the current record is 329 tests in FY2005). The proposal, while succinct, represents the culmination of our efforts over the past month or so to "kick the tires" both within the Division and within the Department to ensure that the goals we set forth are achievable. We are working with OPA and OIPL to formulate a more specific roll-out strategy, and will submit a finalized proposal once we have a recommendation.

Scolinos, Tasia

From: Scolinos, Tasia
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 3:47 PM
To: Reyes, Luis (SMO); Gorsuch, Neil M; Beach, Andrew; Elwood, Courtney; Swenson, Lily F; Pacold, Martha M
Cc: Holland, Eric W
Subject: RE: 2/10/06 Trafficking Press Event - Long Island, NY

Great. Just to brainstorm this a bit, we might want to consider having the AG follow up a speech on this topic with a meeting with some of the victims of human trafficking who are now advocates against this horror to put a human face on the problem. (if any such victims have taken a public posture - does anyone know?) We will also start to put together a fact sheet that lists everything the department is doing in this area. (kind of an executive summary of the report). We can also push a out a fact sheet that highlights some of the bigger HT cases of the last year or so . If you are comfortable Wan we can also pitch you for some interviews on this topic once we get some momentum going around a HT event. Please keep me in the loop as this develops.

From: Reyes, Luis (SMO)
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 2:38 PM
To: Gorsuch, Neil M; Beach, Andrew; Scolinos, Tasia; Elwood, Courtney; Swenson, Lily F; Pacold, Martha M
Subject: FW: 2/10/06 Trafficking Press Event - Long Island, NY

Meant to copy Andy, Courtney, and Martha on this.

From: Reyes, Luis (SMO)
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 2:23 PM
To: Scolinos, Tasia; Gorsuch, Neil M; Swenson, Lily F
Subject: RE: 2/10/06 Trafficking Press Event - Long Island, NY

That is exactly along the lines of what we and OAG (Sampson, Elwood) were thinking. The report will likely be published before the end of the month. (Final draft has been circulated. Just need to finalize and send to printer). Our thought would be to announce the sentencing, release the report, and reference the OJP money all in one, thereby demonstrating the continued day to day commitment to this issue. The one caveat here: these sentencing dates are in many instances pushed back, sometimes for several months. CRT reports that there is a possibility of this happening here. Accordingly, we have asked CRT to work with OIPL to put together proposed alternative venues for such an announcement in early February (i.e. a speech to an NGO or another group (a MALDEF perhaps) that has a stake this issue). CRT will have a proposed alternative roll out plan for us shortly.

From: Scolinos, Tasia
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 2:11 PM
To: Reyes, Luis (SMO)
Subject: FW: 2/10/06 Trafficking Press Event - Long Island, NY

It seems there could be the making of an event here if we take the new OJP money mentioned in this proposal and also package that with the report you all have been working on. When do you expect that the report will be done?

From: Beach, Andrew
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 12:40 PM
To: Scolinos, Tasia; Roehrkasse, Brian

Subject: 2/10/06 Trafficking Press Event - Long Island, NY

What is your recommendation on this?

From: Comisac, Rena (CRT)
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 10:58 AM
To: Beach, Andrew
Cc: Kim, Wan (CRT); Gorsuch, Neil M; Reyes, Luis (SMO); Swenson, Lily F; Schlozman, Brad (CRT); Longwitz, Tobi (CRT); Vargas, Omar (CRT)
Subject: Scheduling request form

Andy -- over the holidays you were kind enough to put a placeholder on the AG's calendar for a press conference that may be held on February 10 in New York. I've attached the scheduling request form that essentially codifes that informal placeholder. Pls. let me or Tobi know if you have any questions. Thanks.

<< File: AG Scheduling Form 2.wpd >>

Sampson, Kyle

From: Sampson, Kyle
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 4:43 PM
To: Kim, Wan (CRT); Scolinos, Tasia; Elwood, Courtney
Cc: McNeil, Tucker (OPA); Gorsuch, Neil M
Subject: RE: Operation Home Sweet Home

I confess, I have conceived of this initiative as one that wld form a portion of the AG's mid-February priorities speech: e.g., he talks about civil rights and why it is one of his top priorities and then gives a couple of examples: (1) the great work we've done on human trafficking (citing the forthcoming report) and (2) our new fair housing initiative. So, let's discuss.

-----Original Message-----
From: Kim, Wan (CRT)
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 3:42 PM
To: Scolinos, Tasia; Elwood, Courtney
Cc: McNeil, Tucker (OPA); Sampson, Kyle; Gorsuch, Neil M
Subject: RE: Operation Home Sweet Home

Yes, CRT will be ready to go. In addition to the information in the draft memo, attached below is the fact sheet on the current Testing Program that can be found on our website. I also note that we should not stress precise numbers, as (1) these have been less than meticuously maintained prior to this Admin and (2) it might hamper our law enforcement efforts for such targets to be publicly known (I am not aware that we have publicly released such information in the past, and I do not think that we should do so in the future). It is clear, though, that we will be both (1) doubling the current level of testing, and (2) reaching a new historical high in the testing program.

Testing Program

At the Department of Justice, the Housing and Civil Enforcement Section of the Civil Rights Division brings suit on behalf of the United States to enforce the Fair Housing Act, which prohibits discrimination on the basis of race, color, religion, national origin, sex, disability, and familial status. The Act authorizes the Department to bring suits where investigations yield evidence of a pattern or practice of illegal housing discrimination.

In 1991, the Civil Rights Division established a fair housing testing program within the Housing and Civil Enforcement Section and commenced testing in 1992. Testing refers to the use of individuals who, without any bonafide intent to rent or purchase a home, apartment, or other dwelling, pose as prospective buyers or renters of real estate for the purpose of gathering information, which may indicate whether a housing provider is complying with fair housing laws. The primary focus of the Section's fair housing testing program has been to identify unlawful housing discrimination based on race, national origin, disability, or familial status. The Section also has responsibilities to enforce Title II of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, the nation's public accommodations law, and, on occasion, has tested places of public accommodation.

The testing program staff presently consists of eight test coordinators, an evidence technician, and a secretary, all of whom are under the direction of a program supervisor. The Section employs various means to accomplish testing in local communities, including contracts with private fair housing organizations, contracts with individuals, and by using non-attorney Department employees throughout the country. The Department employees are volunteers who have been trained to participate as testers. Since 1992, the testing program has recruited and trained over 1000 employees from various Department components throughout the nation to participate as testers. The Section conducts approximately a dozen testing investigations simultaneously at any given time.

Over the past ten years, the Department of Justice has filed 78 pattern and practice testing cases with evidence directly generated from the fair housing testing program. The vast majority of testing cases filed to date are based on testing evidence that involved allegations of agents misrepresenting the availability of rental units or offering different terms and conditions based on race, and/or national origin, and/or familial status. The Department's testing has resulted in the filing of testing cases in 19 states including Alabama, California, Florida, Georgia, Illinois, Indiana, Louisiana, Michigan, Missouri, Mississippi, New Jersey, New Mexico, North Carolina, Ohio, Pennsylvania, South Dakota, Virginia, West Virginia and Wisconsin. Of the 78 suits filed, 75 have been resolved. Of the 75 resolved cases, the Department has recovered more than $11 million, including over $1.7 million in civil penalties and over $9.3 million in other damages.

The Department has demonstrated that testing can be a valuable tool to investigate housing market practices and to document illegal housing discrimination. The testing program has greatly enhanced the ability of the Department to identify and to challenge the discriminatory housing practices that persist in the rental and sale of housing.

-----Original Message-----
From: Scolinos, Tasia
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 3:28 PM
To: Elwood, Courtney
Cc: McNeil, Tucker (OPA); Sampson, Kyle; Gorsuch, Neil M; Kim, Wan (CRT)
Subject: RE: Operation Home Sweet Home

I think this is a good proactive story and I am concerned the announcement could get lost in the speech Monday since it is on a holiday. Also, if we fly at a 30,000 foot level, as suggested by Wan's email, the reporters won't really get the whole scope of the proposal. It will need a fact sheet and probably a conference call with reporters to explain why this is significant, give past numbers, explain how the testing program works, etc. My thought was that could follow an AG speech on this with the fact sheet and roundtable. I would like to check with Paul and see if he feels strongly about holding it until after the "Key Priorities" speech of mid-February. If we all agree to move it out before then, one option is to have him talk about this during his speech here at DOJ in honor of MLK. Wan - would we have all the details ironed out by then?

-----Original Message-----
From: Elwood, Courtney
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 2:52 PM
To: Scolinos, Tasia
Cc: McNeil, Tucker (OPA); Sampson, Kyle; Gorsuch, Neil M; Kim, Wan (CRT)

Subject: Fw: Operation Home Sweet Home

I'm intrigued by the idea of adding the announcement of Operation Home Sweet Home to the MLK speech on Monday. What do you'all think?

Also, Tucker, would you mind sending a draft of that speech to Neil?

Thanks.

Sent from my BlackBerry Wireless Handheld

-----Original Message-----
From: Kim, Wan (CRT) <Wan.Kim@crt.usdoj.gov>
To: Elwood, Courtney <Courtney.Elwood@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
Sent: Thu Jan 12 14:23:10 2006
Subject: RE: Operation Home Sweet Home

He certainly could (CRT is prepared to implement it). And he quite possibly should (though I defer to OPA/OIPL on this issue). As I understand it, the temporary FEMA housing is due to expire in early Feb (2/7, I've heard). Now, this could well be extended again, but that's the current plan. So, the issue is a timely one -- and the audience should certainly be receptive.

I would not get into the weeds with numbers (we've put them in the memo so that you folks have them; the only relevant figure is "double the existing level"). I would suggest that the AG simply state that (1) Fair Housing is a fundamental civil right; (2) we have recently seen huge numbers of displaced Americans, many of color, in the wake of Hurricane Katrina; (3) they will be looking to restore a level of permanancy to their lives in the coming months after the temporary FEMA housing expires; (4) housing must be provided on a non-discriminatory basis; (5) he is directing CRT to engage in a initiative, called Project Home Sweet Home, to double the number of tests (by FY07) conducted under the Housing and Civil Enforcement's Testing Program to police that right; (6) the focus on the additional tests will be those areas where displaced Hurricane Katrina residents are seeking housing; and (7) we will vigorously bring lawsuits against offenders.

-----Original Message-----
From: Elwood, Courtney
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 1:55 PM
To: Kim, Wan (CRT)
Subject: Re: Operation Home Sweet Home

Is this something the AG could/should say in his MLK speech on Mon.

Sent from my BlackBerry Wireless Handheld

-----Original Message-----
From: Kim, Wan (CRT) <Wan.Kim@crt.usdoj.gov>
To: Comisac, Rena (CRT) <Rena.Comisac@crt.usdoj.gov>; Sampson, Kyle <Kyle.Sampson@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Elwood, Courtney <Courtney.Elwood@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Gorsuch, Neil M <Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Reyes, Luis (SMO) <Luis.Reyes@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Swenson, Lily F <Lily.Fu.Swenson@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Mercer, Bill (ODAG) <Bill.Mercer@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
CC: Roberts, Crystal <Crystal.Roberts@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Scolinos, Tasia <Tasia.Scolinos@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Holland, Eric W <Eric.W.Holland@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
Sent: Thu Jan 12 11:44:15 2006
Subject: RE: Operation Home Sweet Home

One clarification: the all time record is 329 tests in FY 2000.

In FY 2005, we conducted 205 tests -- and this is the figure we propose to double to 410 by FY 2007.

-----Original Message-----
From: Comisac, Rena (CRT)
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 11:38 AM
To: Sampson, Kyle; Elwood, Courtney; Gorsuch, Neil M; Reyes, Luis (SMO); Swenson, Lily F; Mercer, Bill (ODAG)
Cc: Kim, Wan (CRT); Roberts, Crystal; Scolinos, Tasia; Holland, Eric W
Subject: Operation Home Sweet Home

Attached is a draft proposal setting forth our strategy to increase CRT's efforts to detect race and national origin discrimination in the housing market. Our Housing and Civil Enforcement Section is confident that the target number of 410 paired tests by FY2007 would represent an all-time high (the current record is 329 tests in FY2005). The proposal, while succinct, represents the culmination of our efforts over the past month or so to "kick the tires" both within the Division and within the Department to ensure that the goals we set forth are achievable. We are working with OPA and OIPL to formulate a more specific roll-out strategy, and will submit a finalized proposal once we have a recommendation.

<< File: HCE testing memo.wpd >>

Gorsuch, Neil M

From: Gorsuch, Neil M
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 4:46 PM
To: Sampson, Kyle; Elwood, Courtney
Subject: Re: Operation Home Sweet Home

For reasons discussed w Courtney today and can share w you tomorrow am orally, I am not sure this, while very close and extremely well conceived, is quite ready for prime time anyway.

-----Original Message-----
From: Sampson, Kyle <Kyle.Sampson@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
To: Kim, Wan (CRT) <Wan.Kim@crt.usdoj.gov>; Scolinos, Tasia <Tasia.Scolinos@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Elwood, Courtney <Courtney.Elwood@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
CC: McNeil, Tucker (OPA) <Tucker.McNeil@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Gorsuch, Neil M <Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
Sent: Thu Jan 12 16:42:31 2006
Subject: RE: Operation Home Sweet Home

I confess, I have conceived of this initiative as one that wld form a portion of the AG's mid-February priorities speech: e.g., he talks about civil rights and why it is one of his top priorities and then gives a couple of examples: (1) the great work we've done on human trafficking (citing the forthcoming report) and (2) our new fair housing initiative. So, let's discuss.

-----Original Message-----
From: Kim, Wan (CRT)
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 3:42 PM
To: Scolinos, Tasia; Elwood, Courtney
Cc: McNeil, Tucker (OPA); Sampson, Kyle; Gorsuch, Neil M
Subject: RE: Operation Home Sweet Home

Yes, CRT will be ready to go. In addition to the information in the draft memo, attached below is the fact sheet on the current Testing Program that can be found on our website. I also note that we should not stress precise numbers, as (1) these have been less than meticuously maintained prior to this Admin and (2) it might hamper our law enforcement efforts for such targets to be publicly known (I am not aware that we have publicly released such information in the past, and I do not think that we should do so in the future). It is clear, though, that we will be both (1) doubling the current level of testing, and (2) reaching a new historical high in the testing program.

Testing Program

At the Department of Justice, the Housing and Civil Enforcement Section of the Civil Rights Division brings suit on behalf of the United States to enforce the Fair Housing Act, which prohibits discrimination on the basis of race, color, religion, national origin, sex, disability, and familial status

discrimination on the basis of race, color, religion, national origin, sex, disability, and familial status. The Act authorizes the Department to bring suits where investigations yield evidence of a pattern or practice of illegal housing discrimination.

In 1991, the Civil Rights Division established a fair housing testing program within the Housing and Civil Enforcement Section and commenced testing in 1992. Testing refers to the use of individuals who, without any bonafide intent to rent or purchase a home, apartment, or other dwelling, pose as prospective buyers or renters of real estate for the purpose of gathering information, which may indicate whether a housing provider is complying with fair housing laws. The primary focus of the Section's fair housing testing program has been to identify unlawful housing discrimination based on race, national origin, disability, or familial status. The Section also has responsibilities to enforce Title II of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, the nation's public accommodations law, and, on occasion, has tested places of public accommodation.

The testing program staff presently consists of eight test coordinators, an evidence technician, and a secretary, all of whom are under the direction of a program supervisor. The Section employs various means to accomplish testing in local communities, including contracts with private fair housing organizations, contracts with individuals, and by using non-attorney Department employees throughout the country. The Department employees are volunteers who have been trained to participate as testers. Since 1992, the testing program has recruited and trained over 1000 employees from various Department components throughout the nation to participate as testers. The Section conducts approximately a dozen testing investigations simultaneously at any given time.

Over the past ten years, the Department of Justice has filed 78 pattern and practice testing cases with evidence directly generated from the fair housing testing program. The vast majority of testing cases filed to date are based on testing evidence that involved allegations of agents misrepresenting the availability of rental units or offering different terms and conditions based on race, and/or national origin, and/or familial status. The Department's testing has resulted in the filing of testing cases in 19 states including Alabama, California, Florida, Georgia, Illinois, Indiana, Louisiana, Michigan, Missouri, Mississippi, New Jersey, New Mexico, North Carolina, Ohio, Pennsylvania, South Dakota, Virginia, West Virginia and Wisconsin. Of the 78 suits filed, 75 have been resolved. Of the 75 resolved cases, the Department has recovered more than $11 million, including over $1.7 million in civil penalties and over $9.3 million in other damages.

The Department has demonstrated that testing can be a valuable tool to investigate housing market practices and to document illegal housing discrimination. The testing program has greatly enhanced the ability of the Department to identify and to challenge the discriminatory housing practices that persist in the rental and sale of housing.

-----Original Message-----
From: Scolinos, Tasia
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 3:28 PM
To: Elwood, Courtney
Cc: McNeil, Tucker (OPA); Sampson, Kyle; Gorsuch, Neil M; Kim, Wan (CRT)
Subject: RE: Operation Home Sweet Home

I think this is a good proactive story and I am concerned the announcement could get lost in the speech Monday since it is on a holiday. Also, if we fly at a 30,000 foot level, as suggested by Wan's email, the reporters won't really get the whole scope of the proposal. It will need a fact sheet and probably a conference call with reporters to explain why this is significant, give past numbers, explain how the testing program works, etc. My thought was that could follow an AG speech on this with the fact sheet and roundtable. I would like to check with Paul and see if he feels strongly about holding it until after the "Key Priorities" speech of mid-February. If we all agree to move it out before then, one option is to have him talk about this during his speech here at DOJ in honor of MLK. Wan - would we have all the details ironed out by then?

-----Original Message-----
From: Elwood, Courtney
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 2:52 PM
To: Scolinos, Tasia
Cc: McNeil, Tucker (OPA); Sampson, Kyle; Gorsuch, Neil M; Kim, Wan (CRT)
Subject: Fw: Operation Home Sweet Home

I'm intrigued by the idea of adding the announcement of Operation Home Sweet Home to the MLK speech on Monday. What do you'all think?

Also, Tucker, would you mind sending a draft of that speech to Neil?

Thanks.

Sent from my BlackBerry Wireless Handheld

-----Original Message-----
From: Kim, Wan (CRT) <Wan.Kim@crt.usdoj.gov>
To: Elwood, Courtney <Courtney.Elwood@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
Sent: Thu Jan 12 14:23:10 2006
Subject: RE: Operation Home Sweet Home

He certainly could (CRT is prepared to implement it). And he quite possibly should (though I defer to OPA/OIPL on this issue). As I understand it, the temporary FEMA housing is due to expire in early Feb (2/7, I've heard). Now, this could well be extended again, but that's the current plan. So, the issue is a timely one -- and the audience should certainly be receptive.

I would not get into the weeds with numbers (we've put them in the memo so that you folks have them; the only relevant figure is "double the existing level"). I would suggest that the AG simply state that (1) Fair Housing is a fundamental civil right; (2) we have recently seen huge numbers of displaced Americans, many of color, in the wake of Hurricane Katrina; (3) they will be looking to restore a level of permanancy to their lives in the coming months after the temporary FEMA housing expires; (4) housing must be provided on a non-discriminatory basis; (5) he is directing CRT to engage in a initiative, called Project Home Sweet Home, to double the number of tests (by FY07) conducted under the Housing and Civil Enforcement's Testing Program to police that right; (6) the focus on the additional tests will be those areas where displaced Hurricane Katrina residents are seeking housing; and (7) we will vigorously bring lawsuits against offenders.

-----Original Message-----
From: Elwood, Courtney
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 1:55 PM
To: Kim, Wan (CRT)
Subject: Re: Operation Home Sweet Home

Is this something the AG could/should say in his MLK speech on Mon.

Sent from my BlackBerry Wireless Handheld

-----Original Message-----
From: Kim, Wan (CRT) <Wan.Kim@crt.usdoj.gov>
To: Comisac, Rena (CRT) <Rena.Comisac@crt.usdoj.gov>; Sampson, Kyle <Kyle.Sampson@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Elwood, Courtney <Courtney.Elwood@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Gorsuch, Neil M <Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Reyes, Luis (SMO) <Luis.Reyes@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Swenson, Lily F <Lily.Fu.Swenson@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Mercer, Bill (ODAG) <Bill.Mercer@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
CC: Roberts, Crystal <Crystal.Roberts@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Scolinos, Tasia <Tasia.Scolinos@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Holland, Eric W <Eric.W.Holland@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
Sent: Thu Jan 12 11:44:15 2006
Subject: RE: Operation Home Sweet Home

One clarification: the all time record is 329 tests in FY 2000.

In FY 2005, we conducted 205 tests -- and this is the figure we propose to double to 410 by FY 2007.

-----Original Message-----
From: Comisac, Rena (CRT)
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 11:38 AM
To: Sampson, Kyle; Elwood, Courtney; Gorsuch, Neil M; Reyes, Luis (SMO); Swenson, Lily F; Mercer, Bill (ODAG)
Cc: Kim, Wan (CRT); Roberts, Crystal; Scolinos, Tasia; Holland, Eric W
Subject: Operation Home Sweet Home

Attached is a draft proposal setting forth our strategy to increase CRT's efforts to detect race and national origin discrimination in the housing market. Our Housing and Civil Enforcement Section is confident that the target number of 410 paired tests by FY2007 would represent an all-time high (the current record is 329 tests in FY2005). The proposal, while succinct, represents the culmination of our efforts over the past month or so to "kick the tires" both within the Division and within the Department to ensure that the goals we set forth are achievable. We are working with OPA and OIPL to formulate a more specific roll-out strategy, and will submit a finalized proposal once we have a recommendation.

<< File: HCE testing memo.wpd >>

Sampson, Kyle

From: Sampson, Kyle
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 4:48 PM
To: Gorsuch, Neil M; Elwood, Courtney
Subject: RE: Operation Home Sweet Home

10-4. Thx.

-----Original Message-----
From: Gorsuch, Neil M
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 4:46 PM
To: Sampson, Kyle; Elwood, Courtney
Subject: Re: Operation Home Sweet Home

For reasons discussed w Courtney today and can share w you tomorrow am orally, I am not sure this, while very close and extremely well conceived, is quite ready for prime time anyway.

-----Original Message-----
From: Sampson, Kyle <Kyle.Sampson@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
To: Kim, Wan (CRT) <Wan.Kim@crt.usdoj.gov>; Scolinos, Tasia <Tasia.Scolinos@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Elwood, Courtney <Courtney.Elwood@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
CC: McNeil, Tucker (OPA) <Tucker.McNeil@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Gorsuch, Neil M <Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
Sent: Thu Jan 12 16:42:31 2006
Subject: RE: Operation Home Sweet Home

I confess, I have conceived of this initiative as one that wld form a portion of the AG's mid-February priorities speech: e.g., he talks about civil rights and why it is one of his top priorities and then gives a couple of examples: (1) the great work we've done on human trafficking (citing the forthcoming report) and (2) our new fair housing initiative. So, let's discuss.

-----Original Message-----
From: Kim, Wan (CRT)
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 3:42 PM
To: Scolinos, Tasia; Elwood, Courtney
Cc: McNeil, Tucker (OPA); Sampson, Kyle; Gorsuch, Neil M
Subject: RE: Operation Home Sweet Home

Yes, CRT will be ready to go. In addition to the information in the draft memo, attached below is the fact sheet on the current Testing Program that can be found on our website. I also note that we should not stress precise numbers, as (1) these have been less than meticuously maintained prior to this Admin and (2) it might hamper our law enforcement efforts for such targets to be publicly known (I am not aware that we have publicly released such information in the past, and I do not think that we should do so in the future). It is clear, though, that we will be both (1) doubling the current level of testing, and (2) reaching a new historical high in the testing program.

testing, and (2) reaching a new historical high in the testing program.

Testing Program

At the Department of Justice, the Housing and Civil Enforcement Section of the Civil Rights Division brings suit on behalf of the United States to enforce the Fair Housing Act, which prohibits discrimination on the basis of race, color, religion, national origin, sex, disability, and familial status. The Act authorizes the Department to bring suits where investigations yield evidence of a pattern or practice of illegal housing discrimination.

In 1991, the Civil Rights Division established a fair housing testing program within the Housing and Civil Enforcement Section and commenced testing in 1992. Testing refers to the use of individuals who, without any bonafide intent to rent or purchase a home, apartment, or other dwelling, pose as prospective buyers or renters of real estate for the purpose of gathering information, which may indicate whether a housing provider is complying with fair housing laws. The primary focus of the Section's fair housing testing program has been to identify unlawful housing discrimination based on race, national origin, disability, or familial status. The Section also has responsibilities to enforce Title II of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, the nation's public accommodations law, and, on occasion, has tested places of public accommodation.

The testing program staff presently consists of eight test coordinators, an evidence technician, and a secretary, all of whom are under the direction of a program supervisor. The Section employs various means to accomplish testing in local communities, including contracts with private fair housing organizations, contracts with individuals, and by using non-attorney Department employees throughout the country. The Department employees are volunteers who have been trained to participate as testers. Since 1992, the testing program has recruited and trained over 1000 employees from various Department components throughout the nation to participate as testers. The Section conducts approximately a dozen testing investigations simultaneously at any given time.

Over the past ten years, the Department of Justice has filed 78 pattern and practice testing cases with evidence directly generated from the fair housing testing program. The vast majority of testing cases filed to date are based on testing evidence that involved allegations of agents misrepresenting the availability of rental units or offering different terms and conditions based on race, and/or national origin, and/or familial status. The Department's testing has resulted in the filing of testing cases in 19 states including Alabama, California, Florida, Georgia, Illinois, Indiana, Louisiana, Michigan, Missouri, Mississippi, New Jersey, New Mexico, North Carolina, Ohio, Pennsylvania, South Dakota, Virginia, West Virginia and Wisconsin. Of the 78 suits filed, 75 have been resolved. Of the 75 resolved cases, the Department has recovered more than $11 million, including over $1.7 million in civil penalties and over $9.3 million in other damages.

The Department has demonstrated that testing can be a valuable tool to investigate housing market practices and to document illegal housing discrimination. The testing program has greatly enhanced the ability of the Department to identify and to challenge the discriminatory housing practices that persist in the rental and sale of housing.

-----Original Message-----
From: Scolinos, Tasia

Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 3:28 PM
To: Elwood, Courtney
Cc: McNeil, Tucker (OPA); Sampson, Kyle; Gorsuch, Neil M; Kim, Wan (CRT)
Subject: RE: Operation Home Sweet Home

I think this is a good proactive story and I am concerned the announcement could get lost in the speech Monday since it is on a holiday. Also, if we fly at a 30,000 foot level, as suggested by Wan's email, the reporters won't really get the whole scope of the proposal. It will need a fact sheet and probably a conference call with reporters to explain why this is significant, give past numbers, explain how the testing program works, etc. My thought was that could follow an AG speech on this with the fact sheet and roundtable. I would like to check with Paul and see if he feels strongly about holding it until after the "Key Priorities" speech of mid-February. If we all agree to move it out before then, one option is to have him talk about this during his speech here at DOJ in honor of MLK. Wan - would we have all the details ironed out by then?

-----Original Message-----
From: Elwood, Courtney
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 2:52 PM
To: Scolinos, Tasia
Cc: McNeil, Tucker (OPA); Sampson, Kyle; Gorsuch, Neil M; Kim, Wan (CRT)
Subject: Fw: Operation Home Sweet Home

I'm intrigued by the idea of adding the announcement of Operation Home Sweet Home to the MLK speech on Monday. What do you'all think?

Also, Tucker, would you mind sending a draft of that speech to Neil?

Thanks.

Sent from my BlackBerry Wireless Handheld

-----Original Message-----
From: Kim, Wan (CRT) <Wan.Kim@crt.usdoj.gov>
To: Elwood, Courtney <Courtney.Elwood@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
Sent: Thu Jan 12 14:23:10 2006
Subject: RE: Operation Home Sweet Home

He certainly could (CRT is prepared to implement it). And he quite possibly should (though I defer to OPA/OIPL on this issue). As I understand it, the temporary FEMA housing is due to expire in early Feb (2/7, I've heard). Now, this could well be extended again, but that's the current plan. So, the issue is a timely one -- and the audience should certainly be receptive.

I would not get into the weeds with numbers (we've put them in the memo so that you folks have them; the only relevant figure is "double the existing level"). I would suggest that the AG simply state that (1) Fair Housing is a fundamental civil right; (2) we have recently seen huge numbers of displaced Americans, many of color, in the wake of Hurricane Katrina; (3) they will be looking to restore a level of permanancy to their lives in the coming months after the temporary FEMA housing expires; (4) housing permanancy to their lives in the coming months after the temporary FEMA housing expires; (4) housing must be provided on a non-discriminatory basis; (5) he is directing CRT to engage in a initiative, called Project Home Sweet Home, to double the number of tests (by FY07) conducted under the Housing and Civil Enforcement's Testing Program to police that right; (6) the focus on the additional tests will be those areas where displaced Hurricane Katrina residents are seeking housing; and (7) we will vigorously bring lawsuits against offenders.

-----Original Message-----
From: Elwood, Courtney
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 1:55 PM
To: Kim, Wan (CRT)
Subject: Re: Operation Home Sweet Home

Is this something the AG could/should say in his MLK speech on Mon.

Sent from my BlackBerry Wireless Handheld

-----Original Message-----
From: Kim, Wan (CRT) <Wan.Kim@crt.usdoj.gov>
To: Comisac, Rena (CRT) <Rena.Comisac@crt.usdoj.gov>; Sampson, Kyle <Kyle.Sampson@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Elwood, Courtney <Courtney.Elwood@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Gorsuch, Neil M <Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Reyes, Luis (SMO) <Luis.Reyes@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Swenson, Lily F <Lily.Fu.Swenson@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Mercer, Bill (ODAG) <Bill.Mercer@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
CC: Roberts, Crystal <Crystal.Roberts@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Scolinos, Tasia <Tasia.Scolinos@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Holland, Eric W <Eric.W.Holland@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
Sent: Thu Jan 12 11:44:15 2006
Subject: RE: Operation Home Sweet Home

One clarification: the all time record is 329 tests in FY 2000.

In FY 2005, we conducted 205 tests -- and this is the figure we propose to double to 410 by FY 2007.

-----Original Message-----
From: Comisac, Rena (CRT)
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 11:38 AM
To: Sampson, Kyle; Elwood, Courtney; Gorsuch, Neil M; Reyes, Luis (SMO); Swenson, Lily F; Mercer, Bill (ODAG)
Cc: Kim, Wan (CRT); Roberts, Crystal; Scolinos, Tasia; Holland, Eric W
Subject: Operation Home Sweet Home

Attached is a draft proposal setting forth our strategy to increase CRT's efforts to detect race and national origin discrimination in the housing market. Our Housing and Civil Enforcement Section is confident that the target number of 410 paired tests by FY2007 would represent an all-time high (the current record is 329 tests in FY2005). The proposal, while succinct, represents the culmination of our efforts over the past month or so to "kick the tires" both within the Division and within the Department to ensure that the goals we set forth are achievable. We are working with OPA and OIPL to formulate a more specific roll-out strategy, and will submit a finalized proposal once we have a recommendation.

<< File: HCE testing memo.wpd >>

Kim, Wan (CRT)

From: Kim, Wan (CRT)
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 5:01 PM
To: Sampson, Kyle; Scolinos, Tasia; Elwood, Courtney
Cc: McNeil, Tucker (OPA); Gorsuch, Neil M
Subject: RE: Operation Home Sweet Home

I defer timing/vehicle to you experts. Let us know how we can assist. Thx, Wan

-----Original Message-----
From: Sampson, Kyle
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 4:43 PM
To: Kim, Wan (CRT); Scolinos, Tasia; Elwood, Courtney
Cc: McNeil, Tucker (OPA); Gorsuch, Neil M
Subject: RE: Operation Home Sweet Home

I confess, I have conceived of this initiative as one that wld form a portion of the AG's mid-February priorities speech: e.g., he talks about civil rights and why it is one of his top priorities and then gives a couple of examples: (1) the great work we've done on human trafficking (citing the forthcoming report) and (2) our new fair housing initiative. So, let's discuss.

-----Original Message-----
From: Kim, Wan (CRT)
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 3:42 PM
To: Scolinos, Tasia; Elwood, Courtney
Cc: McNeil, Tucker (OPA); Sampson, Kyle; Gorsuch, Neil M
Subject: RE: Operation Home Sweet Home

Yes, CRT will be ready to go. In addition to the information in the draft memo, attached below is the fact sheet on the current Testing Program that can be found on our website. I also note that we should not stress precise numbers, as (1) these have been less than meticuously maintained prior to this Admin and (2) it might hamper our law enforcement efforts for such targets to be publicly known (I am not aware that we have publicly released such information in the past, and I do not think that we should do so in the future). It is clear, though, that we will be both (1) doubling the current level of testing, and (2) reaching a new historical high in the testing program.

Testing Program

At the Department of Justice, the Housing and Civil Enforcement Section of the Civil Rights Division brings suit on behalf of the United States to enforce the Fair Housing Act, which prohibits discrimination on the basis of race, color, religion, national origin, sex, disability, and familial status. The Act authorizes the Department to bring suits where investigations yield evidence of a pattern or practice of illegal housing discrimination.

In 1991, the Civil Rights Division established a fair housing testing program within the Housing and Civil Enforcement Section and commenced testing in 1992. Testing refers to the use of individuals who, without any bonafide intent to rent or purchase a home, apartment, or other dwelling, pose as prospective buyers or renters of real estate for the purpose of gathering information, which may indicate whether a housing provider is complying with fair housing laws. The primary focus of the Section's fair housing testing program has been to identify unlawful housing discrimination based on race, national origin, disability, or familial status. The Section also has responsibilities to enforce Title II of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, the nation's public accommodations law, and, on occasion, has tested places of public accommodation.

The testing program staff presently consists of eight test coordinators, an evidence technician, and a secretary, all of whom are under the direction of a program supervisor. The Section employs various means to accomplish testing in local communities, including contracts with private fair housing organizations, contracts with individuals, and by using non-attorney Department employees throughout the country. The Department employees are volunteers who have been trained to participate as testers. Since 1992, the testing program has recruited and trained over 1000 employees from various Department components throughout the nation to participate as testers. The Section conducts approximately a dozen testing investigations simultaneously at any given time.

Over the past ten years, the Department of Justice has filed 78 pattern and practice testing cases with evidence directly generated from the fair housing testing program. The vast majority of testing cases filed to date are based on testing evidence that involved allegations of agents misrepresenting the availability of rental units or offering different terms and conditions based on race, and/or national origin, and/or familial status. The Department's testing has resulted in the filing of testing cases in 19 states including Alabama, California, Florida, Georgia, Illinois, Indiana, Louisiana, Michigan, Missouri, Mississippi, New Jersey, New Mexico, North Carolina, Ohio, Pennsylvania, South Dakota, Virginia, West Virginia and Wisconsin. Of the 78 suits filed, 75 have been resolved. Of the 75 resolved cases, the Department has recovered more than $11 million, including over $1.7 million in civil penalties and over $9.3 million in other damages.

The Department has demonstrated that testing can be a valuable tool to investigate housing market practices and to document illegal housing discrimination. The testing program has greatly enhanced the ability of the Department to identify and to challenge the discriminatory housing practices that persist in the rental and sale of housing.

-----Original Message-----
From: Scolinos, Tasia
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 3:28 PM
To: Elwood, Courtney
Cc: McNeil, Tucker (OPA); Sampson, Kyle; Gorsuch, Neil M; Kim, Wan (CRT)
Subject: RE: Operation Home Sweet Home

I think this is a good proactive story and I am concerned the announcement could get lost in the speech Monday since it is on a holiday. Also, if we fly at a 30,000 foot level, as suggested by Wan's email, the reporters won't really get the whole scope of the proposal. It will need a fact sheet and probably a conference call with reporters to explain why this is significant, give past numbers, explain how the testing program works, etc. My thought was that could follow an AG speech on this with the fact sheet and roundtable. I would like to check with Paul and see if he feels strongly about holding it until after the "Key Priorities" speech of mid-February. If we all agree to move it out before then, one option is to have him talk about this during his speech here at DOJ in honor of MLK. Wan - would we have all the details ironed out by then?

-----Original Message-----
From: Elwood, Courtney
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 2:52 PM
To: Scolinos, Tasia
Cc: McNeil, Tucker (OPA); Sampson, Kyle; Gorsuch, Neil M; Kim, Wan (CRT)
Subject: Fw: Operation Home Sweet Home

I'm intrigued by the idea of adding the announcement of Operation Home Sweet Home to the MLK speech on Monday. What do you'all think?

Also, Tucker, would you mind sending a draft of that speech to Neil?

Thanks.

Sent from my BlackBerry Wireless Handheld

-----Original Message-----
From: Kim, Wan (CRT) <Wan.Kim@crt.usdoj.gov>
To: Elwood, Courtney <Courtney.Elwood@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
Sent: Thu Jan 12 14:23:10 2006
Subject: RE: Operation Home Sweet Home

He certainly could (CRT is prepared to implement it). And he quite possibly should (though I defer to OPA/OIPL on this issue). As I understand it, the temporary FEMA housing is due to expire in early Feb (2/7, I've heard). Now, this could well be extended again, but that's the current plan. So, the issue is a timely one -- and the audience should certainly be receptive.

I would not get into the weeds with numbers (we've put them in the memo so that you folks have them; the only relevant figure is "double the existing level"). I would suggest that the AG simply state that (1) Fair Housing is a fundamental civil right; (2) we have recently seen huge numbers of displaced Americans, many of color, in the wake of Hurricane Katrina; (3) they will be looking to restore a level of permanancy to their lives in the coming months after the temporary FEMA housing expires; (4) housing must be provided on a non-discriminatory basis; (5) he is directing CRT to engage in a initiative, called Project Home Sweet Home, to double the number of tests (by FY07) conducted under the Housing and Civil Enforcement's Testing Program to police that right; (6) the focus on the additional tests will be those areas where displaced Hurricane Katrina residents are seeking housing; and (7) we will vigorously bring lawsuits against offenders.

-----Original Message-----
From: Elwood, Courtney

Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 1:55 PM
To: Kim, Wan (CRT)
Subject: Re: Operation Home Sweet Home

Is this something the AG could/should say in his MLK speech on Mon.

Sent from my BlackBerry Wireless Handheld

-----Original Message-----
From: Kim, Wan (CRT) <Wan.Kim@crt.usdoj.gov>
To: Comisac, Rena (CRT) <Rena.Comisac@crt.usdoj.gov>; Sampson, Kyle <Kyle.Sampson@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Elwood, Courtney <Courtney.Elwood@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Gorsuch, Neil M <Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Reyes, Luis (SMO) <Luis.Reyes@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Swenson, Lily F <Lily.Fu.Swenson@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Mercer, Bill (ODAG) <Bill.Mercer@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
CC: Roberts, Crystal <Crystal.Roberts@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Scolinos, Tasia <Tasia.Scolinos@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Holland, Eric W <Eric.W.Holland@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
Sent: Thu Jan 12 11:44:15 2006
Subject: RE: Operation Home Sweet Home

One clarification: the all time record is 329 tests in FY 2000.

In FY 2005, we conducted 205 tests -- and this is the figure we propose to double to 410 by FY 2007.

-----Original Message-----
From: Comisac, Rena (CRT)
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 11:38 AM
To: Sampson, Kyle; Elwood, Courtney; Gorsuch, Neil M; Reyes, Luis (SMO); Swenson, Lily F; Mercer, Bill (ODAG)
Cc: Kim, Wan (CRT); Roberts, Crystal; Scolinos, Tasia; Holland, Eric W
Subject: Operation Home Sweet Home

Attached is a draft proposal setting forth our strategy to increase CRT's efforts to detect race and national origin discrimination in the housing market. Our Housing and Civil Enforcement Section is confident that the target number of 410 paired tests by FY2007 would represent an all-time high (the current record is 329 tests in FY2005). The proposal, while succinct, represents the culmination of our efforts over the past month or so to "kick the tires" both within the Division and within the Department to ensure that the goals we set forth are achievable. We are working with OPA and OIPL to formulate a more specific roll-out strategy, and will submit a finalized proposal once we have a recommendation.

<< File: HCE testing memo.wpd >>

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From: USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 6:19 PM
To: USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject: DOJ Daily News Wrap

PUBLIC AFFAIRS DAILY NEWS WRAP
January 12, 2006

Contact: Brian Roehrkasse, Deputy Director, Office of Public Affairs, (202) 514 2007

TOMORROW'S EXPECTED NEWS STORIES:

Motion to Dismiss (OPA)
The United States filed a Motion to Dismiss for Lack of Jurisdiction in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld. The motion was filed in the Supreme Court of the United States today, and was based on the Detainee Treatment Act of 2005, which removes the jurisdiction of the federal courts to hear habeas and other suits filed by Guantanamo detainees.

Thomas Barnett's Confirmation (Antitrust)
The Washington Wire section of tomorrow's Wall Street Journal will mention Thomas Barnett's confirmation as Assistant Attorney General for Antitrust.

Aragoncillo Investigation (FBI)
Ted Bridis, *Associated Pres*s, is still inquiring about the Aragoncillo investigation and documents that Aragoncillo may have illegally passed to a foreign intelligence service.

Integrity Committee Questions (FBI)
Guy Gugliotta, The Washington Post, submitted additional questions on the Integrity Committee and an ongoing NASA investigation. The FBI is not commenting on the ongoing investigation.

Warren Jeffs Investigation (FBI)
A press conference was held to announce that Warren Jeffs was charged in Arizona for committing sexual acts with a minor. There is currently an Unlawful Flight to Avoid Prosecution (UFAP) warrant out for his arrest.

Talking Points:

- In June 2005, Warren Jeffs was indicted by a Mojave County Grand Jury for Sexual Conduct with a Minor and Conspiracy to Commit Sexual Conduct with a Minor.

- As the investigation continues to locate Warren Jeffs, we will seek charges against anyone whom we develop evidence against assisting and/or harboring Jeffs. Until such evidence is developed and appropriately presented to the US Attorney's Office for a prosecutive opinion, we would not be able to provide you with such information.

FRIDAY'S EXPECTED EVENTS/RELEASES:

Amber Alert Awareness Day (OAG)
Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales will speak about expanding the reach of the AMBER Alert and Deputy Postmaster General Patrick Donahoe will unveil the AMBER Alert postage stamp.

The Washington Hilton
International Ballroom, Concourse Level
1919 Connecticut Avenue, N.W.
Washington, D.C. 20009
10:00 A.M. EST
OPEN PRESS

Reyes, Luis (SMO)

From: Reyes, Luis (SMO)
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 6:45 PM
To: Scolinos, Tasia; Gorsuch, Neil M; Beach, Andrew; Elwood, Courtney; Swenson, Lily F; Pacold, Martha M
Cc: Holland, Eric W
Subject: RE: 2/10/06 Trafficking Press Event - Long Island, NY

I like these ideas and of course will defer to OAG. A victims event may be a more difficult endeavor in that, to my knowledge, the only ones that have taken somewhat of a public posture are the one or two that actually testified before Congress. Even then, these folks were testifying to effectuate legislation, but it is not clear that they wanted the public attention. CRT, in coordination with OVC and counterparts at HHS) would be able to best evaluate the feasibility of putting together an event like this.

From: Scolinos, Tasia
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 3:47 PM
To: Reyes, Luis (SMO); Gorsuch, Neil M; Beach, Andrew; Elwood, Courtney; Swenson, Lily F; Pacold, Martha M
Cc: Holland, Eric W
Subject: RE: 2/10/06 Trafficking Press Event - Long Island, NY

Great. Just to brainstorm this a bit, we might want to consider having the AG follow up a speech on this topic with a meeting with some of the victims of human trafficking who are now advocates against this horror to put a human face on the problem. (if any such victims have taken a public posture - does anyone know?) We will also start to put together a fact sheet that lists everything the department is doing in this area. (kind of an executive summary of the report). We can also push a out a fact sheet that highlights some of the bigger HT cases of the last year or so . If you are comfortable Wan we can also pitch you for some interviews on this topic once we get some momentum going around a HT event. Please keep me in the loop as this develops.

From: Reyes, Luis (SMO)
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 2:38 PM
To: Gorsuch, Neil M; Beach, Andrew; Scolinos, Tasia; Elwood, Courtney; Swenson, Lily F; Pacold, Martha M
Subject: FW: 2/10/06 Trafficking Press Event - Long Island, NY

Meant to copy Andy, Courtney, and Martha on this.

From: Reyes, Luis (SMO)
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 2:23 PM
To: Scolinos, Tasia; Gorsuch, Neil M; Swenson, Lily F
Subject: RE: 2/10/06 Trafficking Press Event - Long Island, NY

That is exactly along the lines of what we and OAG (Sampson, Elwood) were thinking. The report will likely be published before the end of the month. (Final draft has been circulated. Just need to finalize and send to printer). Our thought would be to announce the sentencing, release the report, and reference the OJP money all in one, thereby demonstrating the continued day to day commitment to this issue. The one caveat here: these sentencing dates are in many instances pushed back, sometimes for several months. CRT reports that there is a possibility of this happening here. Accordingly, we have asked CRT to work with OIPL to put together proposed alternative venues for such an announcement in early February (i.e. a speech to an NGO or another group (a MALDEF perhaps) that has a stake this issue). CRT will have a proposed alternative roll out plan for us shortly.

From: Scolinos, Tasia
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 2:11 PM
To: Reyes, Luis (SMO)
Subject: FW: 2/10/06 Trafficking Press Event - Long Island, NY

It seems there could be the making of an event here if we take the new OJP money mentioned in this proposal and also package that with the report you all have been working on. When do you expect that the report will be done?

From: Beach, Andrew
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 12:40 PM
To: Scolinos, Tasia; Roehrkasse, Brian
Subject: 2/10/06 Trafficking Press Event - Long Island, NY

What is your recommendation on this?

From: Comisac, Rena (CRT)
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 10:58 AM
To: Beach, Andrew
Cc: Kim, Wan (CRT); Gorsuch, Neil M; Reyes, Luis (SMO); Swenson, Lily F; Schlozman, Brad (CRT); Longwitz, Tobi (CRT); Vargas, Omar (CRT)
Subject: Scheduling request form

Andy -- over the holidays you were kind enough to put a placeholder on the AG's calendar for a press conference that may be held on February 10 in New York. I've attached the scheduling request form that essentially codifes that informal placeholder. Pls. let me or Tobi know if you have any questions. Thanks.

<< File: AG Scheduling Form 2.wpd >>

Elwood, Courtney

From: Elwood, Courtney
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 7:44 PM
To: Reyes, Luis (SMO); Scolinos, Tasia; Gorsuch, Neil M; Beach, Andrew; Swenson, Lily F; Pacold, Martha M; Kim, Wan (CRT)
Cc: Holland, Eric W
Subject: RE: 2/10/06 Trafficking Press Event - Long Island, NY

Adding Wan.

-----Original Message-----
From: Reyes, Luis (SMO)
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 6:45 PM
To: Scolinos, Tasia; Gorsuch, Neil M; Beach, Andrew; Elwood, Courtney; Swenson, Lily F; Pacold, Martha M
Cc: Holland, Eric W
Subject: RE: 2/10/06 Trafficking Press Event - Long Island, NY

I like these ideas and of course will defer to OAG. A victims event may be a more difficult endeavor in that, to my knowledge, the only ones that have taken somewhat of a public posture are the one or two that actually testified before Congress. Even then, these folks were testifying to effectuate legislation, but it is not clear that they wanted the public attention. CRT, in coordination with OVC and counterparts at HHS) would be able to best evaluate the feasibility of putting together an event like this.

From: Scolinos, Tasia
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 3:47 PM
To: Reyes, Luis (SMO); Gorsuch, Neil M; Beach, Andrew; Elwood, Courtney; Swenson, Lily F; Pacold, Martha M
Cc: Holland, Eric W
Subject: RE: 2/10/06 Trafficking Press Event - Long Island, NY

Great. Just to brainstorm this a bit, we might want to consider having the AG follow up a speech on this topic with a meeting with some of the victims of human trafficking who are now advocates against this horror to put a human face on the problem. (if any such victims have taken a public posture - does anyone know?) We will also start to put together a fact sheet that lists everything the department is doing in this area. (kind of an executive summary of the report). We can also push a out a fact sheet that highlights some of the bigger HT cases of the last year or so . If you are comfortable Wan we can also pitch you for some interviews on this topic once we get some momentum going around a HT event. Please keep me in the loop as this develops.

From: Reyes, Luis (SMO)
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 2:38 PM
To: Gorsuch, Neil M; Beach, Andrew; Scolinos, Tasia; Elwood, Courtney; Swenson, Lily F; Pacold, Martha M
Subject: FW: 2/10/06 Trafficking Press Event - Long Island, NY

Meant to copy Andy, Courtney, and Martha on this.

From: Reyes, Luis (SMO)
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 2:23 PM
To: Scolinos, Tasia; Gorsuch, Neil M; Swenson, Lily F
Subject: RE: 2/10/06 Trafficking Press Event - Long Island, NY

That is exactly along the lines of what we and OAG (Sampson, Elwood) were thinking. The report will likely be published before the end of the month. (Final draft has been circulated. Just need to finalize and send to printer). Our thought would be to announce the sentencing, release the report, and reference the OJP money all in one, thereby demonstrating the continued day to day commitment to this issue. The one caveat here: these sentencing dates are in many instances pushed back, sometimes for several months. CRT reports that there is a possibility of this happening here. Accordingly, we have asked CRT to work with OIPL to put together proposed alternative venues for such an announcement in early February (i.e. a speech to an NGO or another group (a MALDEF perhaps) that has a stake this issue). CRT will have a proposed alternative roll out plan for us shortly.

From: Scolinos, Tasia
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 2:11 PM
To: Reyes, Luis (SMO)
Subject: FW: 2/10/06 Trafficking Press Event - Long Island, NY

It seems there could be the making of an event here if we take the new OJP money mentioned in this proposal and also package that with the report you all have been working on. When do you expect that the report will be done?

From: Beach, Andrew
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 12:40 PM
To: Scolinos, Tasia; Roehrkasse, Brian
Subject: 2/10/06 Trafficking Press Event - Long Island, NY

What is your recommendation on this?

From: Comisac, Rena (CRT)
Sent: Thursday, January 12, 2006 10:58 AM
To: Beach, Andrew
Cc: Kim, Wan (CRT); Gorsuch, Neil M; Reyes, Luis (SMO); Swenson, Lily F; Schlozman, Brad (CRT); Longwitz, Tobi (CRT); Vargas, Omar (CRT)
Subject: Scheduling request form

Andy -- over the holidays you were kind enough to put a placeholder on the AG's calendar for a press conference that may be held on February 10 in New York. I've attached the scheduling request form that essentially codifes that informal placeholder. Pls. let me or Tobi know if you have any questions. Thanks.

<< File: AG Scheduling Form 2.wpd >>

Reyes, Luis (SMO)

From: Reyes, Luis (SMO)
Sent: Friday, January 13, 2006 2:35 PM
To: Elwood, Courtney; Pacold, Martha M; Vargas, Omar (CRT)
Cc: Gorsuch, Neil M; Swenson, Lily F; Kim, Wan (CRT); Comisac, Rena (CRT)
Subject: POTUS Photo for trafficking report

My initial recommendation is to have Wan contact Allyson Ho in Domestic Policy. If not, Neil or Lily could. Caveat: this may open up another can of worms. Has domestic policy been looped in on this project? I believe it is probably a good idea to let them know and give them a draft to review, HOWEVER, I would run this course of action by OAG first. A possible approach is to loop Allyson in on the project, give her a draft, then raise the issues of clearnce for the POTUS photo. Courtney, Martha, what are your thoughts?

-----Original Message-----
From: Vargas, Omar (CRT)
Sent: Friday, January 13, 2006 12:12 PM
To: Reyes, Luis (SMO)
Subject: Re: Farewell to DOJ

Your tenure deserves a standing ovation. I have one more thing to ask of you before you leave. The white house photo office refuses to allow us use of POTUS photos in our report. How shall we handle?

Sent from my BlackBerry Wireless Handheld

Khan, Omar

From: Khan, Omar
Sent: Friday, January 13, 2006 3:24 PM
To: Gorsuch, Neil M
Subject: Unable to connect to Outlook

Hi Neil,

Drop me an email when this occurs again and please try to log in to another workstation at the same time. The ticket will remain open under my name until we get this fixed.

Omar Khan
Sr. Systems Engineer
SMO-JMD Server/Ops
PHB RM 4519
[redacted]

Vargas, Omar (CRT)

From:	Vargas, Omar (CRT)
Sent:	Friday, January 13, 2006 5:48 PM
To:	Reyes, Luis (SMO); Elwood, Courtney; Pacold, Martha M
Cc:	Gorsuch, Neil M; Swenson, Lily F; Kim, Wan (CRT); Comisac, Rena (CRT)
Subject:	Re: POTUS Photo for trafficking report

OPA is working on a different approach with Kimani of our office and White House Media Affairs. Let's see if this works.

Sent from my BlackBerry Wireless Handheld

-----Original Message-----
From: Reyes, Luis (SMO) <Luis.Reyes@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
To: Elwood, Courtney <Courtney.Elwood@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Pacold, Martha M <Martha.M.Pacold@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Vargas, Omar (CRT) <Omar.Vargas@crt.usdoj.gov>
CC: Gorsuch, Neil M <Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Swenson, Lily F <Lily.Fu.Swenson@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Kim, Wan (CRT) <Wan.Kim@crt.usdoj.gov>; Comisac, Rena (CRT) <Rena.Comisac@crt.usdoj.gov>
Sent: Fri Jan 13 14:35:00 2006
Subject: POTUS Photo for trafficking report

My initial recommendation is to have Wan contact Allyson Ho in Domestic Policy. If not, Neil or Lily could. Caveat: this may open up another can of worms. Has domestic policy been looped in on this project? I believe it is probably a good idea to let them know and give them a draft to review, HOWEVER, I would run this course of action by OAG first. A possible approach is to loop Allyson in on the project, give her a draft, then raise the issues of clearnce for the POTUS photo. Courtney, Martha, what are your thoughts?

-----Original Message-----
From: Vargas, Omar (CRT)
Sent: Friday, January 13, 2006 12:12 PM
To: Reyes, Luis (SMO)
Subject: Re: Farewell to DOJ

Your tenure deserves a standing ovation. I have one more thing to ask of you before you leave. The white house photo office refuses to allow us use of POTUS photos in our report. How shall we handle?

Sent from my BlackBerry Wireless Handheld

Elwood, Courtney

From:	Elwood, Courtney
Sent:	Friday, January 13, 2006 8:34 PM
To:	Reyes, Luis (SMO); Pacold, Martha M; Vargas, Omar (CRT)
Cc:	Gorsuch, Neil M; Swenson, Lily F; Kim, Wan (CRT); Comisac, Rena (CRT); Hertling, Richard; Brand, Rachel
Subject:	RE: POTUS Photo for trafficking report

Before Luis departed the building, he raised an excellent point (below) about alerting the WH/DPC about the trafficking report. I am not aware that the subject has been raised, but have added Richard and Rachel as the most likely to know, apart from those originally on this email chain.

May I suggest that Neil call Allyson on Tuesday?

-----Original Message-----
From: Reyes, Luis (SMO)
Sent: Friday, January 13, 2006 2:35 PM
To: Elwood, Courtney; Pacold, Martha M; Vargas, Omar (CRT)
Cc: Gorsuch, Neil M; Swenson, Lily F; Kim, Wan (CRT); Comisac, Rena (CRT)
Subject: POTUS Photo for trafficking report

My initial recommendation is to have Wan contact Allyson Ho in Domestic Policy. If not, Neil or Lily could. Caveat: this may open up another can of worms. Has domestic policy been looped in on this project? I believe it is probably a good idea to let them know and give them a draft to review, HOWEVER, I would run this course of action by OAG first. A possible approach is to loop Allyson in on the project, give her a draft, then raise the issues of clearnce for the POTUS photo. Courtney, Martha, what are your thoughts?

-----Original Message-----
From: Vargas, Omar (CRT)
Sent: Friday, January 13, 2006 12:12 PM
To: Reyes, Luis (SMO)
Subject: Re: Farewell to DOJ

Your tenure deserves a standing ovation. I have one more thing to ask of you before you leave. The white house photo office refuses to allow us use of POTUS photos in our report. How shall we handle?

Sent from my BlackBerry Wireless Handheld

Gorsuch, Neil M

From:	Gorsuch, Neil M
Sent:	Friday, January 13, 2006 10:18 PM
To:	Elwood, Courtney; Reyes, Luis (SMO); Pacold, Martha M; Vargas, Omar (CRT)
Cc:	Swenson, Lily F; Kim, Wan (CRT); Comisac, Rena (CRT); Hertling, Richard; Brand, Rachel
Subject:	Re: POTUS Photo for trafficking report

I agree. Unless anyone sees a reason to proceed otherwise, I will plan on reaching out to Allyson on Tuesday. Have a good weekend all. NMG

-----Original Message-----
From: Elwood, Courtney <Courtney.Elwood@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
To: Reyes, Luis (SMO) <Luis.Reyes@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Pacold, Martha M <Martha.M.Pacold@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Vargas, Omar (CRT) <Omar.Vargas@crt.usdoj.gov>
CC: Gorsuch, Neil M <Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Swenson, Lily F <Lily.Fu.Swenson@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Kim, Wan (CRT) <Wan.Kim@crt.usdoj.gov>; Comisac, Rena (CRT) <Rena.Comisac@crt.usdoj.gov>; Hertling, Richard <Richard.Hertling@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Brand, Rachel <Rachel.Brand@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
Sent: Fri Jan 13 20:34:19 2006
Subject: RE: POTUS Photo for trafficking report

Before Luis departed the building, he raised an excellent point (below) about alerting the WH/DPC about the trafficking report. I am not aware that the subject has been raised, but have added Richard and Rachel as the most likely to know, apart from those originally on this email chain.

May I suggest that Neil call Allyson on Tuesday?

-----Original Message-----
From: Reyes, Luis (SMO)
Sent: Friday, January 13, 2006 2:35 PM
To: Elwood, Courtney; Pacold, Martha M; Vargas, Omar (CRT)
Cc: Gorsuch, Neil M; Swenson, Lily F; Kim, Wan (CRT); Comisac, Rena (CRT)
Subject: POTUS Photo for trafficking report

My initial recommendation is to have Wan contact Allyson Ho in Domestic Policy. If not, Neil or Lily could. Caveat: this may open up another can of worms. Has domestic policy been looped in on this project? I believe it is probably a good idea to let them know and give them a draft to review, HOWEVER, I would run this course of action by OAG first. A possible approach is to loop Allyson in on the project, give her a draft, then raise the issues of clearnce for the POTUS photo. Courtney, Martha, what are your thoughts?

-----Original Message-----
From: Vargas, Omar (CRT)
Sent: Friday, January 13, 2006 12:12 PM
To: Reyes, Luis (SMO)
Subject: Re: Farewell to DOJ

Your tenure deserves a standing ovation. I have one more thing to ask of you before you leave. The white house photo office refuses to allow us use of POTUS photos in our report. How shall we handle?

Sent from my BlackBerry Wireless Handheld

Elwood, Courtney

From:	Elwood, Courtney
Sent:	Friday, January 13, 2006 10:44 PM
To:	Gorsuch, Neil M; Reyes, Luis (SMO); Pacold, Martha M; Vargas, Omar (CRT)
Cc:	Swenson, Lily F; Kim, Wan (CRT); Comisac, Rena (CRT); Hertling, Richard; Brand, Rachel
Subject:	Re: POTUS Photo for trafficking report

I don't know when you planned to go to the printer. But, if possible, we probably should not send it to the printer before giving the Allyson 2 or 3 days for review if she wants it (and I anticipate she will). Will that create any problems?

Sent from my BlackBerry Wireless Handheld

-----Original Message-----
From: Gorsuch, Neil M <Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
To: Elwood, Courtney <Courtney.Elwood@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Reyes, Luis (SMO) <Luis.Reyes@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Pacold, Martha M <Martha.M.Pacold@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Vargas, Omar (CRT) <Omar.Vargas@crt.usdoj.gov>
CC: Swenson, Lily F <Lily.Fu.Swenson@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Kim, Wan (CRT) <Wan.Kim@crt.usdoj.gov>; Comisac, Rena (CRT) <Rena.Comisac@crt.usdoj.gov>; Hertling, Richard <Richard.Hertling@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Brand, Rachel <Rachel.Brand@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
Sent: Fri Jan 13 22:17:58 2006
Subject: Re: POTUS Photo for trafficking report

I agree. Unless anyone sees a reason to proceed otherwise, I will plan on reaching out to Allyson on Tuesday. Have a good weekend all. NMG

-----Original Message-----
From: Elwood, Courtney <Courtney.Elwood@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
To: Reyes, Luis (SMO) <Luis.Reyes@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Pacold, Martha M <Martha.M.Pacold@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Vargas, Omar (CRT) <Omar.Vargas@crt.usdoj.gov>
CC: Gorsuch, Neil M <Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Swenson, Lily F <Lily.Fu.Swenson@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Kim, Wan (CRT) <Wan.Kim@crt.usdoj.gov>; Comisac, Rena (CRT) <Rena.Comisac@crt.usdoj.gov>; Hertling, Richard <Richard.Hertling@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Brand, Rachel <Rachel.Brand@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
Sent: Fri Jan 13 20:34:19 2006
Subject: RE: POTUS Photo for trafficking report

Before Luis departed the building, he raised an excellent point (below) about alerting the WH/DPC about the trafficking report. I am not aware that the subject has been raised, but have added Richard and Rachel as the most likely to know, apart from those originally on this email chain.

May I suggest that Neil call Allyson on Tuesday?

-----Original Message-----
From: Reyes, Luis (SMO)
Sent: Friday, January 13, 2006 2:35 PM
To: Elwood, Courtney; Pacold, Martha M; Vargas, Omar (CRT)
Cc: Gorsuch, Neil M; Swenson, Lily F; Kim, Wan (CRT); Comisac, Rena (CRT)
Subject: POTUS Photo for trafficking report

My initial recommendation is to have Wan contact Allyson Ho in Domestic Policy. If not, Neil or Lily could. Caveat: this may open up another can of worms. Has domestic policy been looped in on this project? I believe it is probably a good idea to let them know and give them a draft to review, HOWEVER, I would run this course of action by OAG first. A possible approach is to loop Allyson in on the project, give her a draft, then raise the issues of clearnce for the POTUS photo. Courtney, Martha, what are your thoughts?

-----Original Message-----
From: Vargas, Omar (CRT)
Sent: Friday, January 13, 2006 12:12 PM
To: Reyes, Luis (SMO)
Subject: Re: Farewell to DOJ

Your tenure deserves a standing ovation. I have one more thing to ask of you before you leave. The white house photo office refuses to allow us use of POTUS photos in our report. How shall we handle?

Sent from my BlackBerry Wireless Handheld

Hertling, Richard

From: Hertling, Richard
Sent: Saturday, January 14, 2006 9:54 AM
To: Elwood, Courtney; Gorsuch, Neil M; Reyes, Luis (SMO); Pacold, Martha M; Vargas, Omar (CRT)
Cc: Swenson, Lily F; Kim, Wan (CRT); Comisac, Rena (CRT); Brand, Rachel
Subject: Re: POTUS Photo for trafficking report

I don't disagree, but I think Neil needs to make two calls. Allyson is one, but the DPC lead on trafficking is not Allyson but Melissa Pardue. I think Neil should call both and give both a chance to review the report. I have signalled to Allyson that the report was in the works but have said nothing more and have not supplied any of the drafts.

-----Original Message-----
From: Elwood, Courtney <Courtney.Elwood@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
To: Gorsuch, Neil M <Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Reyes, Luis (SMO) <Luis.Reyes@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Pacold, Martha M <Martha.M.Pacold@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Vargas, Omar (CRT) <Omar.Vargas@crt.usdoj.gov>
CC: Swenson, Lily F <Lily.Fu.Swenson@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Kim, Wan (CRT) <Wan.Kim@crt.usdoj.gov>; Comisac, Rena (CRT) <Rena.Comisac@crt.usdoj.gov>; Hertling, Richard <Richard.Hertling@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Brand, Rachel <Rachel.Brand@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
Sent: Fri Jan 13 22:43:46 2006
Subject: Re: POTUS Photo for trafficking report

I don't know when you planned to go to the printer. But, if possible, we probably should not send it to the printer before giving the Allyson 2 or 3 days for review if she wants it (and I anticipate she will). Will that create any problems?

Sent from my BlackBerry Wireless Handheld

-----Original Message-----
From: Gorsuch, Neil M <Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
To: Elwood, Courtney <Courtney.Elwood@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Reyes, Luis (SMO) <Luis.Reyes@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Pacold, Martha M <Martha.M.Pacold@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Vargas, Omar (CRT) <Omar.Vargas@crt.usdoj.gov>
CC: Swenson, Lily F <Lily.Fu.Swenson@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Kim, Wan (CRT) <Wan.Kim@crt.usdoj.gov>; Comisac, Rena (CRT) <Rena.Comisac@crt.usdoj.gov>; Hertling, Richard <Richard.Hertling@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Brand, Rachel <Rachel.Brand@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
Sent: Fri Jan 13 22:17:58 2006
Subject: Re: POTUS Photo for trafficking report

I agree. Unless anyone sees a reason to proceed otherwise, I will plan on reaching out to Allyson on Tuesday. Have a good weekend all. NMG

-----Original Message-----
From: Elwood, Courtney <Courtney.Elwood@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
To: Reyes, Luis (SMO) <Luis.Reyes@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Pacold, Martha M <Martha.M.Pacold@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Vargas, Omar (CRT) <Omar.Vargas@crt.usdoj.gov>
CC: Gorsuch, Neil M <Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Swenson, Lily F <Lily.Fu.Swenson@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Kim, Wan (CRT) <Wan.Kim@crt.usdoj.gov>; Comisac, Rena (CRT) <Rena.Comisac@crt.usdoj.gov>; Hertling, Richard <Richard.Hertling@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Brand, Rachel <Rachel.Brand@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
Sent: Fri Jan 13 20:34:19 2006
Subject: RE: POTUS Photo for trafficking report

Before Luis departed the building, he raised an excellent point (below) about alerting the WH/DPC about the trafficking report. I am not aware that the subject has been raised, but have added Richard and Rachel as the most likely to know, apart from those originally on this email chain.

May I suggest that Neil call Allyson on Tuesday?

-----Original Message-----
From: Reyes, Luis (SMO)
Sent: Friday, January 13, 2006 2:35 PM
To: Elwood, Courtney; Pacold, Martha M; Vargas, Omar (CRT)
Cc: Gorsuch, Neil M; Swenson, Lily F; Kim, Wan (CRT); Comisac, Rena (CRT)
Subject: POTUS Photo for trafficking report

My initial recommendation is to have Wan contact Allyson Ho in Domestic Policy. If not, Neil or Lily could. Caveat: this may open up another can of worms. Has domestic policy been looped in on this project? I believe it is probably a good idea to let them know and give them a draft to review, HOWEVER, I would run this course of action by OAG first. A possible approach is to loop Allyson in on the project, give her a draft, then raise the issues of clearnce for the POTUS photo. Courtney, Martha, what are your thoughts?

-----Original Message-----
From: Vargas, Omar (CRT)
Sent: Friday, January 13, 2006 12:12 PM
To: Reyes, Luis (SMO)
Subject: Re: Farewell to DOJ

Your tenure deserves a standing ovation. I have one more thing to ask of you before you leave. The white house photo office refuses to allow us use of POTUS photos in our report. How shall we handle?

Sent from my BlackBerry Wireless Handheld

Comisac, Rena (CRT)

From: Comisac, Rena (CRT)
Sent: Saturday, January 14, 2006 11:01 AM
To: Gorsuch, Neil M
Subject: Re: POTUS Photo for trafficking report

I owe you a phone call on Home Sweet Home. I apologize for not calling in yesterday -- very hectic travel day that began at 5 am and did not end until more than 12 hrs later! But the press conference on USERRA/ American Airlines went very well, and I expect we'll see some good print coverage today. The local CBS affiliate was also there, so there may have been some video coverage yesterday also.

But I digress. Re HSH, should we touch base over the weekend, or is Tuesday fine? If you prefer the former, the Command Center has all my contact info -- call at your convenience.

Sent from my BlackBerry Wireless Handheld

-----Original Message-----
From: Gorsuch, Neil M <Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
To: Elwood, Courtney <Courtney.Elwood@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Reyes, Luis (SMO) <Luis.Reyes@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Pacold, Martha M <Martha.M.Pacold@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Vargas, Omar (CRT) <Omar.Vargas@crt.usdoj.gov>
CC: Swenson, Lily F <Lily.Fu.Swenson@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Kim, Wan (CRT) <Wan.Kim@crt.usdoj.gov>; Comisac, Rena (CRT) <Rena.Comisac@crt.usdoj.gov>; Hertling, Richard <Richard.Hertling@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Brand, Rachel <Rachel.Brand@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
Sent: Fri Jan 13 22:17:58 2006
Subject: Re: POTUS Photo for trafficking report

I agree. Unless anyone sees a reason to proceed otherwise, I will plan on reaching out to Allyson on Tuesday. Have a good weekend all. NMG

-----Original Message-----
From: Elwood, Courtney <Courtney.Elwood@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
To: Reyes, Luis (SMO) <Luis.Reyes@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Pacold, Martha M <Martha.M.Pacold@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Vargas, Omar (CRT) <Omar.Vargas@crt.usdoj.gov>
CC: Gorsuch, Neil M <Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Swenson, Lily F <Lily.Fu.Swenson@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Kim, Wan (CRT) <Wan.Kim@crt.usdoj.gov>; Comisac, Rena (CRT) <Rena.Comisac@crt.usdoj.gov>; Hertling, Richard <Richard.Hertling@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Brand, Rachel <Rachel.Brand@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
Sent: Fri Jan 13 20:34:19 2006
Subject: RE: POTUS Photo for trafficking report

Before Luis departed the building, he raised an excellent point (below) about alerting the WH/DPC about the trafficking report. I am not aware that the subject has been raised, but have added Richard and Rachel as the most likely to know, apart from those originally on this email chain.

and Rachel as the most likely to know, apart from those originally on this email chain.

May I suggest that Neil call Allyson on Tuesday?

-----Original Message-----
From: Reyes, Luis (SMO)
Sent: Friday, January 13, 2006 2:35 PM
To: Elwood, Courtney; Pacold, Martha M; Vargas, Omar (CRT)
Cc: Gorsuch, Neil M; Swenson, Lily F; Kim, Wan (CRT); Comisac, Rena (CRT)
Subject: POTUS Photo for trafficking report

My initial recommendation is to have Wan contact Allyson Ho in Domestic Policy. If not, Neil or Lily could. Caveat: this may open up another can of worms. Has domestic policy been looped in on this project? I believe it is probably a good idea to let them know and give them a draft to review, HOWEVER, I would run this course of action by OAG first. A possible approach is to loop Allyson in on the project, give her a draft, then raise the issues of clearnce for the POTUS photo. Courtney, Martha, what are your thoughts?

-----Original Message-----
From: Vargas, Omar (CRT)
Sent: Friday, January 13, 2006 12:12 PM
To: Reyes, Luis (SMO)
Subject: Re: Farewell to DOJ

Your tenure deserves a standing ovation. I have one more thing to ask of you before you leave. The white house photo office refuses to allow us use of POTUS photos in our report. How shall we handle?

Sent from my BlackBerry Wireless Handheld

Comisac, Rena (CRT)

From:	Comisac, Rena (CRT)
Sent:	Saturday, January 14, 2006 11:09 AM
To:	Elwood, Courtney; Gorsuch, Neil M; Reyes, Luis (SMO); Pacold, Martha M; Vargas, Omar (CRT)
Cc:	Swenson, Lily F; Kim, Wan (CRT); Hertling, Richard; Brand, Rachel
Subject:	Re: POTUS Photo for trafficking report

We were planning on sending the report to the printer on Tuesday, which would have gotten it back to us on February 7 -- just in time for the Alonzo Perez sentencing on February 10. But we are exploring alternative roll outs, so I don't think it's the end of the world if we don't roll it out on 2/10.

Sent from my BlackBerry Wireless Handheld

-----Original Message-----
From: Elwood, Courtney <Courtney.Elwood@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
To: Gorsuch, Neil M <Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Reyes, Luis (SMO) <Luis.Reyes@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Pacold, Martha M <Martha.M.Pacold@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Vargas, Omar (CRT) <Omar.Vargas@crt.usdoj.gov>
CC: Swenson, Lily F <Lily.Fu.Swenson@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Kim, Wan (CRT) <Wan.Kim@crt.usdoj.gov>; Comisac, Rena (CRT) <Rena.Comisac@crt.usdoj.gov>; Hertling, Richard <Richard.Hertling@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Brand, Rachel <Rachel.Brand@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
Sent: Fri Jan 13 22:43:46 2006
Subject: Re: POTUS Photo for trafficking report

I don't know when you planned to go to the printer. But, if possible, we probably should not send it to the printer before giving the Allyson 2 or 3 days for review if she wants it (and I anticipate she will). Will that create any problems?

Sent from my BlackBerry Wireless Handheld

-----Original Message-----
From: Gorsuch, Neil M <Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
To: Elwood, Courtney <Courtney.Elwood@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Reyes, Luis (SMO) <Luis.Reyes@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Pacold, Martha M <Martha.M.Pacold@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Vargas, Omar (CRT) <Omar.Vargas@crt.usdoj.gov>
CC: Swenson, Lily F <Lily.Fu.Swenson@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Kim, Wan (CRT) <Wan.Kim@crt.usdoj.gov>; Comisac, Rena (CRT) <Rena.Comisac@crt.usdoj.gov>; Hertling, Richard <Richard.Hertling@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Brand, Rachel <Rachel.Brand@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
Sent: Fri Jan 13 22:17:58 2006
Subject: Re: POTUS Photo for trafficking report

I agree. Unless anyone sees a reason to proceed otherwise, I will plan on reaching out to Allyson on Tuesday. Have a good weekend all. NMG

-----Original Message-----
From: Elwood, Courtney <Courtney.Elwood@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
To: Reyes, Luis (SMO) <Luis.Reyes@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Pacold, Martha M <Martha.M.Pacold@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Vargas, Omar (CRT) <Omar.Vargas@crt.usdoj.gov>
CC: Gorsuch, Neil M <Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Swenson, Lily F <Lily.Fu.Swenson@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Kim, Wan (CRT) <Wan.Kim@crt.usdoj.gov>; Comisac, Rena (CRT) <Rena.Comisac@crt.usdoj.gov>; Hertling, Richard <Richard.Hertling@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Brand, Rachel <Rachel.Brand@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
Sent: Fri Jan 13 20:34:19 2006
Subject: RE: POTUS Photo for trafficking report

Before Luis departed the building, he raised an excellent point (below) about alerting the WH/DPC about the trafficking report. I am not aware that the subject has been raised, but have added Richard and Rachel as the most likely to know, apart from those originally on this email chain.

May I suggest that Neil call Allyson on Tuesday?

-----Original Message-----
From: Reyes, Luis (SMO)
Sent: Friday, January 13, 2006 2:35 PM
To: Elwood, Courtney; Pacold, Martha M; Vargas, Omar (CRT)
Cc: Gorsuch, Neil M; Swenson, Lily F; Kim, Wan (CRT); Comisac, Rena (CRT)
Subject: POTUS Photo for trafficking report

My initial recommendation is to have Wan contact Allyson Ho in Domestic Policy. If not, Neil or Lily could. Caveat: this may open up another can of worms. Has domestic policy been looped in on this project? I believe it is probably a good idea to let them know and give them a draft to review, HOWEVER, I would run this course of action by OAG first. A possible approach is to loop Allyson in on the project, give her a draft, then raise the issues of clearnce for the POTUS photo. Courtney, Martha, what are your thoughts?

-----Original Message-----
From: Vargas, Omar (CRT)
Sent: Friday, January 13, 2006 12:12 PM
To: Reyes, Luis (SMO)
Subject: Re: Farewell to DOJ

Your tenure deserves a standing ovation. I have one more thing to ask of you before you leave. The white house photo office refuses to allow us use of POTUS photos in our report. How shall we handle?

Sent from my BlackBerry Wireless Handheld

Gorsuch, Neil M

From: Gorsuch, Neil M
Sent: Saturday, January 14, 2006 2:21 PM
To: Comisac, Rena (CRT)
Subject: Re: POTUS Photo for trafficking report

No worries. It will keep till Tuesday. Have a great weekend!

-----Original Message-----
From: Comisac, Rena (CRT) <Rena.Comisac@crt.usdoj.gov>
To: Gorsuch, Neil M <Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
Sent: Sat Jan 14 11:00:51 2006
Subject: Re: POTUS Photo for trafficking report

I owe you a phone call on Home Sweet Home. I apologize for not calling in yesterday -- very hectic travel day that began at 5 am and did not end until more than 12 hrs later! But the press conference on USERRA/ American Airlines went very well, and I expect we'll see some good print coverage today. The local CBS affiliate was also there, so there may have been some video coverage yesterday also.

But I digress. Re HSH, should we touch base over the weekend, or is Tuesday fine? If you prefer the former, the Command Center has all my contact info -- call at your convenience.

Sent from my BlackBerry Wireless Handheld

-----Original Message-----
From: Gorsuch, Neil M <Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
To: Elwood, Courtney <Courtney.Elwood@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Reyes, Luis (SMO) <Luis.Reyes@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Pacold, Martha M <Martha.M.Pacold@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Vargas, Omar (CRT) <Omar.Vargas@crt.usdoj.gov>
CC: Swenson, Lily F <Lily.Fu.Swenson@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Kim, Wan (CRT) <Wan.Kim@crt.usdoj.gov>; Comisac, Rena (CRT) <Rena.Comisac@crt.usdoj.gov>; Hertling, Richard <Richard.Hertling@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Brand, Rachel <Rachel.Brand@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
Sent: Fri Jan 13 22:17:58 2006
Subject: Re: POTUS Photo for trafficking report

I agree. Unless anyone sees a reason to proceed otherwise, I will plan on reaching out to Allyson on Tuesday. Have a good weekend all. NMG

-----Original Message-----
From: Elwood, Courtney <Courtney.Elwood@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
To: Reyes, Luis (SMO) <Luis.Reyes@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Pacold, Martha M <Martha.M.Pacold@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Vargas, Omar (CRT) <Omar.Vargas@crt.usdoj.gov>

<Martha.M.Pacold@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Vargas, Omar (CRT) <Omar.Vargas@crt.usdoj.gov>
CC: Gorsuch, Neil M <Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Swenson, Lily F <Lily.Fu.Swenson@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Kim, Wan (CRT) <Wan.Kim@crt.usdoj.gov>; Comisac, Rena (CRT) <Rena.Comisac@crt.usdoj.gov>; Hertling, Richard <Richard.Hertling@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Brand, Rachel <Rachel.Brand@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
Sent: Fri Jan 13 20:34:19 2006
Subject: RE: POTUS Photo for trafficking report

Before Luis departed the building, he raised an excellent point (below) about alerting the WH/DPC about the trafficking report. I am not aware that the subject has been raised, but have added Richard and Rachel as the most likely to know, apart from those originally on this email chain.

May I suggest that Neil call Allyson on Tuesday?

-----Original Message-----
From: Reyes, Luis (SMO)
Sent: Friday, January 13, 2006 2:35 PM
To: Elwood, Courtney; Pacold, Martha M; Vargas, Omar (CRT)
Cc: Gorsuch, Neil M; Swenson, Lily F; Kim, Wan (CRT); Comisac, Rena (CRT)
Subject: POTUS Photo for trafficking report

My initial recommendation is to have Wan contact Allyson Ho in Domestic Policy. If not, Neil or Lily could. Caveat: this may open up another can of worms. Has domestic policy been looped in on this project? I believe it is probably a good idea to let them know and give them a draft to review, HOWEVER, I would run this course of action by OAG first. A possible approach is to loop Allyson in on the project, give her a draft, then raise the issues of clearnce for the POTUS photo. Courtney, Martha, what are your thoughts?

-----Original Message-----
From: Vargas, Omar (CRT)
Sent: Friday, January 13, 2006 12:12 PM
To: Reyes, Luis (SMO)
Subject: Re: Farewell to DOJ

Your tenure deserves a standing ovation. I have one more thing to ask of you before you leave. The white house photo office refuses to allow us use of POTUS photos in our report. How shall we handle?

Sent from my BlackBerry Wireless Handheld

Gorsuch, Neil M

From:	Gorsuch, Neil M
Sent:	Saturday, January 14, 2006 2:22 PM
To:	Hertling, Richard; Elwood, Courtney; Reyes, Luis (SMO); Pacold, Martha M; Vargas, Omar (CRT)
Cc:	Swenson, Lily F; Kim, Wan (CRT); Comisac, Rena (CRT); Brand, Rachel
Subject:	Re: POTUS Photo for trafficking report

Will do Tues am.

-----Original Message-----
From: Hertling, Richard <Richard.Hertling@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
To: Elwood, Courtney <Courtney.Elwood@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Gorsuch, Neil M <Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Reyes, Luis (SMO) <Luis.Reyes@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Pacold, Martha M <Martha.M.Pacold@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Vargas, Omar (CRT) <Omar.Vargas@crt.usdoj.gov>
CC: Swenson, Lily F <Lily.Fu.Swenson@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Kim, Wan (CRT) <Wan.Kim@crt.usdoj.gov>; Comisac, Rena (CRT) <Rena.Comisac@crt.usdoj.gov>; Brand, Rachel <Rachel.Brand@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
Sent: Sat Jan 14 09:54:02 2006
Subject: Re: POTUS Photo for trafficking report

I don't disagree, but I think Neil needs to make two calls. Allyson is one, but the DPC lead on trafficking is not Allyson but Melissa Pardue. I think Neil should call both and give both a chance to review the report. I have signalled to Allyson that the report was in the works but have said nothing more and have not supplied any of the drafts.

-----Original Message-----
From: Elwood, Courtney <Courtney.Elwood@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
To: Gorsuch, Neil M <Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Reyes, Luis (SMO) <Luis.Reyes@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Pacold, Martha M <Martha.M.Pacold@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Vargas, Omar (CRT) <Omar.Vargas@crt.usdoj.gov>
CC: Swenson, Lily F <Lily.Fu.Swenson@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Kim, Wan (CRT) <Wan.Kim@crt.usdoj.gov>; Comisac, Rena (CRT) <Rena.Comisac@crt.usdoj.gov>; Hertling, Richard <Richard.Hertling@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Brand, Rachel <Rachel.Brand@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
Sent: Fri Jan 13 22:43:46 2006
Subject: Re: POTUS Photo for trafficking report

I don't know when you planned to go to the printer. But, if possible, we probably should not send it to the printer before giving the Allyson 2 or 3 days for review if she wants it (and I anticipate she will). Will that create any problems?

Sent from my BlackBerry Wireless Handheld

-----Original Message-----
From: Gorsuch, Neil M <Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
To: Elwood, Courtney <Courtney.Elwood@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Reyes, Luis (SMO) <Luis.Reyes@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Pacold, Martha M <Martha.M.Pacold@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Vargas, Omar (CRT) <Omar.Vargas@crt.usdoj.gov>
CC: Swenson, Lily F <Lily.Fu.Swenson@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Kim, Wan (CRT) <Wan.Kim@crt.usdoj.gov>; Comisac, Rena (CRT) <Rena.Comisac@crt.usdoj.gov>; Hertling, Richard <Richard.Hertling@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Brand, Rachel <Rachel.Brand@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
Sent: Fri Jan 13 22:17:58 2006
Subject: Re: POTUS Photo for trafficking report

I agree. Unless anyone sees a reason to proceed otherwise, I will plan on reaching out to Allyson on Tuesday. Have a good weekend all. NMG

-----Original Message-----
From: Elwood, Courtney <Courtney.Elwood@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
To: Reyes, Luis (SMO) <Luis.Reyes@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Pacold, Martha M <Martha.M.Pacold@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Vargas, Omar (CRT) <Omar.Vargas@crt.usdoj.gov>
CC: Gorsuch, Neil M <Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Swenson, Lily F <Lily.Fu.Swenson@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Kim, Wan (CRT) <Wan.Kim@crt.usdoj.gov>; Comisac, Rena (CRT) <Rena.Comisac@crt.usdoj.gov>; Hertling, Richard <Richard.Hertling@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Brand, Rachel <Rachel.Brand@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
Sent: Fri Jan 13 20:34:19 2006
Subject: RE: POTUS Photo for trafficking report

Before Luis departed the building, he raised an excellent point (below) about alerting the WH/DPC about the trafficking report. I am not aware that the subject has been raised, but have added Richard and Rachel as the most likely to know, apart from those originally on this email chain.

May I suggest that Neil call Allyson on Tuesday?

-----Original Message-----
From: Reyes, Luis (SMO)
Sent: Friday, January 13, 2006 2:35 PM
To: Elwood, Courtney; Pacold, Martha M; Vargas, Omar (CRT)
Cc: Gorsuch, Neil M; Swenson, Lily F; Kim, Wan (CRT); Comisac, Rena (CRT)
Subject: POTUS Photo for trafficking report

My initial recommendation is to have Wan contact Allyson Ho in Domestic Policy. If not, Neil or Lily could. Caveat: this may open up another can of worms. Has domestic policy been looped in on this project? I believe it is probably a good idea to let them know and give them a draft to review, HOWEVER, I would run this course of action by OAG first. A possible approach is to loop Allyson in on the project, give her a draft, then raise the issues of clearnce for the POTUS photo. Courtney, Martha, what are your thoughts?

-----Original Message-----
From: Vargas, Omar (CRT)
Sent: Friday, January 13, 2006 12:12 PM
To: Reyes, Luis (SMO)
Subject: Re: Farewell to DOJ

Your tenure deserves a standing ovation. I have one more thing to ask of you before you leave. The white house photo office refuses to allow us use of POTUS photos in our report. How shall we handle?

Sent from my BlackBerry Wireless Handheld

Khan, Omar

From: Khan, Omar
Sent: Wednesday, January 18, 2006 10:39 AM
To: Gorsuch, Neil M
Subject: PC Problems

Hi Neil,

Just checking if you have had any issues this morning with your Outlook not starting?

Omar Khan
Sr. Systems Engineer
SMO-JMD Server/Ops
PHB RM 4519
[redacted]

From: Miller, Charles S
Sent: Wednesday, January 18, 2006 11:40 AM
To: Agarwal, Asheesh (CIV); Ames, Andrew; Apisson, Elizabeth M; Baxter, Felix (CIV); Branda, Joyce (CIV); Brody, Stephen (CIV); Bucholtz, Jeffrey (CIV); Bukvics, Jennifer (CIV); Claterbos, Barbara (CIV); Cohen, David M. (CIV); Cohn, Jonathan (CIV); Davidson, Jeanne (CIV); Fadely, Kathlynn (CIV); Fargo, John (CIV); Fielding, Gabrielle (CIV); Figley, Paul (CIV); Flentje, August (CIV); Garren, Timothy (CIV); Glynn, J.Patrick (CIV); Gorsuch, Neil M; Hertz, Michael (CIV); Hollis, Robert (CIV); Hunt, Jody (CIV); Hussey, Thom (CIV); Jeweler, James (CIV); Katsas, Gregory (CIV); Keisler, Peter D (CIV); Kohn, Chris (CIV); Kopp, Robert (CIV); Letter, Douglas (CIV); Levine, Larry (EOIR); Lindemann, Michael (CIV); Magnuson, Cynthia; McCallum, Robert (SMO); Meron, Daniel (CIV); Nichols, Carl (CIV); Nowacki, John; Pyles, Phyllis (CIV); Reyes, Luis (SMO); Riley, Sharon (CIV); Rivera, Jennifer (CIV); Roehrkasse, Brian; Schiffer, Stuart (CIV); Scolinos, Tasia; Seidel, Rebecca; Senger, Jeffrey M; Spellberg, Dianne (CIV); Swenson, Lily F; Thirolf, Eugene; Wilson, Karen L; Zwick, Ken (CIV)
Subject: 1/18/06 Civil Division News

U.S. Supreme Court Tells Panel to Reconsider Abortion Decision

Oregon Suicide Law Is Upheld by High Court

ASSISTED SUICIDE UPHELD

News Analysis: Fraught Issue, but Narrow Ruling in Oregon Suicide Case

Lawsuits claim domestic spying program is illegal, unconstitutional

Hitchens joins authors seeking US wiretapping ban: Legal challenge to domestic spy programme Former 'war on terror' ally tells of phone call fears

Some Iraq Rebuilding Funds Go Untraced

PennDOT pays whistleblower

Plan for BlackBerry outages

Pentagon scales back, delays first installment of NSPS

Suspect in Federal Spam Case Pleads Guilty

Bloomberg
1/18/06

U.S. Supreme Court Tells Panel to Reconsider Abortion Decision

Jan. 18 (Bloomberg) -- The U.S. Supreme Court unanimously told a lower court to reconsider an abortion ruling that struck down a New Hampshire parental-notification requirement, saying a less sweeping ruling might resolve any constitutional problems.

Retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, probably writing her last abortion opinion on the high court, said a federal appeals court ``need not have invalidated the law wholesale'' to ensure that doctors could perform emergency procedures to protect a patient's health.

DOJ_NMG_0009703

The law, which has never taken effect, requires girls under age 18 who seek an abortion to notify a parent 48 hours in advance unless a judge rules the minor is mature enough to give informed consent herself. An abortion could be performed without such notification if needed to prevent the minor's death. No similar exception exists to protect her health.

The case is only the second abortion dispute at the high court since it reaffirmed the constitutional right in the 1992 Planned Parenthood v. Casey case.

The case is Ayotte v. Planned Parenthood of Northern New England, 04-1144.

END

Legal Times
01-18-2006

Oregon Suicide Law Is Upheld by High Court

By Tony Mauro

In a ruling that re-energizes the debate over federalism and the right to die, the Supreme Court on Tuesday said the federal Controlled Substances Act does not give the Bush administration the authority to thwart Oregon's law allowing physician-assisted suicide.

"Congress did not have this far-reaching intent to alter the federal-state balance and the congressional role in maintaining it," wrote Justice Anthony Kennedy for the 6-3 majority in Gonzales v. Oregon.

"The Supreme Court's ruling today affirms the right of Oregonians to govern their own end-of-life, pain management and palliative care choices," said Peg Sandeen, executive director of the Death with Dignity National Center, which has defended the Oregon law since voters approved it in 1994. "Gonzales v. Oregon is a historic milestone that will protect the people's rights as patients."

The ruling is a setback for the Bush administration and could spur other states to follow Oregon, currently the only state allowing physician-assisted suicide. Sandeen cautioned, however, that Congress could try to cripple the law in other ways with new legislation.

A Department of Justice spokeswoman, Tasia Scolinos, expressed the administration's disappointment with the ruling, but added that the department "remains committed to enforcing our nation's laws and ensuring that drugs are not diverted to unlawful uses."

The decision featured Chief Justice John Roberts Jr.'s first dissent and also echoed some of the debate over executive power heard just last week over the nomination of Samuel Alito Jr. to replace Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. Kennedy articulated a limited view of the power of the executive branch to tinker with acts of Congress -- unless Congress permits it.

The Oregon Death With Dignity Act allows doctors to prescribe death-hastening drugs to terminally ill patients in limited circumstances. The Clinton administration did not move to stop Oregon, but in November 2001, then-Attorney General John Ashcroft, who had opposed assisted suicide as a senator, issued an "interpretive rule" interpreting the Controlled Substances Act and announcing that assisted suicide was not a "legitimate medical purpose" that would allow doctors to prescribe Schedule II drugs under the act. Oregon, joined by physicians and terminally ill patients, challenged the rule, and the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals struck it down as overstepping federal authority.

The high court on Tuesday upheld the 9th Circuit -- itself a notable event -- in a ruling written by Kennedy, once a member of the 9th Circuit.

Once again, the Reagan-appointed Kennedy was in the position of announcing a Supreme Court decision that ran counter to conservative views on a hot-button issue. In 2003 Kennedy announced Lawrence v. Texas, upholding gay rights, and in 2005 he wrote Roper v. Simmons, striking down the juvenile death penalty.

But unlike his other controversial rulings, Kennedy's decision on Tuesday was devoid of soaring constitutional language, focusing instead on statutory interpretation and how much deference rules issued by the attorney general should be given.

"This ruling will probably be read in the future as an administrative law event rather than a political event or a constitutional one," said Greg Castanias, a partner in Jones Day's D.C. office, who authored a brief in the case on behalf of religious groups supporting the Oregon law. Castanias added that the ruling followed the teaching of the Court's 1997 Washington v. Glucksberg decision that found no constitutional right to assisted suicide but allowed states to legislate in the area.

DOJ_NMG_0009704

Kennedy said the deference that an executive branch official is usually given in implementing laws through regulation did not apply here, because when it passed the Controlled Substances Act, Congress did not give the attorney general the authority to promulgate rules like Ashcroft's. The structure of the law, Kennedy said, "conveys unwillingness to cede medical judgments to an executive official who lacks medical expertise."

The Bush administration's claim was also weakened, Kennedy said, by the fact that it intruded on the regulation of physicians and medical care, usually the province of states. Ashcroft's rule said Oregon physicians who continued to prescribe Schedule II drugs risked losing their federal registration that allows them to prescribe controlled substances.

"The background principles of our federal system also belie the notion that Congress would use such an obscure grant of authority to regulate areas traditionally supervised by the states' police power," wrote Kennedy.

Dissenters said Ashcroft's rule fits well under the powers given him by the Controlled Substances Act.

"If the term 'legitimate medical purpose' has any meaning, it surely excludes the prescription of drugs to produce death," Justice Antonin Scalia wrote, joined by Roberts and Clarence Thomas. Roberts did not write separately, but his vote marked the first time since he joined the Court in September that he dissented.

Thomas also chided the majority for upholding states' rights when, just last term in Gonzales v. Raich, it upheld federal power under the same law to forbid California's medical marijuana initiative.

The majority barely mentioned the Raich ruling, but appeared to suggest that the attorney general had greater authority to regulate drugs associated with abuse and criminal behavior than he does in restricting physicians' practices at issue in the Oregon case.

"The Court's reliance upon the constitutional principles it rejected in Raich," said Thomas, "is perplexing to say the least."

END

PBS: The NewsHour
17 January 2006

ASSISTED SUICIDE UPHELD

The U.S. Supreme Court Tuesday upheld an Oregon law that allows doctor-assisted suicide. By 6-3 the Court said the U.S. Justice Department may not use a federal drug law to override the state law. Following a background report, two experts discuss the implications of the ruling.

Supreme Court of the United States

State of Oregon

Euthanasia Research and Guidance Organization

RAY SUAREZ: Oregon physician Peter Rasmussen was outraged five years ago when then-Attorney General John Ashcroft issued a directive barring statewide distribution of drugs used for assisted suicides. The federal government argued such drugs can be used only for "legitimate medical purposes," and that didn't include suicide.

DR. PETER RASMUSSEN: He's not a physician. He's not an expert on what is appropriate and inappropriate medical practice. It's very clear that what he wanted to do was to just stop Oregon's death with dignity law.

RAY SUAREZ: Oregon psychiatrist Greg Hamilton said his state's right to die law, the only one of its kind in the nation, simply allowed doctors to kill their patients.

DR. GREG HAMILTON: If one of my patients is going to die tomorrow and I give them an overdose today, then I've killed them today.

RAY SUAREZ: But a majority of Oregon voters supported the law, approving it twice. It gives a patient, who two doctors agree has only six months to live, the right to ingest a physician-prescribed lethal medication.

More than 200 people have taken advantage of the law since it took effect in 1997. John Ashcroft tried to stop the practice using federal drug laws, so the state of Oregon sued the Bush administration, claiming only the state, not the U.S.

DOJ_NMG_0009705

Attorney General, has the authority to set medical standards. Two lower federal courts agreed, and today, so did the U.S. Supreme Court. By a 6-3 decision, it ruled that Attorney General Ashcroft's directive was unlawful, unenforceable and that he had overstepped his authority.

Interpreting the Controlled Substances Act
RAY SUAREZ: With us now is Marcia Coyle, Washington, D.C. Bureau Chief and Supreme Court correspondent for the National Law Journal.

And, Marcia, both in the argument and in the ruling today, this wasn't the Supreme Court speaking on the right to die, was it?

MARCIA COYLE: No, not at all. In fact, Justice Anthony Kennedy, who wrote the majority opinion, said at the outset that this case is the product of the debate, the moral and political debate over assisted suicide. But the issue before the court in this case really had to do with interpreting a federal statute, the Controlled Substances Act, to see whether it gave the attorney general the authority to prohibit physicians from prescribing regulated drugs for assisted suicide even when its state law allows them to do it.

RAY SUAREZ: So it was more of a states' rights case than an assisted suicide case?

MARCIA COYLE: It was partly a states' rights case but I would say it was really more of a statutory interpretation case, sort of the bread and butter stuff that the Supreme Court does in most of its cases. They were interpreting a statute.

RAY SUAREZ: So what basis did the court majority give for overruling the federal government, the executive branch?

MARCIA COYLE: The court basically rejected all of the government's arguments and, I'd say, followed the state of Oregon's arguments very closely. Justice Kennedy said that Congress gave the attorney general limited powers under the federal Controlled Substances Act.

The attorney general can register physicians, revoke their registration or suspend it to write prescriptions, and the attorney general can control the listing of drugs in certain schedules under the act.

But nowhere within the act was a broad grant of power to make assisted suicide criminal. The courts said that if you accept the government's argument the power to criminalize would be unrestrained. The attorney general could criminalize physicians' conduct whenever the attorney general felt that the conduct was illegitimate.

The court majority also felt that the government's claim to authority here really clashed or conflicted with the design and the objective of the Controlled Substances Act. The federal law is designed to combat illegal drug dealing and drug trafficking as it's conventionally understood. The medical profession is regulated here to ensure that physicians don't use their prescription writing to deal in drugs.

There is no connection between that and assisted suicide, according to the court, so the attorney general overstepped his authority in banning the use of prescription drugs for assisted suicide in this instance.

RAY SUAREZ: The final vote was 6-3. Who was in that six-member majority?

MARCIA COYLE: Everybody except Chief Justice John Roberts and Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas. Justices Scalia and Thomas wrote dissents. Justice Scalia said that he felt perhaps the decision was driven more by the belief that assisted suicide as a subject was no business of the federal government. But he thought the Congress clearly gave the attorney general authority here. The attorney general can act in the public interest in terms of registering and revoking the registration of physicians.

He said the overwhelming opinion of the medical community today is that assisted suicide is not a legitimate medical practice so the attorney general can act in the public interest.

Justice Thomas felt that the ruling was inconsistent with the court's rulings on state rights -- most recently the one in which the court used the Controlled Substances Act to knock down California's medical marijuana law.

Justice Kennedy, to get back to your federalism point, did say that the regulation of the medical profession is a traditional state power but this specific act, he felt, worked in harmony with that and so there was no federalism violation.

RAY SUAREZ: Well, Justice O'Connor, outgoing Justice O'Connor, voted with the six-person majority --

DOJ_NMG_0009706

MARCIA COYLE: Right.

RAY SUAREZ: -- so even if she -- if her retirement had been made final, the majority would have prevailed on this one. But more eyes seem to be turning in the analysis toward Justice Kennedy, who wrote the majority opinion.

MARCIA COYLE: And it was clear during the oral arguments on this case that Justice Kennedy could go either way. And it's also theorized that once Justice O'Connor leaves the bench -- and we know her as a key pivotal vote in many of these close cases -- that Justice Kennedy may well fulfill that role. He wasn't pivotal here, but he was very important. Also, Ray, this was Chief Justice Roberts' first dissent on the bench. And he did join the court's most conservative members.

RAY SUAREZ: Marcia, thanks a lot.

MARCIA COYLE: You're welcome.

Differing views of assisted suicide
RAY SUAREZ: Now, for the implications of today's Supreme Court decision, we are joined by: Kathryn Tucker, director of legal affairs for Compassion and Choices, an advocacy group for choice in care at the end of life -- she represented the patients in the case decided today; and Jim Bopp, president of the National Legal Center for the Medically Dependent and Disabled -- he filed an amicus brief in opposition to Oregon's assisted suicide law.

Kathryn Tucker, your reaction to today's ruling?

KATHRYN TUCKER: Well, we're very pleased, Ray. This decision allows the Oregon law to continue operating as it has for the past eight years. This gives tremendous comfort to terminally ill patients in Oregon who, in facing protracted, difficult deaths know they have the option for a peaceful and humane death if their suffering becomes intolerable. So their right to make that choice is preserved.

It's important also to patients nationwide because the Ashcroft directive potentially would have posed a terrible threat to patients everywhere who simply want good, attentive, pain and symptom management as they're dying. And so we have dodged that risk with the court's ruling today.

RAY SUAREZ: And, Jim Bopp, what did you see in looking at both the majority and the dissents?

JAMES BOPP, JR.: It depends on how you want to look at the case. If you look at it as a legal case, in other words, what issues were involved as Marcia has explained, this would make a good case for Administrative Law 101 where you talk about how statutes are to be interpreted and when a federal bureaucrat interprets that statute how much deference should the courts give to that interpretation.

So it was a very technical federal law question about both the authority of government officials to interpret congressional acts and also the interpretation of congressional laws themselves. So, the only real intersection with assisted suicide here is that the people in Oregon have chosen to have physicians use controlled substances to kill patients.

Now, they could have picked, you know, use of carbon monoxide administered by someone, a lay person, and of course that would have then not implicated the statute at all.

Will other states follow?
RAY SUAREZ: You've suggested that the ruling is technical and narrow. But in its effect does it make it easier for states to write right-to-die legislation? Does it sort of clear the table of it?

JAMES BOPP, JR.: Well, the proponents of assisted suicide have chosen doctors to be the ones to kill their patients.

Now, the medical profession, as Marcia reported, you know, they reject that killing patients through assisted suicide like in Oregon is medical care, and they don't want to be involved in that. So, to the extent that that has been the choice of the advocates of this position, well, then they can still use doctors for that purpose.

RAY SUAREZ: Kathryn Tucker, what do you --

KATHRYN TUCKER: If I might --

RAY SUAREZ: Go ahead.

DOJ_NMG_0009707

KATHRYN TUCKER: Yeah. If I might jump in there, the Oregon law does permit physicians to write prescriptions for their patients who are seeking a humane and peaceful death. And that's because we know that it is controlled substances that make a gentle and peaceful death possible.

Unfortunately, opponents such as Mr. Bopp like to suggest that non-humane methods might be more appropriate. We don't believe that. We believe that a patient who is coming to the end of life deserves to be able to turn to their physician in that doctor-patient relationship and have a full exploration of options including hastening impending death in a peaceful, gentle way, and it's not the case that physicians oppose that.

In fact, every poll nationwide of physicians shows a strong majority favoring patients being empowered to make this choice and a larger percentage of citizens nationwide support that choice.

RAY SUAREZ: You've already suggested that you support current Oregon statute. But what do you see as the bottom line effect of today's ruling?

Besides letting Oregon's law stand, will it make it easier for the other states contemplating laws of this kind to write them without anticipating federal interference?

KATHRYN TUCKER: Well, it certainly lifts a cloud of uncertainty that had been hanging over the question of whether states had the sovereignty to do this. And that cloud has now dissipated.

There is a measure pending in California modeled after the Oregon law, very strong public support for it, strong support in the state legislature, and I think that that state can look to its neighbor, Oregon, and examine carefully what has happened over the past seven years.

And what we've seen is that none of the risks that were speculated as possible or likely have actually presented. And so policymakers and citizens have that data. They can examine it closely and feel comfortable knowing that passage of this law poses no harm and no risk and provides an option that is very important for the comfort of a certain fraction of dying patients.

RAY SUAREZ: And, conversely, James Bopp, there are states that have already written laws to head this off, to make sure it does not become legal in their states. Does this provide this ruling any clarity if you're a state attempting to do that or a legislator who'd like to spearhead that kind of legislation?

JAMES BOPP, JR.: No. The states have always had the authority to prohibit assisted suicide. The vast majority of states have such laws because they recognize that it is really a form of discrimination to say, well, your life is not worth living and therefore we're not going to protect your life from assisted suicide because you have some condition or illness or disability.

And that's why the disability community is really concerned about laws such as Oregon's that could be used in the context of concern about the cost of medical care, can be used to pressure people with disabilities to agree to assisted suicide or shortening of their life in order to relieve these cost pressures.

A test case for assisted suicide?

RAY SUAREZ: Often when people are advocating or opposing very hot issues, they look for a test case. Will this part of the law need another case to go before federal courts and high courts in order to clarify what's medicine, what's not, what's treatment and what's not, some of the issues you've suggested?

JAMES BOPP, JR.: Yes. This case, of course, did not involve any of that really. And I think now what we are likely to see is an effort in Congress to clarify what has been the longstanding policy.

It was the Clinton administration that reversed the drug enforcement administration's long-held policy that controlled substances should not be used to kill patients. Really, Attorney General Ashcroft restored that policy.

But I think we can see efforts in Congress to make it clear that, you know, the federal government should not be involved in assisted suicide. They've already voted to ensure that the there will be no funding or no support or -- for assisted suicide with federal funds.

I think we'll see an effort in Congress to clarify the law that really has existed all but a few years in the Clinton administration.

DOJ_NMG_0009708

RAY SUAREZ: So, Kathryn Tucker, your work on behalf of your organization is certainly not over. It sounds like there are other challenges yet to come.

KATHRYN TUCKER: Well, we'll certainly continue to advocate for patients nationwide who want the comfort of having this choice available to them.

I have to say it's just such a shame to hear this referred to as somebody being killed or somebody having to agree to use this law. What this is, is a choice for a patient facing a difficult death to be able to choose for themselves without coercion, without pressure, but with full information from their physician of many choices.

They can choose aggressive pain and symptom management, hospice care, but there is a fraction of patients for whom the dying process will be so intolerable even with excellent pain and symptom management that this choice preserves their dignity; it preserves their autonomy and it's important to make this available. It's not forced on anyone. It's 100 percent the patient's choice. And that should be a choice that we as Americans know we have in our last days.

RAY SUAREZ: Quick response, Jim Bopp.

JAMES BOPP, JR.: The problem with that, I mean that is a whitewash of the situation. The situation is, is that the vast majority of people who would consider assisted suicide do so because of clinically diagnosable simple depression. The association between depression and suicide is like 95 percent. So when we have people in Oregon that are asking for assisted suicide, we have people who are depressed, who need treatment, who need care, not be essentially written off, given a drug and left to die.

RAY SUAREZ: Thank you --

KATHRYN TUCKER: No patient in Oregon can use the law who is depressed.

RAY SUAREZ: Guests, thank you very much.

KATHRYN TUCKER: Thank you.

END

New York Times

January 18, 2006

News Analysis: Fraught Issue, but Narrow Ruling in Oregon Suicide Case

By TIMOTHY EGAN and ADAM LIPTAK

PORTLAND, Ore., Jan. 17 - Just 30 terminally ill people exercise a right each year that is unique in America to the state of Oregon, hastening their deaths with a lethal dose of drugs prescribed by doctors.

The Supreme Court decision on Tuesday rejecting the Justice Department's effort to block the state's Death With Dignity Act will allow such suicides to continue, but it may not have the broad impact people on both sides of the debate are predicting.

There is no reason to think that the pace of physician-assisted suicides will quicken in Oregon. And the decision lends little support, one way or the other, to the efforts to enact similar laws around the country that have stalled since the Oregon law was enacted in 1994.

The Supreme Court's ruling was, in fact, notably focused and technical. It did not address whether there is a constitutional right to die. It did not say that Congress was powerless to override state laws that allow doctors to help their patients end their lives.

It said only that a particular federal law, the Controlled Substances Act, which is mainly concerned with drug abuse and illegal drug trafficking, had not given John Ashcroft, then the attorney general, the authority to punish Oregon doctors who complied with requests under the state's law. The law allows mentally competent, terminally ill patients to ask their doctors for lethal drugs.

"What the court decision means is simply that you won't have federal agents trying to put an end to this in the state of Oregon," said Dr. Timothy E. Quill, a professor of medicine and psychiatry at the University of Rochester, who is a prominent supporter of physician-assisted suicide. "We were very fearful of what might have happened had the ruling gone the other way."

Here in Oregon, the issue was initially contentious, passed by a bare margin in 1994. But the more that people outside the state criticized the law, the more support it gained here. When it came up for a second referendum in 1997, it was upheld 60 to 40.

"I would not expect to see an increase in doctor-assisted suicides here," said Mary Williams, Oregon's solicitor general. "But I do expect more states will at least have discussion now."

But states have been free to enact such laws, and they have not followed Oregon's example. Mr. Ashcroft did not issue his interpretation of the Controlled Substances Act until 2001, and it was soon enjoined. The federal government lost in the courts every step of the way.

One question now is whether the debate will move from the court to Congress. Peg Sandeen, executive director of the Death With Dignity National Center in Portland, said her group would move to push legislation or voter initiatives in several states.

But Ms. Sandeen said the organization was concerned that "a Congress that would intervene in the death of Terri Schiavo" might be galvanized into action by this decision.

Still, Tuesday's decision may prompt lawmakers in some states to give the matter a fresh look.

"This decision gives the green light to the rest of the nation to move forward with assisted-suicide laws," said Mathew D. Staver, president of Liberty Counsel, which filed a brief supporting the federal government in the Oregon case. "This particular case was either going to close the door or to open it, and it opened it."

In the handful of states where a similar measure has been under consideration, supporters said they hoped the decision would help.

"This will be a tremendous momentum builder for Vermont and other states who want to bring compassionate care to end-of-life issues," said Dr. David Babbott, a board member of Death With Dignity Vermont.

Opponents of assisted suicide said Tuesday's decision was a narrow and technical one that did not endorse any particular approach to these issues.

"I don't think its impact will be great," Dr. Robert D. Orr, the president of the Vermont Alliance for Ethical Healthcare, said of the decision. "Some have misunderstood the Oregon case as a challenge to the Oregon statute itself."

The Oregon law was initially held up by an injunction, and not fully put into effect until 1998. Since then, through 2004, a total of 208 people have taken their lives by lethal injection with a physician-prescribed drug, usually a barbiturate.

Critics had said Oregon would become a suicide center, with people flying in to end their lives. They also predicted that the law would be unfairly used against uneducated people or those without health insurance or adequate medical choices.

In the seven full years since the law has been in effect and records have been kept, more than 60 percent of those who have killed themselves have had some college education, the state reported.

Nora Miller, whose husband, Rick, took his life here in Portland in 1999 after he was given less than six months to live with a diagnosis of terminal lung cancer, said the Oregon law allowed for a peaceful and relatively pain-free end to his life.

"He was worried about being unconscious and completely out of it," said Ms. Miller, whose husband was 52. "But it was as good a death as he could have hoped for."

She praised the court decision as a backing of individual liberty.

"This country was founded on the idea that you should be able to make these kinds of decisions without government interference," Ms. Miller said.

But the leader of a group of Oregon physicians who have long opposed the measure, Dr. Kenneth Stevens, said the medical community had long had ways to help people deal with pain at the end of their lives.

"I've been taking care of cancer patients for more than 30 years," Dr. Stevens said, "and I feel helping people kill themselves is not something doctors should be doing."

Gov. Theodore R. Kulongoski of Oregon said one effect of the decision would be to allow innovative states like Oregon to continue to be laboratories for new ideas.

"The U.S. Supreme Court recognized the delicate balance between our federal system and the right of the states to be the crucibles for new ideas and new ways to meet the changing needs of their citizens," Mr. Kulongoski said.

END

DOJ_NMG_0009710

Knight Ridder Newspapers
January 18, 2006

Lawsuits claim domestic spying program is illegal, unconstitutional

By Jonathan S. Landay

Two civil liberties groups filed separate lawsuits Tuesday to halt the Bush administration's domestic spying program, charging that the interception of Americans' communications without court warrants is illegal and unconstitutional.

The federal court lawsuits brought by the American Civil Liberties Union in Detroit and the Center for Constitutional Rights in New York are the latest and most prominent legal challenges to the spying program, which is run by the super-secret National Security Agency.

The groups argued that President Bush exceeded his power, violated the rights of American citizens and broke eavesdropping laws when he authorized the program after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks to track members and supporters of al-Qaida in the United States.

The program "seriously compromised the free speech and privacy rights of the plaintiffs and others," argued the ACLU lawsuit.

White House spokesman Scott McClellan reiterated the administration's contention that Bush acted legally, asserting that the program was "a vital tool in our efforts to prevent further attacks inside the United States."

"If you're not talking to a known al-Qaida member or a member of an affiliated organization, you don't have to worry about this," said McClellan.

The program was revealed by The New York Times last month, and congressional hearings into its legality are scheduled for next month.

The CCR lawsuit named Bush, the heads of the NSA and other intelligence agencies, FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff as defendants.

The ACLU\l "l" lawsuit was filed against the NSA and its director, Lt. Gen. Keith B. Alexander.

Both lawsuits sought court orders to stop the program. The CCR lawsuit also demanded that the government disclose "all unlawful surveillance of plaintiffs' communications."

The lawsuits were filed on behalf of 18 organizations, lawyers, scholars and journalists who believe their communications with terrorism suspects and their families, witnesses, officials, political activists, human rights observers and others in the Middle East and Asia have been monitored.

Legal opinion: Several legal scholars said the Justice Department probably would demand the cases be dismissed because the suits\l "l" are based on suspicions - not proof - that the plaintiffs have been targeted.

In order for such cases to have standing in court, judges require plaintiffs to show that their rights were infringed by the government's conduct, something that will be difficult to demonstrate with the NSA program because it's top secret.

Beeson contended that lawyers representing detainees in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, can no longer communicate freely and in confidence with their clients, their families and friends or witnesses, and must undertake overseas travel to pursue their cases.

The CCR made a similar assertion in its lawsuit.

The NSA program, it charged, has inhibited the ability of four CCR attorneys and a legal aide to adequately represent hundreds of Muslim foreigners held in the United States after Sept. 11, Guantanamo Bay detainees and a Canadian arrested in New York and sent to Syria, where he was held for nearly a year and allegedly tortured.

"Plaintiffs are suffering irreparable harm," asserted the lawsuit.

DOJ_NMG_0009711

Both lawsuits argued that a 1967 law and the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act require the NSA to obtain warrants from a secret federal court to eavesdrop on Americans' e-mail and telephones.

Under FISA, the government can conduct wiretaps for up to 75 hours in an emergency or 15 days after a declaration of war before seeking a warrant.

Congress specified in an amendment to the 1967 law and in FISA that FISA is the "exclusive means" by which domestic eavesdropping can be conducted.

The administration has acknowledged that the NSA hasn't obtained FISA warrants, but it argues that Bush was empowered to circumvent FISA by an October 2001 congressional resolution authorizing him to use force to deter al-Qaida attacks.

It also contends that the program targets only a small number of Americans known to belong to or support al-Qaida or other terrorist groups and is structured to protect civil liberties.

James Bamford, an author of two books on the NSA and a plaintiff in the ACLU lawsuit, called the program a "vast vacuum cleaner" that monitors large numbers of Americans, much as occurred during abuses in the 1960s and 1970s.

"It's a return to the bad old days of the NSA," he said.

Larry Diamond, an ACLU plaintiff, said his ability to investigate human rights abuses and the impact of U.S. foreign policy in the Islamic world has been severely hamstrung because people in countries with repressive regimes are no longer willing to communicate openly for fear they'll be overheard.

"The breadth and illegality and unconstitutionality of this program ... do very great damage to our standing in the world," said Diamond, a fellow at Stanford University's Hoover Institute. "I don't think we can promote freedom abroad if we don't practice it at home."

Other ACLU plaintiffs included the ACLU, its Michigan chapter, the Council on American-Islamic Relations and the Greenpeace environmental organization.

END

Guardian (UK)

January 18, 2006

Hitchens joins authors seeking US wiretapping ban: Legal challenge to domestic spy programme Former 'war on terror' ally tells of phone call fears

Suzanne Goldenberg Washington

The British writer Christopher Hitchens, one of the most reliable allies of the US administration's conduct of the war on terror, has joined a lawsuit seeking a ban on a domestic spy programme authorised by President George Bush.

In two lawsuits filed separately yesterday by the American Civil Liberties Union in Detroit and the Centre for Constitutional Rights in New York City, the National Security Agency is accused of violating the constitution by eavesdropping on people without court oversight.

They represent the first legal challenge to the surveillance programme, which has outraged members of Congress and led to charges that Mr Bush has overstepped his authority as president.

In the ACLU\l "I" suit\l "I", Hitchens joins other writers, Greenpeace and the Council on American-Islamic Relations in seeking an immediate end to the wiretaps, saying they violate constitutional rights to privacy and free speech.

The suit\l "I" brought by Hitchens, Tara McKelvey, a senior editor at American Prospect magazine, James Bamford, author of two books on the NSA, and Barnett Rubin, an academic at New York University, addresses one of the primary fears surrounding the extrajudicial surveillance of telephone calls and email - that the NSA used the eavesdropping programme to spy on opponents of the Bush administration. Hitchens and the other plaintiffs said they feared their email and telephone calls were monitored, compromising their contacts in the Middle East. "People will say it's wartime and we have a deadly enemy, and I agree with that. I was in favour of the war in Iraq and Afghanistan very strongly, but it is even more important in such a time that we don't give away power to the unaccountable agencies that helped get us into this in the first place," Hitchens told the Guardian. "It is extremely important we know what the rules are and there has to be a line drawn. You mustn't turn emergency or panic measures into custom or practice."

In a separate suit brought against President Bush as well as the chiefs of the NSA, the CIA, the FBI and other security agencies, the Centre for Constitutional Rights says it fears its legal work was hampered by the eavesdropping programme.

The CCR, whose lawyers represent detainees at Guantanamo and other suspects in the war on terror, said it believes communications with clients' families could have come under surveillance.

The two law suits arrive at a time when President Bush is under increasing pressure to demonstrate the legality of the NSA surveillance programme, which operated free of any judicial oversight.

Mr Bush authorised the monitoring of Americans suspected of having links with al-Qaida in 2002, allowing the NSA to bypass the foreign intelligence surveillance court which had ordinarily granted warrants for such surveillance.

Mr Bush and other officials have vigorously defended the secret wiretap regime since it was disclosed last month. They have insisted the surveillance was im plicitly authorised by Congress after the 2001 terror attacks. Officials also argue the eavesdropping led to the capture of terrorists and helped save American lives.

However, the New York Times reported yesterday that although the NSA flooded the FBI with telephone numbers and email addresses of Americans they believed were linked to al-Qaida, eavesdropping failed to detect any terrorist networks inside the US. Virtually none of the individuals turned out to have links to terrorists.

The newspaper quotes FBI officials as saying they complained to the NSA that the surveillance resulted in unnecessary intrusion. "We'd chase a number, find it's a schoolteacher with no indication they've ever been involved in international terrorism - case closed," one former FBI official said. "After you get a thousand numbers and not one is turning up anything, you get some frustration."

guardian.co.uk/usa >

'You mustn't turn emergency or panic measures into custom or practice,' Christopher Hitchens

END

Wall St. Journal

1/18/06

Some Iraq Rebuilding Funds Go Untraced

By SCOT J. PALTROW
Staff Reporter of THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

WASHINGTON -- More than 18 months after the Pentagon disbanded the Coalition Provisional Authority that ran Iraq, neither the Justice Department nor a special inspector general has moved to recover large sums suspected of disappearing through fraud and price gouging in reconstruction.

Earlier audits by the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction -- a post Congress created in late 2004 -- found that oversight of contractors by the Authority was so lax that widespread abuse was likely. An audit in April 2005, for example, found "significant deficiencies in contract administration," which meant that "there was no assurance that fraud, waste, and abuse did not occur in the management and administration of contracts" the U.S. awarded with Iraqi oil money administered by the United Nations.

Nevertheless, there hasn't been a concerted effort to trace what happened to the money and make recipients pay back any ill-gotten gains. The inspector general's office said it doesn't plan to ask the Justice Department to file lawsuits or to conduct widespread audits of individual contracts to look for fraud.

Instead, it says, it is using its limited resources to pursue higher priorities, including investigating charges of bribery to win some Iraqi work and auditing current controls on the spending of redevelopment aid.

The Coalition Provisional Authority, which existed from shortly after the fall of Saddam Hussein in April 2003 until June 2004, was allocated more than $38 billion in U.S. and Iraqi funds. It spent $19.7 billion of U.N.-administered Iraqi oil money.

Authority officials rapidly doled out the money, including $12 billion from the U.N. fund paid in cash, as they scrambled to restore vital services and impose order in Iraq. Concerns that contracts weren't being sufficiently monitored led Congress to create the office of the special inspector general and vest it with powers to investigate money misspent or unaccounted for by the Authority. President Bush named as the special inspector general Stuart Bowen Jr., who had been the Authority's own inspector general.

The U.S. has been under pressure to better account for funds spent in the early days of Iraqi reconstruction. A U.N. monitoring board has pushed the U.S. to return Iraqi money that might have been misspent under no-bid contracts awarded by the authority. Meanwhile, a group of Congressional Democrats has pressed the Defense Department and other agencies to track down and recover overpayments to contractors.

Some officials who were associated with the contracting, in the Pentagon and in Iraq, have defended contractors' practices in the country, citing the chaos of wartime. They say contractors were doing their best to perform quickly amid trying circumstances. Paul Bremer, who ran the Authority, wrote in response to one critical audit that it unfairly assumed that "Western-style budgeting and accounting standards" should apply "in the midst of war."

Still, some in Congress have advocated tough action against contractors, noting that the government's main legal means to recover money is the False Claims Act, passed during the Civil War to recoup gains from contractors who had gouged the Union Army for essential supplies.

Under that act, the Justice Department's civil division has the authority to sue contractors that defraud the government, and to seek treble damages. But Justice hasn't initiated any such suits involving Iraq-related work, a spokesman said. The civil division also hasn't joined any suits filed by private-sector whistle-blowers who claim they know of fraud or abuse, although lawyers familiar with such suits estimate that at least two dozen are pending.

One problem is that any attempts to recover money through the courts could prove challenging, say former lawyers for the Justice and Defense Departments. The Pentagon put the Authority in place as a temporary government, but no law or regulation established it. As a result, debate persists over whether it was an international entity or an agency of the U.S. government and subject to U.S. law.

Also, there could be scant evidence for such lawsuits because U.S. officials in Iraq didn't keep extensive records, and often didn't track whether contractors performed the work they were paid to do.

It isn't clear how many contracts the Authority issued, in part because the inspector general's office says it hasn't located many of the contracts. But among those awarded large ones were Fluor Corp., Parsons Corp. and Washington International Group. One question facing the government is whether to seek recovery of funds paid to the largest contractor, Halliburton Co.'s KBR unit, which was awarded multibillion-dollar no-bid contracts beginning shortly before the U.S. invaded Iraq to rebuild oil fields and provide logistical support to the U.S. military.

A series of 2004 audits by the Defense Contract Audit Agency, the Pentagon's contract-auditing arm, found expenses of $1.48 billion unsupported by adequate documentation on KBR's two largest contracts, which were valued at a total of $9.5 billion.

In a recently disclosed letter, the audit agency said it has passed on findings about Halliburton to the Justice Department, to consider whether a criminal investigation is warranted.

But the audit agency's calls to withhold some payments from Halliburton have been resisted by Pentagon units that awarded the contracts. The Army Corps of Engineers disclosed in November 2005 that it was going ahead with a $1.5 billion payment to Halliburton for work on Iraqi oil fields, including $124 million for costs the defense-department auditors had challenged as questionable. It also paid Halliburton nearly $38 million in bonuses allowed under a contract formula for good performance.

A Halliburton spokeswoman said the company "has continued to cooperate with audit agencies and our customer throughout this process. Audits are part of the normal contracting process."

DOJ_NMG_0009714

She added, "The costs questioned are just that -- questioned costs. The auditors have raised questions about the support and the documentation rather than questioning the fact that KBR incurred the costs. Many of DCAA's questions have been about the quality of supporting documentation for costs that KBR clearly incurred. Therefore, it would be wrong to say or imply that any of these costs that were incurred at the client's direction for its benefit are 'overcharges.' "

A spokeswoman for the Defense Contract Audit Agency said that as of the end of the government's 2006 fiscal first quarter, it had "performed 1,373 audits in support of Iraq reconstruction contracting activity." She said these audits weren't designed specifically to look for fraud but added that the auditors are required "to obtain reasonable assurance about whether the contractor submissions and supporting data are free of material misstatement."

In addition to seeking fund recovery, the federal government can intervene in suits filed under the False Claims Act by individuals who maintain that they know of misused money. Each case must be filed under seal until the Justice Department decides whether to intervene; if it doesn't, the individuals may pursue the cases on their own. Individuals can receive 15% to 20% of funds recovered if the government intervenes, and up to 30% if it doesn't.

The Justice Department won't disclose how many whistle-blower suits have been filed against contractors in Iraq. But the only Iraq-related False Claims Act case on which the Justice Department so far has announced a decision, it declined to intervene.

That case was filed in U.S. District Court in Alexandria, Va., by two individuals who alleged that Custer Battles LLC, of Fairfax, Va., overcharged the government for expenses on work in Iraq. The company was awarded contracts totaling $38 million -- partially paid with $4 million in cash -- to provide security at Baghdad Airport, and later to help guard distribution of new Iraqi currency, although the tiny concern never had provided security services before.

The Justice Department declined to say why it decided not to back the case -- filed by a former Custer Battles employee and an employee of a subcontractor -- citing department policy. Robert T. Rhoad, a lawyer for Custer Battles, denies wrongdoing by the company, and said he was optimistic that the case would be dismissed. After suspending Custer Battles from receiving new contracts because of the fraud allegations, the Air Force in Sept. 2005 reinstated the company, declaring it eligible again for contracts. An Air Force spokeswoman said contracting regulations require it to reinstate a company after a year if the Justice Department hasn't taken action or requested that the ban be extended.

END

Pittsburgh Tribune-Review
1/17/06

PennDOT pays whistleblower

By Jim Ritchie
TRIBUNE-REVIEW

PennDOT paid $500,000 to settle a whistleblower lawsuit filed by a former construction manager who claimed the agency retaliated against him for reporting overbilling by consulting firms.

The agency initially refused to divulge the terms of its Nov. 17 settlement agreement with Bill Arnold, 62, of South Strabane, Washington County, but supplied a copy of the deal after the Pittsburgh Tribune-Review filed a challenge under the state's Right-to-Know law.

Consultants overbilled the Pennsylvania Department of Transportation hundreds of thousands of dollars with the approval of agency managers who were consultants' guests at expensive golf outings and sports events, according to court records from Arnold's 2003 lawsuit.

Neither Arnold nor his attorney, Jon Pushinsky, would comment.

Though Arnold's whistleblower suit is settled, reviews of the overbilling have just begun.

State Auditor General Jack Wagner's office said last week it will investigate charges of overbilling at the District 11 office by private consulting companies.

Arnold has filed a second federal suit seeking to recover the overbilled money on behalf of the federal government. Arnold's legal team intends to determine how much money consulting firms overbilled PennDOT in the last decade, the suit states. It names 22 consulting companies as defendants.

The suit is filed under the federal False Claims Act, on behalf of the U.S. Department of Transportation, which could intervene in the case.

PennDOT spokesman Rich Kirkpatrick declined to comment.

END

TechRepublic
January 16, 2006, 13:45 GMT

Plan for BlackBerry outages

Mike Talon

Research In Motion (RIM) — the makers of the ubiquitous BlackBerry email devices — revolutionised the email industry. With their portable units, people could send and receive mail from anywhere they could get a signal, quickly and easily. It has been said that nothing shakes the foundations of a society like when something we all take for granted stops working, and a potential legal action could create just such a situation for our digital society and its communications.

RIM is currently being sued in the US for patent violations by NTP, a brain-trust that holds the patents on several technologies for the transmission of email via mobile devices. Basically NTP claims that BlackBerry and its related services and service providers are using technology originally envisioned by NTP patent holders, and therefore RIM must either pay up for back royalties and licensing fees, or else shut down their service. This would mean literally hundreds of thousands of US users of Blackberry devices would be left with paperweights instead of email devices as the radio network and server systems shut down in the wake of the result of the legal action, if NTP wins.

Now, it's unlikely that NTP will get a complete and full injunction against RIM, at least not unless/until they win the lawsuits. The reason for this is simple, the very Justice Department that would enforce such a ruling is also a major user of the BlackBerry services, and they would be very hard pressed to shut down their own systems. However, what would happen if they did?

How many people in your organisation are reliant on using these devices in the US to perform their day-to-day activities? How many need BlackBerry devices to stay competitive, to close deals, to keep your business ahead of others? Also, this case could have deep repercussions for other wireless email services, so what happens if a ripple effect strikes the industry in general?

First off, be ready for the possibility of loss of service for those members of your company in the US. Get all users to understand that this is a potential issue, even if the chances of actual service loss are slim. This will at least soften the blow if the system does go offline at some point. Also, keep in mind that there are alternatives to BlackBerry. Microsoft has mobile email services for Exchange 2003 Server editions. Goodlink has a competing service to RIM, offering both services and enterprise-level server systems. Both of these have various mobile devices they will and will not work with, so keep in mind that if you swap over it will almost definitely require new equipment.

Remember that most email systems can be accessed remotely via laptops and Web browsers. It's nowhere near as convenient as the BlackBerry, but it will allow users to get to their mail when not at the office. You probably already have everything you need to implement this service already, so it is something you can offer without buying new hardware and units for the whole sales crew.

While the chances of RIM going offline are slim, they are real, and you should be taking a serious look at how your organisation will react if it happens. The Gartner analyst firm is recommending that new mission-critical BlackBerry deployments be put on hold, and as if RIM didn't have enough problems, a new threat aimed at BlackBerry devices has just been discovered — one that could result in disabling a user's ability to view attachments. The bottom line is that disasters come in all shapes and sizes, and sometimes the loss of a depended-upon service can be as big a disaster as any other data system failure.

END

Government Executive Magazine

January 17, 2006

Pentagon scales back, delays first installment of NSPS

By Karen Rutzick

The Defense Department on Tuesday took a large step back in its plans for a massive personnel overhaul by drastically reducing the size of the first group of civilians set to enter the new human resources system, and announcing a delay in the start date.

The Pentagon has reduced the number of employees who are to begin receiving performance reviews under the initial installment of the National Security Personnel System to 11,000 from 65,000. The first group originally was scheduled to enter early this year, but that has been postponed until April 30.

The first paychecks received under the pay-for-performance system are now scheduled for January 2007.

The next group will go into the system on Oct. 1, and the third group will enter in January 2007. The Pentagon said it is still determining which employees will fall into these two groups.

NSPS is the department's plan to modernize human resources by reclassifying jobs and placing employees in broad paybands intended to give managers greater flexibility in hiring and setting pay raises. The General Schedule and its guaranteed raises are to be replaced by performance-based increases determined after more rigorous and meaningful performance reviews.

A coalition of labor unions banded together to file a lawsuit against aspects of NSPS that affect collective bargaining. Oral arguments in the case will be heard Jan. 24. Those same unions have said they are leaving the door open to file a case against the human resources portion of the system as well, once it is implemented.

The unions have complained that the Pentagon has not consulted with them in creating the new system, a charge the department strongly rejects.

In a message on the NSPS Web site, officials said they are delaying NSPS to work out some kinks in the system that they discovered from feedback. The explanation was identical to one given in a Dec. 23 letter that announced the department was delaying training on the system.

"Ensuring that we 'take the time to do this right' has always been a principle in our event-driven implementation approach," the statement said. "We want to make sure that our employees, supervisors and leaders fully understand this system, and that they have the tools to succeed in a results-focused, performance-based environment."

Of the 11,000 employees still left in the first group, 2,200 of them are in the Naval Sea Systems Command headquarters and program executive offices. NSPS officials said they singled out NAVSEA to serve as a pilot because of its experience with demonstrations projects in personnel systems.

Matt Biggs, spokesman for the coalition of labor unions, said starting 11,000 employees on NSPS is nothing more than another demonstration project.

"They haven't worked with the workers on putting this together," Biggs said. The delay "is reflective of a lot of what seem to be internal issues with implementing this. I think they're overwhelmed and in over their heads."

American Federation of Government Employees president John Gage said the setback validates his union's longstanding concerns with NSPS.

"If you look at DoD's recent actions, it is clear that they are not ready to implement such a far-reaching system," Gage said. "DoD now needs to face the facts, scrap what they have and start over."

In addition to the NAVSEA employees, employees still in the initial grouping include 2,418 employees at Tinker Air Force Base in Oklahoma, 2,348 employees in various Army human resources offices and 990 employees in the Defense Threat Reduction Agency.

END

AP

1/18/06

Suspect in Federal Spam Case Pleads Guilty

ANN ARBOR, Mich. - The main defendant in the nation's first prosecution under a 2004 federal anti-spam law pleaded guilty Tuesday to three felony charges, federal prosecutors said.

Daniel J. Lin, 30, of West Bloomfield Township faces nearly five years in prison and a fine of up to $250,000, the U.S. Attorney's Office in Detroit said.
Two of the counts are fraud charges involving millions of unsolicited spam e-mails sent to computer users. The other is possession of a firearm by a felon, for guns discovered when authorities raided Lin's suburban Detroit home.

He is scheduled to be sentenced May 16 in U.S. District Court in Ann Arbor.

Lin and three other West Bloomfield Township men were identified in court documents as being part of the massive illegal spam scheme.

Court papers described a complex web of corporate identities, bank accounts and electronic storefronts used to send hundreds of thousands of e-mail sales pitches for fraudulent weight-loss and erectile dysfunction products.

The Federal Trade Commission said angry consumers forwarded to authorities more than 490,000 e-mails from the operation from January 2004 to April 2004 _ more than from any other spam outfit worldwide during the same period.

Court records show that charges against the other defendants, James J. Lin, Chris Chung and Mark M. Sadek, have been dismissed. The four were arrested in April 2004.

END

DOJ_NMG_0009718

Image not available for this document, ID: 0.7.10316.47143-000001

Image not available for this document, ID: 0.7.10316.47143-000002

Comisac, Rena (CRT)

From: Comisac, Rena (CRT)
Sent: Wednesday, January 18, 2006 4:22 PM
To: Gorsuch, Neil M
Subject: FW: HT Report

I am sending you the email without the report attached. Will send the report separately. Hope this works.

-----Original Message-----
From: Comisac, Rena (CRT)
Sent: Wednesday, January 18, 2006 4:19 PM
To: Gorsuch, Neil M
Subject: FW: HT Report

For some reason this does not appear to have reached you the first time around.

-----Original Message-----
From: Comisac, Rena (CRT)
Sent: Wednesday, January 18, 2006 3:14 PM
To: Gorsuch, Neil M
Subject: FW: HT Report

Welcome back -- hope you are feeling better. I left the office early yesterday myself because I was feeling under the weather.

I am on your calendar for tomorrow afternoon to discuss HSH and trafficking (that was the earliest I could get on your schedule -- you're a busy guy!). Wanted to make sure you had a copy of the most recent version of the trafficking report, which incorporates edits by Martha and others. OLP is getting us edits today. The vast majority of these edits are stylistic and grammatical. I'll be interested in hearing how your call to DPC went. If we want to shoot for the 2/13 roll out, we would need to get the report to JMD for layout (the next step before it goes to the printer) no later than this Friday, January 20. In addition to these existing events, we are exploring alternative events with OIPL. I should know more tomorrow by the time we meet tomorrow.

-----Original Message-----
From: Vargas, Omar (CRT)
Sent: Tuesday, January 17, 2006 6:49 PM
To: Comisac, Rena (CRT)
Subject: HT Report

Rena:

The most recent version of the report is attached. Comments and edits have been submitted by Martha Pacold, Nancy Scott-Finan, Criminal Section staff and various folks in the Criminal Division. I expect Larry Rothenberg's comments on a draft as of yesterday tomorrow morning. Hope you feel better!

The following are a number of roll-out event options occuring after Feb. 10. I am waiting to hear back from the Bureau of Justice Assistance regarding any law enforcement related opportunities already planned and am waiting for an update from Violence Against Women regarding Lifetime Television. A second call went in to Lifetime today and OVW will follow-up tomorrow. Aside from identifying existing events, we can potentially work through OIPL to "create" an event a group of state legislators or law enforcement organizations. Also, depending on the number of copies available after an event and distribution to the Hill, I think it would be helpful distribute copies to constituency groups such as the Hudson Institute, Freedom Network, etc.

February 13-San Francisco, CA - Ending Domestic Violence and Human Trafficking in the 21st Century Conference

The conference is designed to provide information about violence against women through speeches, panels and workshops. This event will provide a platform for education, motivate individuals to take action, and encourage investment in community solutions. While the conference will bring attention to the issue at the national and international levels, the focus will be on how to take action locally. Conference Partners: University of California, San Francisco Center of Excellence in Women's Health, Family Violence Prevention Fund, Partners Ending Domestic Abuse, San Francisco Domestic Violence Consortium, Vital Voices Global Partnership, Mills College, and the International Museum of Women.

Please note that the Family Violence Prevention Fund is a grantee of both OVC and OVW and an OVW funded anti-trafficking program is discussed in our report.

Feb 26-March 2 - South Padre Island, TX - Texas Association Against Sexual Assault Annual Conference: "Begin By Believing."

This appears to be a good opportunity but I am concerned about the optics of a conference on sexual assault scheduled during what may be spring break in a spring break town. Note, that the 26th is a Sunday.

March 6-8 - Dallas, TX - Dallas Police Dept and the Genisis Women's Shelter hosts: 2006 Conference on Crimes Against Women. This conference provides practical instruction to law enforcement, prosecutors, and victim advocates using current information, the newest ideas and most successful intervention strategies. Topics focus on the many different types of crimes against women, including: domestic violence, sexual assault, serial murder, prostitution, and trafficking. Recent high-profile cases will be presented by the involved investigators and prosecutors.

Presently, this appears to be the best option. The conference occurs during the first half of the week (good news cycle) and combines violence against women issues with trafficking and local law enforcement.

March 24 - Trenton/Princeton, NJ - International Institute of New Jersey Anti-Trafficking Conference. Focus on law enforcement and service provider coopertation, global perspectives and the role of the media.

But for this occuring in late March, this is a good opportunity as the sponsoring organziation is an NG-partner in the NJ task force. I am also inquiring as to whether this event is connected to the NJ task force in any way.

******

OLA has provided the following list of members of congress who should be provided a copy of the report.

House and Senate Judiciary Committees - Chair and Ranking Minority Members
House and Senate Appropriations Committees and Justice Subcommittees - Chair and Ranking Minority Members

Senate Majority and Minority Leaders
Senator Brownback
Senator Cornyn
Speaker of the House
House Majority and Minority Leaders
Representative Chris Smith
Representative Deborah Pryce

*****

Williams, Jan

From: Williams, Jan

Sent: Wednesday, January 18, 2006 5:19 PM

To: Spagnoli, Deborah A. (USPC); Nelson, Carrie; Boente, Dana J. (TAX); Nash, Stuart (ODAG); Oldham, Jeffrey L; Pacold, Martha M; Purpura, Michael M (ODAG); Rowan, Patrick (ODAG); Senger, Jeffrey M; Taylor, Jeffrey (OAG); Webb, Lauren; White, Clifford; /o=USDOJ/ou=USAPAE/cn=Recipients/cn=Mailboxes/cn=SMalloy; Agarwal, Asheesh (CIV); Akers, Eric J.; Ames, Andrew; Barnett, Thomas O.; Battle, Michael (USAEO); Beach, Andrew; Beck, Cherith (USAARE); Bianco, Joseph F.; Blomquist, Kathleen M; Boardman, Michelle; Boote, John; Bottner, Andrea; Bounds, Ryan W (OLP); Bradbury, Steve; Bucholtz, Jeffrey (CIV); Burch, Victoria; Chambers, Shane P; Clinger, James H; Cohen, Brian; Cohn, Jonathan (CIV); Comisac, Rena (CRT); Cook, Elisebeth C; Cook, Marita L. (USAWY); Cooperstein, Theodore M; Coppenger, Chesed L. (TAX); Costigan, Michael; Coughlin, Robert; Curtis, O. Benton; Daley, Cybele; David, Matt; Dhillon, Uttam; Dummermuth, Matt (USAVAE); Eisenberg, John; Elwood, Courtney; Elwood, John; Flaherty, Connor; Freeman, Sharee (CRT); Friedrich, Matthew; Gambatesa, Donald (USMS); Garre, Gregory G; Glut, Martha (USANE); Gober, Chris; Golden, Lois; Goodling, Monica; Gorsuch, Neil M; Greg Harris; Hagle, Timothy; Harris, Gregory; Henke, Tracy (SMO); Hertling, Richard; Hofer, Patrick F. (TAX); Hoisington, Jana; Holland, Eric W; Irving, John (ODAG); Jaffer, Jamil N; Jordan, Theresa (USADE); Jungeblut, Neal P.; Katsas, Gregory (CIV); Keehner, Laura; Kessler, Elizabeth A; Korn, Jennifer; Lesch, Jaclyn; Little, Kimani (CRT); Longlet, Benjamin; Lonick, Saundra; Luckinbill, Trent W.; Macklin, Kristi R; MacLean, Alex (CRT); Magnuson, Cynthia; Marshall, C. Kevin; Martinson, Wanda; Masoudi, Gerald; McArthur, Patrick; McDonald, Bruce; McFarland, Steven T (ODAG); McIntosh, Brent; McKee, Cindy (USAKS); McKeown, Matt (ENRD); McKnight, Cynthia M (CRT); McNally, Edward; McNeil, Tucker (OPA); Mercer, Bill (ODAG); Meron, Daniel (CIV); Metcalf, Mark H (CRT); Miranda, Matthew; Monheim, Thomas; Moore, Miriam (ODAG); Morrison, Richard T. (TAX); Murphy, Sean; Neumayr, Mary (ENRD); Nichols, Carl (CIV); Nichols, Grant W; Nowacki, John; OConnell, James; Otis, Lee L; Otis, William G.; Pagliocca, Theresa; Parsky, Laura; Peabody, Payson R. (TAX); Peed, Carl; Potter, Janet; Racicot, Tim (USAMT); Reyes, Luis (SMO); Roberts, Crystal; Roe, Price (OCIO); Roehrkasse, Brian; Roper, Matt M; Rosenberg, Chuck; Rowe, Kiri; Sampson, Kyle; Schlozman, Brad (CRT); Schmitt, Glenn; Schwartz, Arthur; Scolinos, Tasia; Seidel, Rebecca; Selim, George (CRS); Sellers, Kiahna (OAG); Smith, Kimberly A; Sours, Raquel; Strug, Kerri; Swenson, Lily F; Taylor, Bruce A.; Tenpas, Ronald J (ODAG); Todd, Gordon (OLP); Tomlinson, Linda (USANH); Turner, Donald J. (USAPAM); Tzitzon, Nicholas; Underhill, Deborah; Vargas, Omar (CRT); Voris, Natalie (USAEO); Warren, Julie; Williams, Jan; Woodruff, William; Brand, Rachel; Clark, John (USMS); Clement, Paul D; Fisher, Alice; Flores, Robert; Gillis, John; Herraiz, Domingo S.; Keisler, Peter D (CIV); Kim, Wan (CRT); Leonhart, Michele M.; McCallum, Robert (SMO); McNulty, Paul J; Moschella, William; O'Connor, Eileen J. (AAG/TAX); Sanchez, William J (CRT); Spagnoli, Deborah A. (USPC); Tamargo, Mauricio J; Tandy, Karen P (DEA); Wooldridge, Sue Ellen (ENRD)

Subject: FW: IGA Newsletters

Attachments: tmp.htm; Patriot Act Newsletter 1-18-06.pdf; Progress in Iraq January

Attachments: tmp.htm; Patriot_Act_Newsletter_1-18-06.pdf; Progress in Iraq_January Newsletter_1-18-06.pdf

Latest newsletters are attached.

PATRIOT ACT UPDATE

16 Days Until Expiration

JANUARY 18, 2006

On Tuesday, January 31, 2006, the U.S. Congress will reconvene. Upon their return, Congress will have only 4 days to fulfill its responsibility to help ensure the safety and security of the American people. Congress needs to reauthorize the USA PATRIOT Act before it lapses on February 3, 2006. The failure to do so would return America to a pre-9/11 approach to combating terrorism, which would leave us more vulnerable to terrorist attacks.

What Happens if the Patriot Act Expires?

- If the Patriot Act is allowed to expire, we will face returning to a pre-9/11 mode of information sharing where there are not clear rules governing investigators' ability to share information and coordinate with each other, where terrorists and spies can use technology against us, and where it is more difficult to investigate a potential terrorist attack than it is to catch a drug dealer, a mobster, or a white collar criminal.
- Sophisticated terrorists and spies could more easily thwart government surveillance.
- If the Emergency Disclosure of Information section expires, Internet service providers (ISPs) that disclose customer records to law enforcement in emergencies involving immediate risk of death or serious physical injury will no longer be protected from lawsuits. This provision has been critical in situations involving bomb threats, rescuing both children and an elderly lady who had been kidnapped, and reaching out to individuals who have made suicide threats. This provision has saved lives.
- If the Nationwide Search Warrants provision expires, federal judges will no longer be able to issue nationwide search warrants (i.e., allow a judge to issue warrants for searches to be conducted outside his district) to obtain unopened e-mails stored on an ISP's computer server, greatly hampering certain investigations involving large ISPs.
- Investigators would possibly be several steps behind sophisticated terrorists and spies who frequently change phones to evade surveillance.

President George W. Bush talks with a Homeland Security officer, Wednesday, July 20, 2005, as President Bush is shown mobile security scanning equipment during a customs and border protection demonstration at the Port of Baltimore in Baltimore, Md. White House photo by Eric Draper

DID YOU KNOW?

- Despite a four-year track record with no verified civil liberties abuse, the current bill adds more than 30 new significant civil liberties safeguards, which include additional reporting to Congress. If the filibuster of the Patriot Act continues in the Senate, these additional civil liberties protections will never take effect.
- The Patriot Act helped improve information-sharing and coordination at all levels of government, including State and local, thereby enhancing our ability to identify and prosecute terrorists.
- If Congress does not pass the Patriot Act reauthorization bill, the government will also lose its ability to conduct surveillance of a "lone wolf" terrorist—a terrorist who is actually engaged in an act of international terrorism or preparing for an attack alone.

White House photo by Eric Draper

PATRIOT ACT FACT:

In 2001, after the 9/11 attacks, the U.S. Senate voted 98-1 to pass the Patriot Act. Nearly all of the Senators now threatening to continue to filibuster the Patriot Act actually voted for it in 2001 when it did not contain the additional civil liberties safeguards in the current bill.

THE REAL DEAL: PROGRESS IN IRAQ

JANUARY 2006

President Bush Discusses Progress and Plans for Victory in Iraq

President Bush – Iraqi Forces Will Fight Off The Few Who Are Attempting To Squash The Hopes Of Many: "As the Iraqis stand up, we'll stand down. So the strategy, the security strategy is to let the Iraqis do the fighting. It's their country. The people have shown they want democracy. Millions voted. And now part of the mission is to give this government a security force which will help fight off the few who are trying to stop the hopes of the many."

President Bush, Remarks To Kentucky International Convention Center, Louisville, KY, 1/11/2006

"Victory will come when the terrorists and Saddamists can no longer threaten Iraq's democracy. Victory will come when the Iraqi security forces can provide for the safety of their own citizens. Victory will come when Iraq is not a safe haven for terrorists to plot new attacks on our nation"

President Bush, Remarks To The Veterans Of Foreign Wars, Washington, D.C., 1/10/2006

"We will settle for nothing less than complete victory."

President Bush, Remarks To The Veterans Of Foreign Wars, Washington, D.C., 1/10/2006

President George W. Bush steps on stage to address members of the Veterans of Foreign Wars about achieving victory in Iraq in Washington, D.C., Jan. 10, 2006. "History has shown that free nations are peaceful nations," said the President. "And by helping Iraqis build a lasting democracy, we spread the hope of liberty across a troubled region, we will gain new allies in the cause of freedom. By spreading democracy and freedom, we're laying the foundation of peace for generations to come." White House photo by Paul Morse

Vice President Dick Cheney visits the 9th Mechanized Infantry Division Headquarters at Taji Air Base to greet Iraqi troops and view tanks and armored vehicles they have refurbished into working fighting vehicles, Sunday Dec. 18, 2005. White House photo by David Bohrer

Democracy in Action: FREEDOM OF THE PRESS IN IRAQ

- The station's first broadcast was on April 25, 2004.
- The station transmits up to 90 miles from a two-story villa on a residential side street in western Baghdad.
- The station receives up to 1,000 telephone calls per day.
- The station gets more than 1 million hits per month on its Web site.
- The station gives all Iraqis a chance to express their viewpoints in a nonviolent manner. Iraqis desire peace and enjoy the ability to express their opinions without recourse from Saddam's thugs.

The Department of Defense Speaker's Bureau

The DOD Speaker's Bureau places service members and civilian employees in speaking forums across the country (Rotary, Chamber of Commerce, etc.) to discuss the progress and real-life conditions on the ground in Iraq. To request a speaker, simply go to the link and fill out the form online:

http://www.defendamerica.mil/speakers/SpeakerProgram2.html

DOJ_NMG_0009727

Security Progress: Iraqi Forces Are Growing In Size And Capability:

- There are over 80,000 local police officers across Iraq – more than half of the stated goal of 135,000.
- To improve the capabilities of local police, the Coalition is partnering local Iraqi police units with teams of U.S. military police and international police liaison officers, including retired U.S. police officers.
- More than 35 Iraqi battalions have assumed control of their own areas of responsibility – including nearly half of Baghdad province and sectors of South-Central, Southeast, Western and North-Central Iraq.
- As Iraqis see their own countrymen defending them against the terrorists and Saddamists, they are stepping forward with needed intelligence. General Casey reports that the number of tips from Iraqis has grown from 400 in March 2005 to over 4,700 last month.

Political Progress: Iraq Moving Towards Freedom And Democracy:

- In the past 12 Months, Iraq has undergone a political transformation that is virtually without precedent. Iraqis have completed three successful nationwide elections, voted for a transitional government, drafted the most progressive and democratic constitution in the Arab world, approved a constitution, and elected a new government under their new constitution.
- Each successive election has seen less violence, a bigger turnout, and broader voter participation than the one before. Iraq estimates voter turnout was about 70 percent in the Dec. 2005 elections, with over 10.8 million votes cast. This represents an increase of about 2.5 million from the Jan. 2005 elections.
- Iraq's newly elected leaders are today working to form a national unity government to represent all of Iraq's people.

NEW POLICE OFFICERS — An Iraqi soldier celebrates the graduation of a new group of Iraqi police officers at the Iraqi police academy in Baghdad, Iraq, Jan. 9, 2006. Defense Dept. photo by U.S. Army Spc. Teddy Wade

Economic Progress: Iraq's Economy Is Growing:

- Last month, the International Monetary Fund approved Iraq's request for a $680 million loan to carry out economic reforms.
- The World Bank recently approved its first loan to Iraq in over 30 years.
- Iraq has a stable currency, an independent stock exchange, and an independent Central Bank. Iraqis have new investment laws welcoming foreign capital, tax and commercial laws encouraging private-sector growth, and a low-tariff trade regime opening the economy to the world.

www.defendamerica.mil/

Yes, I want to learn more about the progress in Iraq…

Name _____

Title _____

E-mail Address (required) _____

Address _____

City _____ State _____ Zip Code _____

Work Phone _____ Home Phone _____

PLEASE PRINT FORM AND FAX TO (202) 456-7015.

Attached is the January edition of the Progress in Iraq Newsletter, as well as the second installment of the Patriot Act Update--16 Days Until Expiration. Please share with your staff as appropriate.

Thank you.

Gorsuch, Neil M

From: Gorsuch, Neil M
Sent: Wednesday, January 18, 2006 6:18 PM
To: Comisac, Rena (CRT)
Subject: RE: HT Report

No problem! Let's talk tomorrow.

From: Comisac, Rena (CRT)
Sent: Wednesday, January 18, 2006 6:11 PM
To: Gorsuch, Neil M
Subject: FW: HT Report

Despite repeated attempts to do so, I have not been able to email you the report due to its size. Would you like a copy on disk?

-----Original Message-----
From: Comisac, Rena (CRT)
Sent: Wednesday, January 18, 2006 4:22 PM
To: Gorsuch, Neil M
Subject: FW: HT Report

I am sending you the email without the report attached. Will send the report separately. Hope this works.

-----Original Message-----
From: Comisac, Rena (CRT)
Sent: Wednesday, January 18, 2006 4:19 PM
To: Gorsuch, Neil M
Subject: FW: HT Report

For some reason this does not appear to have reached you the first time around.

-----Original Message-----
From: Comisac, Rena (CRT)
Sent: Wednesday, January 18, 2006 3:14 PM
To: Gorsuch, Neil M
Subject: FW: HT Report

Welcome back -- hope you are feeling better. I left the office early yesterday myself because I was feeling under the weather.

I am on your calendar for tomorrow afternoon to discuss HSH and trafficking (that was the earliest I could get on your schedule -- you're a busy guy!). Wanted to make sure you had a copy of the most recent version of the trafficking report, which incorporates edits by Martha and others. OLP is getting us edits today. The vast majority of these edits are stylistic and grammatical. I'll be interested in hearing how your call to DPC went. If we want to shoot for the 2/13 roll out, we would need to get the report to JMD for layout (the next step before it goes to the printer) no later than this Friday, January 20. In addition to these existing events, we are exploring alternative events with OIPL. I should know more tomorrow by the time we meet tomorrow.

-----Original Message-----
From: Vargas, Omar (CRT)
Sent: Tuesday, January 17, 2006 6:49 PM
To: Comisac, Rena (CRT)

Subject: HT Report

Rena:

The most recent version of the report is attached. Comments and edits have been submitted by Martha Pacold, Nancy Scott-Finan, Criminal Section staff and various folks in the Criminal Division. I expect Larry Rothenberg's comments on a draft as of yesterday tomorrow morning. Hope you feel better!

The following are a number of roll-out event options occuring after Feb. 10. I am waiting to hear back from the Bureau of Justice Assistance regarding any law enforcement related opportunities already planned and am waiting for an update from Violence Against Women regarding Lifetime Television. A second call went in to Lifetime today and OVW will follow-up tomorrow. Aside from identifying existing events, we can potentially work through OIPL to "create" an event a group of state legislators or law enforcement organizations. Also, depending on the number of copies available after an event and distribution to the Hill, I think it would be helpful distribute copies to constituency groups such as the Hudson Institute, Freedom Network, etc.

February 13-San Francisco, CA - Ending Domestic Violence and Human Trafficking in the 21st Century Conference

The conference is designed to provide information about violence against women through speeches, panels and workshops. This event will provide a platform for education, motivate individuals to take action, and encourage investment in community solutions. While the conference will bring attention to the issue at the national and international levels, the focus will be on how to take action locally. Conference Partners: University of California, San Francisco Center of Excellence in Women's Health, Family Violence Prevention Fund, Partners Ending Domestic Abuse, San Francisco Domestic Violence Consortium, Vital Voices Global Partnership, Mills College, and the International Museum of Women.

Please note that the Family Violence Prevention Fund is a grantee of both OVC and OVW and an OVW funded anti-trafficking program is discussed in our report.

Feb 26-March 2 - South Padre Island, TX - Texas Association Against Sexual Assault Annual Conference: "Begin By Believing."

This appears to be a good opportunity but I am concerned about the optics of a conference on sexual assault scheduled during what may be spring break in a spring break town. Note, that the 26th is a Sunday.

March 6-8 - Dallas, TX - Dallas Police Dept and the Genisis Women's Shelter hosts: 2006 Conference on Crimes Against Women. This conference provides practical instruction to law enforcement, prosecutors, and victim advocates using current information, the newest ideas and most successful intervention strategies. Topics focus on the many different types of crimes against women, including: domestic violence, sexual assault, serial murder, prostitution, and trafficking. Recent high-profile cases will be presented by the involved investigators and prosecutors.

Presently, this appears to be the best option. The conference occurs during the first half of the week (good news cycle) and combines violence against women issues with trafficking and local law enforcement.

March 24 - Trenton/Princeton, NJ - International Institute of New Jersey Anti-Trafficking Conference. Focus on law enforcement and service provider coopertation, global perspectives and the role of the media.

But for this occuring in late March, this is a good opportunity as the sponsoring organziation is an NG-partner in the NJ task force. I am also inquiring as to whether this event is connected to the NJ task force in any way.

******

OLA has provided the following list of members of congress who should be provided a copy of the report.

House and Senate Judiciary Committees - Chair and Ranking Minority Members
House and Senate Appropriations Committees and Justice Subcommittees - Chair and Ranking Minority Members
Senate Majority and Minority Leaders
Senator Brownback
Senator Cornyn
Speaker of the House
House Majority and Minority Leaders
Representative Chris Smith
Representative Deborah Pryce

*****

Gorsuch, Neil M

From: Gorsuch, Neil M
Sent: Wednesday, January 18, 2006 6:26 PM
To: Nichols, Carl (CIV)
Subject: RE: Guantanamo Events: New Report by UN Special Rapporteurs and OSCE SR visit set for February 4

Thanks for passing this along.

-----Original Message-----
From: Nichols, Carl (CIV)
Sent: Wednesday, January 18, 2006 6:20 PM
To: Gorsuch, Neil M
Subject: FW: Guantanamo Events: New Report by UN Special Rapporteurs and OSCE SR visit set for February 4

-----Original Message-----
From: Henry, Terry (CIV)
Sent: Wednesday, January 18, 2006 6:17 PM
To: Garvey, Vincent (CIV); Gilligan, Jim (CIV); Henry, Terry (CIV); Hunt, Jody (CIV); Johansen, Janine (CIV); Katerberg, Robert (CIV); Noronha, Preeya (CIV); Patterson, Nicholas (CIV); Perez, Marc (CIV); Schwartz, James (CIV); Warden, Andrew (CIV); White, Ned (CIV); Nichols, Carl (CIV); Riley, Sharon (CIV)
Cc: Letter, Douglas (CIV); Loeb, Robert (CIV)
Subject: FW: Guantanamo Events: New Report by UN Special Rapporteurs and OSCE SR visit set for February 4

FYI. It's not pretty.

Terry M. Henry
Senior Trial Counsel
Civil Division, Federal Programs Branch
U.S. Department of Justice
Tel. 202.514.4107

-----Original Message-----
From: [redacted]@dodgc.osd.mil [mailto:[redacted]@dodgc.osd.mil]
Sent: Wednesday, January 18, 2006 6:09 PM
To: Henry, Terry (CIV)
Cc[redacted]@dodgc.osd.mil;[redacted]@dodgc.osd.mil;[redacted]@dodgc.osd.mil
Subject: Fw: Guantanamo Events: New Report by UN Special Rapporteurs and OSCE SR visit set for February 4

CAUTION: Information contained in this message may be protected by the attorney/client, attorney work product, deliberative process or other privileges. Do not disseminate further without approval from the Office of the DoD General Counsel.

Sent from my BlackBerry Wireless Handheld

-----Original Message-----
From: [redacted]DoD OGC <[redacted]@dodgc.osd.mil>
To: [redacted] DoD OGC [redacted]@dodgc.osd.mil>
CC: [redacted] DoD OGC [redacted]@dodgc.osd.mil>; [redacted]DoD OGC [redacted]@dodgc.osd.mil>; [redacted] DoD OGC <[redacted]@dodgc.osd.mil>; [redacted] DoD OGC [redacted]@dodgc.osd.mil>; [redacted] DoD OGC [redacted]@dodgc.osd.mil>
Sent: Wed Jan 18 17:58:50 2006
Subject: FW: Guantanamo Events: New Report by UN Special Rapporteurs and OSCE SR visit set for February 4

<<Summary of UN Report on Gitmo detainees.doc>> <<Report of 5 SRs on Guantanamo.pdf>> Waiting for additional information from State concerning USG response. The report is unfavorable and contains many misstatements of the law and facts. Will keep you posted on State's strategy for responding.

[redacted]
-----Original Message-----
From [redacted][mailto [redacted]@state.gov]
Sent: Wednesday, January 18, 2006 17:41
To: [redacted] Legal); SWCI; DRL-FO-DL; IO-SHA users; [redacted] Legal-L-HRR; Legal-L-PM; Legal-L-UNA; [redacted] OSD-POLICY [redacted] @osd.mil); [redacted] Wiegmann (John_B._Wiegmann@nsc.eop.gov); [redacted] DoD OGC; [redacted] @osd.mil); [redacted] Legal-L-EUR; DRL-MLA-DL
Subject: Guantanamo Events: New Report by UN Special Rapporteurs and OSCE SR visit set for February 4

It has been a busy day for news regarding human rights mechanisms' work relating to our law of war detainees at Guantanamo:

* First, we received this morning from Geneva the awaited 40 page report regarding the detainees at Guantanamo.

<<Report of 5 SRs on Guantanamo.pdf>>

Attached is a short summary of the report

<<Summary of UN Report on Gitmo detainees.doc>>

The letter of transmittal from the UN invited the US to send "factual clarifications" to the report by the end of January. We obviously disagree with much that is contained in the report beyond matters of fact. Please give me any reactions you have to the report and your views on whether and/or how the USG should respond to this..

* Second, our Embassy Brussels reported that [redacted] accepted the invitation to visit Guantanamo on February 4, with a day of meetings in Washington on February 3.

[redacted] agrees to the February 4 date. [redacted] will arrive in DC early in the morning of Friday, February 3, and be available at noon or any time after for the meetings at the pentagon.

[redacted] will you confirm all this for me, and advise me of the time [redacted] should appear at the Pentagon, which entrance, what ID they need to bring, and other details. If [redacted] is to arrive at noon, will you feed [redacted]?

[redacted] would likely also want to know the plans for Saturday. Will [redacted] need to get [redacted] to Andrews, when, how to get through security, etc. I

Thank you

[redacted]

We will send around more information from DOD on the logistics of the visit.

Gorsuch, Neil M

From: Gorsuch, Neil M
Sent: Wednesday, January 18, 2006 6:47 PM
To: Comisac, Rena (CRT)
Subject: Re: HT Report

That's good w me. Look forward to catching up tomorrow.

-----Original Message-----
From: Comisac, Rena (CRT) <Rena.Comisac@crt.usdoj.gov>
To: Gorsuch, Neil M <Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
Sent: Wed Jan 18 18:25:12 2006
Subject: RE: HT Report

I understand you and Brad discussed HSH and the trafficking report roll out today. He is planning on coming with me to tomorrow's meeting. See you then.

-----Original Message-----
From: Gorsuch, Neil M
Sent: Wednesday, January 18, 2006 6:18 PM
To: Comisac, Rena (CRT)
Subject: RE: HT Report

No problem! Let's talk tomorrow.

From: Comisac, Rena (CRT)
Sent: Wednesday, January 18, 2006 6:11 PM
To: Gorsuch, Neil M
Subject: FW: HT Report

Despite repeated attempts to do so, I have not been able to email you the report due to its size. Would you like a copy on disk?

-----Original Message-----
From: Comisac, Rena (CRT)
Sent: Wednesday, January 18, 2006 4:22 PM
To: Gorsuch, Neil M
Subject: FW: HT Report

I am sending you the email without the report attached. Will send the report separately. Hope this works.

-----Original Message-----
From: Comisac, Rena (CRT)

From: Comisac, Rena (CRT)
Sent: Wednesday, January 18, 2006 4:19 PM
To: Gorsuch, Neil M
Subject: FW: HT Report

For some reason this does not appear to have reached you the first time around.

-----Original Message-----
From: Comisac, Rena (CRT)
Sent: Wednesday, January 18, 2006 3:14 PM
To: Gorsuch, Neil M
Subject: FW: HT Report

[redacted]

I am on your calendar for tomorrow afternoon to discuss HSH and trafficking (that was the earliest I could get on your schedule -- you're a busy guy!). Wanted to make sure you had a copy of the most recent version of the trafficking report, which incorporates edits by Martha and others. OLP is getting us edits today. The vast majority of these edits are stylistic and grammatical. I'll be interested in hearing how your call to DPC went. If we want to shoot for the 2/13 roll out, we would need to get the report to JMD for layout (the next step before it goes to the printer) no later than this Friday, January 20. In addition to these existing events, we are exploring alternative events with OIPL. I should know more tomorrow by the time we meet tomorrow.

-----Original Message-----
From: Vargas, Omar (CRT)
Sent: Tuesday, January 17, 2006 6:49 PM
To: Comisac, Rena (CRT)
Subject: HT Report

Rena:

The most recent version of the report is attached. Comments and edits have been submitted by Martha Pacold, Nancy Scott-Finan, Criminal Section staff and various folks in the Criminal Division. I expect Larry Rothenberg's comments on a draft as of yesterday tomorrow morning. [redacted]

The following are a number of roll-out event options occuring after Feb. 10. I am waiting to hear back from the Bureau of Justice Assistance regarding any law enforcement related opportunities already planned and am waiting for an update from Violence Against Women regarding Lifetime Television. A second call went in to Lifetime today and OVW will follow-up tomorrow. Aside from identifying existing events, we can potentially work through OIPL to "create" an event a group of state legislators or law enforcement organizations. Also, depending on the number of copies available after an event and distribution to the Hill, I think it would be helpful distribute copies to constituency groups such as the Hudson Institute, Freedom Network, etc.

February 13-San Francisco, CA - Ending Domestic Violence and Human Trafficking in the 21st Century Conference

The conference is designed to provide information about violence against women through speeches, panels and workshops. This event will provide a platform for education, motivate individuals to take action, and encourage investment in community solutions. While the conference will bring attention to the issue at the national and international levels, the focus will be on how to take action locally. Conference Partners: University of California, San Francisco Center of Excellence in Women's Health, Family Violence Prevention Fund, Partners Ending Domestic Abuse, San Francisco Domestic Violence Consortium, Vital Voices Global Partnership, Mills College, and the International Museum of Women.

Please note that the Family Violence Prevention Fund is a grantee of both OVC and OVW and an OVW funded anti-trafficking program is discussed in our report.

Feb 26-March 2 - South Padre Island, TX - Texas Association Against Sexual Assault Annual Conference: "Begin By Believing."

This appears to be a good opportunity but I am concerned about the optics of a conference on sexual assault scheduled during what may be spring break in a spring break town. Note, that the 26th is a Sunday.

March 6-8 - Dallas, TX - Dallas Police Dept and the Genisis Women's Shelter hosts: 2006 Conference on Crimes Against Women. This conference provides practical instruction to law enforcement, prosecutors, and victim advocates using current information, the newest ideas and most successful intervention strategies. Topics focus on the many different types of crimes against women, including: domestic violence, sexual assault, serial murder, prostitution, and trafficking. Recent high-profile cases will be presented by the involved investigators and prosecutors.

Presently, this appears to be the best option. The conference occurs during the first half of the week (good news cycle) and combines violence against women issues with trafficking and local law enforcement.

March 24 - Trenton/Princeton, NJ - International Institute of New Jersey Anti-Trafficking Conference. Focus on law enforcement and service provider coopertation, global perspectives and the role of the media.

But for this occuring in late March, this is a good opportunity as the sponsoring organziation is an NG-partner in the NJ task force. I am also inquiring as to whether this event is connected to the NJ task force in any way.

******

OLA has provided the following list of members of congress who should be provided a copy of the report.

House and Senate Judiciary Committees - Chair and Ranking Minority Members House and Senate Appropriations Committees and Justice Subcommittees - Chair and Ranking Minority Members Senate Majority and Minority Leaders Senator Brownback Senator Cornyn Speaker of the House House Majority and Minority Leaders Representative Chris Smith Representative Deborah Pryce

*****

Williams, Jan

From: Williams, Jan

Sent: Thursday, January 19, 2006 8:36 AM

To: Spagnoli, Deborah A. (USPC); Nelson, Carrie; Bradbury, Steve; Brand, Rachel; Clark, John (USMS); Clement, Paul D; Fisher, Alice; Flores, Robert; Gillis, John; Herraiz, Domingo S.; Keisler, Peter D (CIV); Kim, Wan (CRT); Leonhart, Michele M.; McCallum, Robert (SMO); McNulty, Paul J; Moschella, William; O'Connor, Eileen J. (AAG/TAX); Sanchez, William J (CRT); Tamargo, Mauricio J; Tandy, Karen P (DEA); Wooldridge, Sue Ellen (ENRD); /o=USDOJ/ou=USAPAE/cn=Recipients/cn=Mailboxes/cn=SMalloy; Agarwal, Asheesh (CIV); Akers, Eric J.; Ames, Andrew; Barnett, Thomas O.; Battle, Michael (USAEO); Beach, Andrew; Beck, Cherith (USAARE); Bianco, Joseph F.; Blomquist, Kathleen M; Boardman, Michelle; Boote, John; Bottner, Andrea; Bounds, Ryan W (OLP); Bucholtz, Jeffrey (CIV); Burch, Victoria; Chambers, Shane P; Clinger, James H; Cohen, Brian; Cohn, Jonathan (CIV); Comisac, Rena (CRT); Cook, Elisebeth C; Cook, Marita L. (USAWY); Cooperstein, Theodore M; Coppenger, Chesed L. (TAX); Costigan, Michael; Coughlin, Robert; Curtis, O. Benton; Daley, Cybele; David, Matt; Dhillon, Uttam; Dummermuth, Matt (USAVAE); Eisenberg, John; Elwood, Courtney; Elwood, John; Flaherty, Connor; Freeman, Sharee (CRT); Friedrich, Matthew; Gambatesa, Donald (USMS); Garre, Gregory G; Glut, Martha (USANE); Gober, Chris; Golden, Lois; Goodling, Monica; Gorsuch, Neil M; Greg Harris; Hagle, Timothy; Harris, Gregory; Henke, Tracy (SMO); Hertling, Richard; Hofer, Patrick F. (TAX); Hoisington, Jana; Holland, Eric W; Irving, John (ODAG); Jaffer, Jamil N; Jordan, Theresa (USADE); Jungeblut, Neal P.; Katsas, Gregory (CIV); Keehner, Laura; Kessler, Elizabeth A; Korn, Jennifer; Lesch, Jaclyn; Little, Kimani (CRT); Longlet, Benjamin; Lonick, Saundra; Luckinbill, Trent W.; Macklin, Kristi R; MacLean, Alex (CRT); Magnuson, Cynthia; Marshall, C. Kevin; Martinson, Wanda; Masoudi, Gerald; McArthur, Patrick; McDonald, Bruce; McFarland, Steven T (ODAG); McIntosh, Brent; McKee, Cindy (USAKS); McKeown, Matt (ENRD); McKnight, Cynthia M (CRT); McNally, Edward; McNeil, Tucker (OPA); Mercer, Bill (ODAG); Meron, Daniel (CIV); Metcalf, Mark H (CRT); Miranda, Matthew; Monheim, Thomas; Moore, Miriam (ODAG); Morrison, Richard T. (TAX); Murphy, Sean; Neumayr, Mary (ENRD); Nichols, Carl (CIV); Nichols, Grant W; Nowacki, John; OConnell, James; Otis, Lee L; Otis, William G.; Pagliocca, Theresa; Parsky, Laura; Peabody, Payson R. (TAX); Peed, Carl; Potter, Janet; Racicot, Tim (USAMT); Reyes, Luis (SMO); Roberts, Crystal; Roe, Price (OCIO); Roehrkasse, Brian; Roper, Matt M; Rosenberg, Chuck; Rowe, Kiri; Sampson, Kyle; Schlozman, Brad (CRT); Schmitt, Glenn; Schwartz, Arthur; Scolinos, Tasia; Seidel, Rebecca; Selim, George (CRS); Sellers, Kiahna (OAG); Smith, Kimberly A; Sours, Raquel; Strug, Kerri; Swenson, Lily F; Taylor, Bruce A.; Tenpas, Ronald J (ODAG); Todd, Gordon (OLP); Tomlinson, Linda (USANH); Turner, Donald J. (USAPAM); Tzitzon, Nicholas; Underhill, Deborah; Vargas, Omar (CRT); Voris, Natalie (USAEO); Warren, Julie; Williams, Jan; Woodruff, William; Boente, Dana J. (TAX); Nash, Stuart (ODAG); Oldham, Jeffrey L; Pacold, Martha M; Purpura, Michael M (ODAG); Rowan, Patrick (ODAG); Senger, Jeffrey M; Taylor, Jeffrey (OAG); Webb, Lauren; White, Clifford

Subject: White House Morning Update: 1/19/06

The Morning Update

This morning, President Bush will travel to Sterling, VA to outline his agenda to maintain the economy's momentum and help small businesses.
The President will discuss the policies needed to keep the economy strong and growing in 2006. In the last two months, the economy has added more than 400,000 jobs - more than 4.6 million new jobs since May 2003. The 4.9 percent unemployment rate is lower than the average of the 1970s, 1980s and 1990s. In Loudon County, where the President will be speaking, the unemployment rate is 2 percent.
The economy grew more than 4 percent at an annual rate in the third quarter of 2005 and has been growing close to that rate on average for the last two years.
Entrepreneurship and small business growth is flourishing, and we must keep our economy strong by pursuing pro-growth policies.

In the afternoon, the President will meet with a group of Gulf Coast recovery foundations to discuss rebuilding efforts.

10:10 am: THE PRESIDENT makes Remarks on the Economy

EST JK Moving & Storage, Inc. | Sterling, VA

1:15 pm: THE PRESIDENT and Mrs. Bush meet with Foundations on Gulf Coast Recovery

EST The White House | Washington, DC

From Today's Morning Headlines

President Bush Meets With Victims Of Saddam Hussein And His Regime.
"Iraqis who said they were beaten, imprisoned and lost loved ones at the hands of Saddam Hussein's government shared their stories Wednesday with President Bush, who said the former Iraqi president 'will get his due justice.'
<http://news.yahoo.com/s/ap/20060119/ap_on_go_pr_wh/bush_iraq;_ylt=AlICc nmBS8_mdCFJt2Y2c92s0NUE;_ylu=X3oDMTA3OXIzMDMzBHNlYwM3MDM-> ... 'One of the interesting moments will come here this year when Saddam Hussein's trial is brought forth for the world to see, to see the butcherer, the person who brutalized many people or ordered the brutality of many people here at this table, get his due justice under rule of law,' the president told reporters brought in for two minutes at the end of the meeting." (Nedra Pickler, "Bush Meets Victims Of 'Butcherer' Saddam," The Associated Press, 1/18/06)

Mrs. Bush Announces New Commitment To Help Fight AIDS In Africa. "First lady Laura Bush brought drugs to AIDS patients in a rural hospital yesterday, announcing the U.S. would spend millions to prevent impoverished women from passing the disease to their children. 'That's so important, if we can stop the transmission from mother to child - it really protects the next generation,' she told patients and medical officials outside St. Mary's Hospital. Standing in front of the first shipment of anti-retroviral treatment for about 500 people, Mrs. Bush announced a new commitment of $163 million to help Nigeria treat AIDS this year.
<http://www.washingtontimes.com/national/20060118-101330-7819r.htm> " (Bill Sammon, "First Lady Brings AIDS Drugs To Africans," The Washington Times, 1/19/06)

National Economic Council Director Al Hubbard Discusses The President's Strong Commitment To Spending Restraint. "President George W. Bush is expected to push for more cuts in spending this year in his budget proposal for fiscal 2007, White House economic adviser Al Hubbard said on Wednesday. The proposals would be in addition to the $40 billion in spending cuts over five years that Congress has been trying to pass and hopes to send to the president when lawmakers return from a recess. ...
'I can assure you this president is being very aggressive on spending control,' <http://news.yahoo.com/s/nm/20060118/pl_nm/economy_budget_hubbard_dc;_ylt=Arqxbly2.cR5mqhK1.gkWh8a.3QA;_ylu=X3oDMTBiMW04NW9mBHNlYwMlJVRPUCUl>
Hubbard said in an interview with Reuters. He noted that non-defense, non-security discretionary spending declined in the past year. 'I think it's reasonable to expect a similar approach this coming year,' Hubbard said." (Tabassum Zakaria And Kristin Roberts, "Bush Adviser Sees Spending Cuts, Health Proposals," Reuters, 1/18/06)

Secretary Chertoff Discusses The Importance Of The NSA Surveillance Program. "'What I can tell you is this,' Chertoff said. 'The technique of electronic surveillance, which is gathering information about who calls whom or intercepting actual conversation, is the most significant tool in the war against terrorism.' 'If we didn't have it, I'm quite sure we'd have disrupted fewer attacks and identified fewer [terrorists].'
<http://www.rollcall.com/issues/51_69/kondracke/11779-1.html> Buried at the bottom of the Times story were a number of cases where actual terrorist operations had been disrupted, apparently as a result of NSA eavesdropping, including efforts to smuggle a missile launcher into the United States, to cut Brooklyn Bridge cables with a blowtorch and an attempt to blow up a fertilizer bomb in London." (Morton M. Kondracke, "NSA Data Mining Is Legal, Necessary, Sec. Chertoff Says," Roll Call, 1/19/06)

Former Counsel For The Senate Intelligence Committee Victoria Toensing Writes That The NSA Surveillance Program Is Crucial To Winning The War On Terror. "I have extensive experience with the consequences of government bungling due to over-strict interpretations of FISA. As chief counsel for the Senate Intelligence Committee from 1981 to 1984, I participated in oversight of FISA in the first years after its passage.
When I subsequently became deputy assistant attorney general in the Reagan administration, one of my responsibilities was the terrorism portfolio, which included working with FISA. ... Today, FISA my responsibilities was the terrorism portfolio, which included working with FISA. ... Today, FISA remains ill-equipped to deal with ever-changing terrorist threats. <http://online.wsj.com/article/SB113763551855150439.html?mod=opinion_main_commentaries> It was never envisioned to be a speedy collector of information to prevent an imminent attack on our soil. And the reasons the president might decide to bypass FISA courts are readily understandable, as it is easy to conjure up scenarios like the TWA hijacking, where strict adherence to FISA would jeopardize American lives." (Victoria Toensing, Op-Ed, "Terrorists On Tap," The Wall Street Journal, 1/19/06)

Making Progress Toward Financial Stability, Iraqi Government Bonds Will Begin Trading On Monday. "It won't make anyone forget the car bombs and kidnappings, but Iraq soon will take an important step toward financial stability. New government securities are scheduled to begin trading Monday for the first time in two decades. As part of an ongoing restructuring of foreign debt left over from the Saddam Hussein era, Iraq late last year agreed with its commercial creditors on a swap of old debts for new Iraqi bonds. Once the new bonds officially start trading on world markets, investors will get a chance to vote with their wallets on the country's future. 'This is just yet another step on the road to Iraq's normalization with the global financial community. We see this as solid forward progress,' <http://www.usatoday.com/printedition/money/20060119/iraq19.art.htm> says Timothy Adams, the Treasury department's undersecretary for international affairs." (David J. Lynch, "Iraq Takes Another Step Toward Conquering Debt," USA Today, 1/19/06)

International Community Pledges $1.9 Billion To Combat Bird Flu.
"Alarmed by a spate of bird flu infections and deaths in Turkey, 33 countries and international institutions pledged $1.9 billion on Wednesday to fight the disease. The pledges, at the conclusion of a two-day conference here, are considerably greater than the $1.2 billion to $1.4 billion that the World Bank had said would be needed in the next three years. <http://www.nytimes.com/2006/01/19/international/asia/19flu.html?pagewanted=all> The money will pay for tasks like strengthening of veterinary and medical surveillance for outbreaks, stockpiling of surgical masks and other protective equipment and expanding research." (Keith Bradsher, "Global Effort Attracts $1.9 Billion In Pledges To Battle Bird Flu," The New York Times, 1/19/06)

Yesterday From The White House

President Meets With Victims Of Saddam Hussein, Discusses Progress <http://www.whitehouse.gov/news/releases/2006/01/20060118-1.html>

* In Focus: Renewal In Iraq <http://www.whitehouse.gov/infocus/iraq/>

Statement On U.S. Pledge Of $334 Million In Global Fight Against Bird Flu <http://www.whitehouse.g ov/news/releases/2006/01/20060118-6.html>

Press Briefing By Scott McClellan
<http://www.whitehouse.gov/news/releases/2006/01/20060118-5.html>

Press Briefing By The First Lady En Route Sal Island, Cape Verde <http://www.whitehouse.gov/news/releases/2006/01/20060118-3.html>

Miller, Charles S

From: Miller, Charles S
Sent: Thursday, January 19, 2006 10:56 AM
To: Agarwal, Asheesh (CIV); Ames, Andrew; Apisson, Elizabeth M; Baxter, Felix (CIV); Branda, Joyce (CIV); Brody, Stephen (CIV); Bucholtz, Jeffrey (CIV); Bukvics, Jennifer (CIV); Claterbos, Barbara (CIV); Cohen, David M. (CIV); Cohn, Jonathan (CIV); Davidson, Jeanne (CIV); Fadely, Kathlynn (CIV); Fargo, John (CIV); Fielding, Gabrielle (CIV); Figley, Paul (CIV); Flentje, August (CIV); Garren, Timothy (CIV); Glynn, J.Patrick (CIV); Gorsuch, Neil M; Hertz, Michael (CIV); Hollis, Robert (CIV); Hunt, Jody (CIV); Hussey, Thom (CIV); Jeweler, James (CIV); Katsas, Gregory (CIV); Keisler, Peter D (CIV); Kohn, Chris (CIV); Kopp, Robert (CIV); Letter, Douglas (CIV); Levine, Larry (EOIR); Lindemann, Michael (CIV); Magnuson, Cynthia; McCallum, Robert (SMO); Meron, Daniel (CIV); Nichols, Carl (CIV); Nowacki, John; Pyles, Phyllis (CIV); Reyes, Luis (SMO); Riley, Sharon (CIV); Rivera, Jennifer (CIV); Roehrkasse, Brian; Schiffer, Stuart (CIV); Scolinos, Tasia; Seidel, Rebecca; Senger, Jeffrey M; Spellberg, Dianne (CIV); Swenson, Lily F; Thirolf, Eugene; Wilson, Karen L; Zwick, Ken (CIV)
Subject: 1/19/06 Civil Division News

Justices Reaffirm Emergency Access to Abortion

Privacy group to sue over US eavesdropping program

Civil Liberties Group to Sue Justice Dept.

US opposes quick court action on Uighurs detained in Guantanamo

Salvati lawyer sees a plan in IRS audit

Salvati Attorney Raises Questions About IRS Audit

Government files motion to dismiss religious intolerance lawsuit

Feds want Google search records; BUSH LAWYERS ASK JUDGE TO MAKE GOOGLE HAND OVER DATA; GOOGLE PROMISES A FIGHT

ANTHRAX SHOT PLAINTIFFS ALLEGE AGENCIES HOPE TO 'MANIPULATE' COURT

Editorial: The Assisted-Suicide Decision

Editorial: Double trouble

New York Times

January 19, 2006

Justices Reaffirm Emergency Access to Abortion

By LINDA GREENHOUSE

WASHINGTON, Jan. 18 - In its first ruling on an abortion case in six years, the Supreme Court issued a unanimous decision on Wednesday that reaffirmed the need to include an exception for medical emergencies in a law that restricts teenagers' access to abortion.

The decision told a lower court to reconsider its ruling that struck down, in its entirety, a New Hampshire law that fails to include such an exception. "We try to limit the solution to the problem," Justice Sandra Day O'Connor said in her opinion for the court, instructing the lower court to consider invalidating the law only as it applies to those few teenagers who need an immediate abortion for medical reasons.

"We do not revisit our abortion precedents today," Justice O'Connor declared in the opening words of what is likely to be her last opinion for the court. The studiously bland 10-page opinion carefully sidestepped the abortion debate that has been a prominent feature of public discourse about the court's future.

The hiatus may be brief, however. At their conference on Friday, the justices are scheduled to take up the Bush administration's appeal of a lower court ruling that declared unconstitutional a federal law, the Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act of 2003.

That case, on which the court had deferred action until the New Hampshire case was decided, presents issues that may not be so easily avoided. Further, the federal case, if the court agrees to hear it, would be argued after Justice O'Connor's departure. She was part of the 5-to-4 majority that struck down a Nebraska precursor of the federal law in 2000, so her successor, who is likely to be Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr., could cast the deciding vote.

In the New Hampshire decision on Wednesday, the justices accepted the finding by two lower federal courts that the New Hampshire law was constitutionally deficient in not making explicit provisions for pregnant teenagers facing a medical emergency. The law requires notice to a parent, followed by a 48-hour waiting period, before a doctor can perform an abortion on a girl under the age of 18.

Where the justices differed from the Federal District Court in Concord, N.H., and the United States Court of Appeals for the First Circuit, in Boston, was on how to remedy the absence of a medical-emergency provision. The two lower courts had barred enforcement of the entire statute, even for the great majority of teenagers for whom the lack of an exception is not relevant.

The choice of this "most blunt remedy" was unjustified, Justice O'Connor said, when a "more finely drawn" remedy might be more consistent with the intent of the legislature, which passed the law in 2003.

Consequently, the Supreme Court vacated the appeals court's decision and ordered it to examine which option the legislature would have preferred: a statute with an emergency exception, or no enforceable parental-notice law. "We try not to nullify more of a legislature's work than is necessary," Justice O'Connor said. "The touchstone for any decision about remedy is legislative intent."

If the decision, Ayotte v. Planned Parenthood of Northern New England, No. 04-1144, turns out to be Justice O'Connor's last, it will be a fitting coda to a 25-year tenure in which she often played a pivotal role in the court's abortion jurisprudence.

Perhaps Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. had that in mind when he assigned her the opinion after the case was argued Nov. 30. It was evident from that argument that the justices were looking for a narrow way to decide the case and were setting aside, for the moment, whatever passion they bring to the abortion debate. Justice O'Connor's opinion embodied that collective judgment, whether under the guiding hand of the new chief justice or due to a confluence of individual responses.

However the New Hampshire decision was reached, "the decision preserves the status quo while the court is in transition," said Clarke D. Forsythe, senior attorney for Americans United for Life, a public interest law firm that litigates against abortion.

Mr. Forsythe filed a brief in the New Hampshire case on behalf of the sponsors of the New Hampshire law, the Parental Notification Prior to Abortion Act. In an interview, he said the answer to Justice O'Connor's question was "absolutely clear." Rather than have no parental-notice law at all, he said, the sponsors would accept an exception for medical emergencies, a choice he said they made clear by including a clause in the statute providing that if any application of the law was found to be invalid, "such invalidity shall not affect the provisions or applications" as to which there was no problem.

By including this language, known as a severability clause, the sponsors "practically anticipated" the court's decision, he said.

An opposite brief, on behalf of 153 New Hampshire legislators who opposed the parental-notice law, was filed in support of the plaintiffs, a doctor and three medical clinics. These legislators said the debate over the bill made clear that the sponsors wanted to test the Supreme Court's abortion precedents and "would have preferred to have no law rather than a law that contains a medical emergency exception in it."

Jennifer Dalven, a lawyer for the American Civil Liberties Union who argued the case for the plaintiffs in the Supreme Court, said in an interview that the sponsors "very clearly did not want a health exception" and predicted that the lower courts would once again bar enforcement of the entire statute.

"We're very happy that the court reaffirmed the need for a medical emergency exception," Ms. Dalven said, adding that the decision "tells politicians that they can't jeopardize women's health" when enacting abortion restrictions.

The Supreme Court for years has upheld state laws requiring parental involvement in a teenager's abortion decision, and 44 states now have such laws. The basic validity of these laws was not at issue. Nor, Justice O'Connor said, was the requirement that access to abortions "necessary, in appropriate medical judgment, for preservation of the life or health of the mother" may not be restricted.

Her opinion cited five precedents for that proposition, going back to Roe v. Wade in 1973. Notably absent from the list was the court's most recent abortion ruling, Stenberg v. Carhart, which in 2000 struck down Nebraska's ban on the procedure opponents call "partial birth abortion" in part because the law failed to provide a health exception. That decision provoked four vigorous dissents, and the price for the unanimity of the new opinion might have been the omission of the reference.

In spite of the Nebraska ruling, Congress passed the federal Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act, now pending before the court in Gonzales v. Carhart, No. 05-380. The act does not include a medical exception, instead simply declaring that the procedure is never necessary to protect a woman's health. The case presents a direct challenge to the court's willingness to adhere to its precedent.

END

Reuters

Wed Jan 18, 2006 6:00 PM ET

Privacy group to sue over US eavesdropping program

WASHINGTON (Reuters) - A group that advocates privacy rights said on Wednesday it planned to sue the Justice Department to win the public release of documents related to President George W. Bush's domestic eavesdropping program.

The Electronic Privacy Information Center, or EPIC, is the latest of a number of civil liberties organizations to take the federal government to court over the domestic spying program, which has caused an outcry among Republicans and Democrats alike.

The American Civil Liberties Union and the Center for Constitutional Rights filed separate lawsuits on Tuesday, challenging the highly classified program that allows the National Security Agency to monitor U.S. citizens' international telephone and e-mail messages without first obtaining warrants.

EPIC said it would ask a federal district court in Washington on Thursday to order the release of related Justice Department documents that the government has failed to disclose under the Freedom of Information Act.

The 1966 FOIA law sets out procedures that allow the public to request the release of government documents and records.

EPIC submitted FOIA requests with four Justice Department offices including the Office of the Attorney General after the New York Times first reported the existence of the warrantless surveillance program on December 16.

The Justice Department said it responded quickly to EPIC's requests by agreeing to expedite the FOIA process. "The department continues to work in an expedited manner to meet this request," Justice spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said.

The Washington-based group contends that the Justice Department has played a key role in authorizing, implementing and overseeing the NSA program.

"The Administration has confirmed the existence of the program, but released very little information that sheds light on the key question (of) whether the government is acting illegally," EPIC general counsel David Sobel said in a statement.

The 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act makes it illegal for the U.S. government to spy on Americans in the United States without first getting approval from a secret federal court.

The program's existence has been acknowledged by Bush and defended by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, who is scheduled to appear at a February 6 hearing on the program before the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Records sought by EPIC include an audit of the NSA program, a "checklist" guide used to determine whether an individual's phone or e-mail messages could be monitored, documents showing how information gleaned through eavesdropping had been used, and other legal opinions about the program.

END

AP

January 19, 2006

Civil Liberties Group to Sue Justice Dept.

By MARK SHERMAN

Associated Press Writer

WASHINGTON_The Justice Department is violating federal disclosure law by failing to provide information about its role in the Bush administration's domestic spying program, a civil liberties group said Wednesday.

The government has yet to comply with requests filed Dec. 16 by the Electronic Privacy Information Center under the Freedom of Information Act, hours after the existence of the National Security Agency's warrantless eavesdropping was made known.

The group expects to file a FOIA lawsuit Thursday in U.S. District Court in Washington, asking a judge to order the department to release documents within 20 days because the information "concerns a matter of extraordinary public interest."

Meanwhile, the nonpartisan Congressional Research Service said Wednesday that the administration's limited congressional briefings on the monitoring "appear to be inconsistent with the law."

The CRS memo backs the contention of California Rep. Jane Harman, the senior Democrat on the House intelligence committee, that all the members of the intelligence oversight committees are entitled to hear closed-door explanations of the program.

Administration officials have, to date, briefed only the "Gang of Eight," which is made up of the top Republicans and Democrats in the House and Senate and on the intelligence panels. This smaller group is scheduled to receive another briefing on the NSA program on Friday, said two congressional aides, speaking on condition of anonymity because the briefing has not been publicly announced.

In the FOIA matter, EPIC asked four Justice Department officials to release quickly any department audits of the NSA program, writings on the subject by government\l "l" lawyers\l "l", a checklist to help decide whether there is a legal basis to monitor an individual's communications and documents discussing the use of information obtained through the NSA program to obtain a warrant from a secret federal court for more eavesdropping.

The Justice Department sent EPIC a reply within three business days of its requests, saying they would be handled expeditiously but would take more than 30 business days to fulfill.

EPIC said the public needs the information now because of the lively national debate over the legality of the NSA program and in advance of a Feb. 6 Senate hearing at which Attorney General Alberto Gonzales is expected to testify.

President Bush last month acknowledged he had ordered the surveillance, bypassing the secret Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court, and said the Justice Department regularly reviewed the program to make sure it stayed within the law.

Gonzales also has repeatedly defended its legality in the face of questions from Democratic and Republican lawmakers and legal scholars about whether the president has the authority to order monitoring of people in the United States without a court's approval.

Two separate lawsuits challenging the legality of the spying program were filed Tuesday in Detroit and New York by the American Civil Liberties Union and the Center for Constitutional Rights.

END

AGENCE FRANCE PRESSE ENGLISH WIRE

January 19, 2006

US opposes quick court action on Uighurs detained in Guantanamo

WASHINGTON, Jan 18, 2006 (AFP) - The United States urged an appeals court Wednesday to reject a petition seeking quick action on the detention of two ethnic Uighur Muslims from China held at the US "war on terror" prison in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

The two men, who have been held since July 2002, filed an appeal last month after a district court judge said he could not order their release even though he acknowledged their detention was illegal.

In addition to seeking an expedited Court of Appeals decision, lawyers for Abu Bakker Qassim and Adel Abdu Al-Hakim made an urgent request Tuesday for the US Supreme Court to intervene in the case.

The pair remain held in Guantanamo even though the US military said in March 2005 that they were no longer considered "enemy combatants."

But the United States argues that it cannot release them to China because they could face persecution there and that it was looking for a country to host them.

In court papers field with the appeals court in Washington, the Justice\l "l" Department\l "l" said there was "a substantial question of whether there is any (court) jurisdiction over this case."

The department asked the court to wait for a ruling on a separate case regarding the Detainee Treatment Act of 2005, which states that "no court, justice, or judge shall have jurisdiction to hear or consider" any claims by foreign detainees at Guantanamo Bay.

The court document says the two Uighurs, although no longer enemy combatants, still qualify under the Detainee Treatment Act.

But prosecutors said the United States wanted to free the two detainees.

"Petitioners will be released when a proper country of return is located," the department said in the court document.

"The United States continues to actively pursue all appropriate diplomatic options for the placement of petitioners. We can assure the Court that the United States Government has no interest in keeping petitioners in Guantanamo any longer than necessary," the court papers say.

"The delays being experienced by petitioners are obviously most unfortunate, but they are common during or at the end on an armed conflict, when trying to resettle those captured during the conflict," the Justice\l "l" Department\l "l" said.

The two Turkic-speaking Uighur Muslims from the troubled western region of Xinjiang in China were captured by bounty hunters in Pakistan.

The court document says the detainees are held at a separate facility in Guantanamo called Camped Iguana for non-enemy combatants, where they have been granted "substantial privileges" such as access to television, sports activities and air conditioned facilities.

"Petitioners are, however, former enemy combatants and persons trained at a military training camp supplied by the Taliban, and they remain detained (albeit with greater privileges) pending their release," the department said.

END

Boston Globe

January 19, 2006

Salvati lawyer sees a plan in IRS audit

By Shelley Murphy, Globe Staff

When Medford lawyer Victor Garo was notified last month that the IRS was auditing his 2003 tax returns, he became suspicious.

It's no secret that Garo is suing the US government for $300 million on behalf of Joseph Salvati, who spent 30 years in prison after he was framed in a gangland murder. The story of Salvati's life and Garo's crusade to exonerate him captured the attention of Steven Spielberg's DreamWorks SKG, which signed a movie contract with the pair.

Garo believes it's "highly unlikely" the IRS audit is random, because it is being conducted at the same time Justice Department lawyers are urging a judge in the civil case to force him and Salvati to disclose details of their contract with DreamWorks. "If this is a move by the government to intimidate me, it won't work," Garo said.

Peggy Riley, a spokeswoman for the IRS in Boston, said privacy and disclosure laws prohibit the agency from commenting on individual taxpayer cases. But she said, "In general, IRS enforcement decisions are based strictly on tax issues."

Garo, who has practiced law for 41 years, said he could not think of anything unusual about his filings that would trigger scrutiny. But he added he was concerned about the fact that it's for 2003, the year he and Salvati got a payment from DreamWorks.

Salvati, 73 and living in Boston's North End, was among six men convicted of the 1965 murder of Edward "Teddy" Deegan in a Chelsea alley, primarily on the word of hit man Joseph "The Animal" Barboza.

Only after Salvati and Peter Limone spent more than 30 years in prison and two codefendants died in prison was it disclosed that the FBI had withheld evidence that might have helped them prove Barboza had framed them.

Salvati declined to answer questions from government lawyers about his deal with DreamWorks during a deposition last summer. US District Judge Nancy Gertner has yet to rule on a request from the government to compel Garo to disclose information about the deal.

END

WBZ-TV (Boston)

1/18/06

Salvati Attorney Raises Questions About IRS Audit

Dan Rea Reporting

(CBS4)

CBS4 has learned the government may be using a suspicious tactic in its legal fight with Victor Garo, the lawyer who helped free Joseph Salvati from prison.Garo has practiced law for more than three decades from his one-man law office in Medford Square.Garo's most famous client is Joe Salvati of Boston's North End.

Salvati was framed by an FBI informant and spent thirty years in prison for a crime he did not commit. Five years ago, long hidden FBI documents proved Salvati's innocence.Garo has filed a $300 million civil rights lawsuit against the FBI."I'm seeking justice for Joe Salvati, his wife and four children," Garo says.

In August of 2003, Hollywood producer Steven Spielberg bought the life stories of Garo and Salvati to make a movie about the injustice done to Salvati. And this is where things get interesting.For several months, the Justice Department has asked for information in the Dreamworks contract, but that contract contains a standard non-disclosure paragraph.In November of last year, Garo offered to show the movie contract to federal judge Nancy Gertner for a determination of its relevancy to the civil suit against the FBI.Apparently, that wasn't good enough for the Justice Department.

In early December, Garo received a letter form the IRS. A letter, he read in part for CBS4. "Dear Victor Garo. Your federal tax return for the year above has been selected for examination."Guess which year the IRS wants to audit. That's right, 2003."Is this just a coincidence that the year selected for examination is the year 2003 which is the very year that we singed a contract with Steven Spielberg's Dreamworks and we also received a payment from him. Is this just a coincidence?" questions Garo.

The important legal question now is, is the U.S. Justice Department using the IRS to get information in an audit that it can not get legitimately through the court system."If this IRS audit is meant to intimidate me, it will fail," Garo says.

A spokesperson for the U.S. Justice Department in Washington claims that civil division lawyers have had no contact with the IRS regarding Garo or Salvati, and that Justice knows nothing about any IRS audit.

The multi-million dollar lawsuit filed on behalf of Joe Salvati, Peter Limone and two other men who died in prison, is expected to go to trial next October.

END

AP

January 19, 2006

Government files motion to dismiss religious intolerance lawsuit

By TIM KORTE

Associated Press Writer

ALBUQUERQUE, N.M._The Justice\l "l" Department\l "l" asked a federal judge in New Mexico to dismiss a lawsuit filed by an Air Force Academy graduate who claims the Air Force has illegally promoted evangelical Christianity on academy cadets and other service members.

The dismissal motion, filed Dec. 23 in U.S. District Court in Albuquerque, reiterated a position the Air Force has maintained since Mikey Weinstein filed the lawsuit in October _ that there is no official policy of proselytizing members.

"Plaintiffs cannot demonstrate they are in imminent danger of being subject to an Air Force-wide policy of unconstitutional proselytizing for the additional and important reason that such a policy does not exist," the motion says.

The government said Weinstein and four co-plaintiffs _ also academy graduates _ are no longer enrolled at the Colorado school and thus no longer subject to the alleged conduct they allege has occurred, nor can they show they have been harmed.

Weinstein's lawyers filed a response Friday.

No timetable was given for when District Judge James Parker might rule.

Weinstein said Wednesday he believes Parker will reject the government's request, comparing the motion to "an episode of 'Cops' on TV.'"

"When the officers show up at a domestic disturbance, they always find a couple that is breathing hard. The furniture is turned over and the curtains torn. But they say to the police, 'There's no problem here,'" Weinstein said.

"The government wrongly believes there is no evangelization problem within the Air Force."

Weinstein, who is Jewish and lives in Albuquerque, claims senior officers and cadets at the academy have illegally imposed evangelical Christianity on others, often bullying lower-ranking cadets. But he also believes the problem is systemic within the Air Force.

"I'm not suing the academy. I'm suing the Air Force," he said.

Weinstein's lawsuit seeks to prohibit Air Force members from evangelizing, proselytizing or trying "to involuntarily convert, pressure, exhort or persuade a fellow member of the USAF to accept their own religious beliefs while on duty."

The government, in its dismissal motion, said intervention by a court would interfere with Air Force efforts to address the issue.

The Air Force last year withdrew a code of ethics used by chaplains, which endorsed the practice of evangelizing military service members who are unaffiliated with any religion. The Air Force also issued new guidelines on religious tolerance.

"Not only would interference in the guideline process deprive the Air Force of the opportunity to develop and set forth its policy, but a premature decision by this court regarding plaintiffs' claims could render a decision completely advisory and waste both judicial and agency resources," the motion says.

END

San Jose Mercury News (CA)

January 19, 2006

Feds want Google search records; BUSH LAWYERS ASK JUDGE TO MAKE GOOGLE HAND OVER DATA; GOOGLE PROMISES A FIGHT

By Howard Mintz, Mercury News

The Bush administration on Wednesday asked a federal judge to order Google Inc. to turn over a broad range of material from its closely guarded databases.

The move is part of a government effort to revive an Internet child protection law struck down two years ago by the U.S. Supreme Court. The law was meant to punish online pornography sites that make their content inaccessible to minors.

In court papers filed in U.S. District Court in San Jose, Justice Department lawyers revealed that Google has refused to comply with a subpoena issued last year for the records, which include a request for one million random Web addresses and records of all Google searches from any one-week period.

The Mountain View-based search engine opposes releasing the information on a variety of grounds, saying it would violate the privacy rights of its users and reveal company trade secrets, according to court documents.

Nicole Wong, an associate general counsel for Google, said the company will fight the government's effort "vigorously."

"Google is not a party to this lawsuit, and the demand for the information is overreaching," Wong said.

The government argues that it needs the information as it prepares to once again defend the constitutionality of the Child Online Protection Act in a federal court in Pennsylvania. The law was struck down in 2004 because it was too broad and could prevent adults from accessing legal porn sites.

However, the Supreme Court invited the government to either come up with a less drastic version of the law or go to trial to prove that the statute does not violate the First Amendment and is the only viable way to combat child porn.

As a result, government\l "l" lawyers\l "l" said in court papers they are developing a defense of the 1998 law based on the argument that it is far more effective than software filters in protecting children from porn. To back that claim, the government has subpoenaed search engines to develop a factual record of how often Web users encounter online porn and how Web searches turn up material they say is "harmful to minors."

The government indicated that other, unspecified search engines have agreed to release the information, but not Google.

"The production of those materials would be of significant assistance to the government's preparation of its defense of the constitutionality of this important statute," government\l "l" lawyers\l "l" wrote, noting that Google is the largest search engine.

Google has the largest share of Web searches with 46 percent, according to November 2005 figures from Nielsen/NetRatings. Yahoo is second with 23 percent, and MSN is third with 11 percent.

END

Inside the Pentagon

January 19, 2006

ANTHRAX SHOT PLAINTIFFS ALLEGE AGENCIES HOPE TO 'MANIPULATE' COURT

Defense Department personnel challenging the Pentagon's anthrax vaccine program are alleging the Bush administration is attempting to "manipulate" the U.S. Court of Appeals as it reviews a lower court decision that found the involuntary inoculation effort "illegal."

The Food and Drug Administration issued a final rule and order on Dec. 19 that certified use of the vaccine to protect against anthrax, regardless of whether the disease is contracted through the air -- as anticipated in a bioterror attack -- or through the skin or digestive system (Inside the Pentagon, Dec. 22, 2005, p1). Justice\l "l" Department\l "l" lawyers followed up two days later with a brief filed to the appeals court in Washington, arguing the FDA action suggests the lower decision should be reversed or at least declared moot (ITP, Jan. 5, p1).

But the timing of the FDA's anthrax vaccine certification last month indicates administration officials are "attempting to orchestrate the course of litigation through their ability to act as government regulators," asserts a document the complainants filed to the appeals court last week. Given that the FDA's Dec. 19 order is not part of the administration's May 2005 appeal to the higher court, "the court should reject this attempt by the government to put inadmissible material before the court in an effort to bolster its unsustainable case," the plaintiffs argue in their Jan. 13 brief.

When U.S. District Court Judge Emmet Sullivan banned the mandatory anthrax shots program in October 2004, more than 1 million military personnel had received the vaccine.

Six anonymous DOD personnel subject to orders to take the shots filed the lawsuit in March 2003, arguing the vaccine had not been certified by the FDA and, as such, was "investigational." Title 10 of the U.S. Code -- the law that governs the armed services -- says uncertified vaccines can be given to service members only with their informed consent or following a presidential waiver.

Sullivan agreed in summary judgment for the plaintiffs that the FDA had not followed its own rules and had failed to properly certify the anthrax vaccine. Pending a public comment period, agency review and a new final rule and order -- which has since taken place over the past year -- the federal judge issued a permanent injunction against the Pentagon effort to issue involuntary anthrax shots.

Citing the terms of a newer law, the 2004 Project BioShield Act, the administration last May restarted the Pentagon shots program, but solely on a voluntary basis (ITP, May 5, 2005, p5). Later in the month, the government appealed Sullivan's 2004 decision to the higher court (ITP, May 19, 2005, p1).

Plaintiffs say the extent to which the FDA's new anthrax vaccine certification makes the case before the appeals court moot "is the direct result of unilateral action by the losing parties -- the FDA and DOD -- in a clear effort to short-circuit further appellate review," according to their brief last week. The two agencies "have acted in concert to shape the regulatory landscape in a way benefiting their litigation position," according to the complainants.

Critics have a different take on the timing of the new FDA order.

"That's a little bit cheeky" of the plaintiffs to expect the FDA to do anything other than implement the certification process Sullivan ordered in his 2004 decision, says Brian Boyle, who served until last March as the Justice\l "l" Department's\l "l" lead attorney on the anthrax vaccine case.

FDA published its final rule and order "as quickly as possible after it listened to this court's questions and comments at oral argument on Dec. 1, 2005," the brief alleges. Plaintiffs say the FDA action "is simply an echo" of the agency's first attempt to publish such an order just eight days after Sullivan issued a temporary restraining order against the inoculation program in December 2003, an FDA decree the judge later found to be invalid.

The plaintiffs' new brief was filed in response to the government's Dec. 21 motion to the appeals court to govern the proceedings in light of the FDA's implementation of the court-ordered review process.

Noting they agree with the administration that the FDA action does not moot all of the issues on appeal, "the court should deny the appellant's motion, rule on the merits of the appeal, or remand the case back to the district court for a determination of whether the matter is now moot," argue the plaintiffs. The latter option "would take advantage of the considerable expertise gained by the district court" during initial litigation, the brief states.

An appeals court decision to vacate Sullivan's decision would virtually wipe away from the books the judge's finding that the Pentagon's anthrax vaccine program was illegal from its May 1998 inception through the October 2004 injunction, according to experts.

Even if the FDA order moots the current court case, plaintiffs thus hope the appeals court will find the district judge's findings to have been correct at the time.

Hundreds of service members have faced court-martial or administrative discipline for refusing anthrax shots during that period. If Sullivan's finding stands that the involuntary shots were illegal, that may significantly strengthen the cases of many military personnel who claim they were lawfully disobeying an illegal order to take the vaccine, according to expert observers.

"FDA's actions, which were specifically directed by the district court's order and judgment, cannot retroactively alter the status of the vaccine as determined by the district court in December 2003 and October 2004," the plaintiffs' brief argues.

But the government, in appealing Sullivan's decision, asserts the Pentagon's shots program has been legal throughout, and that the new FDA ruling was necessary only to convince the court of the agency's longstanding position that the anthrax vaccine was, in fact, approved.

"If the Court of Appeals doesn't reach the merits of the case due to the injunction having become moot, vacatur of Judge Sullivan's judgment and injunction would be highly appropriate, [or] else a fundamentally flawed ruling . . . would evade review and remain on the books," Boyle, now with the law firm O'Melveny and Myers in Washington, told ITP this week. "Mere dismissal of the appeal would be improper, since there is still a live dispute as to whether DOD was lawfully using the vaccine prior to the most recent FDA approval." -- Elaine M. Grossman

END

New York Times

January 19, 2006

Editorial: The Assisted-Suicide Decision

The Supreme Court smacked former Attorney General John Ashcroft and the Bush administration when it ruled 6 to 3 that the Justice Department had gone beyond its authority in trying to undermine an assisted-suicide law in Oregon. The only disquieting note was that the new chief justice, John Roberts Jr., who had assured senators that he believed people had "the right to be let alone," nevertheless joined the dissenters in arguing that the federal government had the power to block Oregon's pioneering effort to let terminally ill patients end their own lives humanely.

The decision was notable because it rejected Mr. Ashcroft's attempt to impose his religiously conservative ideology on a state whose voters had decided differently. Oregon's law allowing physician-assisted suicide was approved narrowly in 1994 and reaffirmed by a thumping 60 to 40 percent vote three years later. Congressional conservatives, including Mr. Ashcroft when he was a senator, failed to push through a federal law to overturn it.

So when Mr. Ashcroft became attorney general in 2001, he simply declared that the federal Controlled Substances Act gave him the authority to prevent doctors from prescribing lethal drugs for the purpose of suicide. That position had been rejected by the Clinton administration, and Mr. Ashcroft issued his own directive without consulting Oregon or apparently anyone else outside his own department. His successor, Alberto Gonzales, embraced this power grab.

The Supreme Court concluded that Mr. Ashcroft had overreached when he ruled that physician-assisted suicide was not a "legitimate medical purpose" that would allow doctors to prescribe lethal drugs under the Controlled Substances Act. That act was intended to thwart drug abuse and trafficking, not to punish doctors who prescribed medicines in accord with state law. The majority found that Congress had not intended to pre-empt the state regulation of medical practice or to give a single executive branch officer the power to define standards of medical practice.

Congressional conservatives are already vowing to push through a law barring assisted suicide. After the sorry display of pandering during the Terri Schiavo tragedy, no one can bet that they won't succeed this time. But our own sense is that Oregon has acted with exquisite care by requiring that two doctors agree that a patient is likely to die within six months, and is well informed and acting voluntarily, before lethal drugs can be prescribed. Congress would be wise not to meddle in a sensitive issue that Oregon has clearly studied far more closely.

END

Pittsburgh Tribune -Review

1/19/06

Editorial: Double trouble

PennDOT has forced Pennsylvanians to play the role of Ricky Ricardo in "I Love Lucy" whenever they demand answers from their hopelessly dysfunctional and duplicitous state transportation agency. If only a simple "Lucy, you got some 'splainin' to do" would cause PennDOT to be forthcoming.

But the Trib had to file a challenge under the state's Right-to-Know law before PennDOT disclosed it settled a whistle-blower lawsuit for $500,000 -- half-a-million dollars.

Bill Arnold, a former construction manager, claimed consultants overbilled PennDOT by hundreds of thousands of dollars with the approval of agency managers whom the consultants shamelessly wined and dined.

Presumably state Auditor General Jack Wagner will not ignore the public's right to know after completion of a pending investigation into the overbilling allegations in PennDOT's District 11 office.

But the right to know is not limited to PennDOT.

Mr. Arnold has filed another lawsuit under the federal False Claims Act because the U.S. Department of Transportation did not bother to investigate his allegations about bilking even though federal money was involved. Arnold -- who essentially is forcing the federal government to do its job -- would be entitled up to 25 percent of any proceeds.

Everyone has the right to know why taxpayers must force both agencies to be accountable.

END

Gorsuch, Neil M

From: Gorsuch, Neil M
Sent: Thursday, January 19, 2006 1:57 PM
To: Khan, Omar
Subject: RE: Any Problems with Outlook today?

Started up this am and had same problem. As before, after a few mins and a few diff tries to log on, however, I was able to get email.

From: Khan, Omar
Sent: Thursday, January 19, 2006 11:09 AM
To: Gorsuch, Neil M
Subject: Any Problems with Outlook today?

Omar Khan
Sr. Systems Engineer
SMO-JMD Server/Ops
PHB RM 4519
[redacted]

Hart, Rosemary

From:	Hart, Rosemary
Sent:	Friday, January 20, 2006 3:04 PM
To:	Sobota, Luke; Jones, Kevin R
Cc:	Gorsuch, Neil M; Marshall, C. Kevin
Subject:	Fw: Request for Comment on the Office of Management and Budget's proposed executive order entitled "Further Amendment to Executive Order 12866 on Regulatory Planning and Review"
Attachments:	tmp.htm; ExecutiveOrderAmendments (1 20 06) (circulated draft).doc; EO12866 (with redlined changes by proposed eo).doc; view memo.form.doc

Luke and Kevin: The 12866 EO has arrived, with a one-week review period. As discussed, we want to make sure that we send this to all appropriate components. Because the issues likely will be more in the policy area, perhaps it would make sense for OLP to coordinate the policy comments but with OLC forwarding the agreed-upon comments in its role as usual point of contact for OMB. Could you work out a sensible distribution list? I am out for 2 weeks? Given the importance of this EO, we want to make sure this doesn't get bounced around too low in the bureaucracy.
Thanks!

Rosemary

Rosemary Hart
Special Counsel
Office of Legal Counsel
U.S. Department of Justice
[redacted]

-----Original Message-----
From: McGavock_D._Reed@omb.eop.gov <McGavock_D._Reed@omb.eop.gov>
To: Hart, Rosemary <Rosemary.Hart@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; [redacted]@dodgc.osd.mil <[redacted]@dodgc.osd.mil>; [redacted]@dodgc.osd.mil <[redacted]@dodgc.osd.mil>; State-LRM@state.gov <State-LRM@state.gov>; [redacted]@state.gov <[redacted]@state.gov>; [redacted]@do.treas.gov <[redacted]@do.treas.gov>; [redacted]@do.treas.gov [redacted]@do.treas.gov>; usdaobpaleg@obpa.usda.gov <usdaobpaleg@obpa.usda.gov>; [redacted]@doc.gov [redacted]@doc.gov>; redacted <[redacted]@dhs.gov>; [redacted]@mail.va.gov <[redacted]@mail.va.gov>; [redacted]@os.hhs.gov [redacted]@os.hhs.gov>; [redacted]@epamail.epa.gov [redacted]@epamail.epa.gov>; [redacted]@hud.gov <[redacted]@hud.gov>; [redacted]@ios.doi.gov <[redacted]@ios.doi.gov> [redacted]@dol.gov <[redacted]@dol.gov>; [redacted]@ost.dot.gov <[redacted]@ost.dot.gov>; [redacted]@opm.gov <[redacted]@opm.gov>; [redacted]@ucia.gov <[redacted]@ucia.gov>; [redacted]@ed.gov <[redacted]@ed.gov>; [redacted]@hq.doe.gov <[redacted]@hq.doe.gov> [redacted]@hq.nasa.gov [redacted]@hq.nasa.gov>; ca.legislation@gsa.gov <ca.legislation@gsa.gov>; [redacted]@sba.gov <[redacted]@sba.gov>
CC: Raul_F._Yanes@omb.eop.gov <Raul_F._Yanes@omb.eop.gov>; Steven_D._Aitken@omb.eop.gov <Steven_D._Aitken@omb.eop.gov>; Paul_R._Noe@omb.eop.gov <Paul_R._Noe@omb.eop.gov>;

John_Graham@omb.eop.gov <John_Graham@omb.eop.gov>; Donald_R._Arbuckle@omb.eop.gov <Donald_R._Arbuckle@omb.eop.gov>; Elizabeth_L._Branch@omb.eop.gov <Elizabeth_L._Branch@omb.eop.gov>; Robert_F._Hoyt@who.eop.gov <Robert_F._Hoyt@who.eop.gov>
Sent: Fri Jan 20 14:47:05 2006
Subject: Request for Comment on the Office of Management and Budget's proposed executive order entitled "Further Amendment to Executive Order 12866 on Regulatory Planning and Review"

To all:

Attached for comment is the Office of Management and Budget's proposed executive order entitled "Further Amendment to Executive Order 12866 on Regulatory Planning and Review."

On behalf of the Director of the Office of Management and Budget, this office is collecting input on this proposal. Please communicate any comments or objections to Mr. Mac Reed (e-mail: McGavock_D._Reed@omb.eop.gov; phone (202) 395-3563; fax (202) 395-7294) and copy Ms. Bess Weaver (e-mail: Bessie M. Weaver@omb.eop.gov <mailto:Bessie%20M.%20Weaver@omb.eop.gov> ; phone (202) 395-3556; fax (202) 395-7289) by cob, Friday, January 27, 2006. Please be advised that agencies not responding by that date will be recorded as not objecting to this proposal.

For your reviewing convenience, we have also attached a copy of Executive Order 12866 that shows the changes to be made by the proposed order in redline.

We have also attached a copy of the request for views memorandum and distribution list. (Please see Distribution List I.)

Thank you very much, Mac Reed

Executive Order 12866 of September 30, 1993, as further amended

Regulatory Planning and Review

The American people deserve a regulatory system that works for them, not against them: a regulatory system that protects and improves their health, safety, environment, and well-being and improves the performance of the economy without imposing unacceptable or unreasonable costs on society; regulatory policies that recognize that the private sector and private markets are the best engine for economic growth; regulatory approaches that respect the role of State, local, and tribal governments; and regulations that are effective, consistent, sensible, and understandable. We do not have such a regulatory system today.

With this Executive order, the Federal Government begins a program to reform and make more efficient the regulatory process. The objectives of this Executive order are to enhance planning and coordination with respect to both new and existing regulations; to reaffirm the primacy of Federal agencies in the regulatory decision-making process; to restore the integrity and legitimacy of regulatory review and oversight; and to make the process more accessible and open to the public. In pursuing these objectives, the regulatory process shall be conducted so as to meet applicable statutory requirements and with due regard to the discretion that has been entrusted to the Federal agencies.

Accordingly, by the authority vested in me as President by the Constitution and the laws of the United States of America, it is hereby ordered as follows:

Section 1. Statement of Regulatory Philosophy and Principles.

(a) The Regulatory Philosophy. Federal agencies should promulgate only such regulations as are required by law, are necessary to interpret the law, or are made necessary by compelling public need, such as material failures of private markets to protect or improve the health and safety of the public, the environment, or the well-being of the American p eople. In deciding whether and how to regulate, agencies should assess all costs and benefits of available regulatory alternatives, including the alternative of not regulating. Costs and benefits shall be understood to include both quantifiable measures (to the fullest extent that these can be usefully estimated) and qualitative measures of costs and benefits that are difficult to quantify, but nevertheless essential to consider. Further, in choosing among alternative regulatory approaches, agencies should select those approaches that maximize net benefits (including potential economic, environmental, public health and safety, and other advantages; distributive impacts; and equity), unless a statute requires another regulatory approach.

(b) The Principles of Regulation. To ensure that the agencies' regulatory programs are consistent with the philosophy set forth above, agencies should adhere to the following principles, to the extent permitted by law and where applicable:

(1) Each agency shall identify the problem that it intends to address (including, where applicable, the failures of private markets or public institutions that warrant new agency action) as well as assess the significance of that problem.

(2) Each agency shall examine whether existing regulations (or other law) have created, or contributed to, the problem that a new regulation is intended to correct and whether those regulations (or other law) should be modified to achieve the intended goal of regulation more effectively.

DOJ_NMG_0009761

(3) Each agency shall identify and assess available alternatives to direct regulation, including providing economic incentives to encourage the desired behavior, such as user fees or marketable permits, or providing information upon which choices can be made by the public.

(4) In setting regulatory priorities, each agency shall consider, to the extent reasonable, the degree and nature of the risks posed by various substances or activities within its jurisdiction.

(5) When an agency determines that a regulation is the best available method of achieving the regulatory objective, it shall design its regulations in the most cost-effective manner to achieve the regulatory objective. In doing so, each agency shall consider incentives for innovation, consistency, predictability, the costs of enforcement and compliance (to the government, regulated entities, and the public), flexibility, distributive impacts, and equity.

(6) Each agency shall assess both the costs and the benefits of the intended regulation and, recognizing that some costs and benefits are difficult to quantify, propose or adopt a regulation only upon a reasoned determination that the benefits of the intended regulation justify its costs.

(7) Each agency shall base its decisions on the best reasonably obtainable scientific, technical, economic, and other information concerning the need for, and consequences of, the intended regulation or guidance.

(8) Each agency shall identify and assess alternative forms of regulation and shall, to the extent feasible, specify performance objectives, rather than specifying the behavior or manner of compliance that regulated entities must adopt.

(9) Wherever feasible, agencies shall seek views of appropriate State, local, and tribal officials before imposing regulatory requirements that might significantly or uniquely affect those governmental entities. Each agency shall assess the effects of Federal regulations on State, local, and tribal governments, including specifically the availability of resources to carry out those mandates, and seek to minimize those burdens that uniquely or significantly affect such governmental entities, consistent with achieving regulatory objectives. In addition, as appropriate, agencies shall seek to harmonize Federal regulatory actions with related State, local, and tribal regulatory and other governmental functions.

(10) Each agency shall avoid regulations and guidances that are inconsistent, incompatible, or duplicative with its other regulations and guidances or those of other Federal agencies.

(11) Each agency shall tailor its regulations and guidances to impose the least burden on society, including individuals, businesses of differing sizes, and other entities (including small communities and governmental entities), consistent with obtaining the regulatory objectives, taking into account, among other things, and to the extent practicable, the costs of cumulative regulations.

(12) Each agency shall draft its regulations and guidances to be simple and easy to understand, with the goal of minimizing the potential for uncertainty and litigation arising from such uncertainty.

Sec. 2. Organization. An efficient regulatory planning and review process is vital to ensure that the Federal Government's regulatory system best serves the American people.

(a) The Agencies. Because Federal agencies are the repositories of significant substantive expertise and experience, they are responsible for developing regulations and guidances and assuring that they are consistent with applicable law, the President's priorities, and the principles set forth in this Executive order.

DOJ_NMG_0009762

(b) The Office of Management and Budget. Coordinated review of agency rulemaking is necessary to ensure that regulations and guidances are consistent with applicable law, the President's priorities, and the principles set forth in this Executive order, and that decisions made by one agency do not conflict with the policies or actions taken or planned by another agency. The Office of Management and Budget (OMB) shall carry out that review function. Within OMB, the Office of Information and Regulatory Affairs (OIRA) is the repository of expertise concerning regulatory issues, including methodologies and procedures that affect more than one agency, this Executive order, and the President's regulatory policies. To the extent permitted by law, OMB shall provide guidance to agencies and assist the President and regulatory policy advisors to the President in regulatory planning and shall be the entity that reviews individual regulations and guidances, as provided by this Executive order.

(c) Assistance. In fulfilling his responsibilities under this Executive order, the President shall be assisted by the regulatory policy advisors within the Executive Office of the President and by such agency officials and personnel as the President may, from time to time, consult.

Sec. 3. Definitions. For purposes of this Executive order: (a) "Advisors" refers to such regulatory policy advisors to the President as the President may from time to time consult, including, among others: (1) the Director of OMB; (2) the Chair (or another member) of the Council of Economic Advisers; (3) the Assistant to the President for Economic Policy; (4) the Assistant to the President for Domestic Policy; (5) the Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs; (6) the Director of the Office of Science and Technology Policy; (7) the Deputy Assistant to the President and Director for Intergovernmental Affairs; (8) the Assistant to the President and Staff Secretary; (9) the Assistant to the President and Chief of Staff to the Vice President; (10) the Assistant to the President and Counsel to the President; (11) the Chairman of the Council on Environmental Quality and Director of the Office on Environmental Quality; (12) the Assistant to the President for Homeland Security; and (13) the Administrator of OIRA, who also shall coordinate communications relating to this Executive order among the agencies, OMB, the other Advisors, and the Office of the Vice President.

(b) "Agency," unless otherwise indicated, means any authority of the United States that is an "agency" under 44 U.S.C. 3502(1), other than those considered to be independent regulatory agencies, as defined in 44 U.S.C. 3502(10).

(c) "Director" means the Director of OMB.

(d) "Regulation" or "rule" means an agency statement of general applicability and future effect, which the agency intends to have the force and effect of law, that is designed to implement, interpret, or prescribe law or policy or to describe the procedure or practice requirements of an agency. It does not, however, include:

(1) Regulations or rules issued in accordance with the formal rulemaking provisions of 5 U.S.C. 556, 557;

(2) Regulations or rules that pertain to a military or foreign affairs function of the United States, other than procurement regulations and regulations involving the import or export of non-defense articles and services;

(3) Regulations or rules that are limited to agency organization, management, or personnel matters; or

DOJ_NMG_0009763

(4) Any other category of regulations exempted by the Administrator of OIRA.

(e) "Regulatory action" means any substantive action by an agency (normally published in the Federal Register) that promulgates or is expected to lead to the promulgation of a final rule or regulation, including notices of inquiry, advance notices of proposed rulemaking, and notices of proposed rulemaking.

(f) "Significant regulatory action" means any regulatory action that is likely to result in a rule that may:

(1) Have an annual effect on the economy of $100 million or more or adversely affect in a material way the economy, a sector of the economy, productivity, competition, jobs, the environment, public health or safety, or State, local, or tribal governments or communities;

(2) Create a serious inconsistency or otherwise interfere with an action taken or planned by another agency;

(3) Materially alter the budgetary impact of entitlements, grants, user fees, or loan programs or the rights and obligations of recipients thereof; or

(4) Raise novel legal or policy issues arising out of legal mandates, the President's priorities, or the principles set forth in this Executive order.

(g) “Significant guidance” means an agency statement of general applicability and future effect, other than a regulation required by statute to be published for notice and comment, prepared for regulated entities or the general public to describe the agency’s interpretation of or policy on a statutory, regulatory or technical issue that may:

(1) Reasonably be anticipated to lead to an annual effect of $100 million or more or adversely affect in a material way the economy, a sector of the economy, productivity, competition, jobs, the environment, public health or safety, or State, local, or tribal governments or communities;

(2) Create a serious inconsistency or otherwise interfere with an action taken or planned by another agency;

(3) Materially alter the budgetary impact of entitlements, grants, user fees, or loan programs or the rights or obligations of recipients thereof; or

(4) Raise novel legal or policy issues arising out of legal mandates, the President’s priorities, or the principles set forth in this Executive order. It does not, however, include:

(A) Guidance on regulations or rules issued in accordance with the formal rulemaking provisions of 5 U.S.C. 556, 557;

(B) Guidances that pertain to a military or foreign affairs function of the United States, other than procurement regulations and regulations involving the import or export of non-defense articles and services;

(C) Guidances on regulations or rules that are limited to agency organization, management, or personnel matters; or

(D) Any other category of guidances exempted by the Administrator of OIRA.

DOJ_NMG_0009764

Sec. 4. Planning Mechanism. In order to have an effective regulatory program, to provide for coordination of regulations, to maximize consultation and the resolution of potential conflicts at an early stage, to involve the public and its State, local, and tribal officials in regulatory planning, and to ensure that new or revised regulations promote the President's priorities and the principles set forth in this Executive order, these procedures shall be followed, to the extent permitted by law:

(a) Agencies' Policy Meeting. Early in each year's planning cycle, the Director shall convene a meeting of the Advisors and the heads of agencies to seek a common understanding of priorities and to coordinate regulatory efforts to be accomplished in the upcoming year.

(b) Unified Regulatory Agenda. For purposes of this subsection, the term "agency" or "agencies" shall also include those considered to be independent regulatory agencies, as defined in 44 U.S.C. 3502(10). Each agency shall prepare an agenda of all regulations under development or review, at a time and in a manner specified by the Administrator of OIRA. The description of each regulatory action shall contain, at a minimum, a regulation identifier number, a brief summary of the action, the legal authority for the action, any legal deadline for the action, and the name and telephone number of a knowledgeable agency official. Agencies may incorporate the information required under 5 U.S.C. 602 and 41 U.S.C. 402 into these agendas.

(c) The Regulatory Plan. For purposes of this subsection, the term "agency" or "agencies" shall also include those considered to be independent regulatory agencies, as defined in 44 U.S.C. 3502(10). (1) As part of the Unified Regulatory Agenda, beginning in 1994, each agency shall prepare a Regulatory Plan (Plan) of the most important significant regulatory actions that the agency reasonably expects to issue in proposed or final form in that fiscal year or thereafter. The Plan shall be approved personally by the agency head and shall contain at a minimum:

(A) A statement of the agency's regulatory objectives and priorities and how they relate to the President's priorities;

(B) A summary of each planned significant regulatory action including, to the extent possible, alternatives to be considered and preliminary estimates of the anticipated costs and benefits;

(C) A summary of the legal basis for each such action, including whether any aspect of the action is required by statute or court order;

(D) A statement of the need for each such action and, if applicable, how the action will reduce risks to public health, safety, or the environment, as well as how the magnitude of the risk addressed by the action relates to other risks within the jurisdiction of the agency;

(E) The agency's schedule for action, including a statement of any applicable statutory or judicial deadlines; and

(F) The name, address, and telephone number of a person the public may contact for additional information about the planned regulatory action.

(2) Each agency shall forward its Plan to OIRA by June 1st of each year.

(3) Within 10 calendar days after OIRA has received an agency's Plan, OIRA shall circulate it to other affected agencies and the Advisors.

DOJ_NMG_0009765

(4) An agency head who believes that a planned regulatory action of another agency may conflict with its own policy or action taken or planned shall promptly notify, in writing, the Administrator of OIRA, who shall forward that communication to the issuing agency and the Advisors.

(5) If the Administrator of OIRA believes that a planned regulatory action of an agency may be inconsistent with the President's priorities or the principles set forth in this Executive order or may be in conflict with any policy or action taken or planned by another agency, the Administrator of OIRA shall promptly notify, in writing, the affected agencies and the Advisors.

(6) The Director may consult with the heads of agencies with respect to their Plans and, in appropriate instances, request further consideration or inter-agency coordination.

(7) The Plans developed by the issuing agency shall be published annually in the October publication of the Unified Regulatory Agenda. This publication shall be made available to the Congress; State, local, and tribal governments; and the public. Any views on any aspect of any agency Plan, including whether any planned regulatory action might conflict with any other planned or existing regulation, impose any unintended consequences on the public, or confer any unclaimed benefits on the public, should be directed to the issuing agency, with a copy to OIRA.

(d) Regulatory Working Group. Within 30 days of the date of this Executive order, the Administrator of OIRA shall convene a Regulatory Working Group ("Working Group"), which shall consist of representatives of the heads of each agency that the Administrator determines to have significant domestic regulatory responsibility and the Advisors. The Administrator of OIRA shall chair the Working Group and shall periodically advise the Director on the activities of the Working Group. The Working Group shall serve as a forum to assist agencies in identifying and analyzing important regulatory issues (including, among others (1) the development of innovative regulatory techniques, (2) the methods, efficacy, and utility of comparative risk assessment in regulatory decision-making, and (3) the development of short forms and other streamlined regulatory approaches for small businesses and other entities). The Working Group shall meet at least quarterly and may meet as a whole or in subgroups of agencies with an interest in particular issues or subject areas. To inform its discussions, the Working Group may commission analytical studies and reports by OIRA, the Administrative Conference of the United States, or any other agency.

(e) Conferences. The Administrator of OIRA shall meet quarterly with representatives of State, local, and tribal governments to identify both existing and proposed regulations that may uniquely or significantly affect those governmental entities. The Administrator of OIRA shall also convene, from time to time, conferences with representatives of businesses, nongovernmental organizations, and the public to discuss regulatory issues of common concern.

Sec. 5. Existing Regulations. In order to reduce the regulatory burden on the American people, their families, their communities, their State, local, and tribal governments, and their industries; to determine whether regulations promulgated by the executive branch of the Federal Government have become unjustified or unnecessary as a result of changed circumstances; to confirm that regulations are both compatible with each other and not duplicative or inappropriately burdensome in the aggregate; to ensure that all regulations are consistent with the President's priorities and the principles set forth in this Executive order, within applicable law; and to otherwise improve the effectiveness of existing regulations: (a) Within 90 days of the date of this Executive order, each agency shall submit to OIRA a program, consistent with its resources and regulatory priorities, under which the agency will periodically review its existing significant regulations to determine whether any such regulations should be modified or eliminated so as to make the agency's regulatory program more effective in achieving the regulatory objectives, less burdensome, or in greater alignment with the President's priorities and the principles set forth in this Executive order. Any significant regulations selected for review shall be included in the agency's annual Plan. The agency shall also identify any legislative mandates that require the agency to promulgate or continue to impose regulations that the agency believes are unnecessary or outdated by reason of changed circumstances.

DOJ_NMG_0009766

(b) The Administrator of OIRA shall work with the Regulatory Working Group and other interested entities to pursue the objectives of this section. State, local, and tribal governments are specifically encouraged to assist in the identification of regulations that impose significant or unique burdens on those governmental entities and that appear to have outlived their justification or be otherwise inconsistent with the public interest.

(c) The Director, in consultation with the Advisors, may identify for review by the appropriate agency or agencies other existing regulations of an agency or groups of regulations of more than one agency that affect a particular group, industry, or sector of the economy, or may identify legislative mandates that may be appropriate for reconsideration by the Congress.

(d) For each rule with an annual effect of $1 billion or more, the agency shall provide for a reassessment of the benefits and costs of the rule, including a validity analysis comparing those impacts to the costs and benefits estimated for the rule when it originally was promulgated, the earlier of –

(1) 5 years after the effective date of a rule issued on or after January 1, 2006, or

(2) upon review of a rule issued before January 1, 2006, pursuant to a statute, Executive order, or other requirement.

Sec. 6. Centralized Review of Regulations. The guidelines set forth below shall apply to all regulatory actions, for both new and existing regulations, by agencies other than those agencies specifically exempted by the Administrator of OIRA:

(a) Agency Responsibilities. (1) Each agency shall (consistent with its own rules, regulations, or procedures) provide the public with meaningful participation in the regulatory process. In particular, before issuing a notice of proposed rulemaking, each agency should, where appropriate, seek the involvement of those who are intended to benefit from and those expected to be burdened by any regulation (including, specifically, State, local, and tribal officials). In addition, each agency should afford the public a meaningful opportunity to comment on any proposed regulation, which in most cases should include a comment period of not less than 60 days. Each agency also is directed to explore and, where appropriate, use consensual mechanisms for developing regulations, including negotiated rulemaking.

(2) Within 60 days of the date of this Executive order, each agency head shall designate a Regulatory Policy Officer who shall report to the agency head. The Regulatory Policy Officer shall be involved at each stage of the regulatory process to foster the development of effective, innovative, and least burdensome regulations and to further the principles set forth in this Executive order.

(3) In addition to adhering to its own rules and procedures and to the requirements of the Administrative Procedure Act, the Regulatory Flexibility Act, the Paperwork Reduction Act, and other applicable law, each agency shall develop its regulatory actions in a timely fashion and adhere to the following procedures with respect to a regulatory action:

(A) Each agency shall provide OIRA, at such times and in the manner specified by the Administrator of OIRA, with a list of its planned regulatory actions, indicating those which the agency believes are significant regulatory actions within the meaning of this Executive order. Absent a material change in the development of the planned regulatory action, those not designated as significant will not be subject to review under this section unless, within 10 working days of receipt of the list, the Administrator of OIRA notifies the agency that OIRA has determined that a planned regulation is a significant regulatory action within the meaning of this Executive order. The Administrator of OIRA may waive review of any planned regulatory action designated by the agency as significant, in which case the agency need not further comply with subsection (a)(3)(B) or subsection (a)(3)(C) of this section.

DOJ_NMG_0009767

(B) For each matter identified as, or determined by the Administrator of OIRA to be, a significant regulatory action, the issuing agency shall provide to OIRA:

(i) The text of the draft regulatory action, together with a reasonably detailed description of the need for the regulatory action and an explanation of how the regulatory action will meet that need; and

(ii) An assessment of the potential costs and benefits of the regulatory action, including an explanation of the manner in which the regulatory action is consistent with a statutory mandate and, to the extent permitted by law, promotes the President's priorities and avoids undue interference with State, local, and tribal governments in the exercise of their governmental functions.

(C) For those matters identified as, or determined by the Administrator of OIRA to be, a significant regulatory action within the scope of section 3(f)(1), the agency shall also provide to OIRA the following additional information developed as part of the agency's decision-making process (unless prohibited by law):

(i) An assessment, including the underlying analysis, of benefits anticipated from the regulatory action (such as, but not limited to, the promotion of the efficient functioning of the economy and private markets, the enhancement of health and safety, the protection of the natural environment, and the elimination or reduction of discrimination or bias) together with, to the extent feasible, a quantification of those benefits;

(ii) An assessment, including the underlying analysis, of costs anticipated from the regulatory action (such as, but not limited to, the direct cost both to the government in administering the regulation and to businesses and others in complying with the regulation, and any adverse effects on the efficient functioning of the economy, private markets (including productivity, employment, and competitiveness), health, safety, and the natural environment), together with, to the extent feasible, a quantification of those costs; and

(iii) An assessment, including the underlying analysis, of costs and benefits of potentially effective and reasonably feasible alternatives to the planned regulation, identified by the agencies or the public (including improving the current regulation and reasonably viable nonregulatory actions), and an explanation why the planned regulatory action is preferable to the identified potential alternatives.

(D) In emergency situations or when an agency is obligated by law to act more quickly than normal review procedures allow, the agency shall notify OIRA as soon as possible and, to the extent practicable, comply with subsections (a)(3)(B) and (C) of this section. For those regulatory actions that are governed by a statutory or court-imposed deadline, the agency shall, to the extent practicable, schedule rulemaking proceedings so as to permit sufficient time for OIRA to conduct its review, as set forth below in subsection (b)(2) through (4) of this section.

(E) After the regulatory action has been published in the Federal Register or otherwise issued to the public, the agency shall:

DOJ_NMG_0009768

(i) Make available to the public the information set forth in subsections (a)(3)(B) and (C);

(ii) Identify for the public, in a complete, clear, and simple manner, the substantive changes between the draft submitted to OIRA for review and the action subsequently announced; and

(iii) Identify for the public those changes in the regulatory action that were made at the suggestion or recommendation of OIRA.

(F) All information provided to the public by the agency shall be in plain, understandable language.

(b) OIRA Responsibilities. The Administrator of OIRA shall provide meaningful guidance and oversight so that each agency's regulatory actions are consistent with applicable law, the President's priorities, and the principles set forth in this Executive order and do not conflict with the policies or actions of another agency. OIRA shall, to the extent permitted by law, adhere to the following guidelines:

(1) OIRA may review only actions identified by the agency or by OIRA as significant regulatory actions under subsection (a)(3)(A) of this section.

(2) OIRA shall waive review or notify the agency in writing of the results of its review within the following time periods:

(A) For any notices of inquiry, advance notices of proposed rulemaking, or other preliminary regulatory actions prior to a Notice of Proposed Rulemaking, within 10 working days after the date of submission of the draft action to OIRA;

(B) For all other regulatory actions, within 90 calendar days after the date of submission of the information set forth in subsections (a)(3)(B) and (C) of this section, unless OIRA has previously reviewed this information and, since that review, there has been no material change in the facts and circumstances upon which the regulatory action is based, in which case, OIRA shall complete its review within 45 days; and

(C) The review process may be extended (1) once by no more than 30 calendar days upon the written approval of the Director and (2) at the request of the agency head.

(3) For each regulatory action that the Administrator of OIRA returns to an agency for further consideration of some or all of its provisions, the Administrator of OIRA shall provide the issuing agency a written explanation for such return, setting forth the pertinent provision of this Executive order on which OIRA is relying. If the agency head disagrees with some or all of the bases for the return, the agency head shall so inform the Administrator of OIRA in writing.

(4) Except as otherwise provided by law or required by a Court, in order to ensure greater openness, accessibility, and accountability in the regulatory review process, OIRA shall be governed by the following disclosure requirements:

(A) Only the Administrator of OIRA (or a particular designee) shall receive oral communications initiated by persons not employed by the executive branch of the Federal Government regarding the substance of a regulatory action under OIRA review;

DOJ_NMG_0009769

(B) All substantive communications between OIRA personnel and persons not employed by the executive branch of the Federal Government regarding a regulatory action under review shall be governed by the following guidelines:

(i) A representative from the issuing agency shall be invited to any meeting between OIRA personnel and such person(s);

(ii) OIRA shall forward to the issuing agency, within 10 working days of receipt of the communication(s), all written communications, regardless of format, between OIRA personnel and any person who is not employed by the executive branch of the Federal Government, and the dates and names of individuals involved in all substantive oral communications (including meetings to which an agency representative was invited, but did not attend, and telephone conversations between OIRA personnel and any such persons); and

(iii) OIRA shall publicly disclose relevant information about such communication(s), as set forth below in subsection (b)(4)(C) of this section.

(C) OIRA shall maintain a publicly available log that shall contain, at a minimum, the following information pertinent to regulatory actions under review:

(i) The status of all regulatory actions, including if (and if so, when and by whom) Presidential consideration was requested;

(ii) A notation of all written communications forwarded to an issuing agency under subsection (b)(4)(B)(ii) of this section; and

(iii) The dates and names of individuals involved in all substantive oral communications, including meetings and telephone conversations, between OIRA personnel and any person not employed by the executive branch of the Federal Government, and the subject matter discussed during such communications.

(D) After the regulatory action has been published in the Federal Register or otherwise issued to the public, or after the agency has announced its decision not to publish or issue the regulatory action, OIRA shall make available to the public all documents exchanged between OIRA and the agency during the review by OIRA under this section.

(5) All information provided to the public by OIRA shall be in plain, understandable language.

Sec. 7. Additional Agency Responsibilities. Each agency shall notify OMB of significant agency activities that may substantially affect regulatory policy in the following circumstances and manner:

(a) Significant Guidances. Each agency shall provide OIRA, at such times and in the manner specified by the Administrator of OIRA, with a list of its planned significant guidances. Upon the request of the Administrator, the issuing agency shall provide to OIRA the text of a draft agency action identified as, or determined by the Administrator to be, a significant guidance, together with a brief explanation of the need for the guidance and how it will meet that need.

(b) Consent Decrees and Settlements. Before a rulemaking agency enters into a proposed consent decree, settlement, or other judicial action that would impose requirements on a rulemaking agency that could reasonably be expected to lead to a significant regulatory action or a significant guidance document, the agency (before the agency agrees to the proposal) shall timely submit to the

DOJ_NMG_0009770

Department of Justice and OMB a written description of the proposal, including an assessment of how the action is consistent with applicable statutes, the principles of this Order, and the President's priorities. After such consent decree, settlement, or other judicial action is finalized and becomes public information, the agency shall publish a notice describing it in the Federal Register and make the document available to the public.

Sec. 8. Resolution of Conflicts.

(a) To the extent permitted by law, disagreements or conflicts between or among agency heads or between OMB and any agency that cannot be resolved by the Administrator of OIRA shall be resolved by the President, with the assistance of the Chief of Staff to the President ("Chief of Staff"), with the relevant agency head (and, as appropriate, other interested government officials). Presidential consideration of such disagreements may be initiated only by the Director, by the head of the issuing agency, or by the head of an agency that has a significant interest in the regulatory action at issue. Such review will not be undertaken at the request of other persons, entities, or their agents.

(b) Resolution of such conflicts shall be informed by recommendations developed by the Chief of Staff, after consultation with the Advisors (and other executive branch officials or personnel whose responsibilities to the President include the subject matter at issue). The development of these recommendations shall be concluded within 60 days after review has been requested.

(c) During the Presidential review period, communications with any person not employed by the Federal Government relating to the substance of the regulatory action under review and directed to the Advisors or their staffs or to the staff of the Chief of Staff shall be in writing and shall be forwarded by the recipient to the affected agency(ies) for inclusion in the public docket(s). When the communication is not in writing, such Advisors or staff members shall inform the outside party that the matter is under review and that any comments should be submitted in writing.

(d) At the end of this review process, the President, or the Chief of Staff acting at the request of the President, shall notify the affected agency and the Administrator of OIRA of the President's decision with respect to the matter.

Sec. 9. Publication. Except to the extent required by law, an agency shall not publish in the Federal Register or otherwise issue to the public any regulatory action that is subject to review under section 6 of this Executive order until (1) the Administrator of OIRA notifies the agency that OIRA has waived its review of the action or has completed its review without any requests for further consideration, or (2) the applicable time period in section 6(b)(2) expires without OIRA having notified the agency that it is returning the regulatory action for further consideration under section 6(b)(3), whichever occurs first. If the terms of the preceding sentence have not been satisfied and an agency wants to publish or otherwise issue a regulatory action, the head of that agency may request Presidential consideration through the Director, as provided under section 7 of this order. Upon receipt of this request, the Director shall notify OIRA and the Advisors. The guidelines and time period set forth in section 7 shall apply to the publication of regulatory actions for which Presidential consideration has been sought.

Sec. 10. Agency Authority. Nothing in this order shall be construed as displacing the agencies' authority or responsibilities, as authorized by law.

Sec. 11. Judicial Review. Nothing in this Executive order shall affect any otherwise available judicial review of agency action. This Executive order is intended only to improve the internal management of the Federal Government and does not create any right or benefit, substantive or procedural, enforceable at law or equity by a party against the United States, its agencies or instrumentalities, its officers or employees, or any other person.

DOJ_NMG_0009771

Sec. 12. Revocations. Executive Orders Nos. 12291 and 12498; all amendments to those Executive orders; all guidelines issued under those orders; and any exemptions from those orders heretofore granted for any category of rule are revoked.

DOJ_NMG_0009772

Draft 1/20/06
1:15 p.m.

Executive Order

- - - - - -

FURTHER AMENDMENT TO EXECUTIVE ORDER 12866 ON REGULATORY PLANNING AND REVIEW

By the authority vested in me as President by the Constitution and laws of the United States of America, it is hereby ordered that Executive Order 12866, of September 30, 1993, as amended, is further amended as follows:

Section 1. Section 1 is amended by:

(a) inserting in Section 1(b)(7) after "regulation" the words "or guidance".

(b) inserting in Section 1(b)(10) in both places after "regulations" the words "and guidances".

(c) inserting in Section1(b)(11) after "its regulations" the words "and guidances".

(d) inserting in Section 1(b)(12) after "regulations" the words "and guidances".

Sec. 2. Section 2 is amended by:

(a) inserting in Section 2(a) after "developing regulations" the words "and guidances".

(b) striking in Section 2(a) "the regulations" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "they".

(c) inserting in Section 2(b) in both places after "regulations" the words "and guidances".

Sec. 3. Section 3 is amended by inserting after Section 3(f) the following:

"(g) "Significant guidance" means an agency statement of general applicability and future effect, other than a regulation required by statute to be published for notice and comment, prepared for regulated entities or the general public to describe the agency's interpretation of or policy on a statutory, regulatory or technical issue that may:

(1) Reasonably be anticipated to lead to an annual effect of $100 million or more or adversely affect in a material way the economy, a sector of the economy, productivity, competition, jobs, the environment, public health or safety, or State, local, or tribal governments or communities;

(2) Create a serious inconsistency or otherwise interfere with an action taken or planned by another agency;

(3) Materially alter the budgetary impact of entitlements, grants, user fees, or loan programs or the rights or obligations of recipients thereof; or

(4) Raise novel legal or policy issues arising out of legal mandates, the President's priorities, or the principles set forth in this Executive order. It does not, however, include:

(A) Guidance on regulations or rules issued in accordance with the formal rulemaking provisions of 5 U.S.C. 556, 557;

(B) Guidances that pertain to a military or foreign affairs function of the United States, other than procurement regulations and regulations involving the import or export of non-defense articles and services;

(C) Guidances on regulations or rules that are limited to agency organization, management, or personnel matters; or

(D) Any other category of guidances exempted by the Administrator of OIRA."

DOJ_NMG_0009774

Sec. 4. Section 5 is amended by inserting after Section 5(c) the following:

"(d) For each rule with an annual effect of $1 billion or more, the agency shall provide for a reassessment of the benefits and costs of the rule, including a validity analysis comparing those impacts to the costs and benefits estimated for the rule when it originally was promulgated, the earlier of –

(1) 5 years after the effective date of a rule issued on or after January 1, 2006, or

(2) upon review of a rule issued before January 1, 2006, pursuant to a statute, Executive order, or other requirement."

Sec. 5. Sections 7 – 11 are redesignated respectively as Sections 8 - 12.

Sec. 6. After Section 6, a new Section 7 is inserted as follows:

"Sec. 7. Additional Agency Responsibilities. Each agency shall notify OMB of significant agency activities that may substantially affect regulatory policy in the following circumstances and manner:

(a) Significant Guidances. Each agency shall provide OIRA, at such times and in the manner specified by the Administrator of OIRA, with a list of its planned significant guidances. Upon the request of the Administrator, the issuing agency shall provide to OIRA the text of a draft agency action identified as, or determined by the Administrator to be, a significant guidance, together with a brief explanation of the need for the guidance and how it will meet that need.

(b) Consent Decrees and Settlements. Before a rulemaking agency enters into a proposed consent decree, settlement, or other judicial action that would impose requirements on a rulemaking agency that could reasonably be expected to lead to a significant regulatory action or a significant guidance document, the agency (before the agency agrees to the proposal) shall timely submit to the Department of Justice and OMB a written description of the proposal, including an assessment of how the action is consistent with applicable statutes, the principles of this Order, and the President's priorities. After such consent decree, settlement, or other judicial action is finalized and becomes public information, the agency shall publish a notice describing it in the Federal Register and make the document available to the public."

DOJ_NMG_0009775

THE WHITE HOUSE,

DOJ_NMG_0009776

To all:

Attached for comment is the Office of Management and Budget's proposed executive order entitled "Further Amendment to Executive Order 12866 on Regulatory Planning and Review."

On behalf of the Director of the Office of Management and Budget, this office is collecting input on this proposal. Please communicate any comments or objections to Mr. Mac Reed (e-mail: McGavock_D._Reed@omb.eop.gov; phone (202) 395-3563; fax (202) 395-7294) and copy Ms. Bess Weaver (e-mail: Bessie M. Weaver@omb.eop.gov; phone (202) 395-3556; fax (202) 395-7289) by cob, Friday, January 27, 2006. Please be advised that agencies not responding by that date will be recorded as not objecting to this proposal.

For your reviewing convenience, we have also attached a copy of Executive Order 12866 that shows the changes to be made by the proposed order in redline.

We have also attached a copy of the request for views memorandum and distribution list. (Please see Distribution List I.)

Thank you very much, Mac Reed

January 20, 2006

MEMORANDUM FOR DESIGNATED AGENCY HEADS
(SEE ATTACHED DISTRIBUTION LIST)

FROM: Mac Reed
Assistant General Counsel

SUBJECT: Proposed Executive Order entitled "Further Amendment to Executive Order 12866 on Regulatory Planning and Review"

Attached is a proposed executive order that was prepared by the Office of Management and Budget.

On behalf of the Director of the Office of Management and Budget, this office is collecting input on this proposal. Please communicate any comments or objections to Mr. Mac Reed (e-mail: McGavock_D._Reed@omb.eop.gov; phone (202) 395-3563; fax (202) 395-7294) and copy Ms. Bess Weaver (e-mail: Bessie M. Weaver@omb.eop.gov; phone (202) 395-3556; fax (202) 395-7289) by cob, Friday, January 27, 2006. Please be advised that agencies not responding by that date will be recorded as not objecting to this proposal.

For your reviewing convenience, we have also attached a copy of Executive Order 12866 that shows the changes to be made by the proposed order in redline.

Thank you.

Attachments - Distribution List I
Proposed Executive Order
Executive Order 12866, with redlined changes

cc: Josh Bolten
Joel Kaplan
Austin Smythe
Clay Johnson
John Graham
David Anderson
Joseph Bowab
Karen Evans
J. D. Foster
Noam Neusner
Dean Clancy
Linda Combs
Raul Yanes

DISTRIBUTION LIST I

Honorable Condoleezza Rice
Secretary
Department of State

Honorable John W. Snow
Secretary
Department of the Treasury

Honorable Donald Rumsfeld
Secretary
Department of Defense

Honorable Mike Johanns
Secretary
Department of Agriculture

Honorable Alphonso Jackson
Secretary
Department of Housing and Urban Development

Honorable Alberto Gonzales
Attorney General of the United States

Honorable Carlos Gutierrez
Secretary
Department of Commerce

Honorable Norman Y. Mineta
Secretary
Department of Transportation

Honorable Gale Norton
Secretary
Department of the Interior

Honorable Elaine L. Chao
Secretary
Department of Labor

Honorable Margaret Spellings
Secretary

Department of Education

Honorable Samuel Bodman
Secretary
Department of Energy

Honorable Michael O. Leavitt
Secretary
Department of Health and Human Services

Honorable R. James Nicholson
Secretary
Department of Veterans Affairs

Honorable Stephen L. Johnson
Administrator
Environmental Protection Agency

Honorable Michael Chertoff
Secretary
Department of Homeland Security

Honorable Porter Goss
Director
Central Intelligence Agency

Honorable Linda A. Springer
Director
Office of Personnel Management

Honorable Michael Griffin
Administrator
National Aeronautics and Space Administration

Honorable Stephen A. Perry
Administrator
General Services Administration

Honorable Hector V. Barreto, Jr.
Administrator
Small Business Administration

Honorable Stephen Hadley

Assistant to the President
for National Security Affairs

Honorable Robert Portman
United States Trade Representative

Honorable John H. Marburger III
Director
Office of Science and Technology Policy

Honorable Claude Allen
Assistant to the President
for Domestic Policy

Dr. Harvey S. Rosen
Council of Economic Advisers

Honorable Harriet Miers
Counsel to the President

Honorable David Addington
Chief of Staff to the Vice President

Honorable Brett Kavanaugh
Staff Secretary to the President

Honorable Liza Wright
Director of Presidential Personnel

Honorable Allan B. Hubbard
Assistant to the President for Economic Policy

Honorable Nicolle Wallace
Assistant to the President for Communications

Honorable Karl Rove
Senior Advisor to the President

Honorable David Hobbs
Assistant to the President and
Director of Legislative Affairs

Honorable Heidi Smith
Special Assistant to the President for Cabinet Liaison

Honorable Ruben Barrales
Deputy Assistant to the President
and Director of Intergovernmental Affairs

Honorable Francis Townsend
Assistant to the President
for Homeland Security and Counterterrorism

Honorable James L. Connaughton
Chairman
Council on Environmental Quality

Honorable John Straub
Special Assistant to the President and Director, Office of Administration

Mr. G. Timothy Saunders
Executive Clerk

DISTRIBUTION LIST II

Honorable Alberto Gonzales
Attorney General of the United States

Honorable Donald Rumsfeld
Secretary
Department of Defense

Honorable Michael Chertoff
Secretary
Department of Homeland Security

Honorable R. James Nicholson
Secretary
Department of Veterans Affairs

Honorable Porter Goss
Director
Central Intelligence Agency

Honorable Stephen J. Hadley
Assistant to the President
for National Security Affairs

Honorable Claude Allen
Assistant to the President
for Domestic Policy

Honorable Harriet Miers
Counsel to the President

Honorable Brett Kavanaugh
Staff Secretary to the President

Honorable David Addington
Chief of Staff to the Vice President

Honorable James L. Connaughton
Chairman
Council on Environmental Quality

Honorable John Marburger
Director
Office of Science and Technology Policy

Honorable Robert Portman
United States Trade Representative

Honorable Harvey S. Rosen
Council of Economic Advisers

Honorable John P. Walters
Director
Office of National Drug Control Policy

Honorable Allen B. Hubbard
Assistant to the President for Economic Policy

Honorable Dan Bartlett
Assistant to the President for Communications

Honorable Ruben Barrales
Deputy Assistant to the President
and Director of Intergovernmental Affairs

Honorable Liza Wright
Director of Presidential Personnel

Honorable Candi Wolff
Assistant to the President and
Director of Legislative Affairs

Honorable Heidi Marquez Smith
Special Assistant to the President
For Cabinet Liasion

Honorable Francis Townsend

Assistant to the President
for Homeland Security and Counterrorism

Honorable Barry Jackson
Deputy Assistant to the President and Deputy to the Senior Advisor

Honorable Sara Taylor
Deputy Assistant to the President
And Director of Political Affairs

Honorable Mike Gerson
Assistant to the President for Policy and Strategic Planning

Honorable Desiree T. Sayle
Deputy Assistant to the President and Director of USA Freedom Corps

Honorable Jim Towey
Assistant to the President and Director of the Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives

Mr. G. Timothy Saunders
Executive Clerk

Bryan.DelMonte@osd.mil

From:	Bryan.DelMonte@osd.mil
Sent:	Friday, January 20, 2006 4:55 PM
To:	Gorsuch, Neil M; nbruno@cfr.org; MBehringer@apprisemedia.com
Cc:	allenc@dodgc.osd.mil; beaverd@dodgc.osd.mil
Subject:	Reading Materials - DoD
Attachments:	tmp.htm; USCATREPORT2005.pdf

Neil/Mike:

Attached is the US Periodic Report to the Committee Against Torture submitted in 2005. I would advise the group to read the annex to this document as it explains in detail the basis (both policy and legal) of the Administration's positions on detention operations as well as providing a broad scope of information about DoD detention operations from the military.
I believe it is the most comprehensive and concise document produced by the government about detention operations and the GWOT.

Thanks.

Bryan

<<USCATREPORT2005.pdf>>

Neil/Mike:

Attached is the US Periodic Report to the Committee Against Torture submitted in 2005. I would advise the group to read the annex to this document as it explains in detail the basis (both policy and legal) of the Administration's positions on detention operations as well as providing a broad scope of information about DoD detention operations from the military. I believe it is the most comprehensive and concise document produced by the government about detention operations and the GWOT.

Thanks.

Bryan

<<USCATREPORT2005.pdf>>

UNITED NATIONS

CAT

Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Distr.
GENERAL

CAT/C/48/Add.3
29 June 2005

Original: ENGLISH

COMMITTEE AGAINST TORTURE

CONSIDERATION OF REPORTS SUBMITTED BY STATES PARTIES UNDER ARTICLE 19 OF THE CONVENTION

Second periodic reports of States parties due in 1999*

Addendum *** ****

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

[6 May 2005]

---

* The Committee against Torture decided at its twenty-fourth session to request the second periodic report of the United States by 19 November 2001 (see A/55/44), para. 180 (f)).

 The initial report submitted by the Government of the United States of America is contained in document CAT/C/28/Add.5; for its consideration by the Committee, see documents CAT/C/SR.424, 427 and 431 and Official Records of the General Assembly, Fifty-fifth Session, Supplement No. 44 (A/55/44), paras. 175-180.

 The attachments to annex 1 and annexes 2 and 7 to the present report submitted by the Government of the United States of America may be consulted in the files of the secretariat.

* In accordance with the information transmitted to States parties regarding the processing of their reports, the present document was not formally edited before being sent to the United Nations translation services.

GE.05-42590 (E) 160905

CONTENTS

		Paragraphs	Page
I.	INTRODUCTION	1 - 10	3
II.	INFORMATION ON NEW MEASURES AND NEW DEVELOPMENTS RELATING TO THE IMPLEMENTATION OF THE CONVENTION	11 - 142	4
	Article 1	11 - 15	4
	Article 2	16 - 29	5
	Article 3	30 - 43	11
	Article 4	44	16
	Article 5	45 - 52	16
	Articles 6 and 7	53	19
	Article 8	54 - 55	20
	Article 9	56	20
	Article 10	57 - 59	20
	Article 11	60 - 62	21
	Article 12	63	21
	Article 13	64 - 78	21
	Article 14	79 - 84	25
	Article 15	85 - 86	26
	Article 16	87 - 142	27
III.	ADDITIONAL INFORMATION REQUESTED BY THE COMMITTEE	143	42
IV.	OBSERVATIONS ON THE COMMITTEE'S CONCLUSIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS	144 - 165	42
V.	ANNEXES		47
	Annex 1
	Part One - Individuals Under the Control of U.S. Armed Forces Captured During Operations Against Al-Qaida, the Taliban and their Affiliates and Supporters		47
	Part Two - Individuals Under the Control of U.S. Armed Forces in Iraq Captured During Military Operations		70

I. INTRODUCTION

1. The Government of the United States of America welcomes the opportunity to report to the Committee Against Torture on measures giving effect to its undertakings under the Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (Torture Convention), pursuant to Article 19 thereof and on other information that may be helpful to the Committee. The organization of this Second Periodic report follows the General guidelines regarding the form and contents of periodic reports to be submitted by states parties (CAT/C/14/Rev.1).

2. This report was prepared by the U.S. Department of State ("Department of State") with extensive assistance from the U.S. Department of Justice ("Department of Justice"), the U.S. Department of Homeland Security ("Department of Homeland Security"), the U.S. Department of Defense ("Department of Defense") and other relevant departments and agencies of the United States Government. Except where otherwise noted, the report covers the situation for the period after October 1999 and prior to March 1, 2005.

3. The United States submitted its Initial Report to the Committee Against Torture in October 1999 (CAT/C/28/Add.5), hereafter referred to as "Initial Report". It made its oral presentation of that report to the Committee on May 10-15, 2000. Accordingly, the purpose of this Second Periodic Report is to provide an update of relevant information arising since the submission of the Initial Report.

4. Since the Initial Report, with the attacks against the United States of September 11, 2001, global terrorism has fundamentally altered our world. In fighting terrorism, the U.S. remains committed to respecting the rule of law, including the U.S. Constitution, federal statutes, and international treaty obligations, including the Torture Convention.

5. The President of the United States has made clear that the United States stands against and will not tolerate torture under any circumstances. On the United Nations International Day in Support of Victims of Torture, June 26, 2004, the President confirmed the continued importance of these protections and of U.S. obligations under the Torture Convention, stating:

> …[T]he United States reaffirms its commitment to the worldwide elimination of torture . . . . To help fulfill this commitment, the United States has joined 135 other nations in ratifying the Convention Against Torture and other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment. America stands against and will not tolerate torture. We will investigate and prosecute all acts of torture and undertake to prevent other cruel and unusual punishment in all territory under our jurisdiction….
>
> These times of increasing terror challenge the world. Terror organizations challenge our comfort and our principles. The United States will continue to take seriously the need to question terrorists who have information that can save lives. But we will not compromise the rule of law or the values and principles that make us strong. Torture is wrong no matter where it occurs, and the United States will continue to lead the fight to eliminate it everywhere. See Annex 2.

6. The United States is unequivocally opposed to the use and practice of torture. No circumstance whatsoever, including war, the threat of war, internal political instability, public emergency, or an order from a superior officer or public authority, may be invoked as a justification for or defense to committing torture. This is a longstanding commitment of the United States, repeatedly reaffirmed at the highest levels of the U.S. Government.[1]

7. All components of the United States Government are obligated to act in compliance with the law, including all United States constitutional, statutory, and treaty obligations relating to torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.[2] The U.S. Government does not permit, tolerate, or condone torture, or other unlawful practices, by its personnel or employees under any circumstances. U.S. laws prohibiting such practices apply both when the employees are operating in the United States and in other parts of the world.

8. The legal and policy framework through which the United States gives effect to its Convention undertakings has not changed fundamentally since the Initial Report. Unless otherwise noted, the scope of the relevant protections afforded by the United States Constitution and comparable state constitutions, as well as the statutory and regulatory provisions governing the criminal justice system, detention conditions, and the relevant immigration laws and policies continue to apply. Furthermore, the U.S. federal court cases that have referenced the Torture Convention in some way since October, 1999, numbering well over 1000, illustrate the real impact of U.S. Convention undertakings on the U.S. legal system.[3]

9. By letter of May 21, 2004, the Committee requested "updated information concerning the situation in places of detention in Iraq, up to the time of the submission of the report." In Annex 1, Part Two the United States provides a discussion and related materials relevant to its detention of individuals under the control of U.S. Armed Forces in Iraq captured during military operations. The United States provides similar information in Annex 1, Part One, with respect to detentions of individuals under the control of U.S. Armed Forces in Afghanistan and Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

10. The United States is aware of allegations that detainees held in U.S. custody pursuant to the global war on terrorism have been subject to torture or other mistreatment. The President of the United States, as noted above, has clearly stated that torture is prohibited. When allegations of torture or other unlawful treatment arise, they are investigated and, if substantiated, prosecuted. These issues are addressed in detail in this report and its annexes with a view to conveying the seriousness of the commitment of the United States on these issues.

II. INFORMATION ON NEW MEASURES AND NEW DEVELOPMENTS RELATING TO THE IMPLEMENTATION OF THE CONVENTION

Article 1 (Definition)

11. The definition of torture accepted by the United States upon ratification of the Convention and reflected in the understanding issued in its instrument of ratification remains unchanged. The definition of torture is codified in U.S. law in several contexts.

12. As explained in the Initial Report, this definition is codified at Chapter 113B of Title 18 of the United States Code, which provides federal criminal jurisdiction over an extraterritorial act or attempted act of torture if (1) the alleged offender is a national of the United States or (2) if the alleged offender is present in the United States, irrespective of the nationality of the victim or alleged offender. See 18 U.S.C. §§ 2340 and 2340A, as amended (the extraterritorial criminal torture statute), which is set forth in Annex 5. On October 26, 2001, the Uniting and Strengthening America by Providing Appropriate Tools Required to Intercept and Obstruct Terrorism Act of 2001 (USA PATRIOT Act), Pub. L. 107-56, Title VIII, § 811(g), amended § 2340A to add an explicit conspiracy provision with strengthened penalties to the substantive offense described in the extraterritorial criminal statute. This prohibition on torture and conspiracy to torture extends, inter alia, to U.S. employees and U.S. contractors of the United States anywhere in the world outside of the United States, provided that the conduct falls within the enumerated elements of the statute. At the time of the enactment of 18 U.S.C. §§ 2340, 2340A, 18 U.S.C. § 2 already punished those who aid, abet, counsel, command, induce, procure or cause the commission of an offense against the United States.

13. On December 30, 2004 the Department of Justice's Office of Legal Counsel (OLC), which provides legal advice to the Executive Branch, published a memorandum that addresses the legal standards applicable under the extraterritorial criminal torture statute. This memorandum is available at Annex 3 and at http://www.usdoj.gov/olc/dagmemo.pdf. Under the language Congress adopted in enacting the statute, in order to constitute "torture" under § 2340 -2340A, the conduct in question must have been "specifically intended to inflict severe physical or mental pain or suffering." The December 30, 2004 memorandum separately considers each of the principal components of that key phrase: (1) the meaning of "severe"; (2) the meaning of "severe physical pain or suffering"; (3) the meaning of "severe mental pain or suffering"; and (4) the meaning of "specifically intended." The memorandum supersedes an earlier memorandum of that same office in August 2002 on the same statute, discussing the definition of torture and the possible defenses to torture under U.S. law. The Department of Justice had previously withdrawn the August 2002 memorandum.

14. Torture is also defined in the immigration and extradition regulations that implement U.S. obligations under Article 3, as discussed below. See 8 Code of Federal Regulations (C.F.R.) § 208.18(a) and 22 C.F.R. § 95.1(b).

15. The term "torture" is also defined in the Torture Victim Protection Act (TVPA), 28 U.S.C. § 1350, note, which, as discussed in greater detail in paragraph 82 below, permits victims of torture and extrajudicial killings to claim damages for such abuses.

Article 2 (Prohibition)

16. As indicated in the Initial Report, in the U.S. legal system, acts of torture are prohibited by law and contrary to U.S. policy, subject to prompt and impartial investigations, and punished by appropriate sanction. As noted above, the core legal framework through which the United States gives effect to its Convention undertakings to prevent acts of torture has not changed fundamentally since the Initial Report. As explained in the Initial Report, it is clear that any act of torture falling within the Torture Convention definition would in fact be criminally prosecutable in every jurisdiction within the United States. Such acts may be prosecuted, for example, as assault, battery or mayhem in cases of physical injury; as homicide, murder or manslaughter, when a killing results; as kidnapping, false imprisonment or abduction where an unlawful detention is concerned; as rape, sodomy, or molestation; or as part of an attempt, or a conspiracy, an act of racketeering, or a criminal violation of an individual's civil rights.

17. Since the Initial Report, the jurisdiction to prosecute torture as well as other serious abuses short of torture that are committed outside the United States has been expanded. The extraterritorial jurisdiction to prosecute torture and other serious abuses is discussed in greater detail under Article 5.

18. Throughout this report, we refer to numerous specific actions that the United States is taking to combat various forms of serious abuse. Although the examples cited throughout the report do not necessarily involve acts of torture as defined under Article 1 of the Convention, as ratified by the United States, or cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment as defined under Article 16 of the Convention, as ratified by the United States, they are included to illustrate the commitment of the United States, or as the case may be, the sub-Federal level authorities in the United States, to prevent and prosecute serious abuses, whether or not they fall within these definitions of torture or cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.[4]

19. The United States is fully aware of allegations that U.S. military or intelligence personnel have subjected detainees in various locations to torture. Allegations with respect to the military are discussed in more detail in Annex 1. The numerous statements by Executive Branch officials condemning the use of torture, made in response to allegations of abuse arising out of detentions in Afghanistan, Guantanamo Bay and Iraq, have emphasized that torture is prohibited as a matter of U.S. law. When allegations of abuses arise, they in all cases will be investigated and, if substantiated, prosecuted. As described in the Initial Report, the Congress of the United States has authorized a separate system of military justice for members of the United States armed forces. Members of the armed forces are subject to the Uniform Code of Military Justice, which, among other things, includes a specific offense of cruelty or maltreatment. See Annex 1. Annex 1 provides a description of the investigations into abuse allegations arising out of detentions of individuals under the control of U.S. Armed Forces in Afghanistan, Iraq and Guantanamo Bay, Cuba and actions to hold personnel of the U.S. armed forces accountable under the military justice system when they have been found to have committed unlawful acts. See Annex 1. Allegations regarding intelligence activities are currently under review by the Inspector General of the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA). That office has reported and will continue to report its findings to the Director of the Central Intelligence Agency and the Congressional Intelligence Oversight Committees and will continue to forward substantiated cases of abuse for investigation and prosecution to the Department of Justice.

20. Federal criminal prosecutions of complaints about abuse. Since the Initial Report, complaints about abuse including physical injury by individual law enforcement officers continue to be made and are investigated, and if the facts so warrant, officers are prosecuted by federal and state authorities. As described in the Initial Report, the Criminal Section of the Department of Justice's Civil Rights Division is charged with reviewing such complaints made to the Federal Government and ensuring the vigorous enforcement of the federal statutes that make torture, or any willful use of excessive force, illegal. The Department of Justice is committed to investigating all incidents of willful use of excessive force by law enforcement officers and to prosecuting federal law violations should action by the local and state authorities fail to vindicate the federal interest. Between October 1, 1999 and January 1, 2005, 284 officers were convicted of violating federal civil rights statutes. Most of these law enforcement officers were charged with using excessive force.

21. Below are some significant examples of recent federal law enforcement prosecutions that occurred between October 1, 1999 and January 1, 2005:

- On September 7, 2004, a Texas police officer was convicted on federal civil rights charges under 18 U.S.C. § 242 for repeatedly assaulting a handcuffed man while the officer was acting under color of law during an arrest, and then attempting to cover up his actions. The police officer first kicked and choked the man, who was handcuffed to the side of a police car, then proceeded to stick his gun barrel into the victim's mouth, threatening to kill him. As of January 1, 2005, the defendant had not yet been sentenced;

- On July 14, 2004, an Oklahoma police officer was convicted and awaits sentencing for assaulting and fracturing the hip of a 67-year-old man he stopped for a traffic violation. The officer was prosecuted under 18 U.S.C. § 242 for the willful unreasonable seizure of the victim under the color of law;

- On May 19, 2004, a Louisiana detention officer was convicted and is awaiting sentencing for repeatedly throwing a handcuffed detainee against a wall resulting in significant lacerations to his face. The officer was prosecuted under 18 U.S.C. § 242 for the willful deprivation of the victim's liberty without due process under color of law;

- On March 25, 2004, the United States Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit affirmed the conviction and sentence of a former deputy sheriff with the Jacksonville, Florida Sheriff's Department, who was charged and convicted for kidnapping, murdering, and stealing money from motorists, bank customers, and drug dealers whom he falsely arrested in 1998 and 1999. The deputy sheriff was sentenced to life in prison for, among other charges, the violation of 18 U.S.C. § 241 for conspiracy to deprive one of the victims of life and the others of liberty and property without due process under color of law;

- On September 24, 2003, a North Carolina police officer pleaded guilty to a felony civil rights charge for coercing women, whom he stopped or arrested, into having sex with him. He was sentenced to ten years in prison for willful deprivation of liberty without due process under color of law;

- On January 29, 2002, a North Carolina chief of police was convicted of using excessive force in seven separate incidents, involving six separate arrestees. The defendant was sentenced to 37 months in prison for willfully conducting unreasonable seizures under color of law in violations of 18 U.S.C. § 242;

- On May 27, 2001, the last of five male orderlies at a state-run care facility for developmentally disabled adults near Memphis, Tennessee was convicted for routinely beating residents. One of these beatings resulted in the death of a developmentally disabled patient who could not cry out for help because he was mute. The orderlies received sentences ranging from 60 to 180 months in prison under 18 U.S.C. § 242 for willful deprivation of the victim's liberty without due process under color of law;

